XUM

TO THE LADIES.

THIS to the Altar of your perfections (fairest Ladies) That the Incomparable Courage of the noble Clelia flyes for Protection; nor doth ſhe fear you will prove leſs kind to her then the Rapid ſtreams of a deep River, or the devouring flames of thoſe fiery mountains wherewith Italy abounds: But 'tis not ſo much the Remembrance of her dangers paſt, as the Conſideration of her pains willingly taken for your beautiful Sex in paſſing the Seas, and changing not only her Language but her Country, that invites her thus chearfully to caſt her ſelf on your Mercies, and earneſtly deſire your kind acceptation, however that you may not think ſhe comes empty handed and expects entertaiment meerly upon charity; Survey her with an indifferent eye, and you ſhall find her abounding with ſuch Variety of Delights, as will eaſily defray her charges: For my part (Ladies) the Grand Inducement I had to beſtow thoſe few vacant hours (I ſometimes enjoy) on this work was chiefly to pleaſure you, and withal to endeavor to render the admirable Clelia as neatly dreſt in Engliſh, as her Famous Author Monſieur de Scudery hath ſet her forth in French. Compare Mandana with Clelia, the Princeſs of the Medes and Perſians with an Illuſtrious Roman Lady, and you will perceive in both ſo many, but withal ſuch different Adventures, as ſhall by the Truth of Hiſtory and Illuſtration of Fiction ſatisfie both your curioſity and delight.

THE AUTHORS DEDICATION TO MADEMOISELLE DE LONGUEVILLE.

MADAM,

Is a Maid that Rome ador'd, which now ſpying a neerer approach to Divinity in You, tranſmits all her Honors, and ſubmiſſively bows to a brighter Beauty. She comes to tell you, that if this age pay'd a juſt reſpect to Vertue, we had long ſince Dedicated an Altar to your Highneſs, where every Generous Heart would have ambition'd to be a ſacrifice. And though there are few Princeſſes, whoſe veins wear ſo rich a purple as yours, yet you derive greater Ennoblements from your Merit, then extraction. Many Pillars of State have been carved from your Illuſtrious Stock; but thoſe Excellencies which ſingly adorn'd your Anceſtors, are all Centred, and comprehended in you, not abridg'd, but bound up in one Fair Volume: Perſons of your Quality are often dazell'd with their own Splendor, and abus'd with the falſe Elogies of others; but nature hath given you the beſt antidote againſt Flattery, I mean to tranſcend it: for that which applyed to others would be complement and Hyperbole, when addreſſed to you, is frigid and poor, and falls beneath the ſublime truth. Your Glorious example has made goodneſs the Faſhion at Court; and 'tis yet a Problem, whether that profound Veneration which all render you, be more attracted by that Royal blood which you poſſeſs, or allur'd by your Exalted Vertue; Permit me Madam peculiarly to admire your elemency and condeſcenſion, when you teach your Eyes ſo low a flight, as with humble Raies to warm and cheriſh your inferiors: In this you reſemble the Monarch of Cœleſtial Bodies who ingroſſes not his Treaſury of Light, but communicates his Beams, and illuſtrates the World. All that have beheld you will atteſt, that a more accurate Idea of Beauty never ſprung from a raptured fancy, then you really enjoy: Never was any informed with a clearer and more vigorous Spirit: never were theſe perfections crowned with a ſincerer Goodneſs: 'Tis here, Madam, that Clelia takes ſanctuary, and that fair Roman, whoſe courage ſcorned the ſwelling pride of Tyber, (when ſhe ſubmitted her delicate limbs to the waves, and rode upon that Trydent, which ſways the liquid Empire) now croſſes the Ocean, to tender you a Legitimate duty: I ſhall oblige her to blend my intereſt with hers; Since I have had the Glory to be eſteemed by Madam your Mother, and the Count of Soiſſons your Uncle; And your Highneſs knows beſt my eminent ingagements to Madam de Longveuille and her Family; I value it as no ſmall honour, that ſome of my alliance have been numbred in your Retinue; In fine, I my ſelf have intirely compleated ſeven years under the command of my Lord the Prince of Carignan your Uncle, in the Arms of the Great Charles Emanuel his Father, whoſe affection I muſt ever eſteem as the choyſeſt largeſs of my Fortune. Theſe incouragements (Madam) have made Clelia preſume your ſhelter: ſhe promiſes her ſelf a luſtre from your ſhadow; which though you vouchſafe; my felicity will not be compleat, except you add the permiſſion of being all my Life,

that

CLELIA.

The First Part.

BOOK I.

NEver was there a fairer day, then that which ſhould have preceded the Nuptials of the Illuſtrious Aronces, and the Admirable Clelia; and ſince the Sun firſt did crown the Spring with Roſes and Lillies, it never caſt more pure beams upon the fertile Fields of the delicious Capua, nor diſplay'd more Luminous Radiations o're the Waves of the famous Vulturnus, which ſo pleaſantly watered one of the faireſt Countries in the World: The Heaven was Serene, the River calm, all the Winds were laid aſleep in thoſe dark Caverns, whoſe Intricate Meanders they only were acquainted with, and the gentle Zephyrus could do no more than fan the fair hairs of the Incomparable Clelia, who being now on the point to complete the felicity of the moſt perfect of Lovers, made it appear by her Eyes that the Elements enjoy'd no more tranquillity than ſhe had in her Soul. As for Aronces, though he was more joyful then Clelia, love being more predominant in him, yet was he not without many Inquietudes, which produc'd a certain agitation of Spirit, thinking with himſelf he ſhould not ſufficiently teſtifie the greatneſs of his paſſion, if the only hope of being abſolutely happy the next day had entirely ſatisfied him; he murmured much againſt the length of the days, though it was one of the firſt in the Spring, and he now numbred the hours as Ages; This pleaſing anxiety proceeding from an amorous Impatience, did nothing diſcompoſe his uſual temper ſometimes clouded by moſt ſtrange Diſtractions of his Spirit, which perſwaded him ſome doleful accident might intervene whereby his happineſs might be retarded as formerly it had been; for e're this he had Eſpouſed his Miſtreſs had not the River on whoſe Banks was ſituated a ſtately Houſe wherein Clelius reſolv'd to conſummate his Daughters Nuptials, with ſuch a ſudden violence exceeded its prefixed limits that 'twas impoſſible to ſolemnize any Feaſt there during this terrible Inundation, the Waters continually encreas'd for the ſpace of twelve hours, the Wind, Lightning, Thunder, and a dreadful Shower of Rain ſo multiplying the horrour of this fatal Deluge, that there was generally fear'd a total ruine and deſolation: the water of the River ſeem'd to reach the Skies, and conjoyn'd, with that the Heavens pour'd down, agitated by thoſe impetuous Tempeſts, roar'd as the ſwelling Billows of an angry Sea, or the falling of the moſt rapid Torrents: this violent eruption of the River, much diſordered this Region of delight; for it demoliſh'd Buildings both publick and private, rooted up Trees, covered the Fields with Sand and Stones, levell'd Hills, furrowed the Plains, and changed the whole face of this little Country, but when it had wholly ſpent its fury, 'twas evidently ſeen that this inundation had in ſome places, unburied the ruines of divers Tombs, whoſe Inſcriptions were half effaced, and in others it had diſcovered great Columns of Marble, with many other precious Materials; ſo that this place inſtead of being deprived of its former beauty, received a more additional luſtre from thoſe new acquired Ornaments. 'Twas nigh thoſe ineſtimable ruins that Aronces and Clelia (conducted by Clelius and Sulpicia his Wife attended by a ſmall ſelect train, which ſhould be the next day at the Nuptial Ceremonies of theſe two Illuſtrious Lovers) walked with much pleaſure and delight. Aronces not now remembring the former Impediments of his Rivals, all things as it were ſmiling at his approaching happineſs, and Clelia ſo complying with his deſires, that it was impoſſible the remaining rigour of his deſtiny ſhould wholly ſilence his exceſſive joy, though 'twas ſometimes intermixt, as I have formerly told you with ſome Inquietudes; therefore to acquaint her with the ſweet tranſportments of his Soul, he led her ten or twelve paces from the agreeable company which followed him, imagining what he ſaid to her when ſhe was alone, would make a deep impreſſion in her mind, but after a general, when he would have proceeded to a particular Converſation, and turned his head to ſee whether he could be heard by any but Clelia; he ſaw appear at the entrance of a little Wood the gallanteſt of his Rivals called Horatius, accompanied by ſome of his Friends; this ſight without doubt much ſurpriſed Aronces, but much more Clelia, who fearing there might happen ſome ſad accident, left Aronces to go to her Father, to oblige him to intercede between Horatius and her Lover, that there might ariſe no contention between them: ſcarce had ſhe gone five or ſix paces, but a terrible Earthquake, which is uſual in this Country, began ſo ſuddenly with ſuch impetuoſity, that the Earth opened between Aronces and Clelia, roaring like the mutinous Waves of the diſturbed Ocean;

there issued from it such an horrible flame, that it deprived them from entertaining their eyes with their beloved Object, Aronces only seeing himself surrounded with waving flames, which assuming as many various forms, as are sometimes seen in the Clouds presented to his view the most terrible Object any Imagination can fancy, their blew colour interweav'd with red, yellow, and green, winding themselves in many different manners, rendred the sight of those flames so dreadful, that any but Aronces had certainly fainted in such an occasion; for this Abyss which was opened between Aronces and Clelia, and which had so violently separated them, represented such an horrid spectacle, that it cannot be limned by the most exactest Pencil, and a black smoke having darkned the Sun and obscured the Air as if it had been night; there sometimes issued from this Infernal Gulph a great quantity of tumultuous flames, which afterwards dilating themselves in the Air, were carried as Whirl winds of fire by the winds which now rose from all places; but he was more surprised when he heard all places resound both with Celestial and Subterranean Thunders, which by terrible Convulsions of the Earth seemed to shake the Center of the World, and to remit nature to its first Chaos, a thousand burning stones slung from this flaming Gulph were shot into the Air with fearful hissings, and fell again into the Fields, either nigher or further, according to the impetuosity which carried them, or their own weight made them fall, in some places of the Plain flames boyled as springs of fire, and there exhal'd from these fires such a sulphureous Odor, that it almost suffocated all which were nigh them, and in the midst of all these fires from many parts their flowed divers Torrents which in some places extinguished the flame, and many others were themselves consumed by the fires which opposed them: And to finish this desolation there issued from that Abyss such a prodigious quantity of burning ashes, that the Earth, Air, and River were either entirely fill'd or cover'd with them. In the mean time as the Earth shook more and more, the house where the Solemnities of Clelia's Nuptials were to be kept, was wholly everted, the Hamlet where it was scituated, buried in its own ruins, many Flocks were destroyed, and many men perish'd, and there was never heard of such a dreadful disorder, for those which were on the Land sought little Boats to put themselves on the River, thinking to be safer there, and those which were on the River speedily landed, imagining there was less peril on the shore; those in the Plains fled to the Mountains, and those in the Mountains descended into the Plains, those which were in the Woods endeavoured to gain the Fields, and those in the Fields to shelter themselves in the Woods, every one imagining that the place where he was not, was safer than that where he was.

In the midst of this horrible Earthquake, of these terrible flames, of these dreadful Thunders both Celestial and Subterranean, of those terrible flames, of those Impetuous Torrents, of this sulphurous Odor, of those burning Stones, of that Cloud of flaming ashes which destroyed so many men, and so many Flocks where the Earthquake did not Extend; in the midst, I say, of such an eminent Peril, Aronces who saw nothing living but himself, entertained his thoughts on nothing but his amiable Clelia, and fearing more her destruction than his own, he endeavoured by all means possible to overtake her: but he was not Master of his own Actions, for when he would have gone on one side, the Earthquake cast him on the other, so that he was forced to leave himself to the conduct of his fortune, which had freed him from such an Imminent Peril; but when this great storm was o'r-blown, those burning flames extinct, the Earth re-stated, the noise silenced, the darkness dissipated after it had lasted the remainder of that day, and all the night, Aronces found himself when Phœbus rose from his watry Couch on a Mount of Coals and Ashes, from whence he might take an exact survey of this sad Country: but he was much astonish'd when he saw neither the house where he lay, nor the Hamlet where it was, to see a Isle of the Wood quite overturn'd, and all the field spread with men or dead flocks; so that fear now possessing his Soul more then hope, he descended from that Hill of ashes, but as soon as he was descended he saw come forth of one of those Tombs that the over-flowing of the River had discovered, Clelius and Saryna which were retired thither, for by a fortunate Casualty the Earthquake had not destroyed them, at first Aronces much rejoyced to see them, hoping Clelia would have followed them from this Tomb, but when he had seen five of their friends, two men and three Women come out of it, he speedily advanced towards Sulpicia to whom he was nigheſt; I pray, said he, tell me what is become of Clelia; alas, answered this afflicted Mother, I came to demand the same of you, for I knew nothing but that at the same time as she left them to come to her father, I saw Horatius followed by those which accompanied her Majesty towards her, and I saw nothing afterwards but Whirl-winds of flames which forced Clelius and I to shelter our selves in those Tombs with those which were the nigheſt to us, Sulpicia had hardly pronounced those words, when Aronces without looking upon either Clelius, Sulpicia, or those which were with them, sought amongst those great Mountains of ashes without precise knowing what he sought for, Clelius and the rest did the like, to see whether they could find any sign of the life or death of Clelia; but the more they sought the more they encreased their grief, for they found one of Clelia's Maids stifled under those burning coals which fell upon her, and nigh her Body they saw one of her Lovers which partaked of the same Destiny: This lamentable, though sad Object obliged Aronces to wish the fate of that unhappy Lover, since he had the advantage to finish his dayes by his Mistress. But as these two persons needed not any ones assistance, they did not stay there, after Clelius had ordered two of his Domesticks he accidentally found, to take those bodies from under the the ashes, and to remain there till they heard further from him; whilst they were thus seeking what they could not find, there came many persons from all places, both from the neighbouring woods, from the ruinated houses, and from those new Concaves of the earth, to seek for their friends or kindred, for this Accident had dispersed all Families, some wept for their Fathers, others for their Children, some for their ruinated houses, others for their Flocks, and most for the fear only to have lost what they sought for; for though Earthquakes have been very frequent in this delightful Country, their grief was not the less abated, but amongst so many misfortunes which o'r-spread this unhappy Country, try, none equalled that of the unfortunate Aronces, his affliction was the more powerful because it tied up the Organs of his Speech, and 'twas easie at this time to discern the difference between the grief of a Father, Mother, and a Lover, for though Clelius and Sulpicia were much afflicted for their Daughter, yet Aronces his grief incomparably exceeded theirs; but in fine, seeing their hopes frustrated in not finding what they sought for; they believed Clelia might be escaped by a fortunate Accident as well as they; feeding themselves therefore with this fancy a year, they thought nothing more requisite than to return to Capua, to see whether some one had not brought her thither, and fortune propitious to their designs presented them the means to perform their intended Journey, by supplying them with an empty Chariot, which the Earthquake having only overturned, they easily disingaged from the ashes, and finding a man who knew how to guide it, they mounted into it, after the least afflicted of the company had given order to carry the bodies of those two Lovers to Capua, and obliged the rest to take a short repast at the first convenient Habitation; for 'twas remarkable in this Earthquake, that it extended but from the Town where the Nuptials of Aronces were to be kept to Nola, and from thence to Capua; it had only endamaged some places by the fall of the burning Cinders: the grief of Aronces much encreased when he arrived there, and heard no news neither of his dear Clelia nor his Rival, but a little after he knew Horatius was not dead, being advertised by one of his acquaintance, that an intimate friend of Horatius called Stenius, had read a Letter that morning from him; so that incited both by a curiosity and Eyes of passion, he went to his house, where not finding him, but being told he was gone to breath himself in a spacious Field behind Diana's Temple at Capua, he went thither, Stenius as soon as he saw him received him with much civility, though he was his friends Rival, so that Aronces hoping he would not refuse to satisfie his demands, thus civilly saluted him: I am not ignorant Stenius said he to him, that you are more Horatius his friend than mine, neither would I propose you to betray the secret he hath confided to you, but being certainly informed you have received a Letter from him this day: I come to pray, and earnestly beseech you to tell me whether he doth intimate unto you that Clelia is living. I demand not, said he, whither he goes, or where he is now, for I know honour forbids you to tell it me, so it doth not permit me to demand it of you, and I have such a good opinion of you, that I am perswaded if I should request such a Courtesie of you, you would easily grant it me; but I would not have the grandure of my affection force me to propound any unjust proposition; but Stenius all that I desire is, that favouring an afflicted Lover, you only tell me whether Clelia is living, without informing wherein Horatius intends to carry her, and to oblige you thereto: pursued he, if you do not satisfie my desires, I shall rest in the opinion that Clelia is not dead, but retained in my Rivals power; therefore I believe without infringing your fidelity to Horatius you may consent to my propositions: I do not deny, replied Stenius, but I have this day received a Letter from Horatius, and I confess I have it now about me, but I am much surprised at your strange demands, which I ought not to satisfie, and that I believe you would not your self do, if you were in my place; if I demanded any thing which might prejudice your friend, replied Aronces, you would have reason to use the said expressions; but that which I desire of you is to consolate an unhappy Lover, without any way prejudicing his Rival, and if you have ever loved, you would have never refused it me: I know not what I should do as a Lover, replied Stenius arrogantly, but I know as Horatius his friend, I ought not to acquaint you with any thing wherein he is interressed, and I account it an unworthy action of you to ask a thing which I cannot perform without violating the Laws of friendship, because you shall do it honourably, replied Aronces, putting his hand to his Sword, you must as well sustain your fidelity by your valour, as your wilful obstinacy, and you must defend the Letter of Horatius, since he will not tell me whether Clelia is living; at those words Stenius retiring some paces drew his Sword, and before any would separate them, Aronces had not only disarmed and vanquished Stenius, but had taken from him Horatius his Letter, after which he speedily retired to Clelius house, where he viewed his Rival's Letter, which contained these words.

Horatius to Stenius.

AN Earthquake having put the Rigorous Clelia in my power, I intend to reside at Perusia, where send me all things which he that gives you the Letter requires of you, and to augment my satisfaction, write me what despair possesses my Rival.

The reading of this Letter was so satisfactory to Aronces, as it cannot be expressed: for he not only learn'd that Clelia was living, but he likewise knew that his Rival carried her to a place where both honour and nature obliged him to go, and where he had not, it may be, so soon gone, if he had not been drawn thither by the attractive Loadstone of Love, so that acquainting Clelius and Sulpitia with his intention, he resolved to depart the next day, which he did, with an equipage only proportionable to Clelius Son-in-Law, attended but by three or four Slaves, and obliged an intimate friend, whose amity he had contracted at Capua; to perform this Voyage, in whose bosom he emptied his most secret thoughts, that if this Journey should happily succeed he might share his fortune; This affectionate friend, called Celeres; being then the sole consolation of Aronces, they departed from Capua, after they had left order with Clelius and Sulpitia, to send them by a safe conduct all things which were necessary to accomplish the Voyage and wished success of Aronces; these two friends began and pursued their intended Journey without any Obstacle, though 'twas a tedious way, till arriving one night at the Banks of the Lake of Thrasymene, they stayed to consider its Beauty, and truly it merited the curious observation of such gallant Spirits as Aronces and Celeres, for as there are three fair and pleasant isles, every one fortified by a strong yet stately Castle, and round about the Lake many Villages and Hamlets which rendred these Islands the fairest in the world; but Aronces and Celeres had scarce the time to consider the grandure and beauty of this Lake, when they saw come from the Point of this Isle two little Barks, in one of which Aronces saw his dear Clelia, and Horatius with six men with swords in their hands, which defended themselves against ten which were in the other; this Object so surprised him that he could not at first believe his eyes, but Celeres having confirmed him, 'twas no deception of his sight, he really believed he saw both his Mistress and his Rival, and it seemed to him that he which was at the prow of the other Bark was the Prince of Numidia whom he dearly loved, Aronces was at this time much perplexed, because there was no Boat nigher than the space of two miles, as the Guide of the Country told him, which should conduct him to Perusia, so that he must resolve to go thither, for as these two Barks fighting with one another went still further from him, as if they would have gone to the second Isle of the Lake, he imagined if he should have enterprized to swim, 'twas impossible his horse to overtake them, Horatius causing his men so diligently to ply their Oars; so that seeing no likelyhood to assist his Mistress, unless he went speedily to the place where he was informed he might find many Boats, therefore he spur'd his horse towards part of the Lake which runs into a great Wood, which he must of necessity pass to go to an Habitation where his Guide assured him he might be supplied with Boats, but as he went thither he look'd towards the two Boats which fought, and saw to his great grief that they still went further from him, and that he must loose sight of them before he could come to approach them: as he was now buried in a deep Sea of distracted thoughts, and rode with a swift pace towards that part of the Coast, where he was informed he might procure Boats, his Friend whose spirit was not so possessed as his, heard a noise of Arms and Horses, which made him turn his head to see whether their men followed them, but he saw neither their men nor their Guide; for as Aronces and he had rode very fast, the Wood deprived them of their sight, so that calling to Aronces that he should take care of himself, and not lightly engage himself, he told him what he heard, his melancholy not permitting him to hear it; but he had scarce acquainted him with it, when a Slave covered with blood came from amongst the Trees running towards them, and addressing his Speech to them; I beseech you, said he, whosoever you are, assist the Prince of Perusia which Traitors would assassinate; at these words, Aronces lifted his eyes to Heaven, to demand as it were, what he should do in such an occasion, when so many puissant reasons made him unresolv'd; but he was not long considering of it, for he saw an ancient man of a gallant presence, whom the Slave told him was Mezentius Prince of Perusia, who retired back, defending himself from six men which pursued him, one of which, which seemed to be the Captain so vigorously assailed him, that he was ready to thrust his Sword through his Body; for though Mezentius was valiant, he was not in a posture to resist these Assailants, being hurt in two places, and having but a Trunchion of his Sword to put by their thrusts, the other part being broken by the weightiness of their blows; such a compassionate Object dispelled the irresolution of Aronces, so that he cast himself with an incredible valour before the Prince of Perusia and his Enemy, who was ready to fix his heart, and Celeres so powerfully seconded Aronces, that at the second blow he gave the Captain of the Assassinats, he dyed his Sword with his blood; Mezentius looking upon these Strangers as Protectors the Gods had sent him, and not knowing they knew who he was, told them for their encouragemen that they served a Prince who knew how to recompence them, but they had not need to be prompted to perform Heroick Actions, their valour making it sufficiently evident when they had their Swords in their hands.

In the mean time, as those six men which assaulted Mezentius were very resolute, and the principal of them, one of the valianteſt in the World; Aronces and Celeres were at first involved in much danger, but after Aronces had killed one and hurt two, he set so vigorously upon him, which appeared to be Master of the rest, warding all his blows, and not letting slip any advantage, whilst Celeres and their men which were now arrived, fought with the others that he forced him to flie, and so strictly pursued him, that he push'd him against some great Trees the wind had overthrown, so that not having any power to retreat further, he thrust his Sword through his body, and saw him fall dead at his feet: But as he was in this Estate, one of those which fled before Celeres who pursued them, wounded Aronces in the thigh, thinking to pierce his body, but he was chastised for his presumption by him who received it, who discharged such a weighty blow on his head, that he o'rthrew him dead at his feet.

In the mean time Mezentius who was very old, was so weakned by the effusion of his blood from those wounds he had received, that he was constrained to alight from his Horse, and to lean against a Tree, supported by that faithful Slave, who had spoken to Aronces and Celeres, on the other side the Protector of that Prince not being able longer to endure the agitation of his Horse, because of the hurt in his thigh, was much afflicted, seeing he could not further prosecute his intended Journey, but hoping the service he had rendred this Prince, might claim an acknowledgment and protection from him, he went, though with much difficulty, towards this Prince, who was then accompanied by many men of Quality which were come from divers places of the Wood, when he would have entreated him to send some of his men to help a distressed Virgin of a noble Extraction which was forcibly carried away; this Prince was so suddenly bereaved both of his Sight and Speech, that Aronces not being hearkned to by any, they being all imployed to recover the fainting speech of this Prince, was reduced to a most deplorable condition; so that without considering either his hurt, or the pain thereof, he went on foot followed by his Friend to the Lake, to see whether he could yet see those Barks he had seen, but Night now began to Curtain the whole Hemisphere, and so many thick Mists o'r-spead the Lake, that they could hardly see the Islands which were there, and further from seeing the two little Barks, so that the unhappy Lover wholly immerged in grief, and not regarding his hurt, a man of Quality conducted by Mezentius, his Slave came to him, who told him, that the Prince a little after he had left him, coming to himself, had commanded that they should take as much care of him to whom he owed his life, as of his own person, and 'twas for that reason he sought for him, and Sycanus, for so was this man named; further intreated him that he would be pleased to go into a Boat which was about fifty paces from them

them to be transported to the next Island, where he should be accommodated with all necessaries whatsoever, for in fine said Sycanus, as there is but one Chariot to carry the Prince to Perusia, and that 'tis too late for you to ride thither in the condition you are in, you had better to go to the Castle in the Island, where I offer you on the Princes part all that depends on me, it being under my command. Aronces hearing Sycanus his proposition, joyfully accepted of it, but withall desired him that instead of going directly to the Isle, he would permit him to seek upon the Lake for two Barques which he had seen a little before he had the happiness to lend his assistance to Mezentius, telling him more easily to induce him thereto, that he was obliged to succour a Noble Virgin which was in one of those Barques, but Sycanus answered him, that he being not in a condition to go himself, whilst he went to the Island, he would go with his Friend in another Boat to endeavour to satisfie his desires, though with little hope of success, because of the greatness of the Lake, the time that was elapsed, since he saw the two Barques, the thickness of the mists and the approaching night; Aronces answered that he had been told by Marriners, that they could see more clear in the night upon the water when there were mists, then when there was none, and that he would go himself, so that not being able to be diverted from his Intentions, he caused the Boat wherein he was to be rowed more than three hours upon the Lake before he would consent to be landed at the Island, to have his hurts dress; but in the end knowing that which his love prompted him to was irrational, and Celeres having whispered to him, that if he would think to live, to deliver Clelia, and to revenge himself of his Rival, he should permit Sycanus to command his men to land them at the Willow Island; for by that name 'twas called to distinguish it from two others which are in the Lake of Thrasimene. As Sycanus was accomplish'd with all Noble Qualities, and was link'd in marriage with a Lady whose virtue and merit far surpassed those of her Sex, Aronces and Celeres were received into this Castle with as much Civility as Magnificence, Aronces being as well attended there as if he had been at Perusia, for as this Isle had many Inhabitants, and Sycanus usually resided there, it was furnish'd with very expert Chirurgions, and all things else both necessary and delicious; the apartment of Aronces was most magnificent; for as Perusia was then one of the richest Cities in Italy, except those on the Sea-Coast, and Sycanus being descended from one of the greatest and most Opulent houses of Perusia: this Castle was not only pleasantly situated, but richly adorned: the Chamber where Aronces was lodged, was in that Isle which nigh superview'd all the Lake, and from whence he might see the place where he had seen Clelia, though he could not bless his eyes with a sight of her, but he was not the only person which found assistance in this Island, for his wound was hardly dress't when one advertised Sycanus that there was a Barque landed, in which there was a man of a gallant Deportment, who was much hurt, and who demanded the favour of him to pass the Night in one of the Fisher's Cabins, that his hurts might be look'd too: but as Sycanus was too generous not to assist those which were unhappy when it lay in his power, he went himself to offer to this unknown all the assistance he required, and he so freely offered it him that he accepted of it, and was conducted to the Castle, and lodged in the Apartment far enough from Aronces; so that Celeres being with him to endeavour to consolate him, he did not know till the next morning; about three hours after the Sun was risen, that there was arrived an hurt Stranger at the Castle, he heard it from Sycanus his Wife which was called Aurelia, and who demanded of him when she gave him a Visit, if he was accommodated in the Apartment they had given him, because it look'd over a little Port where there was alway some noyse, for in fine, said she obligingly to him, as the Protector of the Prince; Mezentius may command some priviledge, if you are disturbed in that place where you are, we will give you another Lodging when we dislodge the other Stranger the gods have sent hither to be succoured as well as you: what, Madam, replied Aronces, is there arrived any more unhappy than I; yes Generous unknown, replied Aurelia, and he is more unhappy than you, because his hurts are more dangerous; O, Madam, replied Aronces, he may be more hurt than I, but he cannot be more unhappy: as Aronces had thus said, Celeres came into his Chamber to tell him that the Prince of Numidia was in the Castle, and that he had heard by one of his men that he was wounded fighting against Horatius, who had stollen away Clelia: I beseech you (Madam) said Aronces addressing his Speech to Aurelia, permit me, I pray, you to deprive my self of the honour of your presence, that I may go to the Prince of Numidia's Chamber, to whom I am very much obliged, and from whom I may happily learn something which imports me more than you can imagine, you are in such a bad condition to go, replied Aurelia, that I believe you ought not to enterprise it, without the permission of your Chirurgeons; O, Madam, replied Aronces, if you knew the Interest I have to see the Prince of Numidia, you would then be assured that I ought to consult none but my heart in this incounter, after that Aurelia affectively hearing that Aronces would go to the Prince of Numidia's Lodging, went to that of the Princess of the Leontines, whom divers Interests did at this time retain in that Castle, but she went not thither before she had told Celeres that it was for him to perswade Aronces not to destroy the cure she had resolved to have for the welfare of a man which had saved the life of the Prince Mezentius, and who merited if no reason had invited us thereto, that we should interess our selves both in his safety and recovery.

Celeres according to her directions would have induced Aronces to have sent him to the Numidian Prince who was named Adherball, to demand of him what he knew of Clelia, but 'twas impossible for him to divert his intended resolution, for after he was dress't, and had advertised the Prince of his coming, he went thither leaning on two Slaves, he was scarce come into the Prince his Chamber, when he said to him, pardon me, Sir, if the ardent desire I have to be satisfied by you what is become of Clelia, and her Ravisher against whom I saw you yesterday fight on the Lake, hinders me from giving you new demonstrations of that friendship we contracted at Carthage? Alas, my dear Aronces, replied Adherball, sighing, the Ravisher of Clelia after he had reduced me to the estate in which you now see me, caused his men to row so diligently that I soon lost sight of him, for my men seeing me hurt would not obey me, me, when I commanded them to follow Horatius with all the speed they could possible, and they took more care for the preservation of my life, than the performance of my commands, though they have exposed my life it may be to more danger by not obeying them; for in fine, my dear Aronces, now that I am in a place where no reasons oblige me to disguise my thoughts; I have loved Clelia since I first saw her at Carthage, and the commencement of our friendship proceeded from my love to her, imagining that if I should acquire your esteem, it might much conduce to the furtherance of my affection: Aronces was surprised at Adherbal's expressions, and finding him to be his Rival whom he only supposed his friend, he changed colour on a sudden, which Adherbal who did not know that Aronces loved Clelia, attributed to his friendship, not any way suspecting his love, so that obligingly resuming his discourse, I must ingenuously confess, said he, that after I had the happiness to be acquainted with you, if I had not loved Clelia, I should have esteemed Aronces, whose great merits command respect from all those which know him; it appears by your words, replied Aronces, that you do not well know me, and I am perswaded if you knew me better you would be of a contrary opinion; but as we are both in a condition not to give any great testimonies either of love or hatred, what thoughts soever sways our Soul, I think I had best leave you in repose and retire my self, and after Aronces had saluted Adherbal with a more reserved Civility than before; he returned to his Chamber, in such a despair as evidenced the greatness of his affliction; he was no sooner in his bed but Sycanus brought him a Noble man called Cilicies, whom Mezentius had sent to him with Complements both from himself and the Princess Aretale his Wife, so that Aronces being necessarily obliged to conceal his grief both from Sycanus and Cilicies, desired them to inform him who were those which would have assassinated Mezentius; though you are a Stranger, replied he which was sent from the Perusian Prince, it is not possible but you have heard ere you arrived at the Thrasymenean Lake, that Porsenna King of Chusium, and the Queen his Wife, have been retained Prisoners there these three and twenty years, by the Prince Mezentius his Father-in-Law: therefore without particularizing the cause of their long Imprisonment, I shall tell you in few words, that a Noble man called Thrachon, Native Subject of that unhappy King, being perswaded that it was lawful to act all manner of Crimes to deliver an Innocent Prince, had laid an Ambuscado in the Wood, where he obliged Mezentius to hunt, leading him from his men till he was to come to the place where he had set those which should assail Mezentius, who was strangly surprised when he saw him which he thought would defend him, put himself at the head of those Assassinats and assault him; and Mezentius now believes contrary to the opinion of all, that Porsenna was acquainted with this Conspiracy which plotted against him, so that all those which interess themselves in the life of this great Prince, fear some violence will be acted against his Person; is it possible he should so ill requite the care the gods have had for the conservation of his life, replied Aronces, as to put to death an innocent man, and if I was in estate to go to demand of him any recompence for the service I have done him, I should intreat him to limit his resentments, and to do me likewise the favour, as to command some of his men to inform him of one called Horatius, who hath stollen a Noble Virgin called Clelia, is now within his Dominions, and to oblige him so set free that admirable Person: Attending the time till you are able do it your self, replied Sycanus, Cilicies shall tell him all you desire, and I am perswaded you can demand nothing of a Prince whose life you have so generously saved, but will be easily granted you; for my part, replied Cilicies, if the generous Aronces did not order me to do it, I should acquaint the Prince with his desires, for I am confident he ardently wishes the power to recompence the services he hath performed to him, and that he will be very glad to know the means wherby he might make any retaliation. In fine, after those obliging words of Cilicies, Aronces told him all the divers Interests he had prompted him to demand both for Porsenna's safety and Clelia's liberty, and not willing afterwards to suffer any constraint, he appeared so distempered both to Sycanus and Cilicies, that believing their presence did add some grief to his wound, they immediatly departed: they were no sooner out of his Chamber, but looking upon Celeres with eyes which would inspire pity and compassion in the most obdurate hearts; and now my dear Celeres, said he unto him, what think you of the cruelty of my destiny, you, who know all my disgraces and all my adventures, and who have been accustomed to see me unhappy? Is it not true pursued he, that you did not forsee that which is now arrived to me? For not mentioning many misfortunes which have happened to me even from my birth to the time when I esteemed my self to be ascended to the supream top of all felicity, by espousing the Incomparable Clelia; and when all my Rivals were not in a capacity to resist my divine fortune, a dreadful Earthquake o'rthrew all my happiness, and snatch'd Clelia from my hands to put her in my Rivals, and to finish my Capricious Destiny: I saved a Princes life who will destroy Porsenna, whose life is dearer to me than my own, I kill'd him who had conspired his liberty; I saw Clelia with my own eyes in Horatius his power, and I find a Prince to be my Rival, whom I believed my Friend, and that I should have never suspected to have loved Clelia; I can do nothing now but patiently endure my affliction, since I am not in a condition, neither to pursue Clelia's Ravisher to protect Porsenna, or to discover my true quality to Adherbal; for there is no reason I should tell him whom I am, as long as we are not capable to prejudice one another, in case we should be enemies, as there is great likelihood we shall be: his Complaints had lasted longer, had not Sycanus entred into his Chamber, with Nicius and Martia, from whom he expected the greatest assistance in his Affairs; he received them with all imaginable joy, and Sycanus demanded his pardon, because he had not treated him according to his quality; what Nicius (said Aronces, fixing his eyes upon him) do you believe it requisite to oblige the generous Sycanus to conceal a Secret of such importance, as my Birth? Yes Sir, replied Nicius, and I am so satisfied of his fidelity, that is in this Castle, that all the King Porsenna's Friends assemble to consult together, what is best to be done for his liberty and your discovery; I pray Sir, (said Sycanus to Aronces) do not so much injure one, who passionately desires to serve you, as to suspect his fidelity; for I am perswaded without the least scruple, that by serving

King

King Porſenna, I importantly ſerve the Prince of Peruſia, judge then what I ought to do for him, who hath ſaved his life; for my particular, ſaid Martia to Aronces, I can aſſure you, Sycanus hath much intereſt in your happineſs, and I may very well ſay, the fortune of two Kingdoms, is ſo inſeparably tied to yours, that they would be both deſtroyed, if you do not ſave them, by ſaving your ſelf; after this, Aronces having ſaid many obliging things to thoſe who ſpoke to him, they began to conſult on the liberty of Porſenna, and the Queen his Wife, and the diſcovery of Aronces; but they could not conclude any deciſive reſolution, till three Noble men of great account in this Realm, (and which were much addicted to Porſenna's intereſt) arrived at this Caſtle.

In the mean time Sycanus told Aronces, that there was a Princeſs in his Houſe, whom it would be convenient to make uſe of, becauſe ſhe had great power with a man which was in much favour with the Prince Mezentius; but replied Aronces, may we confide in this Princeſs, ſince ſhe is ſo well acquainted with one of Mezentius his Favourites, we may Sir, replied Sycanus; for the Princeſs of the Leontines is ſo averſe to him, that if ſhe ſhould be leſs generous than ſhe is, ſhe would be faithful to thoſe, which intreat her not to diſcover, that they truſt to her ſecreſie, and this Princeſs having as much vertue as beauty, will never think of obſtructing your deſigns, for not knowing your Birth, but hearing the generous action you performed in ſaving the Prince Mezentius his life, ſhe was ſo much diſpoſed to ſerve you, that ſhe made Aurelia promiſe her, (whom ſhe entirely affecteth, and who will ingage for her fidelity) to obtain your permiſſion, that ſhe might give you a Viſit. If I was in a capacity to anticipate it, replied Aronces, I would now intreat you to bring me to her Apartment; but ſince I am not, I muſt commit the conduct of this Affair, both to yours and Aurelia's diſcretion: after that Sycanus, Martia and Nicius left Aronces in the hands of his Chirurgions, which then came to dreſs his wound; on the other ſide, the Numidian Prince, who really loved Aronces for his great deſerts, and whom he looked upon as Clelia's adopted Brother, of whom he was amorous, continually ſent to know the ſtate of his health, and made a propoſition to him through exceſs of friendſhip, to permit him to lie in his Chamber, that he might have the conſolation to entertain him without diſturbing his repoſe; but Aronces refuſed it,, not willing, as he pretended to be troubleſome to him, though he was ſwayed to this denial by a jealous reſentment, he could not conceal. In the mean time, Sycanus having told the Princeſs, that Aronces would receive her viſit with much ſatisfaction, ſhe reſolved to go thither when night began to blind the World, in the company of Martia and Aurelia; but to wing the hours till the long expected time, ſhe diſcourſed with Nicius, Martia and Celeres, whom Sycanus had brought thither, even in thoſe things which have the moſt equality; for in fine, ſaid ſhe to Aurelia, I have lately had an experience which ſtrongly fortifies the reaſons may be alledged to prove the powerfulneſs of it, and I doubt not, but the deſire I have to ſee Aronces, proceeds from that forcible inclination of which we are as ignorant, as of the true cauſes of the winds, and which blows as ſtrong a gale in many occaſions, and to prove the verity of my expreſſions; conſider the Prince of Numidia and Aronces, both arrived here at the ſame time, of whom I have received almoſt an equal deſcription, for Sycanus hath informed me, that the Prince of Numidia is tall, of a fair proportion, and though of a brown complexion, of a very pleaſing aſpect, interwoven with the rays of an haughty Spirit, and a maid who attends me, whoſe genius is excellent at copying ſhapes and faces, when ſhe hath ſeen them hath told me, ſhe thought Aronces was the exacteſt piece ever nature drew, that the air of his looks expreſſed both grandeur and nobleneſs, his hair light, his eyes blew, every feature agreeable, and his whole compoſure heroick, and if I have known Aronces hath performed a glorious action, by ſaving the Peruſian Princes life, I know likewiſe, that the Numidian Prince hath equalized it by endeavouring to reſcue a noble Virgin, who had been forcibly taken away, they are both hurt, both of incredible valour, both ſtrangers, and both unknown, and I believe both unhappy, becauſe a deep melancholy ſits inthroned in their faces; but there is ſome difference between them in my ſpirit; for though I know Adherbal is a Prince, and do not know the extraction of Aronces, yet I have no intention to go to ſee the Numidian Prince, but an impatient deſire to viſit Aronces, and I am ſo addicted to ſerve him, that I do not doubt, but that he is the Prince Adherbals ſuperiour in all noble qualities, as I am not ſufficiently acquainted with the Numidian Prince, to judge equitably of his merits, replyed Celeres, I dare not preſume to give any character of him, but Madam, I can aſſure you, you will never have reaſon to change that favourable opinion you have conceiv'd of Aronces. In effect Madam, he hath all the natural endowments that can be deſired in an accompliſhed man, and I deſire thoſe who know him better than I do, to find any defect in him, or to make the leaſt wiſh to his advantage, for firſt Aronces is of a moſt pleaſant diſpoſition, and his knowledge far exceeds that profeſſion he hath practiſed all his life, his ſoul towring above all common motions, his heart ſeated beyond the reach of fear, yet hath he a tender and compaſſionate ſpirit, he entirely loves and reſpects his friends, and believes humanity ought to reſide in all men, and that Princes ſhould not diſpence with themſelves, from having particular vertues, though they are obliged to have others, which are peculiar to them, he hath affability mix'd with courteſie, and an inexplicable charm in his diſcourſe, flowing from him with ſuch eloquence, and pronounced with ſuch grace and Majeſty, that it charms the attention of all his auditors, and to define him in few words, he is one whom detraction it ſelf cannot mention without Epithetes of applauſe and merit, and a ſubject fit for nothing but admiration.

I may very well ſay, ſaid the Princeſs of the Leontines, that the inclination I have for Aronces whom I do not know, is not ill grounded, though it appears blind to me, but the miſchief is, it ſometimes doth not accord with reaſon, for my part, ſaid Aurelia, that which we often call inclination is not: and that the reaſon for which it inclines more to one ſide than another, is, that it can never find ſuch an equality betwixt perſons, as not to put ſome diſtinction between them, ſo that as it is the property of the ſpirit to diſcern and chuſe, it always elecſeth that the heart is moſt affected to, and that as we commonly attribute to the cæcity of our inclinations, is indeed an effect of a more perſpicuous illumination. There is doubtleſs much ingenuity in what you ſay, replied Celeres; but it ſhall never

perſwade me, that the inclination is an effective thing, where reaſon hath no operation, for it is ſometimes found that our reaſon prompts us to one thing, and our inclination to another, and though we know that which we love, merits leſs than that we hate, it doth not at all alter our affections; as I have more experience in the world added Martia; being elder than all thoſe before whom I ſpeak, I have noted an hundred times ſuch prodigious effects of this blind Inclination that I cannot doubt the power of it; for I have ſometimes ſeen men of tranſcendent parts love women which have neither Beauty to attract their eyes, nor Vertue to allure their hearts; and women of great eſteem to favour men which are by all rejected, and to deſpiſe others who merit much eſtimation: I, and I have my ſelf ſometimes been ſwayed to the friendſhip of ſome perſons more than others, not being able to give any reaſon for it, and I very well diſcern'd that if they had been deficient in Noble Qualities, 'twould not have changed my contracted Amity, therefore I have always put a diſtinction between thoſe I have loved by Election, and thoſe I have affected by Inclination. I believe ſometimes it doth not chuſe replyed Sycanus, for thoſe which are of a lively Imagination and a penetrating ſpirit, ſo ſpeedily determine of that they would eſteem, that they do not perceive the proper operations of their Spirit, and aſcribe that to Inclination which doth not appertain thereto, and that which moſt authorize thoſe who attribute all to the Inclination, is, that ſome men indiſcreetly chuſe thoſe which are not amiable, and every one who cannot comprehend how reaſon ſhould be capable of ſuch grand miſtakes, had rather ſubmit to a blind inclination than to confeſs it is ſometimes blind it ſelf, ſo that by this way we may cloak one bad Election with a ſeeming excuſe, for the greateſt part of men believe they are but half-juſtified, if they ſay they could not reſiſt their Inclination, for my part, replyed Aurelia, though I am perſwaded of the grand Potency of the Inclination, I ſhould not believe I were juſtified if it made me commit an Errour, but I ſhould believe my ſelf to be more excuſable, if I ſhould commit a fault by the force of my Inclination than by defect of knowledge: After that the Princeſs of the Leontines went to Aronces his Apartment, conducted thither by Celeres, and followed by Sicanus, Martia, and Aurelia; this Enterview was received on both parts in a manner beyond expreſſion, for although perſons which are endowed with all the advantages of a gallant Spirit, are commonly mute at the firſt ſight, their tongues not performing their uſual Functions, it hapned not ſo with the Princeſs of the Leontines and Aronces, for their converſation was as free as if their knowledg had been of a long continuance, and they were as well acquainted at this firſt reception with one anothers deſerts; as if they had been already united in a ſtrict Bond of Amity; the Princeſs of the Leontines applauded his Heroick Action in ſaving the Princes life, and he highly commended the honour ſhe vouchſafed to viſit him; but theſe praiſes were without affectation, and which ſavouring not of flattery, did not perplex thoſe which received them, and they both found, though they much endeavoured to reſtrain themſelves, that they had both ſome great ſubject of Inquietude, ſo that imagining their grief might proceed from one cauſe, they had many inducements to deſire one anothers friendſhip, and if the Princeſs of the Leontines departed from Aronces much admiring him, he remained with the ſame admiration for her; 'tis true, that as his Spirit was pre-occupied with many things which ſtrangely diſtracted him, ſhe was no ſooner gone, but his grief reſuming its former place (which her preſence had a little diſpers'd) he thought on nothing now but how he might compaſs a remedy to put a period to his afflictions: The Princeſs whoſe diſturbed thoughts admitted more relaxation than thoſe of Aronces, was no ſooner return'd to her Chamber, but an urgent curioſity incited her to deſire Aurelia to impart unto her both the birth and adventures of Aronces: That which you demand of me, ſaid Aurelia, is of ſo great a conſequence, that I dare not preſume to tell you what I know of them without the permiſſion of Aronces, though they much require your knowledge; and likewiſe knowing but part of his Adventures, I cannot entirely ſatiſfie your deſires, but I will promiſe you to entreat Sycanus, to oblige Aronces to permit them to be imparted to you; and Aurelia inviolably keeping the promiſe ſhe had made the Princeſs, did ſo much urge her Husband to deſire this favour of Aronces, that he at laſt eaſily conſented thereto, and very well knowing how important it might be to acquaint her with Aronces his Adventures, he communicated his Sentiments to Nicius, Martia, and Celeres, who giving them a favourable approbation, they went together to Aronces his Chamber, to perſwade him to licenſe their diſcovery to her, at firſt he could not reſolve to give his conſent (his nature contradicting him) but after Sycanus had alledged many perſwaſive Arguments and Allegations to prove the neceſſity of it, he at laſt willingly without the leaſt oppoſition granted their deſires; 'tis true, the mind of this Princeſs could not be herein ſo ſoon ſatisfied as ſhe deſired, for the Peruſian Prince the more to honour him who had ſaved his life, ſent the Princeſs his wife to viſit him, with Tiberius the only Favourite of the Court, amorous of the Princeſs of the Leontines, who arrived at this time at the Willow Iſland, after Sycanus had conceal'd Nicius and Martia, in an Apartment, having given ſtrict order no perſon ſhould enter there, and an expreſs command to all his Domeſticks, not to declare that there was any Stranger in the Caſtle beſides Aronces and the Numidian Prince (their diſcovery ſo much importing Aronces) he brought to the Caſtle, the Peruſian Princeſs followed by five or ſix women, and conducted by Tiberius (not any of their Attendants knowing Nicius and Martia were there) and Sycanus having before advertiſed the Princeſs that the Numidian Prince was in the Caſtle, ſhe believed his quality required the firſt viſit, but 'twas moſt remarkable, that Adherbal who did not know Aronces was his Rival, mentioned none but him ſo long as their converſation laſted, exaggerating thoſe Noble Actions he had performed at Carthage, where he was firſt acquainted with him.

But after many Encomiums of the generous Aronces, tell me his birth ſaid the Peruſian Princeſs to him, to the end that the Prince whoſe life he hath ſaved may eſteem him according to his quality, Aronces of himſelf is ſo illuſtrious, replyed the Numidian Prince, that if his condition ſhould not be meritorious, he would deſerve the treatment of a Kings Son; 'tis true, his birth was ſo variouſly reported at Carthage, that I cannot give you any aſſurance of it, but

but what I certainly know is this, that he was educated by a Noble Roman, who being exiled by Tarquin, came to seek an Asylum at Carthage, where I first had the honour of his acquaintance, and I cannot be perswaded but he is of noble blood, for his thoughts do so transcend the Capacity of the Vulgar Intellects, that it would be a mere Solœcism to imagine he can be less than of a Royal Extraction. I believe, said the Princess of Perusia to him, that I shall hear your Eulogy from the mouth of Aronces, as I have heard his from yours, in expectation whereof I shall now take my leave, after I have offered unto you, all those things which are necessary for you: The Prince of Numidia answered to this Complement with much Civility, entreating her not to believe the Character Aronces gave him, for as his thoughts were unknown to him, he presupposed that according to his obliging disposition, he would have given an higher Encomium of him than he deserv'd, so that the Princess having staid a quarter of an hour with the Numidian Prince, whom Tiberinus freely offered to assist to the utmost extent of his power, she went towards the Apartment of the Princess of the Leontines, but having met her by the way, some reciprocal Complements having past on both sides, she brought her to Aronces his Chamber, who received the visit of this Princess with as much civility, as if he had not known she would be a grand Obstacle to all his Designs; at first her grateful language expressed how much she was obliged to him for saving the Prince her Husbands life, assuring him of the grandeur of his acknowledgment for such a signal Service, and that he had given express order to make an exact enquiry throughout all his Dominions; for the person he so much desired. Aronces returned thanks to this Princess with a joyful Emotion which sufficiently demonstrated, that the liberty of this person did much tend to his entire satisfaction: the Princess of Perusia likewise told him, that the Numidian Prince had related many things to his advantage, and that necessarily he was the most affectionate of all his friends; for in fine said she to him, though you deservedly merit all those Praises he hath attributed to you; I am of opinion that I may very well draw from them the consequence I have drawn, seeing that there are few persons who praise with excess, if friendship doth not thereto oblige them. I have without doubt, replyed he, received many Demonstrations of the Amity of the Numidian Prince whilst I resided at Carthage; but I am really perswaded he will one day repent of them when he is better acquainted with me, neither do I flatter my self with the vanity of those applausive expressions he hath bestowed on me, and I am strongly perswaded that he is a Prince whose deserts are incomparable, and who is endued with those qualities, which as much distinguish him from common men, as his birth is superior to them: After these words Aronces held his peace, for in those Sentiments which lay concealed in the innocence of his heart if he had been less generous, he had not given such an advantageous Character of this new Rival which much augmented his Inquietude, seeming to him he might justly complain of Clelia, for detaining such a Jewel from him: But whilst the Princess of Perusia entertained Aronces, Tiberinus spoke to the Princess of the Leontines, who being opposite to his affection, could hardly contain her self from shewing that mortal Enmity her Soul had contracted against him; for Aurelia, she conversed with those Ladies which accompanied the Perusian Princess, and Sycanus entertained Celeres: but in fine, the Princess having performed her visit, after she had received a magnificent Collation at the Apartment of Aurelia, she returned to the Boat which had wafted her over the Lake, conducted by Aurelia to her Chariots, which attended her on the other side of the Lake; but she was no sooner gone when Nicius and Martia came from those places where they were conceal'd and the Princess of the Leontines spoke to Aurelia, to solicit her to remember her promise, so that Aurelia having spoke to Sycanus of it, and Sycanus to Aronces, he was resolved for many important reasons, that the next day after Dinner Celeres should go to the Chamber of the Princess of the Leontines, to recount unto her all that she desired of the fortune of Aronces, whose adventures he knew almost to the least circumstances, but to the end he might make a better recital of them, he went this Night to the Prince of Numidia's Lodging, from whose mouth he learn'd the love he had for Clelia, and all the Occurrences thereupon, this Prince telling it to him, to the end he should tell it to Aronces, he being denyed the liberty to speak to him: so that Celeres being fully instructed either by Aronces, the Prince of Numidia, or his own observations, in all that which might content the curiosity of this Princess, he went the next day to her Chamber, where she with much impatience expected his coming, there being only with her Sycanus and Aurelia, he had scarce entred her Lodging, where she importunately solicited him to begin his discourse, which after a little consideration he perform'd in this manner.

The History of Aronces and Clelia.

I Cannot tell, Madam, whether my words may seem impertinent when I tell you that 'tis not possible for you to comprehend the present fortune of this Prince, if I do not intermix in my relation some particularity reflecting on the King his Fathers life. What, said the Princess of the Leontines interrupting him, is Aronces a Kings Son? Yes Madam, replyed Celeres, Aronces is Son of the most Illustrious King of all Etruria, and the unhappiest King of the Earth, for the King Porsenna is his Father: I pray you, replyed the Princess of the Leontines, if it lyes in the sphere of your knowledge, to acquaint me with the adventures of Porsenna as well as those of Aronces, not concealing any thing from me, if it please you, for though I reside some time in this Country, I have heard them but very confusedly, because I have had so many unquiet thoughts which have disturbed my Spirit, that I had not any curiosity to inform my self of the misery of others, when I had no power constantly to support my own: Since you command it, Madam, and that you desire of me is necessary to instance you of the deplorable estate of the Prince Aronces, I must deduce my discourse further than I at first intended, and tell you that the precedent King of Clusium, Porsenna's Father, waging War against the Prince of Perusia now regnant, gained a famous Battel but the sequel proved unfortunate: for the Prince his Son under whose Command his Troops were Victorious too far, pursuing those he had vanquished, was taken prisoner, so that Mezentius believing to have had as much advantage in this occasion as his Enemy, the Victory produced no peace between these two Princes, but the War continued as before.

In the mean time, Porsenna who was one of the faireſt Princes in the World, and who is now one of the ancienteſt Illuſtrious Kings in the Earth, was uſed with as much Civility as one in his condition could expect, though he was kept with as much exactneſs, as if inſtead of being a Priſoner of War he had been a Priſoner of State; he was therefore put in a Caſtle about ſix miles from Peruſia, and which is ſo advantagiouſly ſcituated, that one hundred men may defend it againſt one thouſand; but for his good or ill fortune, I know not which to term it, the Princeſs Nicetale the firſt Wife of the Prince of Peruſia being very ſick, was ordered to go for the recovery of her health to an Air leſs ſubtle than that of Peruſia, and her Phyſicians finding none more commodious for her than the Caſtle in which the Prince Porſenna was kept, adviſed her to go thither, for as it's very great, and that it hath one Tower, which is ſo far divided from it, ſhe might reſide in the Caſtle without the knowledge of any of his Guard; but going thither ſhe carried along with her the Princeſs Galerita her only Daughter, who was then about fifteen years old, and who was of ſuch a piercing and prodigious beauty, that ſhe could not be ſeen without admiration; the Prince Porſenna whom Nicetale viſited many times in the Tower where he was kept, would not ſee her without being ſenſibly told, that he became more captive of the Daughter, through the love ſhe gave him, than the Father by the Laws of War: Nicetale being a Princeſs of great Spirit, no ſooner perceived the paſſion that the young Galerita had produced in Porſenna, ſhe joyfully countenanced it, for ſhe being naturally inclined to Peace, pitch'd upon this productive love, as the only means which might eſtabliſh it between the King of Cluſium and the Prince of Peruſia her Husband, and far from oppoſing its continuation contributed much to the progreſſion thereof, by the frequent viſits ſhe vouchſafed this Illuſtrious Captain, who ſeeing the bloing youth of the Perſon whom he loved, and not ſeeing her without the Princeſs Nicetale, judged that to acquire the love of Galerita, he might firſt gain the friendſhip of Nicetale, and indeed he had ſuch an aſcendant over her, that ſhe loved him as if he had been her Son.

In the mean time he managed his love ſo diſcreetly, that the young Princeſs of Peruſia knew that he had for her, that as ſhe had heard term'd love, and ſhe likewiſe felt, that ſhe had for him I know not what tenderneſs that ſhe never yet had for any Perſon; but in the end without expatiating my ſelf to tell you with what Gallantry and addreſs this loving Priſoner perſwaded his love to her which had produced it; I ſhall only tell you that he acquainted her with it by writing, and obtained Nicitales permiſſion to ſpeak to her of it, which in the high eſteem ſhe had for him, received this confeſſion of his love for her Daughter in a moſt obliging manner, for ſhe then unlock'd to him the ſecret of her heart, telling him that ſhe knew that the touching of the Eſtate of the King of Cluſium, and that of the Prince of Peruſia was without doubt the way to put him in a capacity to give law to all Etruria, and to diſpute the power with the famous Vulturnum, and with proud Rome it ſelf, but knowing the reſentments the King of Peruſia had againſt the King of Cluſium his Father, ſhe was ſtrongly perſwaded that he would never conſent to hearken to any terms whilſt he was in priſon, or that if he did hearken to it, he would never give his Daughter to his Priſoner; 'tis therefore, ſaid ſhe to him, we muſt contrive a way to render you happy, and to give the Peace to two Eſtates, which cannot ſubſiſt in War: Alas Madam, what expedient, may a Prince find overwhelmed with ſo many different chances, as I highly eſteem your vertue, I will propoſe to you a propoſition, which according to all appearances may effect happily your deſign, if you follow my advice.

But generous Porſenna, purſued ſhe, before I tell it you, you muſt ſolemnly ſwear to me, and do not promiſe me that which you will not inviolably keep, I promiſe you Madam, ſaid he to her, that I will never violate my word I give you, and that I will not make uſe of the priviledge that may be granted to Priſoners not to perform their promiſe, but likewiſe promiſe me, that you will not command me to diſreſpect you, or not to affect Galerita: on the contrary replied Nicetale, I intend to put you in a poſſibility always to love her, and to permit her to love you innocently, till the expiration of her life; but to make this deſign ſucceed happily, I muſt ſteer my courſe ſo, that you may depart from priſon without any ſuſpition, that I was privy to it: you muſt therefore ſaid ſhe, not go to Cluſium, for fear you ſhould not be there Maſter of your ſelf, but you muſt go to the King of Cera, who remaining neuter during this War, is very fit to be a Mediator between the King of Cluſium, and the Prince my Husband; but before it's put in execution, you muſt promiſe me, that in caſe by your ſolicitations and addreſs, you can neither conclude a Peace between theſe two Princes, nor to oblige them to conſent, that you may eſpouſe Galerita, you will come back to reaſſume your chains; for it is not juſt, knowing your valour and good fortune in the War, I ſhould put ſuch a valiant man as you in the head of an Army, which muſt fight againſt Mezentius, for though he is ſometimes violent and unjuſt, I am his Wife, and ought to eſpouſe his intereſt againſt all the World, think therefore if you are capable to accompliſh my deſires, as Porſenna was amorous, and Nicetales propoſition was equitable, he promiſed her with joy to perform all the deſired, on condition, ſhe would likewiſe promiſe him to uſe all her power, that he might eſpouſe Galerita; ſo the agreement being fully concluded, they reſolved that this Princeſs ſhould return to Peruſia, and he that commanded the Caſtle, abſolutely depending on Nicetale, ſhould give him leave to eſcape, and Porſenna through an intereſt of love was obliged to wiſh the abſence of his beloved object, as Nicetale deſired paſſionately Peace ſhould be concluded before the beginning of the Spring, ſhe haſtened her return to accelerate the execution of her deſign, but as ſhe now look'd upon Porſenna, as a Prince which ſhould eſpouſe her Daughter, ſhe permitted them to have ſome particular conference the day which preceded her departure, whilſt ſhe entertained below a Lady of Quality which had arrived there that Morning; ſo that Porſenna in this manner bid adieu to that young and fair Perſon, the Grandeur of whoſe Spirit, equalling her great Beauty, made her to tell things moſt judicious to the Prince whom ſhe

was about to leave: for after he had made to her a thousand Protestations of fidelity, she told him she would not oblige him to so many things, as the Princess her Mother had, in case that he could not make a pacification between the King of Clusium and the Prince of Perusia, she would only desire him not to bear Arms against the Prince her Father; but Porsenna having answered her, that if he was free, honour would force him to fight for his Father; and both love and honour equally engaging him to her, if he could not conclude a Peace, he would come back to re-assume his Irons, which seemed to him much lighter than those with which love had chained him; in fine Madam, this separation was so tender and sensible, and those which have related this Adventure, say, that it was scarce credible, that so young a Person, as Galerita should have power to draw her self from his conversation with so much judgment and address, and assuredly this particular entertainment much encreased the Princes affection. In the mean time, Nicetale, after she had reconfirmed her promises to him, and he had renewed his to her, returned to Perusia, leaving a secret order with him which commanded the Castle, who was the Son of the Princess Galerita's Governess, to favour Porsenna's escape in four or five days, but so privately to act it, that he might not in the least appear culpable of it; this man over whom his Mother had as much power by her address, as by that which nature gave her, disposed himself to hazard his Fortune in hopes to advance it, and executed it so happily, a few days after, the Princess Nicetale was returned to Perusia, that Porsenna saved himself, as if he had suborned some of his Guards who went with him, neither did Mezentius know any thing of Porsenna's love to Galerita, nor the Intelligence of Nicetale with Porsenna. In the mean time, this Prince according to his word went to Cera, from whence he sent to the King of Clusium to intreat him to endeavour to conclude a Peace with the Prince of Perusia by proposing his Marriage with the Princess his Daughter, and he to whom this imployment was committed, being a man of Quality very fit to perform this Commission Porsenna fully instructed him of all the reasons which might oblige the King his Father to consent to his Propositions, charging him that if he would not effect it, to tell him that he was not free, but in appearance, and that he would return to the Prison of the Prince of Perusia, when his hopes were frustrated of espousing the Princess Galerita, and to give Peace to two of the most considerable Estates of all Etruria; at first the King of Clusium was strangely irritated against the Prince his Son; because he went to Cera, and not to him, and vented his anger against his Proposition, but Porsenna having secretly wrote to those which had some credit over this his Father's Spirit, that they might induce him to make Peace, they knew so well how to represent to him, that his people were weary of War, and the advantage that the Marriage of his Son with the blooming youth of the Perusian Princess would bring him, that in the end he resolved to send to offer Peace to Mezentius, whose courage was much abated at Porsenna's flight, for he knew not the conditions, on which he departed from his Irons, but having a fiery heart, and a vindicative spirit, he would not resolve with himself to hearken to any Proposition of Peace, nor Alliance with a Prince whom he hated, and that which fed this humour, was, that the Princess Galerita was much affected by a Prince of this Court, named Bianor, who forgot nothing that might hinder that the Peace should deprive him of his Mistress; that which rendred his credit so great: was that Mezentius was amorous of his Sister, who is now that Princes Wife, and who was then very beautiful and ambitious, so it was not without great difficulty, that Nicetale made him consent to her desires, but she could not have done it, unless having divulged the advantageous Proposals of Peace by the King of Clusium: the people were no sooner advised of it, but they murmured at him, and so highly began to testifie their aversion to War, that Mezentius knowing very well, he could not without danger excite a revolt in his Estates, (having given a great charge to Bianor to appease the Person whom he loved) he consented in the end to treat with the King of Clusium.

In the interim there passed few days, but Porsenna wrote to Nicetale and Galerita, to pray the first to remember her promise, and to give a thousand testimonies of love to the latter: but in the end, after a long Negotiation, the Peace was concluded, and the Marriage of Porsenna and Galerita resolved on, on condition Porsenna should remain at Perusia, as long as his Father lived: Mezentius imagining that the King would renew the War, in despight of the Alliance, if he retained not the Prince as Hostage, it is true, this Article was easily accorded to, for though the King of Clusium very much loved his Son, he was not sorry for this advantageous absence, which reunited in his Person all the obedience of his Subjects, so that the Marriage was happily concluded in despight of the Clandestine Machinations of Bianor, and the natural aversion of Mezentius; but hardly had Porsenna and Galerita the leasure to contemplate the happy Sun-shine of their good fortune, when it was eclipsed with grief; for the sage and prudent Nicetale died a little after the Celebration of the Nuptials, and she dyed with much regret, because she knew the secret aversion Bianor's Sister entertained in her heart against Porsenna, and it was principally because she saw him adored by all the Court, and very much loved by the People. In the mean time the death of Nicetale put such a great consternation in all her House, and in the Princess her Daughters, that there were few in the one and the other which were not entirely swayed by grief, so that in this great disorder, it unhappily fell out, that one of the Women of this Queen, which had been alwayes favourable to Porsenna's Rival, found all the Letters the Prince had written to Nicetale, during his residence at Cera, by which he entreated her exactly to keep her word, and to oblige the Princess her Daughter to keep the promise she made him to espouse none but him; so that this Person being seised of these Letters, to evidence to Bianor, that if she had not had the power heretofore to serve him nigh Galerita, it was not for want of address, but because an invincible obstacle opposed her intentions, but shewing all those Letters to Bianor, she excited a great confusion in his Spirit, which made him resolve to revenge himself both of Porsenna and Galerita, for as he knew Mezentius was jealous of his Authority, that he was violent and vindicative, and that he noted, he did not very much affect Porsenna, he believed that when he knew the commerce which had been between him and the Princess his Daughter, he would be much exasperated against him, & having consulted with his Sister thereupon, she confirmed him in his design, for not seeing now that it was impossible Mezentius should espouse her, being a Widdower, and that he was very amorous of her, she imagined it would be most advantageous to effect her Marriage with that Prince, and the only way to excite his anger, both against Porsenna; and the Princess Galerita: So that this Maid reasoning as an Ambitious Person, and [illegible] as a Vindicative Lover and an Ambitious Rival, they absolutely resolved to shew the Prince of Perusia all Porsenna's Letters, but as they were not absolutely assured what impression they would make in Mezentius Spirit when he saw them, they would not give them to him with their own hands, but laid them on the Table of his Cabinet, where he found them without knowing who put them there; he was strangely astonish'd to see them; for as he well knew the writing of Porsenna, and easily comprehended their Contents, he would not make appear his astonishment nor anger, because he would be better satisfied of them, though those Letters almost learn'd to him all that which was passed, the Article only excepted which might justifie Nicetale, for it was not positively written in the Letter that he should return to Prison if the Peace was not concluded, because he judged Nicetale would understand it, if he did but express in general terms that he would not violate his promise: Mezentius then being willing to be better instructed in that which was but dubiously mentioned in the Letters, sent to find out the Lady who had been the Princess his Daughters Governess before her Marriage, judging that this secret might be known to her, she being very much belov'd by Nicetale, but the better to palliate his Design, he shewed to her all Porsenna's Letters to Nicetale, without expressing the least resentment of anger, to have learn'd the Intelligence which had been between the Princess his Daughter, and Porsenna during his Imprisonment; but on the contrary he said to her the more to deceive her, that he had not the curiosity to know particularly all the passages between them, and who were those which had contributed to unite their affection, but to the end, to know to whom he owed that obligation of Peace which his People enjoyed by the Marriage of those two Persons; Mezentius thus speaking with a feigned dissimulation, and the Lady believing in the estate things were, his designs were consonant to his words, disguised nothing from him, and recounted to him all that was passed; but though she told him that Porsenna was set free on a limited condition to come back thither if he espoused not Galerita by concluding Peace, but he believed it not, but believed 'twas this Ladies invention, and judged 'twas her Son which had facilitated the flight of that Prince, though she did not acquaint him with it, but told him that Nicetale had suborned some of his Guards, but she principally aggravated the Grandure of Porsenna's love to Galerita, and that powerful inclination of Galerita for Porsenna, seeming to her that nothing was more proper to mollifie the heat of a Prince which was himself susceptible of Loves flames; but scarce had this Lady finish'd her Speech, but Mezentius unmasking his anger, what, said he to her, beholding her with a terrible aspect, which would make the constantest Person tremble? Have I then put my Daughter to you, to teach her to love my Enemy and those that my Valour had subdued? Was it to inspire her with such degenerate thoughts that I preferred the care of her Education to you before many others? Sir, said she unto him, I have but obeyed the Princess Nicetale, and I do not see that this obedience hath had a preposterous Event, since you have for your Son in Law, the Son of a great King, and which merits to be greater as much by the qualities he possesses, as by his highness of his birth, If I could resuscitate Nicetale to punish her for her treachery and perfidiousness, pursued he, I would do it with all my heart: but since 'tis not possible, you shall answer for the fault she hath committed, and I will so severely punish you for your Treason, that you shall wish your death all the rest of your life; this Lady would have then allayed the fury of this violent Prince, but the more she spoke the more it excited his anger, and at this instant they came to advertise him that Bianor had something of consequence to impart to him, so that he having commanded some of his Attendants to carry that Lady to her Chamber, and not to let her speak to any person, he hearkned to Bianor, who assured him that he had news that the King of Clusium was upon the point of expiration: Porsenna not knowing of it, from whom he would conceal it, to the end he should not depart from his Court; for fear he should be retained there by his people, who would never consent that their Prince should reside at Perusia, hardly had Bianor learn'd unto him the Estate of the King of Clusium, but he took a resolution to satisfie three passions instead of one, for he pretended to satisfie his vengeance in arresting Porsenna, and declaring his marriage void, he easily pretended to satisfie his Ambition in usurping his Estates after the death of the King his Father, and he pretended to satisfie his love by espousing Bianors Sister, on pretext to revenge himself of Galerita and to dis-inherit her, because she had had a secret love with the Prince she had married, when there was war with the King his Father, so that confusedly reasoning with all the preoccupation of a person which had love, ambition and anger, he considered neither justice nor resentments of nature, nor the sequel of his resolution, hinting on nothing but to execute his unjust designs, he therefore acquainted Bianor with all his intentions, communicating to him all that he would act against Porsenna, and for Sextilia his Sister, and as Bianor had an artificial spirit, he more stirred up Mezentius anger, and offered himself to execute his commands whatsoever they were, so that the Prince of Perusia without deferring a moment, gave all the orders necessary, to arrest at the same time Porsenna and Galerita, and it was so speedily resolved on, and so diligently executed, that Porsenna was already returned to the prison where he had been, and Galerita and her ancient Governess, were already in the greatest Isle of the Lake, that you may see from your windows. And they did not yet know in the City whether they were arrested or no, and Mezentius was at first so happy in his unjust actions, that all succeeded according to his desire; for he had cruelly revenged himself both of Porsenna and Galerita, and saw himself in an estate to possess the person whom he lov'd, and he hop'd Clusium would soon obey him, for he knew the next day that Porsennas Father was dead, and that the Grandees of the Realm were divided, and he had the good fortune, that though the people of Perusia very much lov'd Galerita and Porsenna, they revolted not because Bianor published many things disadvantageous to these two illustrious persons, so that they at first, not being able to discern truth from falshood, they opposed not the injustice of Mezentius, who a few days after espoused Sextilia, in hopes to have a successor, which would deprive Galerita from having the power one day to possess his Kingdom, but to satisfie either his ambition or revenge, he promised protection to one of those parties in Clusium, to endeavour to oppress the other, and sent into that Realm a manifesto filled with impostures and false reasons, to palliate Porsennas imprisonment.

In the interim, Biamor being amorous of Galerita, powerfully sollicited his sister to perswade the King to nullifie the marriage of Porsenna, that he might espouse her, for he imagined (induced thereto by love) that Nicetale had a greater hand in this match than Galerita; so that conceiving some hope, he gave no repose to Sextilia, who to satisfie her brother, forgot nothing that was possible to endeavour to make void the marriage of Porsenna, and so far perswaded Mezentius, that he went in person to induce her to desert that Prince, and to tell her that she was forced to marry him, more by her Mothers command than her own inclinations, and that he would not only put to death Porsenna, but her self also if she repugned his will, making likewise to Porsenna the most unjust propositions that could be imagined; for he offered him his liberty, if he would yield to him the half of his estate, and consent to the nullifying of his marriage, telling him he was in a place where he could not be too prudent to refuse any thing: but whatsoever he could say to that Prince, or the Princess his daughter, he could not shake their constancies, and they both told him, they would never forsake one another, so that Mezentius now remained satisfied, in hope that time would alter their opinions, and thought on nothing but how he might entirely usurp the estate of that unhappy King, who though unhappy as he was, was not so much as the Queen his wife; for Madam, I must tell you, that two Months after her Imprisonment, she began to fear her self to be with child, at first she imagin'd it proceeded from a simple effect of her Melancholy, but as she had her ancient Governess with her, this Lady to whom age had given much experience, told her that without doubt her fear was really grounded, so that she finding her self in the saddest condition can be imagin'd, seeing the horrible threatnings of Mezentius, believed that there could be no assurance for the life of Porsennas child; and her Governess was of advice at first, that if Mezentius knew her estate, he would not insist on the rupture of the marriage, but considering he had told her, he would put to death both her and Porsenna, she could not hope that a Prince which had the cruelty to threaten his own daughters death, would spare the life of a child that he looked upon as the child of a Prince whom he esteemed his enemy: this Lady likewise who was her only consolation, told her that after Mezentius had reduc'd things to the estate where they were, he would not be capable to be mollified by the consideration of a child, which was but in conception, and who had nothing but tears to bow his obdurateness, when he should come into the world, so that they thought it was expedient to conceal that indisposition, which produced their fear, but the thing at first appeared so difficult to them, that their consolation ended in tears.

But after a little mature deliberation, they believed that if they could gain his wife, who commanded the Castle, it would not be impossible to conceal so great a secret; for as she was the only person which had the liberty to see this young Queen (except two slaves which served her) they should fear nothing, if they could procure her to be of their intelligence, so that all the care Galerita used was to entirely to acquire that Lady who was called Flavia, and who is sister to Nicius, here present; but to speak truly, it was not difficult for the Princess to oblige her to serve her, and to be faithful to her, for she being naturally tender and compassionate, had a particular inclination to love Galerita, who knew so admirably how to acquire their spirits of those from whom she would obtain any thing, that it had been very difficult for Flavia to resist her intreaties, who much deplored the misery of so fair and vertuous a Queen, but Galerita deferred the discovery of it, as long as she could possible, to see if the Prince of Perusia could desist from his injustice, but hearing by some of her Guards, that he always appeared more inveterate against Porsenna, and that he used all the means possible to usurp his estate, and that when Clusium was submitted, he would assuredly put to death this Prince, she determin'd to confide on Flavia, to whom she learnt her present Estate, and the fear Mezentius should know it, but she told it her with such melting language, and tender considerations to procure her fidelity to assist her in saving the life of of an innocent Babe, which did not yet enjoy the light, that this vertuous woman, which had no obdurate heart mingled her tears with Galeritas, and would not promise her (without evaporating many sighs) the accomplishment of all her desires, so that the true cause of her indisposition might be conceal'd. But without troubling my self to recite impertinent particularities, I shall tell you in few words, that Galerita having feign'd to be seiz'd with a greater malady than really she was, to obtain that her Guards should come no more into her Chamber, and Flavia (who was very much belov'd by her Husband) being wholly gain'd by her, and they having gain'd the Physician which should see Galerita: the design was in the end conducted with so much precaution, judgment, and sense, that the true cause of Galeritas indisposition was not in the least suspected, and she had the advantage to salute the times with a Successor to Porsenna, it being not then known, and the generous Flavia acted her part so handsomly, that the Son of the Queen of Clusium came into the world, without being publickly known, and was taken out of her Chamber without being discovered, for having foreseen what she would act, she had so order'd it that the Queen of Clusium having seen from her Chamber a little child, she had which was very fair, and that one of her slaves held in his arms desired to see it, so that insensibly she had used the Guards of this Princess to enter daily, and go out with that person which carried Flavias young Son into Galeritas Chamber, and which carried it sometimes divested and sometimes wrapt up in sumptuous swath bands, as if it were asleep in her arms, to the end to use this artifice, when it should be necessary, and as Flavia was his wife who commanded the Castle, none which depended on her were suspected by Galeritas Guards, so that when this Queen was in estate to have need of the address of Flavia, she caus'd her which had accustom'd to bring the Son of this Lady to the Chamber of the Princess to come thither with the same swadling clouts wherewith she used to envelope it, when she carried it asleep thither, thither, having taken a great bundle of flowers in going through a Garden, which ſhe carried as if it had been really the child ſhe uſed to carry in her arms, ſo that being entred in this manner into Galeritas Chamber with Flavia who followed her, and having ſtayed there till the Queen had given Porſenna a Son, ſhe departed afterwards from thence with the child of this Queen, whoſe face was covered leſt the fallacy ſhould be diſcern'd, and this young Prince was carried to the Apartment of Flavia; from whence ſhe caus'd it to depart the ſame night, to commit it to the care of Martia her Siſter in Law, to whom without any fear ſhe confided this ſecret, becauſe ſhe had always had ſo great a dependance on the ſervice of the precedent Princeſs of Peruſia, that there was nothing to be fear'd, but as of neceſſity, that this child ſtould be carried in a Bark to the other ſide of the Lake, to tranſport it to the houſe of Martia, which was ten miles from thence.

There was a few days after ſome noiſe diſpers'd of that which Galerita fear'd ſhould be known, and it ſo ſuddenly receiv'd an augmentation, that Bianor hearing of it made it known to Mezentius, and this Prince caus'd to be arreſted the Phyſician, which had aſſiſted the Queen of Cluſium, and by moſt cruel threatnings, he obliged him to confeſs the truth, but hardly did he know it, but fury wholly poſſeſſing him, he commanded an exact ſearch ſhould be made for Galeritas Child, he cauſed Flavia and her husband to be arreſted, and chang'd all the Guards of the Queen his daughter, and ſo rigorouſly treated this Princeſs, that ſhe now fear'd Mezentius would kill her Son if he came into his hands, 'tis true, ſhe long time fear'd this miſhap would arrive, for knowing the humour of Mezentius, and having underſtood from Flavia, that ſome noiſe was diſpers'd of the birth of this young Prince, ſhe oblig'd her to command Nicius and Martia on her part, to ſeek ſpeedily a pretext to perform a voyage to carry this young child from the eſtate of a Prince, whoſe violence and injuſtice ſhe equally fear'd; ſhe gave Flavia precious ſtones of a very conſiderable value to give to Martia, that ſhe might make uſe of as occaſion ſerved during the exile of her Son, and Flavia having inſtructed Nicius and Martia of Galeritas intentions, return'd not to the Iſle where ſhe was kept, till ſhe had ſeen Nicius and Martia depart to ſeek an Aſylum for Porſennas ſucceſſor, at firſt they had a deſign to put themſelves under the protection of thoſe which held the part of that unhappy King in his eſtate, but Nicius who is very prudent, learning how that eſtate was divided, and that the faction Mezentius protected was the moſt powerful, it would be dangerous to truſt this young Prince to men, which in the low eſtate to which they were reduced, would make uſe it may be of that occaſion to make an accommodation with Mezentius, inſtead of defending him againſt him, as the Son of their King, ſo that to put him in more ſafety, Nicius and his wife, leaving Cluſium on the right hand, they embarqu'd at a Port, which was not above ſix miles from the famous City of Cera, with intention to paſs to Syracuſa, where Nicius had heretofore reſided a long time, ſeeming to them that the Iſle of Sicily was a ſafer retreat for the young Prince, which they conducted, than any other place they could chuſe; for as Rome was at this time under the dominion of a violent Prince, that they ſpoke of nothing but exile, Volternum was not far enough, Tarentum was then divided, Capua was too delicious to ſojourn for the afflicted, and Syracuſa ſeem'd a City where they might remain, without informing who they were, becauſe of the great reſort of ſtrangers thither from all parts, this City having the commerce of Africa and Italy, as well as Greece, Tarentum, and a great part of Etruria, but to conceal better ſo great a ſecret, Nicius and Martia reſolved to ſay that this young Prince was their Son, and without having any other company with them, ſave his Nurſe, and two moſt faithful ſlaves, they embarqu'd as I have told you, with intention to go to Syracuſa, but Madam, before I relate the iſſues of their voyage, I ſhall briefly tell you, that Mezentius not only acted all I have told you, after he had known that Galerita had a Son, but he ſwore he would declare war to all Princes, and all Republicks, which gave him a retreat, and that Porſennas party in Cluſium being ſuppreſſed by the others, Mezentius had the power to perſecute impunely that unhappy King, and men of the greateſt knowledge are perſwaded, that if he had not had a Son, his life had been in great danger, but as Mezentius ſaw, that if he put him to death, it would give a pretext for a new war, which he would not undertake, ſince thoſe which had the Prince in their power would uſe his name to revenge the death of the King, he ſpar'd his life, and ſeeing himſelf ſo abſolutely maſter of Cluſium, as he hop'd, for thoſe that he had protected againſt the faithful Subjects of Porſenna, had ever been there of the greateſt Authority.

In the Interim Bianor endeavour'd to conſolate himſelf by the great credit he had with Mezentius, and by the hope that Galeritas child would periſh, and Porſenna die in Priſon, and that he ſhould one day enjoy his Miſtreſs.

But to return to Nicius and Martia, they were no ſooner embarqu'd, but the wind which was at firſt favourable, ſuddenly chang'd, and became ſo outragious that for fear of ſhipwrack, they muſt leave their intended courſe, and abandon themſelves to the wind, which was ſtronger than the Pilots art, who conducted them: and the Sea was ſo tumultuous, that the waves often paſſed from one ſide of the ſhip to the other, with ſuch impetuoſity, that they nigh overwhelm'd all that were there, and theſe waves meeting ſometimes together in ſuch a manner that they form'd within themſelves great foamy mountains, that the other waves bore away in wheeling about, and they ſaw a kind of fight between them, which threatn'd ſhipwrack to all the veſſels which were then on the Sea: This Tempeſt became moſt dangerous to that Ship in which Nicius and Martia was, for the wind after it had toſt it in divers manners, puſht it towards the Cape of Lylibeum, ſo that as there is no greater danger for veſſels when the Sea is angry, than to be nigh the Land, Nicius and Martia had much reaſon to fear the loſs of their Veſſel, but that which more confirmed it, was, that they ſaw the Pilot, who was very skilful, after to have unprofitably uſed his art to reſiſt the impetuoſity of the winds, and the tempeſtuouſneſs of the Sea, had left the helm and fell on his knees to make vows to Neptune, declaring by this action, that he no more hoped there, but in the aſſiſtance of the Gods, yet they appear'd in his face, that he did not hope to obtain that he demanded, for he had all the marks of deſpair in his eyes.

In the mean time, in the middle of this tempeſt, this young Prince which was Nicius and Martias principal fear, peaceably slept in his cradle, without knowing his life was in peril, but though he feared not, Martia and Nicius feared for him, and there was other vessels in this place, which were exposed to perish, as that of Nicius: and by fortunes capriciousnesse, the tempest had brought together in a little space many ships, which held divers wayes, when it began, for there was one of Carthage which being parted from Syracusa to return to its Country had been constrained to leave its course, there was another from Tarentum, two from Ostria, and one from Corinth, so that the wind seemed not to have formed this little Fleet but to destroy it, these Vessels then fearing to be rocks to one another, and to beat by clashing together, performed all which they could to separate them, but as usually the sea being angry disperseth the Fleets, it seemed to have brought these ships together, and would not separate them, till they should be broken by one another, and had covered the shore with their ruines: but Madam, the better to comprehend the marvellousnesse of this adventure, you must know that there was in this vessel that went to Carthage, an illustrious Roman family, who to fly the persecution of Tarquin the proud, which now reigns in that famous City, had taken a resolution to seek an asylum in Africa, because there is no great commerce between Italy and it, except it be casual by the way of Sicilie; and Clelius who was chief of it saw him self unfortunate, and more unfortunate than Nicius, for he had an onely son in the Cradle, that was exposed to perish as well as he, it is not that Clelius feared death, through a resentment of weakness, but that having all the generosity which true Romans make profession of, he lookt upon his losse, and his sonnes as a gain to Tarquin whereof he was enemy and he did not consider the losse of all his family and his own. His wife, who was named Sulpicia, was not so troubled by the apprehension of death, as by a resentment of glory, who desired, that if they perisht, the enemy should not hear of their shipwrack, so that Clelius and Sulpitia, without concealing themselves during the tempest, as usuallyall passengers do, which are in vessels, came on the poop, to look upon this terrible agitation of the waves, which momentarily exposed them to perish, at least just gods (said then this generous Roman, lifting up his eyes to heaven) if ye have resolved my destruction, save my Country, and to die like a true Romane, let me rather make vows for it, than for my self, do then, you just gods I entreat you oppresse Tarquin the proud by his own tyranny, let him be trampled under the Throne to which his crimes have carryed him, and let the cruel Tullia, which passed over her fathers body to mount the same Throne dye cruelly, let all his family be exterminated, let the name of the Tarquins be an horror, and since Rome hath no more legitimate Kings, let it I say be free, and let it never have tyrants, Clelius having thus spoken, and Sulpitia by her suppliant action seemed to joyn her prayers with her husbands, a gust of this enraged wind bearing Nicius his vessel on theirs, split them both in an instant, and covered all the sea with their ruines; the Carthaginians were seen mingled with the Romans and the Romans with the Sicilians, who in particular used all themeans they were able to save their lives, but amongst others Clelius who could swim admirably, and who had a strong heart, incapable of disturbance by the sight of any certain death, endeavoured to swim to discover his wife or his son, amongst that masse of planks, which there floated, and men clinged unto them to save their lives, but as the violence of the waves, soon dispersed the splinters of the ships, Clelius without finding his son or his wife, was constrained to think on his own safety; and having discovered the point of a rock which overlookt the sea, where he might retreat in such a pressing necessity: he that endeavoured to gain it in despight of the impetuosity of the waves, in hope all the vessels which he had seen in the beginning of the tempest were not perished, and that some of them would take him from the rock when the sea was a little calm; but as Clelius vigorously did swim to attain that rock, he saw on his right hand, a cradle which floated, and a young child, which without appearing affrighted at the horrible peril where he was, smiled assoon as he perceived him, this pitiful object sensibly touching the heart of this generous Roman, and at that instant not thinking there was any other Child but his in any of the vessels which were shipwrackt, believed it was his son and did swim with more swiftnesse to go to succour that Cradle, which the waves so rudely tossed, but approaching it, he knew distinctly, that it was not his child; for he had different swadling clouts and very remarkable which gave him no doubt of it; nevertheless, Clelius incited by a compassionate feeling, and wishing his child were in the same estate, who might find one which would succour him, continued swimming towards the cradle of the young Prince of Clusium; for it was Madam the son of him whom Clelius saw in imminent danger, and which would have infallibly perished without his assistance: this illustrious Clelius did swim with so much force and address, for to take hold of a corner of the Cradle of that young Prince whom he knew not; but that which was most cruel, was, that the waves which pusht it, carried it from the point of the rock, that he lookt upon as an Asylum; nevertheless having found this Cradle, he sustained it with one hand, and swimming with the other, he turned his head to the rock, where afterwards arrived with much difficulty, and assoon as he was there, he put the Cradle of this young Prince, on the highest part of that rock, and seated him by it, to behold the place where he was shipwrackt, but looking on it, he saw his own sons cradle which floated, and which being intangled among the planks, that the Sea tossed in a strange manner, appeared to him ready to be drowned, so that not having the power to resist his paternal pity, weary as he was, he left the young child which he had found, and cast himself again into the sea, to endeavour to save his, but going thither had the misfortune to see that a gust of wind having pusht the prow of one of those broken ships, between him and his son, just as the cradle had been disintangled from the planks which supported it, hindred him from seeing any more the cradle or the planks; for at that time there fell a shower of rain so abundant, that Clelius could hardly perceive the rock, where he had left Porsennas son, when he believed to have seen his own son perish, he would return to him which heaven had given him, and having nothing else to do, he regained that Refuge, but when he was there, he sometimes believed, that he and this child would likewise die there, there; for after the ceſſation of this terrible ſhower, he ſaw two veſſels which had not been ſhipwrackt, inſtead to approach the place where he was, did all that they might to eſtrange themſelves from it, for as the Pilots knew that rock, they would not by any means poſſible approach it; ſo that Clelius finding his deplored eſtate, judged that it may be, if he enterpriſed to ſwim to gain thoſe veſſels, it would not be impoſſible for him to do it, if he went alone without enterpriſing to ſuſtain the Cradle; but as he would not forſake the child which heaven had put into his protection, he could not reſolve to do it; for he was no ſooner on the rock, but the wind changed, and puſhed thither ſuch an abundance of foam, that if Clelius had not held the Cradle of this young Prince in his arms, he had been drowned in the ſea. Clelius being in this deplorable eſtate, believed when he ſee his ſon periſh, he did not doubt of his wifes death, his generoſity hindred from thinking of preſerving his own life, and he ſaw little appearance to preſerve that unhappy infant; but in the end, one of theſe Carthaginian veſſels which had not periſhed, being puſhed in deſpight of him towards that rock and Clelius having made divers ſigns, was in the end perceived by him which commanded it, which being capable of humanity, had taken a particular care to ſave the moſt of thoſe men he could, which were ſhipwrackt, and in the end, the wind having ceaſed on a ſudden, it was eaſie for him without danger to approach the rock: and Clelius put himſelf again in the water, charged with the Cradle of the ſon of Porſenna to gain the veſſel, where he had the joy to find again his dear Sulpitia, that a faithfull ſlave had ſaved her by bearing her upon the water, and making her to board the ſhip where he found her. This interview had ſomething very delightful: for Clelius was much comforted by finding his wife, and Sulpicia was very joyfull to ſee again her huſband, ſhe believed at firſt ſhe had recovered her ſon, when ſhe ſaw Clelius with a child in his arms, but ſhe was ſoon diſabuſed, and in the end they both comforted themſelves for the loſſe of their child by him fortune had given them, and by the conſolation they had to ſee one another, after they had believed never to have ſeen one another again, and it ſeemed, that in the ſhipwrack, where they had believed to have loſt all, they ſaved that which was of moſt value; for they found a part of their veſſel run on ground on a heap of ſand, where the richeſt things which they had were, and Sulpicia ſtrugling in the water had ſeiſed on a plank of another broken veſſel, upon which was a casket faſtned by divers cords wound round about it in that turning which was made at the time of the ſhipwrack; ſo that this faithfull ſlave of Clelius, who had ſaved Sulpicia, having found her ſuſtaining her ſelf by this plank, which was ready to ſink by the weight of this casket, ſupported her, and brought her to the veſſel where Clelius found her (for it was very nigh) bringing likewiſe in his hands the casket which was faſtened to the plank, imagining without examination, that it was hers, ſo that after Clelius and Sulpicia had had the leaſure to meditate on the accident which was arrived, they found that their loſſe was leſſe then they thought of in this occaſion; for they had found a child in ſtead of theirs, and ſtones of an ineſtimable value in that Casket.

In the mean time, Clelius believing that he could not better acknowledge the favour that the gods had afforded him by ſaving his life, than in having a particular care of that child he had found, prayed Sulpicia to nouriſh it in ſtead of hers, and to love it as her own, and as they both felt the grief they had for the loſſe of theirs; they would have reſtored this child to thoſe which had loſt it, if they were not periſht themſelves, but they could not hear of them, for the misfortune was, that thoſe of the Carthaginian Veſſels ſaved none but thoſe which were with Clelius and the other veſſels, which were nigh that in which Porſennas ſon was ſhipwrackt, ſuccoured thoſe which eſcaped there, but as the tempeſt ſeparated them, and their wayes being different, Clelius could learn nothing of the birth of this child, neither of what country he was, nevertheleſſe his hope was, that the veſſel which had ſaved him, went thither where he had a deſign to go: he obliged the Captain, to whom he owed his life, to bring him to Carthage, where he had a deſign to paſſe the time of his exile, to the end ſaid he, that I may not have my ſpirit troubled by the recitall of Tarquins tyranny. But to make Sulpicia love the child better, the gods had given them, he deſired he ſhould have the name of Aronces, which was the name of the child he had loſt; but he would not ſay, when he came to Carthage that Aronces was his ſon, though he had for him a paternal affection, for fear that ſhould obſcure his knowledge, and not knowing whether he ſhould have other children, he would not diſguiſe the truth, but he would carefully keep the Cradle, and the ſwading bands in which this child had been found, and likewiſe imagined that the ſtones he had found in that Casket might conduce to his knowledge: And he had for this child which was unknown to him, all the cares which his high birth rendred him worthy of, but whilſt Clelius rendred to him all the offices of a true father, Nicius and Martia which had been ſaved by a Syracuſian veſſel, were in ſo ſtrange a deſpair for the loſſe of this young Prince, which was truſted to their care, that they durſt never declare his death to the particular friends of Galerita, though they were ſtrongly perſwaded he had periſhed; for as things were then, if this young Prince had been in their power, they durſt not in any wiſe have revealed his birth, and they remained at Syracuſa, where they learnt that Porſenna was more ſtrictly kept, that Biennor perſecuted Galerita, and that Sextilia had no children. But to return to Clelius and Sulpicia, you ſhall know Madam, that they lived at Carthage, where their vertue ſoon gained them many friends, and the young Aronces comforted them ſo well for the loſſe of their ſon, that if they had had a deſire to deſtroy him to reſuſcitate the other, they could not reſolve to do it, and indeed I have heard them ſay, he was amiable even from his Cradle, and that he ever appeared to have ſomething ſo great in him, little as he was, that it was eaſie even then to imagine that he ſhould be of illuſtrious extraction, he was likewiſe more dear to Clelius and Sulpitia, becauſe they were four years without any children, but in the end Sulpitia had a daughter, which was called Clelia, but a daughter ſo fair, that they ſpoke of her beauty even at her birth, I ſhall not trouble my ſelf Madam to exaggerate to you all her firſt attraction, though I have heard Aronces ſay, ſhe teſtified ſo much ſpirit, even before ſhe could ſpeak, for as I have things of more importance importance to tell you, I shall not weary your patience by a recital of that nature, and I shall content my self to assure you, that if Clelius forgot nothing to bring up the young Aronces, Sulpicia likewise forgot nothing to bring up the young Clelia; neither shall I trouble my self Madam, to tell you many particularitis of the Grandeur and Magnificence of Carthage, to make you comprehend that these two Persons could not be better in any place of the Earth; since it is true, they found in it all they might find in the most political Republicks, and in the most flourishing Monarchies; but as it is not that of which I must treat, but it is the life of Aronces you must know: I shall tell you in two words, that Carthage is one of the richest and fairest Cities in the World, and that as all the Africans have a natural inclination to delight, though they are a warlike People, all pleasures were found in this Magnificent City, as much as in any place of the Earth.

Moreover, as Carthage is dreadful to her Neighbours, it is never without the residence of men of Quality from all bordering Estates, and it hath in its Neighbourhood a Prince which is called the Prince of Carthage, because he derives his descent from an Aunt of Dido, which did likewise reside there, before he imbroyled himself with this Republick: the Prince of Numidia here present, was at this time there, and there was no Prince in Africa, which desired not to send his Children to Carthage, so that Aronces saw even from his Birth, Persons whose conditions were proportionable to his, for as Clelius was much esteemed in this City, and Aronces was of a pleasant disposition, and a dexterous wit, he easily familiarised himself with the Carthaginian and Numidian Princes, they being all of one Age; the Prince of Carthage so entirely affecting his Conversation, (that when he went to a City under his power called Utica, not far distant from Carthage, he always accompanied him) Aronces by this means being very little in Clelia's company, whom he then considered, but as Clelius his Daughter to whom he was obliged both for his life and education; and it is as natural for those of fifteen or sixteen years, to seek those which are elder, he having nigh compleated a lustre more than Clelia, did not at this time much esteem her, the pleasures he found with the Carthaginian and Numidian Princes diverting his eyes from that amiable Object, whose Beauty (as he hath since confessed to me) began then to emit those rayes, which have since wounded his heart, but he so well behaved himself towards Clelius and Sulpitia, that they loved him as if he had been their Son, and expended for him, as if he had been their Child; but Madam, that you may the better understand my Narration, you must know that the Prince of Carthage hath a man of Quality depending on him, named Amilcar, whom he much loved, and which is the most agreeable and accomplished man in the World, who contracted so great a friendship with Aronces, that it is reported Amilcar was no more loved by the Carthaginian Prince, than Aronces was of Amilcar.

And this young Prince having taken a resolution to travel unknown, Amilcar desired that Aronces should accompany him, (and Clelia having consented thereto) Aronces being then sixteen years old, and the young Clelia twelve, departed with the Prince of Carthage and Amilcar to see Greece; but that which was most remarkable, was, that at their return, the Tempest having cast them in Sicyly, in stead of returning to Carthage, as they intended, they resolved to see Rome, and the greatest part of the principal Cities of Tuscany, and these two opposite Voyages requiring some time to perform them, they were four years before they returned to Carthage. Aronces being twenty, and Clelia sixteen when they finished their peregrination; but before I tell you what passed between Clelia and him at their first enterview, it will be requisite to acquaint you, that at their departure from Rome, where the violences of Tarquin continued, the Prince of Carthage who travelled unknown, encountred an Illustrious Roman, named Horatius, whom the unjust Tarquin had banished, who without knowing where to pass the time of his exile, acquainted himself with Aronces, who very well understood the Latine Tongue, because Clelius who loved his Country, even to sacrifice his life for it, would not have Aronces ignorant of that Language: Horatius having a desire therefore to leave it some time to go into a strange Country, was very glad to find one endowed with so many rare qualities, which spoke his Language, and who having learn'd his design, proposed to him to go to Carthage, where he assured him he should find Clelius, whose name and vertue Horatius very well knew; for his Father and his, had been alwayes friends, though they had been Rivals, and Aronces having an Inclination to serve Horatius: not only because he appeared to have much Spirit, but because he was a Roman, and Son to one of Clelius's his Friends, entreated Amilcar, to pray the Prince of Carthage that this illustrious exile might accompany him, and find an asylum with him, and Amilcar following his natural generosity, and willing to satisfie Aronces whom he loved, easily obtained of the Prince of Carthage that which he demanded, who became from this time Aronces's particular Friend, he not foreseeing that which should one day divide them: but Madam, before I declare the Arrival of this Illustrious Troop at Carthage, you must know, that leaving them at Capua; I shall somewhat enlarge my Discourse, and tell you, that during the four years of Aronces's absence, Clelia was mounted to such a transcendent height of perfection, that there was nothing spoke of at his Return, but her Beauty at Carthage, and she had had so many attractive Graces, that she took all hearts captive, and made them do vassalage and homage to her. He who had the greatest Authority in Carthage, and who was named Mahurbal, was become so amorous of her, that he was not in estate to observe the Laws of the Country, acknowledging no other than those love had imposed upon him; but as he is a violent man and very rich, he imagined that if he did but demand Clelia of her Father, he should without doubt obtain her, and if Clelius had been a Carthaginian, he had easily given him his Daughter, but as he had a Roman heart, and had not renounced his Country, he could not resolve to give Clelia to a man which was not of his Country, and without disguising his thoughts, he would have at first explicated himself, when this Marriage was proposed to him; though it appeared to be very advantagious for him, for without doubt Mahurbal's Authority was greater there than any others; for the Prince of Numidia who was captivated by this fair Person, durst not openly testifie his love, for as he was than an Hostage with the Carthaginians, by reason of a Treaty his Father had made with this Republique, he had been very, imprudent, if he had declared himself his Rival, who held him in his power, and which it may be upon sleight pretexts, would have arrested him, or at least made him depart from Carthage, and estrange himself from his beloved Object, to whom he only endeavoured to make his love appear, though he knew very well, that Clelius had said, he would not marry his Daughter, but to a Roman, yet he doubted not, but if he could touch Clelius heart, to make him alter his resolution, and to prefer him before that Puissant Rival, who so highly declared himself, for he believed that a Numidian Prince ought to be more considered by Clelius, than a man which had but a limited Authority, and which had it not for ever.

Thus you see Madam, in what estate things were, when the Prince of Carthage, Aronces, Amilcar and Horatius arrived there, but as Fortune from very inconsiderable beginnings discloseth those Events which oftentimes prove remarkable: Aronces revisited the Fair Clelia in such a gallant manner, that it much contributed to that passion, which since hath tormented his life, for be pleased to know Madam, that as Carthage hath been heretofore begun to be builded by the illustrious Dido, in a place which was bought of the Phenicians which then inhabited there, and since finished by them, it hath ever remained as a mark of dependance of that proud City to that of Tyre, for there is built there every Year a Magnificent Vessel, in which they send to the Phenicians the tenth part of the Republique Revenue, with the tenth part of the Booty and Prisoners that are taken in War, they likewise exchange every Year two Virgins chosen by lot, and those which come to demand this tribute bring two Phenicians, and receive two Carthaginians, which are always most advantagiously married in both Countries, as this Ceremony is famous, there is in one day destined to the renewing the Alliance of these two People, which is spent in nothing but publick rejoycing, for there hath ever been two men of Quality sent from Phenicia, which come to receive this Tribute, and which usually make a Magnificent Feast to the principal Magistrate of the City, in that proud Vessel, and assoon as they are returned to Shore, they ply their Oars, and hoist their Sails. And as Maharball ought to perform this Ceremony, and to renew the Aliance with the Phenicians and Carthaginians, he to content his passion, obliged the Tyrians which were to make this sumptuous Feast, to invite thither the principal Ladies of the City, so that at the going out of that famous Temple of Dido, where this Alliance was to be renewed, all the Ladies conducted by Maharball's Sister, which is a vertuous Person, were brought the two Carthaginians which were to go into Phenicia, and received the two Phenicians, which were to remain at Carthage; but as this Feast was indeed made for Clelia, she was there with her Mother, Clelius not daring to oppose her going where so many other Ladies were, though Maharball's passion displeased him, she being induced thither more by reason than inclination, for Clelia's heart was not yet submitted to loves flame, neither had any of her Adorers made any impression in it, and it might very well be discerned, that she did affect nothing but glory, it giving an augmentation to her Beauty; but to relate the real truth of things, I believe she loved it not too much, at least, I have not seen a fairer in my life, in whom there appeared less affectation.

In the mean time, we arrived at Carthage the day of this Feast advantageously for the Phenicians, and very gloriously for our selves; for Madam, two dayes before the Vessel in which we were, had taken two of the Isle of Cyrene, with whom the Carthaginians had some contest, there being War between Sicyly their Confederate, and this Isle: but without reciting all the particulars of this action; I shall tell you in few words, that the Prince of Carthage, Aronces, Amilcar, and Horatius did highly signalize themselves in this occasion, and that we took in the end these two Vessels, in which we found a very rich Booty, though those of the Isle Cyrene were not rich, they having before taken it in a Sicylian Vessel which came from Corinth: So that we took in this occasion a considerable Prize, whether by the richness of the Merchandize, or the number of the Slaves: but not to obscure the glory of Aronces, it is certain, that all those which were in our Ship, agreed that he had more contributed to this Great Action, than any other, and as I have told you, we arrived very opportunely for the Phenicians, to whom the tenth part of our Booty belonged, and very agreeable for our selves, for when our Vessel entred into the Port Clelia and three or four other Ladies were on the Poop of that Magnificent Ship that the Carthaginians sent to Phenicia, and she was there entertained by Maharbal, and by the Numidian Prince; when we approach'd it the Prince of Carthage, Aronces, and Amilcar knew what was the Feast they made, and told it us, but when they were nigher and might discern the Beauty of Clelia, they were extremely surprized at it, and Aronces was sometime without knowing her, but as he was at first known by Clelia, she so obligingly saluted him, that he knew very well, that this fair Person was that dear adopted Sister, with whom he had passed his minority; so that he took much part in all the praises that the Prince of Carthage, Amilcar, Horatius and I attributed to her Beauty; but if Aronces was sensible of her Glory, Clelia was likewise of his, when that the Prince of Carthage followed by Aronces, Amilcar, Horatius and I were in the tributary Vessel where all the Ladies were, to render account to Maharbal of the Prize he had taken, for as the Vessel was not his, but belonged to the Republique; the glory only of this action appertained to him, which he would have given entirely to Aronces, to whom he gave all the praises, speaking to Maharbal in presence of Clelia, that he made him be looked on with admiration by all those which understood him; but as Aronces hath without doubt all the modesty of a truly brave man, he departed from the place where they spoke so advantagiously of him, and approaching Sulpicia, he demanded of her news of Clelius, he not being there, and a little after, not being able to hinder himself from speaking of the Beauty of her admirable Daughter, he rejoyced with her to see her so fair, and afterwards seeking occasion to speak to her in particular, whilst Maharbal, the Prince of Numidia entertained the Prince of Carthage and Amilcar, he testified to her his joy to see her endowed with such excelling Features, Clelia on her part, who knew how her Father loved Aronces, received him with as many testimonies of friendship, as if he had been her Brother, as Clelius had desired her to stile him, and that Aronces should call her his Sister, so that when he was nigh her, this charming Virgin thus said to him, him, before he could frame himself to speak to her, the admiration of her beauty having for some time suspended his speech: Tell me my Brother, said she to him, hath not absence made you forget Carthage and Greece, and Italy, have not they made you hate Africa? but before you answer me, added she smiling, remember I pray you, that though I was born at Carthage, I boast my self to be a Roman, for fear that without thinking of it, you put it before Rome, and prefer some other Country to my true Countrey. I now remember said Aronces so little of all I have seen during my voyage, that I cannot tell how to render you an account of it, for in the end my dear sister (if it is permitted an adopted brother to tell you my thoughts) you are the fairest creature I ever saw, and if Rome knew your beauty, I am perswaded it would wage a bloodier war to draw you from it, than that as Greece heretofore made against Troy, for to reconquer that fair Princess, whose name shall last as long as the world; at least, I know well, added he, that the most famous beauty of Rome, which is that of a person of great quality called Lucrece, is not comparable to yours; for all I see replyed Clelia, smiling, you are become such a flatterer, that I dare no more name yon my brother, but for to tell me something, that I may hear without blushing, pursued she, tell me, I conjure you, if you are satisfied concerning Rome, and if Tarquin ever merits by his violences the attribute of proud Rome is assuredly replyed Aronces, the first City of all Italy, and it deserves to be the worlds Metropolis, since it may boast to be your true Country, but for Tarquin, he is so absolute there, that though all people murmure secretly against him, there is no appearance that his tyranny should soon finish, for hardly doth he know that any one is against his Interests, but he exiles him, or puts him to death: As Aronces had thus sayd, they saw enter in the vessel where he was, the tenth part of the slaves that the Prince of Carthage had taken, and that he had sent as an homage to the Phenicians, which gave a thousand praises to him in receiving them; but Clelia hearing the Prince of Carthage say, that those slaves belonged to Aronces, she put an obliging war to him in demanding an exact account of his conquests; it is rather for me replyed he gallantly to demand of you an account of yours, which are assuredly more illustrious than mine; for I do not doubt, but if I saw all those which have been inslaved by the attractive lustre of your eyes, since my departure, I should see them in a far greater number, than those the Prince of Carthage attributeth to me, at least I know you may vanquish the vanquisher of others, If you enterprise it: After that Amilcar approaching, Aronces demanded of him, shewing Clelia to him, if he did not fear to be shipwrackt at the Port? and the conversation being become generall, I gave my verdict as well as Amilcar.

But Madam, I must ingeniously confess unto you, she is the fairest nature ever made for wonder, and in her alone are concentred all those graces (may be imagined) to compleat a perfect beauty, the brightness of her hair adding a lustre to her sparkling eyes, and the circumference of her face framed after such exact rules of proportion, that no pencill is able to delineate her mouth for shape, shaming the imitation of the best artists, and the livelicst colours, (though tempered with the hands of the most exquisite Painters) are but dull shadows, and imperfect Representations in comparison of that perfect mixture of red and white, which tinctures her complexion; but she is furthermore imbellish'd with all the Charms of a tempting beauty, for she hath a gallant and modest ayr, a lofty yet lovely Countenance, not any imperious deportment, but such an affable behaviour, that she commands both Love and Respect from all those who behold her, and though she hath a firm and bold spirit above those of her sex, she hath such an engaging sweetness that none can resist, and that grandeur of spirit which makes her despise the greatest perills if she be threatned with them, hath imprinted a certain timerous modesty on her visage, which heightens her unparallel'd Features.

Clelia being adorned with all these superexcellent embellishments of Nature, gave so much admiration to Aronces, Horatius, and to me, when wee saw her in that vessel which was going to Phenicia, that she was the sole subject of our discourse the Remainder of that day, for Horatius he spoke of it less then me, for besides that naturally hee doth not love to declare his thoughts, I have known, that he felt himself so wounded with Clelias beauty at this first sight, that he would not hinder his spirit from being wholly possessed with that fair person whom he alone contemplated, without communicating his Resentments to any persons, as for Aronces, he was more happy then Horatius, for as he resided in Clelius his house, he passed there the rest of that day and all the night, but he lodged no more there, because the Prince of Carthage would absolutely that he should lodge in his Pallace, and that he should be depending on him, and that Aronces having nothing but what Clelius had given him, was not sorry to find such an illustrious way to subsist by his own virtue receiving the benefits of so great a Prince.

In the mean time, after Clelius had imbraced Aronces with a Paternall affection, he had likewise much joy to see Horatius which was son to one of his deerest friends, and prayd Aronces to love him as if he had been his Brother, and commanded Sulpicia and his amiable Daughter, to take a particular care of him, for when Clelius entertained Horatius of the present Estate of Rome, he found such a Sympathy in his thoughts, and that he so much hated Tarquin, and the fiery and cruell Tullia his wife, that he loyed him much more for it, so that Aronces who very much esteem'd Horatius, and which was very much beloved by him, performed all that he could imagin to render his Exile less rigorous; but as freindship is not alwaies dispensed by exact Justice, though I had less merit then Horatius, I had a greater part in the affection of Aronces, being his entire Confident so soon as we arrived at Carthage, we knew the next day Maharballs love for Clelia without knowing the Prince of Numidias, which as I have already told you, made it appear but to her which caused it, but as he soon noted the credit that Aronces had with Clelius, Sulpicia, and their admirable Daughter, he endeavoured by all meanes to gain his friendship, in which without doubt he had much part, and since that time, as Liberty is much greater at Carthage, then Rome; the Prince of Numidia, Aronces, Horatius and I were almost alwaies with Sulpicia, and we had the Advantages, not to be often importuned by Maharballs presence, because as he nigh sustained the weight of the Republique, it was impossible for him absolutely to renounce his duty, to satisfie his Love; and relying on his Authority, he easily dispensed with all those petty cares, he thought unnecessary. And since none imbarqued from Carthage, without his provision, he did not fear Clelius would go from thence, nor that any man of quality in the City durst be his Rivall, as for the Prince of Carthage, he turned eyes another way, Amilcar seemed to have two or three designs instead of one, and the Prince of Numidia was not in estate to dare to oppose him openly, he lookt upon Aronces as one unknown, which durst not turn his eyes towards the Daughter of a man, to whom he owed his life, and he considered Horatius and I as two strangers which would not stay at Carthage, and which would not make an enemy of him which should protect us. Clelia being by these considerations importuned by him, and we were more happy, for though Mabarball hath Spirit, it is an incommodious spirit, he having a formed eloquence with an insupportable slowness, and which would enforce attention from his auditors, as if his discourse contained much ingenuity, who believes himself to be above all, he knowes who boasteth himself to be of a great house, great spirit, and great heart, and who is the violentest man in the world; but in despight of all his violence, the Prince of Numidia was his Rivall, tis true, he was in so discreet a manner, that no person perceived it but Clelia only, and he had perswaded Mabarball that the reason which so often induced him to Sulpicias house; was, that he was charm'd with her Language, and indeed the Prince with so much assiduity studied the Roman language to have only the power to speak of his Love to Clelia, (as I have known this morning by himself) and to vent his passion the first time to that fair person, for as he had lately left a man which depended on Clelius, who taught it him, he feigned to entertain himself alone with her, whilst Sulpicia spoke to other Ladyes to have forgotten some instructions he had given him, so that he made divers questions to her saying, he should be very much obliged to her if she would be his mistress, as the language you learned said she to him, is nigh as strange to me as you; (though I have learnt it from my Cradle since I do not ordinarily speak it, I should teach you my errours instead of correcting yours. As I principally learned that Language, sayd he to her, because I know you love it; and that for to speak it with you, I ought chiefly to speak as you, since I would be understood but by you alone, refuse not mee therefore the favour to clear my doubts, and to assist me to express my self when I entertain you, for it is certain, that how fair and copious the Language of your Country is, I find it poor and steril, every time I would tell you I love you, and I beleeve, tis rather because I have not found terms enough to declare it to you, then any defect of boldness: But in fine cruell Clelia, since you will not teach me to tell it you better I now tell it you, and tell it you with a resolution, to tell it you when any occasion presents, and with a resolution carefully to seek it, I will take such a particular care to shun you, replyed Celia, that if it is true you love me, you will more then once repent what you have sayd, it hath been so long that I have repented for not discovering my Love to you sooner, replyed the Prince of Numidia, that I can hardly believe I shall ever repent to have told you that I love you, for in fine you cannot inflict any punishment upon me, for which I am not prepared, I demand of you therefore the favour, added he, to tell me only if you have as much aversion for me as Mabarball, that which you have told me, replyed she, hath so much exasperated me, that I cannot now tell whether there is any other person in the world then you which displeaseth me, ah rigorous Clelia! cry'd he, you carry too far your hatred by not being willing to tell me that you hate me lesse then a man that I know is very odious to you, and to make me beleive that I am the only person to whom you are averse, see then Madam what was the declaration of the Prince of Numidia's Love, and in what manner the admirable Clelia received the discovery of his affection, she kept her word as she said, to avoid his particular conversation; but she had the generosity to do it so carefully, that none should perceive it for fear they might divine the cause, and that Mabarball should not have occasion to treat this Prince with any severity, as she told it to one of his friends, to the end to make him comprehend, that if she did not openly testifie her hatred against him, 'twas not that he ought to conceive more hope; since, twas but by a bountry which was entirely dissentaneous from all his pretentions.

In the mean time Aronces seeing the admirable Clelia every day, and seeing her with much familiarity, was taken in the snares of her beauty, and not being one moment ignorant of the nature of that affection which began to cloud his Liberty, as usually those are which have had no passion, he really imagined in what fears and disquietudes this Love would involve his Soul, for though he was much esteemed by Clelia, and tenderly affected by her Parents, he little expected ever to attain that happiness he so much desired, and his birth being unknown, it would be esteemed an high presumption if he should levell his thoughts at Clelia, but what considerations soever he used to oppose this new born passion, proved too weak to resist those Charms shot from such a tempting beauty. On the other side, Horatius was at first so powerfully touch'd with Clelia's perfections, that I am assured, he loved as soon as his eyes surveyed those inimitable Graces Nature had bestowed upon her, he not then imagining Love had stole his Heart, but contrary to Aronces, called that Esteem and admiration which might have admitted the term of Love, and these two Rivalls not being acquainted with one anothers affections; spent their time in an amicable familiarity, the Prince of Numidia much esteeming them, and Clelia had three Lovers which knew not themselves to be Rivalls, and of whom but one had disclosed his amourous intentions; I put not Mabarball in this number, for his passion was so generally known, that no person could be ignorant of it.

In the mean time, The Nuptialls (of the two Phœnicians, exchanged for the two Carthaginians the day we arrived there) were solemnized, and as these marriages were performed at the Republicks expences, there was a great Feast made, and nothing but publick acclamations of joy during the space of eight days; but I confess Madam, Clelias Conversations was to be preferred before those Festivall delights, she having a spirit suiting the pleasantness of her disposition. I remember one day amongst the rest, Aronces, Horatius, and I were with her, with two Ladies of the City, the one named Sozemisba, nisba, and the other Barce, for it is certain we could not better spend our time then with Sulpicia, the ground of this discourse proceeded from two men which had married the two Phenicians, one being amourous of her whom he had espoused at first sight, and disaffected her soon after the Nuptialls, the other which had espoused her, which was destin'd to him not being amourous, was become amourous since his marriage, so that this event being singular and agreable, they at first examined this fantasticall adventure; for my self sayd, Clelia I cannot conceive that it is possible to one to love, that he hath not the leisure to know, I easily imagine that a great beauty pleaseth at first sight, but cannot conceive how Love should be produced in a moment, and I am strongly perswaded that one cannot at the first time that they see a person, as amiable as can be imagined, feel any thing in his heart but some disposition to love, as you have never been in Love, replyed Horatius, tis not very strange that you do not know how this passion possesses hearts, and it is certainly true, that one may love at the first sight if they see a person that is capable to be beloved, and I confess that if they should love her at first sight the love would not be, it may be, strong enough to give a long inquietude, and that it would finish as speedily as it begun; as at first a spark cannot make a great fire if care be taken to extinguish it, so Love hath need of entertainment to increase it; but as this spark is fire, though it casteth no great heat nor light, so Love at first is Love, though it is but newly begun. It is certain replyed Aronces, that Love as friendship may be born in an instant which usually is preceded by many good Offices, but I am perswaded that that Love which hath no sudden beginning, and which is advanc'd by great esteem and very much admiration, is more strong and solid then that which is tumultuously born without knowing whether the person beloved hath either virtue or spirit, for I have heard say, that there are men which become amorous of women, with whom they had never changed a word; and there are some sayd Sozomisba which have loved women having never seen them, and which have even loved a picture; for those added Barce, I think they may be rather rank'd with those which have no reason, then in the rank of those which have Love. Indeed replyed Clelia, tis not so strange to see a man very amorous of a fair picture, as of a woman which hath neither Beauty spirit or virtue, as there are some which are; For my particular, replied I, I find the fair Clelia hath reason, and that it is the greatest folly imaginable to love that which is not amiable. I am of your opinion, replyed Horatius, but be likewise of mine, and confess that all great passions have a violent beginning, and that there is nothing which more demonstrates an ardent and durable Love, then when it is born in an instant without consulting our reason, I easily am of your opinion, replyed Aronces, that one may begin to have love at the first sight of an amiable person; but I will not confess that those which have this first thought of passion more violent than others, love more or longer, for 'tis rather an effect of their temperament, than the grandeur of their passion, so that ordinarily those which are of a hot nature love not so constantly as others, because not having power over their own dispositions, they must necessarily change Love as other things, and it consequently follows, that those which love the speediest are not the most constant: But in fine, said Clelia, it matters not whether they change or no, 'tis not of that I intend to speak, for that I maintain is, that one cannot have Love at the first sight they see a woman: I assure you Madam, replyed Horatius, I know a man which from the first day he saw one of the most admirable persons in the world, had I know not what in his heart which entirely possest it, which gave him joy and inquietude, desires, hope and fear, and which in fine, rendred him so different from himself, that if it was not love he had in his heart, it was something which very much resembled it. I know another, replyed Aronces, without suspecting Horatius his Passion for Clelia, which hath long time had esteem and admiration without loving a marvellous person; 'tis true, I am perswaded, that the reason which then hindred him from it was, that he believed himself not permitted to love that which he should adore: but beginning to love, replyed Clelia, hath he left adoration, for if so, I find that which he adored ought to wish he should not love it, these two Resentments are not incompatible.

Madam, replyed Aronces, and though we might adore things we love not, because they surpass our knowledge, we do nevertheless love that which we adore; for my self, replyed Barce, between those two thoughts, I should love him better which belongs to a mistress than him which appertains not but to a Goddess, and the tenderness of the heart is so to be prefer'd before the admiration of the spirit, that I put no comparison between those two things, indeed added Sozomisbe, tenderness is a quality so necessary to all manner of affections, that they cannot be agreeable or perfect if it is not there, I comprehend well said Clelia, that we may say a tender amity, and there is a notable difference between an ordinary and a tender amity, but said Sozomisbe, I have never heard of a tender amity, and I ever figur'd it to my self, that this affected and significative term was consecrated to perfect amity, and that it was only speaking of it, we might fitly imply the word tender, so many men use it now replyed I, that we know not a truer signification of it. I would therefore hinder, said Clelia, that that word which signifies a thing so sweet, rare, and agreeable, should be prophan'd though Celeres hath said every one useth it. For my particular, replied Sozomisbe, I promise you always to make use of it, if you can make me understand its true signification: I promise the same thing added Barce, for I ingenuously confess unto you, that though there passes never a day but I tell some of my friends that I love them tenderly, and some friends accost me in the same Language, I confess it may be that it appertains not to me to use it: As I am perswaded, added Aronces, that there is a species of an amorous tenderness which puts as much difference between the Loves of those which have it or have it not, as ordinary tenderness puts to amity, I shall be infinitely obliged to the fair Clelia, if she will define tenderness, and decipher how I may know it, and what value it sets on friendship, to the end I may prove in the sequel of it, that tenderness joyned to Love, much augmenteth its estimation; as I have naturally a tender Spirit, replyed Clelia, I think it appertains to me more than any other, to speak of tenderness and that Barce with all her Spirit, cannot do it so well as I.

I have already confeſſed, replyed that fair perſon, that I do not well know how to make uſe of this word, neither do I preciſely know, whether I have any tenderneſs or not, therefore I ſhall be infinitely obliged if you pleaſe to tell me the difference between an ordinary and a tender amity; it is ſo conſiderable, replyed Clelia, that I may very well ſay, there is leſs between the indifferent amity, than between theſe two. For in fine, that which hath no tenderneſs, is a kind of a tranquillous friendſhip, which gives neither great contentments, nor great inquietudes to thoſe which are capable of them, they have even friendſhip in their hearts, without expreſſing any ſenſibility; depart from them without being melancholy, they think not of them if they ſee them not, they render them courteſies without great joy, and they receive them without much acknowledgment, they neglect all petty cares, the evils of thoſe they love touch them not, generoſity and oſtentation hath as much part in all they act as friendſhip, they have a certain Lethargy of heart, which makes them not feel the joy to be beloved of thoſe they love, they put little difference between the converſation of other perſons, and thoſe to whom they have promiſed amity: In fine, they love with ſo much lukewarmneſs, that the leaſt conteſtation there is between them and their friends, they are ready to infringe their promiſed friendſhip: Furthermore they are not enough ſenſible, neither of the good or evil of thoſe to whom they have promiſed friendſhip, for uſually they coldly oppoſe thoſe who defame them, and praiſe them themſelves without order or aggravation, and we may ſay they love as if they loved not, ſo lukewarm is this ſort of friendſhip, and uſually their affection is very much intereſſed, and if any one ſeek the cauſe of it they would be found but in themſelves. And indeed we ſee every day that thoſe friends without tenderneſs abandon thoſe to whom they have promiſed affection, as ſoon as fortune frowns on them, there is likewiſe ſome of them which cannot ſuffer the long ſickneſs of thoſe they love, and which deſire to ſee them with aſſiduity, when they are not in eſtate to divertiſe them. That which you now ſay, happened once to me replyed Sozonisbe, for I had a languiſhing malady, which made me know there are few tender friends, in the beginning when I fell ſick, purſued this fair perſon, they had very great care of me, but when the length of my ſickneſs had made me become melancholy, and that I demanded no remedies, but of thoſe which came to ſee me, inſtead of then demanding news of me, or to tell them of it, I was ſoon in a very great ſolitude, and I knew that thoſe whom I eſteemed my beſt friends derided at me in effect, a man one day of my acquaintance was asked how long it was ſince he ſaw me, he anſwered, that till he was become ſo experienced to find ſome remedies to cure my melancholy, he would not ſee me, and the ſame queſtion being demanded a Lady, ſhe ſaid cruelly that unleſs ſhe knew the vertue of all vegetables, ſhe could not make me a viſit which would be pleaſing to me, and that it was better to leave me at quiet, than to weary themſelves by importuning me. 'Tis true, ſaid Aronces, what this fair Sozonisba hath ſaid, and it is true, added Horatius. becauſe we uſually content our ſelves to deplore their miſhaps without comforting them, judge then I pray, added Clelia, if friendſhip without tenderneſs is a ſweet thing, and if I have not reaſon not to account them friends which have not a tender heart, as I have expreſſed to you, for in fine it is not that only which makes the ſweetneſs of amity, and which makes it conſtant and violent together, tenderneſs hath yet that of more particular, that even aſcribeth to it, I know not what character of gallantry which rendring it more divertiſing, it inſpireth civility in thoſe which are capable of it, and there is as great difference between a tender friend and an ordinary friend, as between a tender friend and a lover, but better to define tenderneſs. I think I may call it a certain ſenſibility of heart, which never ſoveraignly operates, but in thoſe which have noble ſouls, vertuous Inclinations, and well weighed ſpirits, and which makes them when they have friendſhip, to have it ſincerely and ardently, and to feel lively the griefs and joys of thoſe they love as their own, 'tis this tenderneſs which obliges them to love better to be with their unhappy friends, than to be in a place of divertiſement: it is this which makes them excuſe their faults and defects, and to praiſe with exaggeration their leaſt virtues, 'tis this which makes them do great ſervices with joy, which makes them not neglect the leaſt cares, which renders particular converſations more ſweet than general; which entertaineth Confidence, which eaſily appeaſeth any diſorder, which happeneth amongſt friends, which uniteth all their deſires, which makes complacency, equality as agreeable to thoſe which have it, as to thoſe for whom they have have it, and in a word comprehends all ſweetneſs and affection of friendſhip, and in effect it's this alone which puts joy there, and which by a particular priviledge ſavours nothing of the irregularity of Love; but reſembles it in many things elſe, thoſe which have but a ſtupid and common friendſhip, take only the care to keep the faireſt Letters of their friends; but thoſe which have a tender friendſhip, keep with pleaſure even their leaſt notes, they hearken to an obliging word with a joy, which obliges thoſe which told it them, they take pleaſure in the leaſt things, and by an inexplicable charm thoſe which have a true tenderneſs in their hearts, are never troubled to aſſiſt thoſe for whom they have friendſhip, if they ſhould be ſick or melancholy, judge then what difference there is between friends without tenderneſs and tender friends. Ah Madam, replied Aronces, if I would as well define the tenderneſs of Love as you have deciphered that of friendſhip, I ſhould aſſuredly make this company confeſs, that there is Love without tenderneſs as well as friends: 'Tis true added Horatius and the fair Clelia hath admirably repreſented that precious and delicate part of friendſhip few are acquainted with. For my particular ſaid Barce ſmiling, I confeſs in my life I never fitly uſed the word tenderneſs, if it be true that it muſt have poſitively ſeat in the heart as Clelia hath ſaid, to have it right, that is to ſay, to love tenderly. It is not ſo with me, added Sozonisbe, for it ſeems that I have an heart made in the manner as it ought to be, to boaſt of tenderneſs. For my part, replyed I, which have had more Love than friendſhip in my life, it more imports me to know what that amorous tenderneſs which puts a difference between Lovers, than that which is between friends, I would therefore deſire the fair Clelia to permit Aronces to give his judgment of it: though I have leſs intereſt in that kind of tenderneſs, replyed she, then you have in that I have spoken of: I voluntarily consent that Aronces tell it you: If tis true you do not know it. Since you then permit me Madam sayd Aronces; I will boldly say, that tenderness is a quality more necessary for Love then friendship, for it is certain that that affection which is produced by the help of reason, and which is conducted and governed by it, may sometimes act in the hearts of those in which it is as if they had tenderness (though naturally they had it not) but for Love which is ever incompatible with reason, and which at least can never be subject to it, it hath absolutely need of tenderness to correct its brutality stupidity and inconsideration. In effect, a Love without Tenderness hath nothing but impetuous desires which can be confined to no bounds nor limits, and a Lover which hath a like passion in his Soul, considers nothing but his own satisfaction without considering the honour of the person belov'd, for one of the principal Offices of true tenderness is, that it takes much more care for the person it loves then its own, and a Lover which hath it not would do all that which might please him without any Reservation, and he would demand in a rude and uncivill way the greatest favours, as if they were due to him as a Tribute in effect, those freer Lovers, which are enemyes of tendernes, and who defame it, are ordinarily insolent, uncivill, full of vanity, ease to anger, difficult to appease, indiscreet when they are favour'd, insupportable when they are misused; They believe the greatest work of Love they can give; is alwaies to wish to be made happy; for without that they know not neither favours nor graces: They are not contented with favourable regards, sweet speeches, and all those petty things which so elevate the beatitude of those which have tender souls, they are Lovers I say which read but once the Letters of their Mistress, whose hearts have not joyfull emotion when they receive them, who neither know how to rave, speak idly, nor sigh agreeably, and are utterly ignorant of a certain pleasing melancholy which proceeds from the tenderness of an amorous heart, and which is sometimes more pleasing then delight. These are Lovers I say of great noise, which makes all the prooves of their Love consist in excessive expences, and which feel nothing of all those delicacies, this passion inspires their jealousie, even as more brutall then that of the Lovers which have a tender heart, for they often pass from hating their Rivalls to hate their Mistresses, when on the contrary, those Lovers whose loves are mingled with tenderness, somtimes so respect their mistresses, that they restrain their anger against their Rivalls in some occasions, because they cannot do it without exasperating them. For my self sayd Horatius, I cannot discern Tenderness from Love in an amorous heart, for that passion when it is violent, so strongly operates in those hearts it possesses, that all the quality of their souls become as it is, or at least assume some amorous impression. Tis true replyed Aronces, that love entirely possesseth the heart of a Lover, and it is likewise true, that he which hath an heart naturally tender, shall love more tenderly, then he which shall be of a temper more fierce and rude, and I maintain, to love well, a Lover must have a naturall tenderness, before he hath Love, and this precious and rare quality which is so necessary, to love well, can be hardly acquired, and it is truly a gift of the Gods, of which they are never prodigall, we may gain more spirit, we may correct our vices; and acquire all vertues; but we can never acquire tenderness, we may without doubt sometimes disguise our selves; but it cannot be long, and those which have tenderness, know not how to deceive; In effect, all the words, all the regards, all the cares, all the actions of a Lover, who hath not a tender heart, are entirely different from those of a Lover, which hath tenderness, for he hath sometimes respect without having a kind of sweet submission, which pleaseth much more, of civility without agreement, of obeysance without sweetness; and even Love without a certain delicate sensibility, which alone causeth all the punishments and all the felicities of Lovers, and which is in fine the truest mark of a perfect Lover, I likewise put for a foundation, that a tender Lover knows not how neither to be unfaithfull, cozening, vain, insolent, nor indiscreet, and not to be deceived neither in Love not freindship, we must as well examine if a Lover or a Friend have tenderness, as if they have Love or Friendship.

As Aronces had thus spoke, the Prince of Numydia entred, and a little after Maharball, so that the subject being changed by their coming, all the company after a little discourse went away with that violent Lover of Clelia. At our departure from thence, I went with Aronces to the Prince of Carthage, but though the incomparable Amilcar had this night there all the merriness of his pleasant disposition, and that all those which were with the Prince of Carthage confessed they never had heard from him more agreeable things. Aronces appeared to be very melancholy, and his melancholy was so generally noted, that Amilcar demanded of me if I knew not the cause of it, so that having observed him more carefully, I noted that Aronces was not where he would be, so that when we were retired, for we then lay together, I pressed him to tell me the cause of his melancholy, at first he would disguise the truth from me, but in the end when I did not think to ask him any more about it, because I beleeved he would not tell me, he stayd himself after he had walked sometime, and looking stedfastly upon me, thus sayd, You are not very inquisitive, said he to me, to demand that which you would know and you have sure little desire to redress my melancholy; since you press me no more to tell you the cause of it, no Aronces, cryed I to him, fixing my eyes on him, nothing but to demand of you, to tell me whether you are amorous, your expressions almost betraying it; for in fine, I prayd you with tenderness to tell me that which caused your grief and you refused it me: Nevertheless, a little after that you were angry, I demanded no more of you, that you refused me, and I find you are even now disposed, to pray me to hearken to that you would never tell me, but in an instant, it is therefore I conclude with reason, and it seemeth to me that you are amorous, since tis true that there is nothing but Love only which can frame such a fantasticall thing as this: Tis true Celeres, sayd he to me, I am amorous, and though you tax me with Injuries, you must be the only confident of my Passion, and I tell you that which it may be shall never be known to the admirable person whom I adore, though I see her daily, you love Clelia then sayd I to him; for it seemeth to me that tis but she alone you daily frequent, quent, yes Celeres, I love Clelia, replyed he, and I love her ardently and so tenderly, that according to all appearances, I shall become the unhappiest man in the World; but it seemes to me sayd I to him, that if I was in your place I should account my self very happy, for in fine, as you have been brought up in Clelius his house, you live with Clelia with the same Liberty as if she was your sister, and her Father and Mother look upon you in effect as if you were her Brother; tis true Celeres replied he, but they look not upon me as her Lover, and I am strongly perswaded, that if they looked upon me as such, they would hate me as much as they love me. And they would think to have right to accuse me of an horrible Ingratitude and terrible presumption. In effect I owe my life to the generous Clelius, and I know not to whom I owe my birth, he found me in the sea, he saved me from an eminent peril, he hath carefully educated me, and I owe to him all my virtue, and I should be without doubt the basest of all men if I should voluntarily do any thing which might displease him; but though I am assured he will take it ill, that one unknown dares lift his eyes towards his admirable daughter; I cannot hinder my self from doing it, and I feel I can never desert her love seeing my self likewise destin'd to live without hope I must prepare my self for imaginable torments, and I know nothing more cruel, then to have power to love without having Ingratitude. You have a soul so great, and an heart so well made, replied I, that Clelius cannot doubt but your birth is illustrious, and if it was so replied he, I should not be in hopes to possess Clelia, though she affected me, for since Clelius refused her to Mahabal, who is of an high birth, rich in possessions, and who hath the cheifest authority in one of the first Cities in the world, he would refuse an unhappy man, that he alwaies lookt upon as an ungrateful, and who it may be would be lookt upon by Clelia, as a man who thinks to enrich himself by marrying her, and not to render himself happy by the only possession of her person; likewise my dear Celeres, my hopes are destitute of all releif, for if Clelius remains in his wonted opinion he will never give his daughter but to a Roman, and if he changes it, he will give her apparantly to Mahabal, but to tell you truth, I do not much fear, it, and I have likewise cause to complain that I am not a Roman, and if perhaps I should be of a birth proportionable to my thoughts, Clelius would refuse me Clelia, as he hath refused her to my Rivall; but alas! I am far from that Estate since I know my extraction, and that according to all appearances, I shall never know it, nevertheles I love Clelia, I love her without hope; and I love with a resolution not to tell her of it; and not to murmure if she is angry to be beloved of me, in case she denyes my passion, judge then my dear freind, if I have no cause of melancholy. For my self replyed I, I am perswaded; that too great prudence is often needless in Love, without considering those things you have done, I would act divers wayes, for I would strive against my passion as much as I could, and if I could not vanquish it, I would seek to perswade my self by all that which might flatter it, and I would forget nothing of all that which might agreeably deceive me. For the first, replyed Aronces, I am resolved to do it, though I am perswaded I shall do it unprofitably; but in fine, I owe that to the generosity of Clelius, and it behoves me if he hath something one day to reproach me of, that I have at least nothing to reproach my self, but for the last, I shall never be in a capacity to follow your counsel for fear from seeking agreeably to deceive my self, I seek in despight to render my self most unhappy in effect, there are many instances which makes me believe that Clelius shall never know my birth more than I, and there are others where I believe that I and he shall learn that I am Son of some Enemy to Rome, or some friend to Tarquin, I strangely deplore the misfortunes which happens to my friends, replied I to him, but I can never take pity of those they make themselves, therefore you may not expect any compassion from me, when you weave the web of your own miseries, after that as 'twas late we lay together, but I should falsifie the truth, if I say we slept, for Aronces did not sleep at all, and he waked me divers times to speak to me of his passion, but in fine Madam, as he hath a marvellous generosity, he effectually fancied with himself, to oppose his Love with all the power he could possible: and he forgot nothing to do it, for he went as little as he could to the places where Clelia was, he sought Clelius in particular, without seeking his admirable daughter, and he so strongly attach'd himself to the Prince of Carthage and Amilcar, that there was no person but believed he had more Ambition than Love. Horatius though he was both his Friend and his Rival perceived not his Love for Clelia, the Prince of Numidia likewise suspected it not, and Clelia did not imagine it, and because she would avoid to give any occasion to the Prince of Numidia to mention his Love, she had given such a generâl order not to leave her alone, that if Aronces had been bold enough to declare his affection to her, he would not have found an opportunity to have done it, so that as nothing more augments a breeding Love than the difficulty to tell it, Horatius on this side soon became as amorous as Aronces; but as he naturally loved to conceal all things; he declared nothing of his passion either to Aronces or to me, these two friends were likewise Rivals without having cause to complain of one another, they being both ignorant of their Loves, for the Prince of Numidia as he looked upon Aronces as if he had been Clelius his brother, he gave to him many testimonies of friendship, without discovering his passion to him, to the end that being his friend he might favour him when occasion should present. For Mahabal the less correspondency he found in Clelias heart, the more his passion augmented, and the more reasons Clelius obliged him to prove that he ought not to think of marrying his daughter at Carthage since he had an intention to go speedily to Rome, the more obstinate he was to compass his design, so that Clelius and Sulpitia were extremely afflicted to see themselves in the power of an amorous person to whom they would refuse all that which might give any satisfaction to his Love. On the other side, though Sulpitia testified to have much friendship for Horatius because Clelius would have it so, 'twas true, that in the bottom of her heart she had a secret disposition not to render Justice to his merit, because he was son to a person of whom Clelius had been very amorous, and whom he thought heretofore to have married, so that Sulpitia yet retaining some resentments of jealousie which perswaded her that her Husband did not love Horatius, but because he had yet some agreeable remembrance of the love he had for his Mother, had without doubt less disposition to love him than Clelius, and she loved more tenderly Aronces than Horatius, tius, for Clelia she esteemed them both; but as she was equitable, she saw that if there was any equality between these two men as reflecting on the qualities essentially necessary for virtuous persons, there was not so much for the agreement of the humour as that of their person, being certain that Aronces as much excells his Rivall, as his Rivall exceeds all others, so Clelia leand, by choice, on the side of Aronces, and having lived with him from her infancy, as if he had been her brother, there was between her and him a greater familiarity then between Horatius and her, though Clelius commanded her to live with him, as if she had been his sister, things being then on these terms there was some factions at Carthage which are unnecessary to mention wherein the illustrious Prince that Amilcar followed, had some part, so that the interest of his affairs obliging him to retire to Utica which depends on him, he went thither followed by his creatures, so that Aronces finding this occasion to separate himself from Clelia for to endeavour to heal himself by his absence, followed him likewise, for Clelius voluntarily consented that Aronces to whom fortune seemed to have not left any establishment should seek one nigh a great Prince, so Aronces departed from Carthage with his consent, he not imagining he went from thence to endeavour not to have more Love for his admirable daughter, but that which is most remarkable, was, that the Prince of Numidia and Horatius who knew not that Aronces was their Rivall, did all what they could to hinder him from following the Prince of Carthage; for as they both knew he was much their friend, and that they noted he was very well beloved by Clelia they imagined they should looose much in loosing him, and that when the time should come when they might discover the passion they had in their souls, they should be much assisted by him; but in fine, the Prince of Numidia and Horatius without telling the true reason which obliged them to counsell Aronces, not to go with the Prince of Carthage, and Aronces without telling them why he did not follow their counsells, we departed as I have before told you: Aronces not having entertained Clelia in particular, for he bid her adieu in the presence of Sulpicia and Horatius, and I who knew only the secret of his heart alone, perceived the reluctancy which he had to depart from Clelius his house, for we entred in again three times upon such pretences, that at last he was constrained to say he had forgotten that which obliged him to reenter, so litle true resemblance he found in the pretences he invented to see Clelia once more, but in the end, Madam, we went to Utica, where Aronces became more amorous, and by consequence more miserable then at Carthage, where there arrived many things since our departure. For you shall know Madam, that Maharball who had a passion in his soul the most violent in the world, not suspecting that the Prince of Numidia who was his Hostage had any design, for Clelia spoke to him of nothing but his Love, of the Injustice of Clelius, and the cruelty of his Daughter, conjuring him to counsell them both to change their thoughts. For in the end, said he, to the Prince Adherball, if it be not a terrible thing to hear Clelius say he would not marry his Daughter till he return to Rome, he which hath been exil'd so long from it, he which is Tarquin's mortal enemy, who raigneth with so absolute an authority, that tis not credible any power can pull him from the Throne on which his cruelty hath so firmly seated him, yet Clelius pretends not to marry his Daughter but when he shall return to Rome, or at least not to marry her to any but a Roman, it must then of necessity be, that he will give the faireſt and propereſt person on the earth to a banished Criminall, or at the most to an unhappy Exil'd: Judge then if I have no reason to complain of Clelius, and if I may not beleive, that either he or Clelia have a secret aversion against me, which they dare not testifie to me because they are under my power, but to hinder these things, pursued he, I pray you when you find a fit occasion to endeavour to make them take better thoughts for fear they force me to act those things which will not be pleasing to them, the Prince of Numidia hearing Maharbal speak in this manner, was so surprized and astonished at it, that the agitation of his heart appeared in despight of him in his eyes, and it being discernd by Maharball, he endeavoured to recall himself; but he wholy discovered it by his words, for as he would not tell Maharball that Clelius was to blame, and that he durst not tell him that he had reason, he took a mean; which perswaded him to whom he spoke, that he was his Rivall; in effect, he so aggravated the Love the Romans have for their Country, the Injustice they had to put a vast difference between strangers and them, and to perswade him, that as Clelius had sought an Asylum in the City where he had the greatest authority, he was obliged not to violence him in a thing which ought to be done freely with many other reasons which served not; but to evidence to Maharball that this Prince was amorous of Clelia; and that he had chosen an ill Confident, so that this thought exciting a grand disturbance in his spirit, he left the Prince of Numidia, and without any delay went to Sulpicias house, where after some generall conversations, he found occasion to speak particularly to Clelia, and he endeavoured to perswade her that it should be very strange to her that Clelius should pretend to marry her, but when he returned to Rome, or at least not to marry her but to an unhappy exile, when he might give her the first rank in one of the cheifest Cities in the world, Sir said Clelia to him, it is not for me to examine my Father the reason why he refused the honour you do him; and it implyes I know that I should commit a great offence by not obeying him, for to oblige me with blindness to follow his desires, but to the end, that all your hatred should not fall on him, I ingeniously confess that I should obey him with an extream grief if he should command me to espouse an Affrican, and so destroy my hope of seeing Rome. For it is true that there is in my heart so strong a Love for my Fathers Country, that would render me very unhappy to take from me the hope of dying there. If I dye not soon at Carthage, replyed Maharball, there is no appearance you will ever live at Rome, alas sir, replyed Clelia, as long as it is under the power of Tarquin, I shall not go thither, but I should be very sorry to looose the hope of it, therefore I intreat you not to persist to oblige my Father to consent to your desires, and to have the generosity to enter in his thoughts, and to beleive that if he were a Roman, he would prefer you before all other Romans, and since, added this discreet mayd, he refuses you a thing which is so little advantageous for you, that you ought rather to thank him then to complain, for in the end, if he accords to that which you seem to desire, every one will reproach you, for your preferring the daughter of an unhappy Exile before so many fair persons which are at Carthage, and whose alliance may be more suitable and agreeable for you. No, no, unjust Clelia, said he to her, do not seek to perswade me that there can be any thing more agreeable or glorious then the conquest of your heart, for it cannot be, and permit me to tell you, that if you were as prudent as fair, you might tell the unjust Clelius, that Tarquin is more powerfull at Rome than ever, and that according to all appearances, he will not permit him to return thither, that it is very dubious whether fortune hath sent more Romans to chuse exile then he hath put to death, and if it was not so, it would be easie to consummate your Nuptialls at Carthage, if it were for any other then Maharbal, and tell to him I pray you that he may be happy if he will, and that he may render himself miserable if he renders me so. Ah Sir, replyed Clelia generously, I know not how to threaten my Father, but I can tell him that if my life is an obstacle to the tranquillity of his, I am ready to sacrifice it for his content so that taking from you the cause of your Love, I might take away your hatred against him. As Clelia had thus spoken, the Prince of Numidia entred, and seeing Maharball with her, he blusht for anger, and he seeing the change of his countenance was confirmed in those thoughts he already had, and the better for to clear his suspition, he continued to speak low to Clelia, whilst Aderbal spoke to Sulpicia, and to the other Ladyes which were with her; but as he is naturally violent, he could not suffer this long particular entertainment without testifying much anger, so that Maharball not doubting but that he was his Rivall, took a resolution to distrust him instead of confiding in him, as he had designed, and as the generall affairs of the Republick gave him not so much leasure as his passions required, he must of necessity go from thence and leave his Rivall with his Mistress, and in effect, though Clelia sought carefully to avoid speaking particularly to the Prince of Numidia, since he had discovered his Love to her, she did not do it this day with the same care, for she had her spirit so distracted with Maharballs expressions, that she thought of nothing else, so that she not taking notice of it, the Prince of Numidia came to her, and began to speak to her as a man which had some particular thing to tell her, Clelia coming to her self, turned towards him and prayd him not to oblige her to fly him, as she would ever do, if he continued to speak of his Passion, for in the end, sayd she to him, if you persevere in it, you will force me to take a resolution not to consider you as you are a great Prince; but to look on you as a man which esteems me not, since he takes no care but to displease me. Would to the Gods Madam, said the Prince of Numidia to her, that I had never told you I loved you, this wish without doubt is a wish very extraordinary from a passionate Lover as I am, but tis true that I now do nothing but strive to repell the passion I have in my soul that you might be ignorant of it, though I know t'will continue till Death. But Madam, that which makes me speak as I do, is, that I must advertise you that if you do not soon depart from Carthage you expose your self to be the unhappiest person in the world, and that offering you an Asylum in the Court of the King my Father, I fear you will not go thither, because I have discovered to you my Love. Nevertheless I swear and protest unto you, that though I am more amorous then Maharball, I will never be so unjust as he.

Clelia hearing the Prince speak in this manner, was extreamly surprized at it, for she knew well that he knew somthing where she had an Interest, and spake to him with more affability then usual, to the end to oblige him to tell her, that which made him use this Language, and in effect the Prince recounted to her the conversation whith he had with Maharbal, continuing in pursuit to offer her an Asylum in Numidia, and protested to her with as much Generosity as Love, that if he should be constrained to make war to defend her, he would do it with much joy; Clelia thankt him very civilly for the offer he made her, assuring him nevertheless that she beleived that her Father would not nor ought not to accept it, adding further, that for all that she should remain much obliged to him for it; but Aderball not holding himself refused for what Clelia said to him, spoke the next day to Clelius, and so lively represented to him the grandeur of Maharballs Love, his authority, and the violence of his Nature, that he made him easily comprehend that his sojourn at Carthage was very dangerous, but after that he offered him that which he had already offered to Clelia, so that Clelius who knew not that this Prince was amorous of his Daughter, admired his generosity, and gave him innumerable prayses, but after all Sir, said he to him, when he had left praysing him, it would not be just it may be to begin again the war between Numidia and Carthage, for a thing where my unhappy family have only interest, you are in a hostage for a treaty of peace which is not yet entirely executed. Likewise Sir, I should expose you to be evill treated by Maharball, and if I should involve the King your Father in new wars with this Republick; and therefore since Carthage is no more an Asylum for me, I must endeavour to depart from it, and to go seek one farther of, where Maharball hath no power to hurt me, for I have long had a great desire to approach Rome: the Prince of Numidia was not fully satisfied with these reasons, but told Clelius that it would be difficult for him to go by sea, and that it would be easier for him to go by Land into Numidia, but whatsoever he could tell him, the generous Clelius believed not, that seeing the terms in which were the things between these two States, he ought to accept the offer of Aderball, and having an effectuall desire to approach Rome, it was more easie for him to be generous, and to refuse the Prince of Numidia, who found himself in a strange perplexity, so that he saw himself necessitated to desire her absence, whose person he loved, and to be separated for ever from her, but he found himself yet in a greater inquietude, for as he observed Maharball more narrowly, he discovered that he had a design to arrest Clelius, making him to be accused for machinating somthing against the Republick, and to have secret Intelligences with the Prince of Carthage with whom Arouces was then, for things were very much imbroyled since the departure of this Prince. That which obliged Maharball to contrive this design, was, that he hoped that being Master of the life of Clelius, he should soon gain Clelia, whom he thought would not refuse to marry him to give life and liberty to her Father; so that the Prince of Numidia believing that the design of Maharball might succeed, and that he should see him possessed of Clelia, if he should not advise Clelius speedily of it, he ballanced it not long, and went to see Clelia at the same time, though he believed this advice would accelerate his departure,

tis true, that in the force of his passion he had a design to follow her without telling her any thing of it; but in fine Madam, to hast my self to tell you that which passed, you shall know that the Prince of Numidia after he had told Clelia the most passionate things that can be imagined, spoke to Clelius, to whom he had made known so precisely the unjust design of Maharball, that after he had consulted with Horatius and Sulpicia about it, he was resolved that they should think no more of any thing but to depart speedily from Carthage, the occasion presented it self very favourable, for there was a Syracusian vessell ready to set sayl, so that Clelius secretly treating with him who commanded it, he promised to receive him and all his family into his ship, the next night which preceded his departure, and in effect without troubling my self to tell you the unprofitable particulars, it suffices that you know that in despight of all the foresight of Maharball, the care of the Prince of Numidia, Clelia and Horatius came to so good a conclusion, that this illustrious Roman family embarqu'd one night without being perceiv'd, so that this vessel of Syracuse departed from the port at the break of day. Maharball not knowing any thing of it till night, for as he believed Aderball was amorous of Clelia, he suspected not he would have assisted her flight, so that having seen him all the day, this Prince had dextrously hindred him from going to Clelius his house, to the end he should not follow Clelia, with hope to find her. For the time had been so favourable, that there was no appearance that any other vessell could joyn that which carried this fair and admirable Virgin, but though the Prince of Numidia constrained himself as much as he could that he might not appear too melancholy, he was so pensive that when Maharball came to know the departure of Clelius and his family, he doubted not but Aderball was acquainted with it, he learnt likewise his departure in such a manner, which much excited his anger; since he knew not that Clelius was departed; but when he sent at night to his house to arrest him as a Criminall, he used the flight of Clelius to authorise this violence, for he assembled all the Suffells, (for so they call those who share the Government of the Republick) and told them it did evidently appear he was a Criminall, because he was fled.

In the mean while, as he was most violent, he heard something from Aderball, which made him believe he was acquainted with Clelius his flight, so that he secured his person, publishing that he had a hand in all that Clelius had plotted with Aronces and Amilcar, Maharbal seeking by this means to revenge on his Rivall the insensibility of his Mistress, and it may be, he believed likewise to find Clelia, because he imagined that the vessel of Syracusa, in which she was embarqued should not be used, but to depart from Carthage, and should land her, to go to seek an Asylum where Aderball would meet her as soon as he should be free, so that in this opinion the Prince was kept very exactly, and treated with much rigour. Maharball likewise sent divers vessells after that, which had conveyed away his Mistress, though with little hope; for besides that he believed not, she took the way of Syracuse, it had been so long since her departure, that there was no hope to find her again. Nevertheless as tis the property of Love not to neglect any thing; Maharball had rather do an hundred unprofitable things then to miss one which might serve him.

But whilst this irritated Lover knew not on whom to revenge the unhappy succes of his Love, and that he revenged himself on another Lover which was no better used then he, during I say that, that the unhappy Aderball suffered an unjust Imprisonment, and that he endured incredible evills.

Aronces who knew nothing of that which passed at Carthage, knew that absence could not heal him; and repented himself for leaving Clelia, for in the Estate in which things then were, there was no means to think of returning to Carthage, so that Aronces was so sad and melancholy, that his grief could hardly receive any increase; but melancholy much more invaded his cogitations, when a slave brought him a Letter that Clelius had written him upon his departure, and that he had trusted to that slave which gave it him, at first he had much joy because he hoped to have news of Clelia, but he had in pursuit an unequalled desparation when he saw that, that Letter which was given him contained these words, if my memory deceive me not.

Clelius to Aronces.

Divers important reasons make me depart from Carthage, to come nigher Rome, I know not whether I shall chose Syracuse or Capua for my Asylum, but in what place of the world soever I am, I shall be alwaies ready to receive you as if you were my son, in case the changes of the Court wherein you are, oblige you to leave it, and if the Gods hinder me from making a second shipwrack on the same sea, where they put you into my arms, you may assure your self of a house in all places where I shall have one for my self. I mention nothing of Sulpicia, Horatius and Clelia, for they know not of my writing to you.

After that Aronces had read this Letter, he gave it me to read, and told me many touching things which would excite compassion in your heart, if I should relate them to you, Amilcar a little after, coming into his Chamber, learnt us the Imprisonment of the Numidian Prince, the fury of Maharball, and confirmed the flight of Clelius, Sulpicia, Horatius, and Clelia, and likewise told us Maharballs design to arrest Clelius, and that they had carried their most precious things along with them, and this design had been so discreetly carried that not any one suspected it, but as Maharball, added he, used the Prince of Carthage his name to prosecute Clelius, though there is great likelihood he acted rather the part of an incensed Lover, then of a good Citizen I come to assure you on the Princes part, that he will recompence you for all the misfortunes Clelius hath suffered, and that there is nothing in fine, but you may expect from him. For my particular pursued he, I offer you all that which is in my power, and I think you may assure your self to be happy, Amilcar added in pursuit many obliging things where I might take part, and where Aronces and I answered with all the civility and acknowledgment that we ought to have for such generous offers, but though Aronces strangely constrained himself, it was impossible for him to conceal his extream melancholy; Nevertheless at first he was not astonished at it, for as he knew that Aronces loved Clelius, as if he had been his Father, he imagined twas a grief which proceeded from his tenderness for him. But as he saw him daily become more melancholy, he ſuſpected ſomething of the true cauſe of his ſadneſs, and drawing me apart he prayed me to tell him, if Aronces was not amorous of Clelia, ſo that not judging that it was diſadvantageous to my friend to confeſs the truth to Amilcar; I told him that I believed he was not deceived, and that I extreamly feared that his grief for her abſence would bring him to the margin of his grave. As Amilcar dearly loved Aronces, he did all that which he could to divertiſe him, he which is the moſt divertiſing of all men, by his grief was too ſtrong to be over power'd: and I can aſſure you that ſince he knew the departure of Clelia, there paſt not a minute but his grief augmented: that which rendred it more powerful was, that he knew that reaſon would have him oppoſe his paſſion, and remain with the Carthaginian Prince, where he found all that he could wiſh for in his preſent eſtate of fortune, for as this Prince very much eſteemed him, he might hope a conſiderable eſtabliſhment with him; Amilcar dearly loved him, this Court was moſt ſplendent and delectable, and conſidering the ſtate of things, the Prince of Carthage would ſoon ſet on foot a great deſign, the happy ſucceſs whereof would put him in a capacity to accumulate honour and riches on all thoſe which ſhould be followers of his fortune, as Aronces one day told me (aggravating his misfortune) that he was the moſt unfortunate of all men, for in fine my dear Celeres, ſaid he to me, after he had confeſſed to me, he was reſolved to leave Africa, and to go to find Clelia. I I do not believe there is a more miſerable man than I, and whoſoever conſiders the deplorable condition in which I now am, ſhall without doubt find that ſince Love makes men unhappy, there never hath been no Lover which had ſo little reaſon to hope to be beloved or to continue to love. Firſt Clelia, purſued he, knows not that I love her, and I ought not to make it known to her, whilſt I know not who I am.

Moreover, Clelius ſeeming to be reſolved not to give his daughter but to a Roman, 'tis aſſured that I ought never to pretend thereto, ſince according to all appearances I am not a Roman born, if it ſhould be ſo, it ſhould be then of ſome unhappy Roman, without virtue or quality, for if there had been any man of quality exiled which had been ſhipwrack'd, and who had loſt a Son in the Sea, Horatius would have told it Clelius, having told him all the ſad accidents which hapned at Rome ſince his departure, be it thoſe which he hath ſeen with his own eyes, or that which he heard from others; but though I know not whence I am, yet it ſeems I certainly conjecture that I am not a Roman, and that conſequently I can never pretend to Clelia, you are ſo ingenious to perſecute your ſelf, I told him that if you would as much ſeek to aſſwage the evil which torments you, you would quickly come to the end of it. Ah Celeres, cryed he, if you knew the nature of the evil of which I ſpeak, you would ſoon ſee it is immedicable, for if I remain here I ſhall dye the moſt deſpairing of all men, and if I go to find Clelia, as I will infallibly, I ſhall without doubt act the moſt irrationalſt thing that can be, ſince I ought not to tell her I love her: If I would not reward Clelius with Ingratitude to whom I owe all things, and ſo I ſhall leave a great hope of fortune to undertake a voyage to go ſee a perſon whom I adore, with intention never to tell it her, and with a ſtrange deſire to tell it her a thouſand times a day if I could; Judge then Celeres if I am in a happy condition: Nevertheleſs I muſt and will part, for my Love perſwades there is no miſery which equals abſence, when abſence is not ſtrong enough to deſtroy Love. I therefore find my ſelf ſo perplexed, when I think Clelius will demand of me that which ſo ſoon obliges me to return to him, for ſhall I tell him a lye if I tell him that I am exiled? and that I am unworthy the care he hath taken of me? and likewiſe if I ſhould tell him that my friendſhip towards him could not permit me to ſtay longer, and ought I not to fear, that when he demands the cauſe of my return that he would hate me, and that he will force me to depart for ever from the perſon whom I love? But after all, let happen what pleaſes the Gods, for I declare to you I cannot do otherwiſe. In Effect, Madam, Aronces relying on Amilcar's friendſhip, told him all that which I could not deny him, and cauſed ſo great compaſſion in him, that he commanded him in the name of the Prince of Carthage to go to Clelius; but for to diſſemble his return, Amilcar obliged the Prince to charge Aronces to negotiate ſomething at Syracuſa, for to endeavour to diſunite Sicyly from the intereſt of Carthage, and Amilcar to finiſh his generoſity, made him ſuch Magnificent preſents, that he put him in a conditlon not to want the aſſiſtance of Clelius when he ſhould return to him. So Madam there being a ſhip of War prepared for us, we parted from Utica, and took the way of Syracuſa, with intention if we did not find Clelius there, to land nigh the mouth of the River Vulturnus, to go by land to Capua, which is but twelve miles from the ſea. I ſhall not tell you Madam, what was Aronces affliction when he went to take his leave of the Prince of Carthage, and ſeparated himſelf from Amilcar, for I cannot expreſs unto you, all that the tenderneſs of friendſhip and the violence of Love made him feel in this encounter, but 'tis true that when he was ready to depart, he began to fear he ſhould be more unhappy, when he ſhould be with Clelia, than when he was from her: but he changed his thoughts when we were embarqued, for as the wind was favourable he had a joy that I cannot expreſs in the thought, that every moment he approached nigh Clelia: 'Tis true that this favourable wind laſted not long, for the next evening we ſaw a far off a light cloud riſe out of the ſea, which without terrifying us we fixt our eyes on it, but we were ſuddenly aſtoniſhed when we ſaw the Pilot who guided us, affrighted at it, and begun to give orders to all the Mariners of our Veſſel to the end they ſhould prepare themſelves for a great tempeſt, at firſt we believed he abuſed us, and we could not comprehend that a thing which had nothing terrible to look upon, ſhould be the forerunner of a dreadful tempeſt, but hardly had we the leiſure to think the Pilots ſuppoſition was but ill grounded, when we ſaw inſenſibly the ſea cover'd with great billows of foam which did the ſame effect over this immenſe ſea, as flocks diſperſt over great vaſt plains, a little after we heard a roaring which was ſomething terrible, though it ſeemed to come afar off, and a little after we heard a clash of Thunder on our left hand, which by a ſudden flaſh of Lightning, gave us a happy preſage, for you know Madam, the Etrurians which are the moſt skilfulleſt people in the world in matter of Divinations, have learnt us, that when the Thunder goes from the left to the right 'tis a happy preſage, but when it goes from the right to the left 'tis an in-auſpicious Omen. Nevertheleſs though Aronces and I knew this ſign was not unhappy, we ſaw a little appearance of good luck, for it ſeemed this

Clap

Clap of Thunder had been a ſignal to unchain the winds, and the ſea roared horribly, and all the waves claſht ſo rudely againſt each other, that they utterly deſtroyed our hopes, and truly Madam, I cannot tell you in what extreams we then were, when the night ſtealing on us on a ſudden, expoſed us to the fury of the waves and winds as long as it laſted, ſometimes our ſhip climb'd the Clouds, and in a moment ſeem'd to deſcend into a profound Abyſs, and the tempeſt turned it in deſpight of the Pilots art, and put us every moment in eſtate of ſhipwrack, likewiſe all the Mariners left their Offices, and the Pilot ſupplicated himſelf on his helm, and invoked Neptune with a high voice, expecting ſuccour but from him alone, for Aronces I confeſs his conſtancy gave me it, for after he had remitted himſelf to the conduct of the Gods, he had as much tranquillity in his ſoul, as if he had not been in danger, and for to give you a ſenſible mark of his conſtancy, I ſhall tell you that in the middle of this terrible tempeſt, he ſpake to me of Clelia, and told me that if he dyed, as there was great appearance, he ſhould dye with grief not to have made known to that fair perſon the love he had for her. But in fine Madam, as the tempeſt began at the ſetting of the Sun, it diminiſht at break of day, and that glorious celeſtial Luminary bringing back the calm with the Light, we ſaw a little after the waves by little and little to abate, but we perceived at the ſame time, that we were ſo nigh a great veſſel, that we might diſcern it was a veſſel of War, our Pilot who ſeemed not to be deſtin'd this voyage, but to anounce us evil news, told us that the tempeſt was paſt, but that we were no leſs in danger, becauſe the Ship we ſaw was a cruel Pyrates which did nothing elſe but interrupt the commerce of Sicily and Carthage by the continual prizes he took. At theſe words, Aronces taking the word to anſwer him, as 'twas your part to command during the tempeſt, ſaid he to him, it is for you to obey during a combat, therefore make us board this veſſel, for as it hath been beaten by the tempeſt as well as ours, we fight with equal advantages; and we ſhall fight it may be better than Pyrates, at firſt the Pilot made a difficulty to obey, and would at leaſt reaſon on the thing, but Aronces having abſolutely commanded him to follow his Orders, and to endeavour to gain the wind that we might be the aſſailants, he obeyed with fear and ſo well played his part, that we got the wind of the Pyrate: 'Tis true that as he was accuſtomed to vanquiſh, and that our veſſel was leſs than his, he perſiſted not in endeavouring to gain from us this advantage, and ſeeking to board us as we did him we joyned together, and we ſaw on an inſtant the enemies deck fill'd with armed Soldiers, which by their countenance only might intimidate thoſe which ſaw them, for as they were men which a long time had been continually inur'd to War and the Sea, they were more ſwarthy and blacker than Africans though they belonged to the Iſle of Cyrne, and they had ſuch a ſavage and fierce ferocity on their faces, that 'twas eaſie to judge they paſſed all their life in ſlaughter and blood, they had likewiſe the ruſticity of Seamen, the cruelty of Soldiers determin'd in their eyes, their hair long black hanging negligently, their habits were not uniform but different, becauſe they were ſuch as they had took from thoſe they vanquiſh'd, but for their arms they were magnificent, and it appeared ſo well by their countenance that they were accuſtomed to fight and overcome, that I believed we ſhould be vanquiſhed; for we had not ſo many men as we ſaw in their veſſel, and they were not without doubt ſo warlike.

Aronces thought to dye with honour, rather than to have the victory; when he ſaw that multitude of Enemies which ſo reſolutely expected him: The Captain of thoſe Pyrates put himſelf at the head of the others when our veſſel joyn'd, he was well advanced in age, he had many hurts on his face which disfigured him, but he was ſo magnificently armed, and he had ſo fierce a countenance, as disfigured as he was, he was eaſily known to be the Maſter of thoſe which inviron'd him. As we were in this poſture Madam, and ready to grapple, we heard that cruel Pyrate inſolently command ſome of his men, that they ſhould prepare chains ready to chain us, adding, that it would not be difficult for him to vanquiſh us; but as ſoon as he had pronounced theſe words, Aronces who felt himſelf outraged, caſt at him a Javelin he had in his hand, and leaping into the Enemies veſſel followed by me and ten or twelve others, we began the terribleſt fight which was ever ſeen, I ſhall not exactly particulariſe it, becauſe I have many other things to tell you, but you muſt know that Aronces gave ſuch teſtimonies of ſuch a prodigious valour, that I may ſay, he only merited all the glory of this great action: At firſt he aſſailed the Captain of the Pyrates, being cloſed together they were both ready to fall in the ſea, when they heard a great noiſe at the other end of the veſſel, which ſuſpending the fury of theſe two fierce Enemies, made them retain and leave one another, and they turn'd their heads towards the place where the noiſe was, but Aronces was aſtoniſhed when he ſaw Clelius and Horatius with ſome others loaded with chains, who did all they could to take Arms from the Soldiers which would reinchain them, this ſurpriſing object making Aronces believe that Clelia was this Pyrates captive, heightned his courage; but that which augmented it was that this fierce Pyrate againſt whom he fought, no ſooner ſaw ſome of his men endeavouring to re-inchain Horatius and Clelius, but he commanded them to kill them inſtead of troubling themſelves to remit them to their Irons, and in effect the cruel miniſters of ſuch a bloody man put themſelves in duty to obey him, and would effectually have done it, if Aronces after he had given him a reverſe blow on the head which ſtun'd him, had not gone directly to thoſe which would have killed Clelius and Horatius, if he had not relieved them at that inſtant; but as he at firſt killed the one and hurt two other, he had the advantage to render to Clelius that which he owed to him by ſaving his life, and he likewiſe ſaved his Rivals, thinking he had only ſaved it to his friend. Nevertheleſs, this cruel Pyrate being come from his ſtupification, came again to the charge, followed by his men; but as Clelius and Horatius had taken ſwords from thoſe Aronces had hurt, they ſeconded him, and I likewiſe whilſt the reſt of our men fought at the other end of the veſſel: The Pyrate then ſeeing that which he little expected, gave command to rally all his men; and to caſt all the priſoners and the captives into the ſea, to the end that thoſe which kept them might come to fight, ſo that Aronces hearing this terrible command, and Clelius crying to him, that it was not ſufficient to have ſaved his life, if he did not likewiſe ſave Sulpitias and Clelias. Aronces performed actions I cannot repreſent to you, for he kill'd or hurt all thoſe he met, and

and that which wound up his courage to such a prodigious height was, that he heard Clelia's voice which endeavoured by her complaints, to attenerate the hearts of those mercileſs Pyrates, which would have caſt her into the ſea, ſo that precipitating himſelf in the middle of thoſe which environ'd the Captain of thoſe Pyrates, he thruſt his ſword through his body, and after he had ſeen him fall down dead, he went to the place where he heard the voice of Clelia, and he arrived ſo happily that he hindred her from being caſt into the ſea, by killing him that would have committed that barbarous action. 'Tis true Horatius followed him very nigh, but 'twas Aronces that ſaved the life of that admirable Virgin and her vertuous Mother; but in exchange Horatius ſaved Aronces by killing a man which would have wounded him behind, and as the death of the Pyrates Captain had abated the hearts of the others, and that the moſt part of our men followed us and fought very valiantly, the Pyrates ſaw themſelves conſtrained to render their Arms, and to receive chains from them to whom they would have given them, ſo that by this means Aronces ſav'd Clelius his life, his wifes, and the admirable Clelias, Horatius and many others, and ſaw himſelf Maſter of the richeſt booty that was ever taken in one veſſel, without having received one hurt, though he had been in great danger, but that which was the ſweeteſt victory was, that he received a thouſand praiſes from Clelius, and as many thanks from Clelia, and after he had cauſed the dead to be thrown into the ſea, chain'd all the vanquiſh'd, and commanded to have a care of the wounded, and eſtabliſhed Orders in theſe two veſſels. Aronces made Clelius, Sulpitia, and his admirable Daughter come into ours, and left me with ſome ſoldiers in that we had taken, for my part I would have had Horatius have ſtaid there likewiſe, but he ſo reſiſted it, that he followed the object of his paſſion, we ſuſpecting nothing of his Love: But in fine, Madam, we knew afterwards that this cruel Pyrate that we had met, had taken the veſſel in which Clelius and his family were embarqu'd at Carthage, and that when we had found him, he had reſolv'd to take the way of Cumes, for to go to ſell Clelia to the Tyrant Alexideſme who now reigneth there, and whom you know Madam, to lead the moſt irregular life of any man in the World. We knew likewiſe, that this Pyrate after he had carried into his veſſel all that which was in that of Clelius, had treated with thoſe he had commerce for all the prizes that he had taken, and that which was admirable was, that he found there all that which belonged to Clelius, even to the Cradle in which Aronces was found on the Sea by that illuſtrious Roman.

In the mean time we conſulted on the way we ſhould take, and for to hold this council, our veſſels were joyn'd together.

I perſwaded this illuſtrious company to ſeek a Retreat at Capua, where I promiſed Clelius and the others to give them for their Friends all thoſe I had there, and to render them all the Services I might, nevertheleſs as Aronces told Clelius that his return was cauſed by ſome Orders that the Prince of Carthage had given him to go to negotiate ſomething for him at Syracuſa, he was reſolv'd that it ſhould be there that we ſhould go to land, and that we ſhould paſs afterwards from thence to a port nigh the place where the River Vulturnus caſts it ſelf into the Sea, for as you know Madam, Capua is but twelve miles diſtant from that place, and in effect the thing was ſo executed: we were ſome days at Syracuſa, from whence we ſent back the Veſſels the Prince of Carthage had lent us, Aronces feigning to tender him an account of his Negotiation though he writ to him but to thank him, as likewiſe to Amilcar, but that, Madam, which was moſt fair to Aronces, was, that he would not attribute to himſelf that rich booty he had taken, and that he would content himſelf with the benefits of the Carthaginian Prince. Clelius ſaid he had not any part therein, Horatius ſaid the ſame, and I maintain'd as the others that Aronces alone had right to diſpoſe of that prodigious riches, ſo that after a long conteſtation where we all declared it to him; Since tis ſo, ſaid he to us, I give all the right I have to——he would ſay Clelia, but fearing to diſcover his love, after he had a little recollected himſelf, inſtead of ſaying Clelia he ſaid Clelius, and in effect he would in deſpight of him that he ſhould diſpoſe of this precious Prize; tis true he diſpoſed of it in a manner worthy of his generoſity, for he gave a great part of it to Horatius, to have means to ſubſiſt during his Exile; he conſtrained me likewiſe to accept of a great part of this Booty: He gave one part to the poor Romans exiled by Tarquin which were retired to Syracuſa, and made an offering of the reſt to that famous Temple builded on the top of the renowned Mountain Erice: but in fine, Madam, without ſtaying my ſelf to tell you a hundred unneceſſary things; I ſhall tell you in two words, that we paſſed from Sicily into Campania, and from thence to Capua where we had a favourable reception, for the chief Magiſtrate of the City that we call Mediadaſticks was my Uncle, ſo that by this means I was happy enough to find occaſion to render ſome ſervices to the perſons of the world I wiſhed moſt to ſerve, ſo that in a few days Clelius, Aronces and Horatius were not treated as ſtrangers in our City: Sulpicia and her admirable daughter likewiſe found amongſt our Ladies ſo much ſweetneſs and Civility that the firſt was conſtrained to remit ſomething of her Roman ſeverity, and to ſuffer Clelia to accommodate her ſelf to the cuſtom of the place where ſhe was and to the honeſt liberty of our manner of life, 'tis true, Madam, that twas not very difficult for her to do it for tis certain that tis not without reaſon that our City is called the delicious Capua, in effect one may ſay that as nature hath placed in our Country all that which might render a life delectable, it hath likewiſe inſpired into the Inhabitants Inclinations which carry them to pleaſure and joy to the end to make them enjoy all the benefits ſhe hath afforded them, for one may ſay there is nothing in this place but delight, and that the care which it had to entertain the publick tranquillity, hath no other motive than to hinder the diſturbance of the publick and particular pleaſures, ſo all the World thinking to divertiſe themſelves one may ſay all the World divertiſeth it ſelf, the Ladies are there fair gallant and magnificent, the men are ingenious for pleaſure, feſtival days and extremely liberal, and there is there led a life ſo ſweet, calm, and delectable, that there are no men ſuch enemies to ſociety which have no grief to depart from thence, and not any ſtrangers which may not facilly accuſtom themſelves thereto, but how agreeable ſoever our City was, and though this fair Troop received all manner of civility, there was none but Clelia there which found any ſweetneſs or delectation; for Clelius hearing that Tarquins authority was greater, greater, and that although he was generally hated by all, that did not hinder him from reigning peaceably, had a most sensible grief: Sulpitia who had the same zeal for her Country, had likewise the same affliction, and Horatius joyning the resentments of an exiled Roman, with those of a Lover who durst not say he loved, found himself very unhappy, but Aronces believed that he was much more, and knew not sometimes if he ought to esteem himself more miserable for not knowing his birth, or that Clelia was Ignorant of his passion, but he found some sweetness as well as Horatius, to think that Clelia was in a place where the violence of Maharbal need not be feared, and those two Rival friends left not to have some pleasing hours in the conversation of Clelia, they lived with more friendship at Capua than at Carthage, because Horatius owing his life to Aronces, and Aronces his to Horatius, the acknowledgment bound with a more stricter knot their affections, they told not one another of the passions they had in their souls, for as I already was the confident of Aronces, and that Horatius was not of the humour to have any, they discovered not to one another their Love, and they told it not even to her which caused it; so that though they had most agreeable hours with her, they had some also very troublesome, for Horatius thought not that an Exile could handsomly make a declaration of Love. Aronces could not imagine that one unknown might be favourably treated, for Clelia though by a natural and generous inclination she interest her self in her Country, nevertheless as she had never seen Rome, that she was fair and young, and that all pleasures courted her, she found her self sufficiently happy, but that which principally made her felicity was, that looking upon Aronces as her Brother, and believing that he had nothing but friendship for her, she accustomed her self to live with him, with a confidence infinitely sweet, and which left not to afflict Aronces as obliging as she was, because that the more he knew the sweetness of Clelia, the more he believed it was dangerous to tell her that he loved her; so that excepting me, he took an extreme care to conceal his passion: Nevertheless these two secret Lovers daily frequented Clelias company, to whose house all the virtuous men and fairest Ladies every day resorted, 'tis not but that the beauty of Clelia gave resentments of jealousie and emulation; but she was so a la mode and there was so many in Sulpitias house, that those which would see and be seen, could not otherwise satisfie their curiosity; for there were few persons in any other houses, or if there was any other company it was ordinarily neither great nor delectable: Aronces one day took pleasant notice of it, for knowing Madam, that being in a fancy to endeavour to heal himself, we went many days from quarter to quarter, from street to street, from door to door, from visit to visit, to the end to divert his spirit from the object which so entirely possessed it, but in what place soever we went we heard nothing spoken of but Clelia, for in one house we were demanded if we had been at her house, and in another if we were going thither, one of my kinsfolks told us she came from it, and one of my friends told Aronces that he came from thence: In another place there was a man who said she should no more be called Clelia but the Fair Roman, and in the house of a Lady who was of a brown complection, there was one of her Gallants who highly praised the beauty of Clelia, though she was yellow haired, in another place we found a Lady which needs would find some fault, saying she was too fair, and I can assure you that for four or five days we went into no place where we heard not Clelia spoken of, and we went every where, where persons of quality might go, but at the last house where we went the last day that Aronces had destin'd to these visits, where we knew not what we sought, there was a Lady who finished to make known to that Lover, that it was in vain to seek any place where he should not hear Clelia spoken of, for he heard her more spoken of in this place than in any other: But Madam, before I recount to you this conversation, you must know to understand it with pleasure, who this person is which we meet with, and I believe you will not be angry if I describe her to you, since 'tis certain that she whereof I speak who is called Aricidia is an in-imitable person. In effect, all that which is particular to her, cannot be seen in any other: For in fine: I must tell you for her honour, that without being of illustrious extraction, without having any beauty, and without youth she is considerable above all those which are great in Capua, and that she is at all Feasts publick and private, but that which is most strange is, that she is continually in conversation with all the young persons of quality, and with all the fairest Ladies: In effect. Those men which make such a tumultuous garboyl, when they find that a fair woman hath her Nose a little too big, too little Eyes, the Chin too short, or Lips too pale, and can hardly suffer those which have passed four Lustres, have not their eyes troubled to see always Aricidia, though she never had any beauty, and though she hath fifteen Lustres to count as the Romans, or that she can recount near twenty Olympiads according to the calculation of the Greeks, you will demand of me Madam, without doubt by what charms a person to whom Nature hath refused all the Graces ordinary to her sex, whom time hath deprived of youth and whom fortune hath not endowed with great favours; for to render her so considerable and so much desired, and I shall answer you 'tis by a great goodness, and by a natural grandeur of Spirit which being joyned to a long experience of the world, and to an agreeable humour that without taking care of her self, she divertiseth all those which frequent her, for as she is without ambition, as she hath a great and noble heart, that she knows not how to flatter, that she is not interested in any manner, that she clearly sees things, that she recounts them pleasantly, and that she knows all that which passes in Capua, there is no person which doth nor desire her, and when there happens any remarkable occurrence, there is no body which wishes not to see her, to know that which she thinks, says, or knows of it; so that if she could be in twenty places at one time, she might be there, she goes likewise every where without being troublesome, because she is never in any place but where she is desired.

Moreover, though she hath something in particular in her Physiognomy, and very pleasant in her manner of speaking, she hath not any pleasantness of profession: In fine, she hath a certain jovial sincerity, which makes her say things which surprise and which please, and the truth is that she hath a solid vertue, though it is not savage. In effect, she says things that she thinks not of. she sees the weakness of others without contributing thereto, and without being ever the confident of any Love, she knows all the Loves of the City, ſhe blameth the tatling Goſſips, ſhe flatters not the Gallants, ſhe gives pleaſantly her opinion of thoſe that pretend to be fair when they are not, ſhe endeavoureth to reconcile the differences of families, ſhe is in friendſhip with all the husbands and wives, and without doing that but which ſhe thinks ſhe ought to do, ſhe pleaſeth men which are oppoſite in all things, ſhe is a good friend and is both officious and free, all the greatneſs of the earth cannot make her change her opinion, when ſhe thinks ſhe hath reaſon; and to define her in few words, I may ſay Aricidia is a living mortality, but a Moraliſt without ſadneſs: and who believes that the pleaſantneſs of innocent Raillery is not uſeleſs to virtue; but the moſt incredible thing is, that though ſhe knows all the maliciouſneſs the world is capable of, ſhe is nevertheleſs incapable of it, and though ſhe hath an infinite ſpirit, ſhe cannot find any invention to prejudice any, though ſhe finds a thouſand when ſhe would ſerve her friends. In fine, Aricidia hath found the art to pleaſe and give divertiſements to all the youths without incurring any blame, for though ſhe is not young ſhe is ſometimes at Balls, ſhe ſees all the great feaſts, ſhe is in the moſt gallant walks and the merrieſt company, and Aricidia is compoſed of ſo much delight, that I may boldly ſay ſhe cannot be parallel'd, and I even maintain that it would not be advantageous for her to be fair, for if ſhe were ſhe goes to an hundred places where ſhe would not go, ſhe ſays things that ſhe would not ſay, and her phyſiognomy which retains more the audacity of my ſex than the timidity of hers, addeth a far more force to her words, and gives a liking to her diſcourſes, as I have ſaid already ſhe is ſo deſired in all places, that the days ſhould be longer for her than others, if ſhe would content all thoſe that deſire her: Aricidia being then ſuch as I have repreſented to you, came into a houſe where Aronces and I entred juſt as ſhe ſpoke of Clelia to five or ſix perſons which were there, and that ſhe ſpoke of her with earneſtneſs, ſo that when we entred ſhe changed not her diſcourſe; on the contrary ſhe no ſooner ſaw us, but knowing we were Clelia's friends, ſhe addreſt her ſelf to us with that familiarity which is natural to her.

You come very fitly, ſaid ſhe to us, to maintain my argument againſt a man you ſee with me, who ſays that Clelia would be fairer than ſhe is, if ſhe was a little more coy: Ah Aricidia cryed that man, which is named Gennius, tell at leaſt to Aronces and Celeres, that which I at firſt ſaid of the great beauty of Clelia, before you tell them what I have wiſhed thereto: I ſhall tell it replied ſhe, after I have delivered my advice thereupon, for I find it ſo unreaſonable that I cannot endure it: The beauty of Clelia is ſo reſplendent and perfect, replyed Aronces, that I cannot well comprehend of what addition it is capable, I think, added I, that without ſeeking to deny it, you had beſt demand it of Aricidia: I voluntarily conſent to it, replyed Gennius, ſo that ſhe will not conceal the praiſes I have given Clelia: For to content you, replyed ſhe, I ſhall then ſay, that you are of my opinion: that all the lineaments of Clelia's face are admirable; that ſhe is of a moſt rare complection, hairs very fair, of a courteous behaviour, and that ſhe is in fine one of the greateſt beauties in the world, but after that purſued ſhe, raiſing her voice, I ſhall ſay I do not believe ſhe can ever cauſe any love in you, becauſe ſhe doth not imitate all faſhions, or to ſay better all the ill favoured countenances of theſe which think themſelves fair, and which do not one action where there is not an affectation which ſtrangely diſpleaſeth, but to the end you may excuſe him, added ſhe, turning her ſelf towards Aronces and me; I muſt tell you that I have ſeen him heretofore amorous of one of thoſe Ladies who frame all their looks, who place their hands with art, who turn negligently their heads, who have an artificial languor or a borrowed joy, who fit their lips to the mirrors when they dreſs themſelves, and which laugh in ſuch a manner, that they ſhew all their teeth when they be white. Ah Aricidia, cryed Gennius, you treat me cruelly, I treat you yet too well anſwered ſhe, ſince there are ſuch men as you are, which detract from thoſe which are fair; for if all theſe forgereſſes of affected ſimperings ſhould not be praiſed by their Gallants, they would ſoon leave them, ſince it is certain they make none, but to attract Lovers, and we ſhould ſee no more that which is ſo unpleaſing to the ſight; in effect I ſee nothing which ſo much undervalueth beauty, as affectation and the ſo great care in deſiring to appear fair; for in the end added ſhe, there is nothing more baſe, than to ſee a woman which hath naturally great eyes and open, which always cloſes them half to have them more tempting, and there is nothing more inſupportable than to ſee the care that certain women have continually to make their lips of a roſeate colour, and to ſee the fantaſtical and extravagant remedy that they uſe thereto, is there any thing more inſupportable, than to ſee women who riſe twenty times out of their places, without having any thing elſe to do but to conſult their glaſſes, if they have forgot nothing of their tricks they have accuſtomed to do, and which have ſuch a fancy to look on themſelves, that they not only look on themſelves with earneſtneſs in all the glaſſes they find, but in the Rivers and Fountains, and even in the eyes of thoſe which ſpeak to them, but that which is yet true is, that when they cannot ſee themſelves, they ſeek an hundred affected inventions, to make themſelves to be ſaid ſuch as they believe themſelves, and that which oftentimes they are not, for ſometimes they ſay they have not ſlept, to the end it ſhould be maintained that it appears not in them, another time that they have an ill countenance, to the end it ſhould be ſaid they have a fair teint in another occaſion, that they are ill favouredly dreſt, to the end it ſhould be ſaid well, and they bear an affectation even to the ſmalleſt things. In fine, thoſe perſons which make ſo many fooleries, and ſo many faſhions, are ordinarily of thoſe that haſten to take the new modes, and which take them with exceſs, for if there be two or three Ribands worn, they take an hundred, and if the dreſſing is a little long, they wear their hair down to their girdle, if a little ſhort they ſhew their ears, and they perform in fine, ſo many diſagreeable things, to thoſe which have not a depraved taſt that they cannot be endur'd, and that which is moſt rare is, that thoſe women which ſpend their days, to compoſe all their actions to pleaſe, horribly diſpleaſe all honeſt men except certain perſons which have particular fancies, as Gennius, yet I know not added ſhe ſmiling, if he is of the ſame humour he ſays, and if he will not find as I, that Clelia is admirable, principally becauſe ſhe hath no affectation.

It is certain, added the Lady in whoſe houſe we were, that though Clelia doth not any action but what what pleaſeth, 'tis clearly ſeen that ſhe doth not think upon any thing ſhe doth, and that ſhe hath formed her ſelf ſo great an habitude to have a good preſence, that it is not poſſible for her to have an ill one. That which ſeemeth to me worthy to be noted in Clelia, ſaid Aronces, is, that though ſhe hath no affectation, ſhe does nothing of all that which other women do; who make profeſſion to be fair. She hath I know not what noble audacity which ſets off her beauty, which hindreth not any one from doubting but that ſhe knows what is hers; but ſhe hath it in ſuch a manner, that 'tis apparent ſhe believeth to have ſomething more conſiderable, and that it is not by that alone by which ſhe merits eſteem, ſo that I know not how Genutius can find that this admirable perſon is defective in any thing.

It is ſometimes pleaſant to diſpute with Aricidia, replyed he, that you ought not to think it ſtrange, if I have contradicted her in ſomething, 'tis not, added he, that I am conſtrained to confeſs that I am not altogether any enemy to certain little affectations which give a gallant air to ſome women, and I know ſome that if we ſhould take away thoſe particular additions they have to heighten their beautie, and ſhould hinder them from doing all thoſe little things which I know not how to name (but which may admit the terms of mines and fooleries) we ſhould leave them nothing to entertain our ſight: And on the contrary, there are certain beauties ſo plain that they cannot pleaſe me: For to ſpeak ſincerely, I would have a woman conceit her ſelf fair before I tell her of it, becauſe I am perſwaded that ſhe will not believe me, if ſhe ſays not it her ſelf, and to ſay in a word what I think, a woman in my opinion is not perfectly lovely if ſhe loves not her ſelf, and if ſhe deſires not to be beloved.

In fine, ſaid Aricidia, half angry to ſpeak, truly you love wanton Goſſips more than others, becauſe it is more eaſie to be favoured by them, and that in the humour you are in, you are not fit to make difficult conqueſts. But to return to Clelia, I maintain that ſhe is more amiable than fair, though ſhe is the faireſt maid I ever ſaw.

As long as Aricidia ſpoke, Aronces ſet his eyes as fixtly on her, as if ſhe had all the youth and beauty of Clelia, for he took ſo much pleaſure in hearing what he loved, commended; that even his very eyes participated with the joy of his ſpirit. There were nevertheleſs ſome moments in which he had ſome ſecret ſpight, in that he could not find any ſubject whereby he might withdraw part of his heart from that beautiful perſon, for in the deſign which he had to draw it wholly if he could from her; there were alſo ſome moments in which the praiſes were given to Clelia, offended him: But theſe inſtances were not of long durance, and in deſpight of himſelf he was glad to hear her commended, and he praiſed her himſelf more than he intended to do.

In the mean while, having endeavoured five or ſix days to go into ſome place where he ſhould not hear Clelia ſpoken of, which he could not find; Aronces propounded to me at our going out of the Ladies houſe where we had ſeen Aricidia, to go and take a walk in a place which was very pleaſant; for Madam, you muſt know that there is near Capua a great Meadow which is one of the delightfulleſt walks in the world: That which principally beautifies it is, that there are many ſmall Rivulets which water it, and that it is bordered on both ſides, with four rows of Trees, which compoſe the pleaſanteſt Umbrage that I ever ſaw, and this place not being far from Capua, we might with convenience after our viſit go thither, and in effect we went thither, with an intention to hear no more ſpeech of Clelia. But Madam, admire the chances of Fortune in certain occaſions, and to be ſurpriſed by that which ſurpriſed Aronces and I, ſuffer me to tell you that as ſoon as we were come near this Medow, Aronces rebeginning this diſcourſe fetching a deep ſigh turned himſelf towards me, and looking ſtedfaſtly on me; in fine he told me, I am now in a place where I ſhall not have Clelias name mentioned, except it be by you or I. You ſpeak of that, I told him, as if you were diſpleaſed to hear that incomparable Maid named, or to have any remembrance of her. Nevertheleſs I know it is not ſo. Alas ſaid he, would you not have me forget Clelia, ſince I am bound to baniſh her from my heart? But in fine Celeres, ſaid he to me again, let us ſpeak no more of it, and contribute what you can to my recovery, and to unſlave my Spirit from ſo lovely an object, ſpeak to me of quite contrary things, and let us entertain each other as if we were ſtrangers. Since you will have it ſo, ſaid I, I muſt entertain you with the pleaſantneſs of this meadow, which is altogether fit for penſive thoughts. It is very true, replied he, that there was never a more pleaſant nor convenient place to entertain ones ſelf, but becauſe I will not think of Clelia, I muſt not be my own company keeper, for all my cogitations would be but of her.

After that Madam, Aronces held his peace, and I did ſo likewiſe, ſo as it were forgetting that we were together, we fell both into a profound penſiveneſs, we even ſeparated our ſelves by ſome ſteps, and if I durſt ſpeak of a love which I had in my ſoul, in diſcourſing to you of that of Aronces, I muſt confeſs that that which agitated his thoughts did alſo mine, and as he had his Spirit poſſeſt but by Clelia only, mine was alſo, but by the beautifulleſt perſon of Capua, which is called Fenice.

But after we had gone two or three hundred paces without looking or ſpeaking to each other, we heard at our right hand ſome body ſinging near the Ruines of a Caſtle, which are a little beyond the meadow, where there is an admirable Echo, inſomuch that we coming again together, we reſolved to go ſee who were at the Echo.

In the mean while, after he who ſung had made an end he held his peace, that thereby he might be anſwered by the Echo: After which we heard divers voices of men and women which were ſpeaking, and becauſe we were far from them, we heard but a confuſed noiſe, which would not permit us to diſcern, neither what was ſung, nor conſequently what was anſwered: But Madam, that which was rare, was, that as ſoon as we were within a diſtance that we might diſtinctly hear, we underſtood that it was Horatius which ſung, and that having made there ſome verſes in commendation of Clelia, which was amongſt thoſe Ladies which hearkned the laſt when we would underſtand him, inſomuch that Aronces and I heard diſtinctly theſe ſix verſes which I ſhall now rehearſe unto you, which extolled Clelia above all the faireſt of Capua, in ſetting forth her praiſes by the faireſt of all, and which was leſs accuſtomed to praiſe the beauty of others. They were theſe.

The Carthaginian Beauties led the way,
And ours like they, to her do homage pay
Toth' Splendor of her eyes all beauties rear, Which makes her raign securely every where;
Yea even Fenice publickly doth say,
That nothing is so fair as Clelia.

So that Aronces who withdrew himself from Capua, not to hear the fair Clelia named, was strangely surprised, for after Horatius had said,

Yea even Fenice publickly doth say,
That nothing is so fair as Clelia.

The Eccho repeated the name of this fair Virgin six times, so that looking upon me in a manner where there was some astonishment and grief mixt together: For any thing I see, said he to me, I must depart the world if I will no more hear Clelia named, for seeing the Ecchoes speak to the trees and fields of her; I believe I shall find no place which speaks not to me of her. Since 'tis so, said I smiling to him, I think you may better speak to her your self, than only to hear her spoken of by others; as I had said these words, we were so nigh that fair Troop, that Aronces had no time to deliberate with himself whether he should go to them or no, for the amiable Clelia, having turned her head on one side knew us and called us, 'tis true, I am perswaded that Aronces who saw that Clelia was in this Troop, would nevertheless have approach'd her, though she should not have called him, though he intended to estrange himself from her, so that advancing towards this gallant troop; the first thing that Aronces did after he had saluted her; was to praise him which had praised Clelia, for my self, I confess I avoided with address to praise those verses though I knew the ingenious malice of it, as much as any person in the company, for Madam, though by these six verses Horatius intimated that Fenice was the fairest person in Capua, and that it was advantageous for her, 'tis nevertheless true that there was malice in this praise, and that he reproached the defect, she hath not to find any thing fair, and 'twas easie to judge that he preferred the beauty of Clelia before Fenices, so that I being amorous of her, shunned as I have told you, to praise those verses of Horatius, and I spoke of the Eccho to a man in the company, for fear some one should tell Fenice that I had praised a man which had praised one other more than her, and which blamed her in such an ingenious manner, but my foresight was unprofitable: as I shall soon tell you, for this adventure made a quarrel between Fenice and me, but to return to Aronces, he not only praised Horatius, in a manner whereof he praised Clelia, but he even praised her in so gallant a manner, that his prose was far better than his Rivals verse, and this same man which some days before had resolved to do all things possible not to love, changed his opinion on a sudden, and resolved in an instant with himself always to love her, and no more to oppose his passion, and to forget nothing that might make him love her, so that being delivered from the care of striving against himself, he had his spirit more free, his humour more joyful, and he was so pleasant that night, that he infinitely pleased all the company, which insensibly engaged themselves to examine the reason, wherefore the most part of fair women are covetous of praise and often very unjust, for said Aronces after many other things, they think some women are deform'd when they are beautiful.

For my part, said Clelia, my curiosity should be to know if effectually those which have the humour as you say are truly prepossessed, or if they say things otherwise than they think them. There are divers sorts of them, replied Horatius, for I am perswaded that there are Ladies which know others to be fair though by an emulative resentment they say they are not, but I am likewise of opinion that there are some which so love themselves that they hate all others, and in whom effectually they find nothing that is fair.

For my particular, said a Lady in the company, who hath much spirit but is not fair, I think it not strange if envy make them speak which pretend to be fair against those which are, but I cannot wonder enough to see them which have no interest in beauty, which because they are not fair, would not have others so, and which are likewise as difficult to please as if they had the fairest attractions in the world, the fairest complections, and all the charms which may be desired in an amiable person. As this Lady had thus spoken, Aricidia whom we had seen that day, came where we were with three women of quality, and three men, so that as Aronces and I had sought this place for its solitariness, we had the pleasantest company I ever saw, for except Fenice the most amiable of our Ladies were there, but as the subject of our conversation was then very curious when these two companies joyned, this Lady who spoke last, said they should oblige Aricidia to give her advice upon the subject they had before spoken of, so that after we had learn'd her what it was, she began to blame the fair ones which would only arrogate to themselves that title, but she blam'd them in a very pleasant manner, for it wanted but little that she related not all the histories of the City to those which have already some knowledge of them.

For my part, said she, I have been heretofore astonish'd to see a fair woman and of as much spirit, which for to dispraise another said the most ridiculous things that may be, for she found her too white and too brown: She likewise said she had eyes too sweet, mouth too little, and if my memory deceive me not, I think I heard her one day say she had lips too incarnate; what is this? thought I when I heard her speak so, am I a fool or wise, have I good eyes or hath she bad who speaks thus? but after a little consideration I found the cause of her injustice, for I knew there was a Lady which was fair flaxen-hair'd, who had eyes sweet, mouth little, and lips of a blushing red, who had taken a Lover from her, so that after that I sought no more the cause of her prejudicate opinion, likewise when I find some of those scrupulous beauties who think none fair but themselves, I examin'd what interests they may have to the fair and brown in general, I and what they might have in particular of those of which they spoke, and after that I did not want much to find the reason which made them unjust. In effect, I lastly saw one who because she had great eyes, maintained that little eyes could not be agreeable, and I saw another which on the contrary, said that it appertained only to little eyes to make great conquests, and they only had I know not what of gallant and agreeable, which was fit to wound hearts, and that ordinarily great eyes open, were stupid and without agreement.

In

In another occasion, pursued Aricidia, I found a woman which contrary to them I have told you of, blamed in others that which she had, and praised that she had not, but she so faintly praised and blamed it, that after I had well examin'd her, I found that she blamed and did not praise it, but to the end to be contradicted, and that they might praise that she had, and blame that she had not: but usually I have already said we must know all the life of a fair woman, for to have power to divine what sort of beauty she may praise, 'tis not but jealousie may hinder her from finding any thing fair; but it more often happens, that there are more remote causes which procure this injustice: For in fine, all the company know a woman which would be very fair if she was fat, to whom I have heard say that a Rival she hath would be fairer than she is now, if she had ten or twelve fits of a Fever which might penance her body, and I know likewise one which because that a Lady is anothers Confident, whom she believes to have a design on the heart of a man, that she would have for her gallant found strange defects in her, though she had not any, so that when I met with these critical choosers of beauty, I enquired who loved such an one? whether her Husband or her Lover betray her not, whether she is jealous, whether she is envious, whether she is wicked, whether she is frantick? I should never Madam, bring my discourse to a period if I should relate to you all those pleasing things Aricidia said on this subject, but not being to trespass upon your patience, I shall desist from mentioning them, but shall only tell you that night beginning to cloath the earth with her sable mantle, the company returned to Capua, and Aronces and I returned thither with Clelia and her company, but to tell you the truth, I was not a little surprised when that being returned to my Lodging, where I desired Aronces to lodge, I found that instead of not being willing to hear Clelia spoken of, he would not speak to me of any other thing.

In effect, if I thought to tell him four words on any other subject, he would not answer me but began to speak to me of Clelia: so that not being willing to contend with him; As far as I see, replied I smiling, you have changed your thoughts since our last Visit, for you desired to depart from the City not to hear Clelia spoken of, and you now speak nothing but of her. No, no, Celeres, said he to me, I have not changed my thoughts, but the truth on't is, I was not the same I thought my self to be, and that though I said I would not love Clelia, I was resolved always to love her, and to speak of her all my life: but if it is so, replied I more smiling, you must seek another Confident than me, and I likewise must seek another than you, for if you have resolved always to speak to me of Clelia; at what hours and time may I speak to you of Fenice? 'Tis true he that's one Lover is not fit to be anothers Confident; but cruel Friend, you are not amorous in such manner as I am, you love Fenice when you see her, pursued he, and you do no more love when you see her not, and your passion for her is rather a voluntary amazement than a true passion: 'tis therefore not very difficult for you not to speak so often of Fenice, and to let me speak of Clelia.

Have you then absolutely resolved, said I to him, not to think more of banishing her from your heart? On the contrary, I have taken a resolution, replyed he, to conquer hers if it be possible, and to acquaint her that she is the only Saint, at whose Shrine I offer up my Devotion. In high thoughts, Madam, was Aronces at this time, and Horatius as I have since known, seeing Clelia give a favourable censure of those Verses; the Maid on a sudden when she oblig'd him to sing to the Echo, where we found him resolved to discover his Love to Clelia on the first occasion which presented, and these two Corrivals though friends, not in the least imagining one anothers love, jump'd on one design when Clelia without thinking of it gave them the means to execute it: For know, Madam, she being desirous to have those Verses Horatius had made, and which she could not retain in her memory, Horatius having but twice sung them, demanded them of him the next day; but as he would make use of this occasion, instead of giving them to her at that time, he could tell her he would send them. On the other side you must know Madam, that as things change very much, by passing from one mouth to another, principally if it is to recount little news of Cabala, where one word alter'd changeth all: It hapned that Aricidia having told some company where she was, and that which passed at the Echo, those which heard it mis-related it to others, and those others worse to others, who told Fenice it was I which had made those Verses at the Echo, but instead of telling her this Song was for Clelia, they only told her 'twas against her; so that being much incensed against me, she complains of me with much inveterateness, in a place where Clelia arrived a little after she departed from it: So that Clelia who is wholly composed of goodness, was very sorry that the praises Horatius had attributed to her, had been the ocasion of a quarrel between me and so fair a person; therefore willing to acquaint me with the complaints of Fenice, that I might justifie my self, and foreseeing she should not see neither Aronces or I all that day, because she knew Sulpicia spent the remaining part of the afternoon in a place where we did not go. She wrote a Letter to Aronces to oblige him to advertise me of the anger of Fenice, for as she had been educated with him, and that Clelius would have her live with him with the same familiarity of a Sister, she made no difficulty to write to him, which she had done before in divers occasions, so that following those motions of goodness she had for me, she wrote a Letter to Aronces as I have already told you, which was somewhat nigh these terms.

Clelia to Aronces.

'AS I know you love Celeres as much as I esteem him, and that I dare not write to him, I believed I ought to acquaint you that Fenice accuses 'him wrongfully of an Injury he hath offered her in 'praising me, to the end he may appease that fair person to whom I willingly yield the Priority of Beauty; 'and I consent that Celeres should make some Verses, 'in which he should as much prefer Fenice before me, 'as Horatius by his Flatteries hath placed me above 'her, for I declare, it's not by the small beauty I have I 'would be esteemed, but there is something in my 'heart that merits praise more than my eyes, and in 'fine there remains no more but to call you my Bro-'ther, that delightful name my Father hath com-'manded me to give you, may hide those blushes 'which stain my Cheeks when I write unto you. A-'dieu, let not Celeres hate me for a quarrel I have in-'nocently

'nocently caused him and use all the power you have 'over him to hinder him from complaining of me.

See then Madam, the Scheme and nigh the words of Clelia's Letter that Aronces received as he was ready to depart, but as he received it in a time when his passion violently transported him, and in a time when he had resolved to discover it to her which caused it, he believed he ought not to let slip this occasion which presented it self, and that without staying to see Clelia, he ought in answering her to tell her clearly that he was amorous of her, and in effect without any hesitation, and without one raze in all his Letter he wrote with a strange precipitation, all the inspirations of his passion, for 'tis certain, this Letter was rather a production of his heart than spirit, but after he had wrote it, he gave it to a discreet and faithful Slave, with order to attend Clelia's return, and to give it her without Sulpicia's seeing it, so that this Slave being very exact, executed it without much difficulty, for those which were with Aronces were in Clelius his house, as if they depended on him; so that 'twas very easie for this Lovers Slave to perform the command of his Master, and Clelia believing he wrote to her to inform her of Celeres quarrel, took the Letter without difficulty, but as she thought 'twas a simple answer to hers, she read it not at that time, because she was called at that instant to go to her Father, and their conversation being somewhat long, she forgot Aronces his Letter in her pocket, and did not remember it until she was retired into her Chamber, and when one of her Maids had given her another which she said one of Horatius his Slaves had brought, so Clelia believing that he had sent her those Verses she demanded of him, and that Letter putting her in mind that she had one from Aronces which she had not read, she put her self in estate to read them both, but as she had without doubt much more inclination towards Aronces than Horatius, she opened his Letter first where she was astonished to find these words.

'YOu have given Celeres such singular demonstra-'tions of your Nobleness, that if I did not hope 'you had the same for me, I would not speak to you 'of him, and had rather give new matter to that high 'Vertue which gives so many Charms to your Beauty: 'but charming Clelia, as there cannot be testified more 'Nobleness than in pardoning a Crime in which ones 'self is solely interested: I must acquaint you that I 'have committed one which reflects on none but you, 'to the end that taking the generous resolution to 'pardon it, I may afterwards innocently commit it all 'my life. For not to draw a Vail over my thoughts, 'the Crime I have committed is, that I love you more 'than you would be beloved, and the glorious name 'of Brother you bestow on me, is so little agreeing 'with my thoughts, that I can no longer accept of it, 'permit me then to bear the title of your slave, if 'you will accumulate glory on me, but to the end my 'passion offend you not, know you have such an abso-'lute power over me, that I shall not desire any thing 'but what you will not refuse me: In fine I love you, 'but in so pure a manner, that if you could see my 'heart, you would never have the injustice to deface 'your Image from it; I know amiable Clelia that I am 'unfortunate, an unknown One, but if you knew my 'flame and the purity of my thoughts, you would 'not be offended to be beloved in the manner I love 'you; take then the pains to know them, and con-'demn me not without it I pray you. But to the end 'I may know if you consent to my demand, I de-'clare to you that if you answer me not, I shall believe 'that you favourably entertain my love, and that I 'shall have nothing but to render you thanks for it: 'but on the contrary if you take a resolution to treat 'me rigorously, I had rather receive a cruel Letter 'than receive none. I pray you make me not despair, 'for in the passion I have for you, I cannot lose hope 'without losing my life.

The reading of this Letter so much surprised Clelia, that she could not tell what she felt in reading it; for as she much esteemed Aronces, and had much inclination towards him, she could not entertain a disobliging anger against him: Nevertheless, her natural modesty checkt her to do it. 'Tis true, as she knew her Fathers thoughts it was followed with some momentary grief, to see it was not permitted her to give any reasonable hope to the person in the world she believed most worthy of her if she had known his birth, and if her Father had not had an intention never to marry her but to a Roman; so that this astonishment, anger, and grief so much possessed her Spirit, that she thought not to read Horatius his Letter, and if her distraction had not made her open it without thinking on it, she would have slept without seeing it, but having opened it without any design to do it; and seeing the Song she demanded if Horatius was not there, and that it was only a Letter, she read it, but not without less astonishment than she had done Aronces: For in fine Madam, I can shew you a Copy of it that I will read to you, seeing you will not be ignorant of any thing in which Aronces is interested.

Horatius to Clelia.

I Send you not those Verses you demanded of me, because having perused them I found they did not merit your sight, and (if I dare say so) they were even unworthy of me: but there is another reason which hinders me from obeying you; for in fine, amiable Clelia, I foresee I go to be so cruelly used by you, that you would not sing a Song which I made. 'Tis not but that I use all means possible not to be rigorously treated, but I sensibly feel that when I tell you now I love you, you will soon divine it, 'tis therefore I had rather declare it to you my self, to the end you may have some obligation to me to have concealed it so long from you: Know then, divine Clelia, that the first minute I saw you was the first of my passion, and that the last of my love will be the last of my life; I know I have not great quality enough to merit you, but I know I have divers things which may hinder me from being ill used: For in fine, I am a Roman, I am beloved by Clelius; my love and hate runs in the same current as his, I am an Exile as he is, I am unfortunate, and I love you more than can be imagined; dispose therefore absolutely of my destiny, but if it is possible banish me not from your heart as I am from Rome, if you will not be more unjust than the Tyrant which banish me thence, and render me infinitely more unhappy by this second and more rigorous Exile, than I am by the first.

Clelia having finished the reading of this Letter, was was much perplexed to resolve what she should do, for she found something so various in this mishap which had made her receive two declarations of love in one moment, that she knew not what to imagine of it. That which most troubled her was, that Aronces and Horatius were friends, and that they might both say they had obligations to her, so that having thought a little thereupon, it came into her mind that that which gave her so much inquietude was not it may be but a simple gallantry agreed on between them to perplex her, for in our Cabalia we make an hundred malicious intents one to another in divers occasions: Clelia therefore finding some sweetness in believing it, to draw her self from that perplexity where she was, made as if she really believed it, and hath since ingenuously confessed to me, that though the Letter of Aronces much vexed and afflicted her, yet she felt in her heart that she sustained it more agreeably than that of Horatius; but after she had confirmed her self in this belief more by her will than reason, she took a resolution to answer those two Letters as if she had certainly known that these two friends desired to deceive her; but as she was not assured of it, she determined to write to both of them obscurely, to the end not to breed any contention between them if her thoughts deceived her, and not to discover to them that they had both discovered their Loves to her, if it was true they loved her. For in fine, (said this admirable Maid to her self) if Aronces and Horatius have plotted this invention, they will understand what I shall tell them, and know that they have not deceived me, and if it is not a deceit, and that they have written to me without one anothers knowledge, I shall not embroyl them, and I shall not find my self in the necessity to answer seriously to two Letters, wherein I shall find my self perplexed to do it, for I should answer it may be too roughly to Horatius and too mildly to Aronces: After this Clelia taking a resolution to draw her self speedily from this perplexity, answered to those two Letters by two Notes that I shall tell you, for I think I never saw any of Clelia's writing that I have not retained, I so much esteem her: This Madam, was her answer to Aronces.

Clelia to Aronces.

YOur deceit hath not succeeded, and he with whom you have contrived it, shall have no more joy than you to believe it would deceive me, believe me Aronces it suffices not to have spirit to be a deceiver, but a certain maliciousness of which I believe you incapable, therefore enterprise no more to deceive me, and to prove that your design both effectually ill succeeded, I protest unto you, your Letter hath not angred me one moment, after this I think I need no more explicate to you my thoughts, and that you believe that I believe you are not amorous of me.

You see Madam, what was Clelia's Note to Aronces, and so what was that she wrote to his Rival.

Clelia to Horatius.

VVHen two have joyned to contrive a Cheat it is easier to be found out; pretend not then I conjure you, that yours hath happily succeeded, and to testifie unto you, that I believe not to be so well with you as you may be evil with me, I pray send me the Verses I have demanded of you, but I likewise pray you to be strongly perswaded that you can never enterprise any thing that less resembles truth than what you have undertook: for in fine, to speak sincerely I live after such a manner in the world, that one must have lost ones sense and reason, if he think to procure my friendship and not my hatred, by disclosing his affection to me in an amorous Letter.

I am assured Madam, you know that though these two Notes were written on one subject and by one person, and that this person had an equal design in writing them, that that which addressed to Horatius was clothed with more rigorous and severe language than the other, but I must tell you the effect they produced in the minds of those which received them the next day: imagine then Madam, that when Aronces received that which appertained to him, there was a strange emotion in his heart, for as he writ to Clelia that if she answered him not, he would believe she was favourable to him, he thought seeing she wrote to him, he was going to receive his arrest of death, and that which made him think so was, that Clelia's Slave by the orders of her Mistress, had given him this Note without staying for an answer, so that he opened it with an extreme Inquietude, but when he had read it his spirit was a little more setled, but he was much perplexed to divine what Clelia would say, when she told him that he had contriv'd with another this deceit: Nevertheless after he had well considered on it, he believed that Clelia had purposely premeditated it, not to be obliged to evil treat him, and that it was I that she made him seemingly think which had part in this pretended deceit of which she spoke in her Note; so that looking upon this Artifice of Clelia as an obliging procedure for him, he found himself more happy than he hoped. He likewise received me with much joy when I entred into his Chamber a quarter of an hour after he had received this Note, but as I was sufficiently troubled at the anger of Fenice, I hearkned not to him so attentively as he would have me, so that being angry at me; Ah cruel friend said he to me, you interest not your self in my fortune: You take so little part in mine, said I to him, that I have more cause to complain of you than you have of me, for after you have told me you are not so miserable as you thought your self, you demand not of me how I stand with Fenice, but for to make you see you are happier than I to read the Letter I leave you, that this fair person hath wrote on the adventure of the Echo, for I am pressed to go to a friend of hers to adventure to oblige her to justifie me to her. After I had left Fenice's Letter in his hands I left him, but departing from his Chamber, I met Horatius who entred there, and who appeared to have something in his spirit which made him melancholy, for he took no notice of me: In effect Madam, you must know that Clelia's answer had highly perplexed him, for he knew he had not mentioned his love to any one, nor the Letter he had wrote to her, so that he knew not what to think of that she wrote to him, seeing that on whatsoever side he looked on the thing, he found nothing of true semblance.

In the mean time, he felt I know not what in Clelias words, which made him believe that he had not any part in her heart, he was notwithstanding perswaded that he might have right to pretend thereto,

if it was not engaged; ſo that now thinking on what he never before thought of, he ſought to find, if it was poſſible, whether Clelia lov'd any one, but after he had examin'd it, he found that if this fair perſon had ſome particular affection in her heart, it muſt neceſſarily be for Aronces, and that it muſt conſequently follow Aronces lov'd her; for he ſuſpected her not to love without being belov'd. This thought was no ſooner formed in his imagination, but it excited in him a great diſturbance: In effect, as Horatius is generous, and that he had many Obligations to Aronces, he had a ſtrange agitation of heart, when he thought he might be his Rival, it likewiſe raiſed a War in his Spirit, and he effectualy took a reſolution to reſiſt his paſſion, if he learnt Aronces loved Clelia. So that endeavouring handſomly to clear himſelf, he went to Aronces his houſe, and he arrived there as I told you when I departed from thence, ſo that he had the Letter of Fenice in his hands I had given him and Clelias anſwer, but as ſoon as Aronces ſaw Horatius enter he concealed Clelias Letter, and ſtill kept Fenices in his hands, for in this inopinate occaſion he thought on nothing but his own intereſt and not mine. 'Tis true, that this Letter was writ in ſuch a manner, that the Author of it could not be known if one did not know the writing, neither for whom it was, it having no ſuperſcription, and the reproaches of Fenice were in ſuch a nature, that one would not divine the cauſe of them: Horatius then entred into Aronces his Chamber, with an intention to diſcover by a familiar diſcourſe if he loved Clelia, and endeavour to divert his love if it was ſo, he ſaw ſome emotion in his countenance, becauſe his mind was then diſquieted, and according to the nature of love which make Lovers fear the ſlighteſt things in certain occaſions, he feared that Horatius ſhould ſee Clelias Letter, and know it, ſo that this diſguiſed Lover ſeeing ſome agitation on Aronces face, and ſeeing a Letter in his hands which was written in Tablets, he held open without thinking on it, he ſo little dreamed of me, and ſeeing they were made in a manner as Ladyes ordinarily uſe to write to men, he demanded of him after ſome complements if thoſe Tablets came from Clelia, Horatius having not any other deſign than to ſpeak to him of that fair Maid on all ſorts of ſubjects, to note either by his actions or words, if there was any ſuſpicion that he was amorous of that fair perſon. But Horatius had hardly demanded this of Aronces, but this Lover which was unprepared was much ſurpriſed at it, becauſe it was true as you know that he had one of Clelias Letters about him, and would not hinder himſelf from telling him this Letter was not from her, ſo as Horatius noting it, and not doubting but thoſe Tablets were Clelia's, he ſpoke to Aronces beleeving it ſo; by your favour, ſaid he to him, do not conceal the truth from me, and tell me if the Letter you have in your hand is not from the admirable daughter of Sulpicia, as I do not doubt of it, ſhew it me I pray you, for as I am perſwaded ſhe writes as well as ſhe ſpeaks, I have a great deſire to ſee one of her Letters, at leaſt I very well know her Character is the faireſt in the world, for I have ſeen verſes of her writing: at firſt Aronces believed, that telling a ſecond time to Horatius that this Letter was not from Clelia, and telling it him very ſeriouſly he would believe it, and would preſs him no more to ſhew it him, but it hapned otherwiſe, for Horatius reiterating his intreaties with much earneſtneſs, perſwaded him he ſuſpected ſomething of his paſſion, ſo that fearing extreamly he ſhould know it, and for fear he ſhould acquaint Clelius with it, with whom he had a moſt inviolable amity, reſolved to ſhew him Fenice his Letter, to make him a falſe confidence by ſhewing it him, to the end to fruſtrate his conceived opinion that he was amorous of Clelia, if it was true he thought ſo that the better to conceal his paſſion. I know not Horatius, ſaid he to him, giving him the Tablets he held, from whence it comes you will not believe me, but to evidence to you, you have wronged me by ſuſpecting the verity of my words, ſee if this writing is Clelia's, but after you have ſeen this Letter do not ſpeak of it I pray you, though I am reſolved not to have any commerce with the perſon who writ it, therefore Horatius tell none, yet nevertheleſs I will not be indiſcreet without any exception, that you have ſeen a Letter of this nature in my hands. As you tell me not her name who wrote it (replyed Horatius, after he had read it) I can hardly be unfaithful to you if I would. For what can I ſay to thoſe to whom I would tell it, but that you have ſhewed me a Letter: Since I know nothing elſe but that it is from an incenſed Lady, who wrote to you with ſuch an high indignation, that I believe ſhe will eaſily be appealed when you will, and that ſhe hath more diſpoſition to love than hate you, whatſoever it be ſpeak not of it, I pray you, ſaid Aronces, for in the thoughts in which I now am, I am aſſured I ſhall never mention love to that perſon: Whilſt Aronces thus ſpoke, Horatius had an extream joy to believe that he was not an amorous of Clelia, for though his friend told him he would never have any commerce with the perſon, whoſe Letter he had ſeen, he harkned to that as the diſcourſe of an angred Lover, who believed ſometimes to hate when he loved moſt, he doubted not but Aronces had a great engagement to this Lady, whoſe Letter he had ſeen, ſo that believing he was not expoſed but to be a mans Rival to whom he owed his Life, and whom he very much loved, he expreſſed a great reſentment of joy by the only imagination of it, and leſt that miſhap he greatly feared might happen to him, he reſolved whilſt Aronces loved another to tell him that he had the ſame for Clelia, though he loved not to declare his ſecrets, for as he knew him to be very generous, he thought that after he had once made him his confident, he would not become his Rival, ſo that caſting an obliging look on Aronces, For to demonſtrate to you how dear your friendſhip is to me, ſaid he to him, I have almoſt ſtolen from you your ſecret, but I will voluntarily declare mine to you: know then, continued he, that time hath worn out many months ſince love ſeized my heart, and I every day feel my hatred againſt Tarquin increaſes, becauſe I look on him as the cruel cauſe of thoſe puniſhments which are prepared for me. Aronces hearing Horatius ſpeak in this manner, imagined he had ſome Amoretta's at Rome, and did not fully comprehend that he hated Tarquin more than ordinarily, becauſe it was his exile which had cauſed his paſſion for Clelia, ſo that willing to teſtifie to Horatius, that he would obligingly eſpouſe his Intereſts, he commiſerated his cruel paſſion, prying to tell him his adventure: Alas my dear friend, ſaid he to him, my adventure is declared in few words, for as ſoon I ſhall tell you that I love without being beloved, I ſhall tell you all which hath happened to me, ſince I was amorous. But hath not abſence, replyed Aronces, healed you of a love which hath been so ill rewarded: as he thus spoke, and that Horatius was about to tell him that he was not absent from the person whom he loved, and that he would have named Clelia to him; Clelius entred into Aronces his Chamber, and broke off the conversation of these two Rivals, which knew not themselves to be so, and they could not renew it this day nor a long time after, for as Aronces would not render secret for secret to Horatius, he rather avoided than sought him: Horatius on his side had his spirit so clouded with grief, that though he had a design to confide in Aronces, he could not do it, no occasion presenting it self. In the mean time, as he believed Aronces to be engaged in another love, he clearly submitted his heart to Clelia.

But to return to the two Letters these Rivals had writ her, and the answers she returned to them; you must know, that three days were fully completed before Aronces had the happiness to see Clelia, though he sought for her in the resolution he had taken not to oppose his love, and had resolved to tell her that that which he writ was positively true, for Horatius though he resolved to love Clelia, he feared to see her lest she should be displeased when he should tell her the contents of his Letter were true: but at last by a fortunate occasion these two Rivals met together after Dinner at Clelius his Gate with one design, to see Clelia; Horatius said nothing particularly to Aronces, because he had with him a friend which he had found at Capua called Stenius, whom he had brought to entertain Sulpitia, that he might discourse with her daughter, so that being entred without discovering their hearts to one another, they seemed as two men which had great friendship together, but they were very much troubled when they approached Clelia, and this fair person seeing them both at once, and seeing in their countenances an equal agitation, confirmed her self in her conceived opinion, that they both had contrived together those Letters they had writ to her, it happened that Horatius noting Aronces his change of Countenance looked on him, and Aronces doing the same thing looked on Horatius, so that Clelia believing they made some intelligent sign to deceive her, determin'd with her self to tell them they were not come to their end: and thus smiling said, you see well said she to them, in the manner with which I receive you both that you have not deceived me, and that your fallacy hath not succeeded: therefore do not enterprise it once more, if you will not have the shame to be discovered, for if you could not deceive when I did not distrust, judge then if you can do it now you have rendred your selves suspected.

Aronces and Horatius hearing Clelia speak in this manner were strangely surprised, for her words agreeing with her writing, they knew by this both had written, and that both their Themes were love, since she used the same terms to them both, and not having power to hinder their surprisals, and their astonishments, they changed colour, looked on one another, and afterwards looked on Clelia, as if they had desired to see her thoughts in her eyes, or what they should answer her: On the other side, Clelia seeing the agitation of their spirits, knew she was deceived, and blushed by a modest thought mingled with confusion; but she did not judge it fit to retract what she had said, and she continued to make war to them, as she had begun, for after Aronces was come from his astonishment; For my particular Madam said he to her, I protest unto you I had no desire to deceive you, and Horatius very well knows I never proposed any deceit to him. I confess what you say, replyed he, but confess likewise I never proposed to you in my life to deceive the fair Clelia, to the end that as I shall make yours, you may make my justification, the path which you tread to justifie your selves will render you more culpable than you imagine, replyed she, therefore if you will believe me, divide the controversie between you, concerning the crime I accuse you. At least amiable Clelia, replyed Aronces, with precipitation tell me, if Horatius his crime is in the nature of mine?

I pray you Madam, added Horatius, yield not to Aronces that he demands of you without doing the like to me, and without telling me if the fallacy of which you accuse him, is like that you accuse me of.

If I should consent to your demands, replyed Clelia prudently, I should give you honour to have deceived me, since I should take the pains to tell you a thing I suppose you know; but in fine, whether your terms be equal or no speak no more of it, for in the humour in which I am, I cannot tolerate such abuses; take then some care to make me forget those you have done me, and never propound it more to me, if you will not have me fear or flee you, as if I had contracted much hatred against you.

I know not, replyed Aronces, what Horatius hath done or said which hath angred you, but for my part Madam I protest unto you, that if I have incurred your displeasure, I am disposed to displease you all my life. Those which have begun a thing, added Horatius, do not so easily leave it off, therefore Madam, you ought not to think it strange if I make use of Aronces his expressions, and assure you if I am criminal I shall be so till death. I shall suffer the rest of the day, replied Clelia, seeming to believe that in effect you have deceived me, but I declare to you my patience extends no further, and that if to morrow you thus speak to me, I shall effectually act as if the deceit had succeeded.

As Clelia had finished these words, one of Horatius friends entred, and I entred a little after with Fenice, with whom I had made my peace since I left Aronces; 'tis true the better to confirm her I was not very sorry to accompany her to Clelias house, to the end she might hear from her mouth, that twas Horatius had made the Song which was the occasion of our quarrel, she accusing me to have done it, and I turned their discourse in such a manner, that I finished to Fenice my justification, but I was much surprised to see Aronces and Horatius both melancholy that they which used to be very civil, had some disposition to contradict one another: I assure you Madam, this I tell you surprises you, for after I had told you that Horatius had a design to discover if Aronces was his Rival, to the end to endeavour to vanquish his passion, I am assured I say Madam, that you are astonished to see this exasperation at first principally in Horatius his Spirit, but I may say he is not culpable, because it is so natural not to love a Rival, that what obligation soever he had to Aronces, he would not look upon him as his Rival, without feeling in his heart an extreme agitation. Aronces on his part, not doubting but that Horatius loved Clelia, had a most sensible grief, and as reasonable as he was, he would not hinder himself from telling me afterwards, that he was as much incenſed againſt Horatius, as if after he had made him the confident of his paſſion, he was become his Rival, he therefore endeavoured to overcome the tumultuous reſentments of his heart, and in effect thoſe two Rivals departed from Sulpitia's houſe, as if they had nothing in their ſouls, which had begun to change their thoughts; but the moſt remarkable thing in this adventure was, that Aronces and Horatius both took an equal deſign, for Horatius reſolved to acquaint Aronces with his affection, and Aronces to precede Horatius, reſolved to diſcover firſt his paſſion for Clelia to him, ſo that thoſe two Rivals inſtead of flying one another, departed together from Clelia's houſe as I have told you; and having propoſed to one another to walk, they went into a publick Garden where every one had the liberty to go, but they were no ſooner there but both being deſirous to uſe one anothers confidence, they hindred themſelves ſometimes by their own impatience, and as ſoon as they were in the Garden, Aronces thus ſaid to Horatius, As I infinitely eſteem you, I ſhall be very glad to acquaint you with the moſt important affairs which have hapned to me in the whole courſe of my life: I pray, ſaid Horatius, let me firſt finiſh my diſcourſe, for there is no reaſon you ſhould deprive me of that advantage ſince I firſt begun to unlock to you the greateſt ſecret in my heart. When I have told you I am amorous of Clelia, interrupted Aronces, then tell me what you pleaſe. Ah Aronces cryed Horatius, you have prevented me, and I have nothing now to tell you, but that I fear I ſhall be conſcious of ingratitude towards you, and ſhall not have enough power over my ſelf as not to be your Rival. What Horatius, ſaid Aronces, is it true that you love Clelia? Yes, ſaid he, I love her, and it was to endeavour to diſcover if you loved her, that I came to your houſe that day Clelius interrupted us, and when I entred into your Chamber, I had taken a reſolution if I could diſcover you to be my Rival, to vanquiſh my paſſion by all means I could poſſibly uſe; but truly I cannot tell whether my inclination induced me to do it, for ſince I have known you love Clelia, I have ſo terrible an agitation in my heart, that I do not know whether I ſhould love Clelia, hate you or hate my ſelf, neither would I infringe our friendſhip or deſert her: Ah Horatius cried Aronces, that which you would do is not poſſible; for if we both love Clelia, we muſt neceſſarily hate one another: I am ſo much obliged to you, replied Horatius, that I think not that the Love I have for her, and the friendſhip I have for you ſhould be incompatible: If that which you ſay is true, replied Aronces, it is for you to yield Clelia to me, for it muſt conſequently follow you love her leſs than I, ſince it is true that I believe it not poſſible to look upon you three days as my Rival without hating you. 'Tis not, ſaid he, that I am leſs generous than you. but 'tis aſſuredly that my love is powerful: Ah Aronces, replyed Horatius, I oppoſe my ſelf to that which you ſay, for you cannot have more Love than I, but it is that owing to me not ſo much as I owe to you, you are not ſo obliged to love me. No no, anſwered Aronces, it is not by that reaſon, for if I have defended your life you have likewiſe defended mine. I declare likewiſe to you that you owe no more to me than I to you, and if you renounce the pretenſions you have for Clelia, I would count it as a thing you are not obliged to do. Would to the Gods, replyed Horatius, I was in eſtate to do all which you ſay, for I ſhould do it by another motive, but it is impoſſible for me to change my affection, and permit you to love her. It is true I am no great obſtacle to you, ſeeing that if I am not deceived, I have not much room in Clelia's ſpirit: Ah Horatius cryed Aronces, you are not only the moſt accompliſhed man in the world, but you are a Roman, and I am an unhappy unknown which cannot hinder you. Notwithſtanding I hope, though I have no ſubject of hope, expect not likewiſe I can ever ſuffer you to love Clelia, though many reaſons oppoſe my Love. If you will (replied Horatius after a little conſideration) ſtrive to divert the current of your affection, I will do the ſame things. If I ſhould conſent to your demands, replied Aronces, we ſhould find our ſelves in ſome days in the ſame eſtate we are now, ſince I am aſſured that I cannot ceaſe to love Clelia, ſo that all I can do is to recal my generoſity to hinder me from hating you, or to hate you leſs than one ordinarily hates his Rival, for as I am ſincere my thoughts muſt fall in the compaſs of my words, let us then love Clelia, purſued he, ſince our deſtiny will have it ſo, and be perſwaded that there is nothing but my love to her can make me hate Horatius. I am of opinion, added this illuſtrious Lover, that if you be not more happy than I, I ſhall not hate you, and I am likewiſe perſwaded that if I am not more happy than you, you will not hate me, and I may likewiſe ſay that Clelia in diſpoſing her heart, ſhall put in yours and mine, either hatred or friendſhip according as we ſhall be either happy or unhappy, and we may draw from hence this advantage, that if Clelia loves you, her affection will conſolate you for my hatred, and if I am preferred before you, I ſhall likewiſe comfort my ſelf for yours. As theſe two Rivals were thus arguing, fortune conducted me where they were, and having noted ſome alteration in their countenances, I preſſed them ſo much to tell me what had diſtracted them, that I became the depoſitory of the promiſes they had made not to oppoſe one another with Clelia, by any other way than endeavouring to make themſelves beloved: they likewiſe promiſed one another not to diſcover it to Clelius, and to expect to heal themſelves when Clelia had choſen one of them, and in effect they lived a little while with the ſame civility as they had formerly done, but I am aſſured their thoughts differed in their hearts, and if their generoſity had not reſtrained them, they would have quarrelled more than once on very ſlight pretexts, they overſwayed their thoughts as I have told you, and lived ſo well together, that if Clelia had not already known their loves, it had been difficult for her to know they were Rivals, but they both took a different reſolution to act with Clelius; for after Horatius had diſcovered his love he continually preſſed her to be favourable to him: and Aronces on the contrary reſolved with himſelf to tell Clelia, that he would not deſire hope, nor demand any thing but the only favour to be believed her Lover; though he pretended not to be beloved, but to be put in the number of thoſe whom Clelia called her tender friends, to diſtinguiſh them from many others, which had not ſo advantageous a place in her heart; ſo that Clelia finding Aronces leſs importunate than Horatius, avoided him leſs than his Rival, but ſhe particularly forbad them both never to ſpeak of love to her, and though Aronces better obeyed her than Horatius, he more perſwaded her, and the importunity of the firſt did ſo evidence the discretion of the second, that he was less unhappy.

As things were in this estate, there arrived at Capua a Roman called Herminius, who merits much estimation, and is endowed with all those qualities which complete a perfect man; but Madam, as I have not the leisure to play the Painter in describing him to you, having many things to acquaint you with, by which you may draw his Character: it shall suffice to tell you that as he was a Roman, and exiled by Tarquin, and one of Horatius his acquaintance, Clelius no sooner knew that he was at Capua, but he presently offered him all that which depended on him, and prayed Aronces to contract a friendship with this illustrious Roman; he brought him likewise to Sulpicia and his daughter; which had no great difficulty to resolve with themselves to use him civilly: But Madam, you must know, that Herminius was so touched with Clelia's merit, that though his affection was confined in Rome, and that it was not ordinary for them which have a violent love, to have at the same time a violent friendship: 'tis true he had an earnest desire to acquire some place in the admirable Clelia's heart, and if Horatius had not told us he knew his adventures, and that he had performed heroick actions for his Mistress, we had nigh believed he was amorous of Clelia, for he praised her with a certain exaggeration which seemed to be peculiar to love, he sought her with an extreme care; he was ravished with joy when he was nigh her, and was much afflicted when he saw her not, and so ardently testified to desire her friendship that Aronces and Horatius did not more passionately desire her love.

In the mean time, though he endeavoured to divertise her in an hundred several manners, he essayed to divine that which might please her; Horatius nor Aronces had no inquietude, because they knew he was amorous at Rome: Clelia likewise and all those who saw him in Clelias house infinitely esteemed him. In the mean time, this admirable virgin lived in such a manner, that she had no lover but he was obliged to conceal himself under the name of a friend, and to call his love friendship, for otherwise they had been banished from her house, and Aronces and Horatius inrolled themselves under that title, if it was not in certain inevitable occasions, where this last strangely importuned Clelia by his continual complaints; for my self which was amorous of Fenice, I was likewise Clelia's friend, and I remember one day among the rest, that Aronces, Herminius, Horatius, Fenice and I were with Clelia, where there was many other persons in conference with Sulpicia, for you must know this day was one of the most agreeable in the world, seeing the manner to which tended our discourse, in effect, as Herminius was a gallant of Friendship and commonly entertained Clelia, with some expressions reflecting on tenderness: Aronces told him he could not chuse a person which knew the nature of true tenderness better than Clelia; adding that if he could so far prevail with Clelia as to define it, he should be the happiest friend in the world, her definition of it much exceeding all others; If it is true, replyed she, that I can so perfectly decipher it it is because my heart dictates it to me, and it is not therefore difficult to tell the Notions of it; but from thence I must not draw this conclusion, added this fair person, that all those I entitle my friends are my tender friends, for I have them in several degrees. In Effect, I have half friends if I may so speak, that I call by another name, agreeable acquaintance, and I have some which have made a farther progress, and which I number in the Catalogue of new friends. I have others which I simply call my friends, and I have some that I call my customary friends, I have others which I name solid friends, and others which I name particular friends: but for those I beautifie with the title of tender friends, they are but few in number, and they are before so firmly seated in my heart, that they can hardly make any farther progress, and I so distinguish all sorts of friendship that I do not confound them. By your favour amiable Clelia, cryed Herminius, tell me where I am I conjure you: You are yet in new friendship, replyed she smiling, and it will be long before you go farther; at least, replyed he smiling as well as she, I should not be very sorry to know how I might go from New amity to Tender.

I am of opinion, replied Aronces, that few men have ever seen a description of that Country, it is a voyage many men would undertake, replied Herminius, and who may deserve to have the way, by which they may be conducted to that amiable place, and if the fair Clelia would do me the favour to teach me it, she would bind me in an indissoluble obligation to her: May be you imagine, replied Clelia, that there is but a short walk between new amity and Tender, tis therefore, before I engage you there I will promise you to give you the Map of that Country, that Aronces believeth hath none. I pray you Madam, said Aronces then to her, if there is one that gives it me as well as Herminius, Horatius and I entreated the same favour. Fenice likewise pressed her to give her the Map of that Country which no person had yet described, we then imagined Clelia would have wrote some agreeable Letter, which would lay open her thoughts, but when we pressed her she told us she had promised it to Herminius, and that she would send it him the next day: and as we knew Clelia writ very gallantly, we had much impatience to see the Letter, we presupposed she would write to Herminius, and Herminius himself expected it with such an ardent desire, that he writ a Note next morning to Clelia, to summon her of her word, and as it was very short, I believe it contained nigh these words.

AS I cannot go from new amity to tender, if you do not perform your word I demand the Map you promised me, but demanding it of you, I engage my self to depart as soon as I have received it to take a voyage, I imagine so agreeable, and that I prefer you before the sight of all the earth, though I should be to receive a Tribute from all Nations in the world.

When Clelia read this note, I have since known she had forgot the promise she made to Herminius; and that having hearkned to all those entreaties we made her, but as a thing which then brought us some delight, she had thought we would not remember it the next day, so that at first the Note of Herminius surprised her, but as at this time a pleasing fancy entertained her thoughts, she imagined it would be delightful to others, and without any further consultation, she took the Tablets and wrote that she had agreeably designed, and she so speedily executed

it, that in half an hour ſhe had compleatly begun, and finiſhed her deſignment, after which having wrote a Note ſhe ſent it to Herminius, with whom Aronces and I then were; but we were aſtoniſhed when that Herminius after he had ſeen that Clelia had ſent to him, ſhewed us a Map effectually deſigned with her hand, which taught us how we might go from new amity to Tender, and which ſo reſembled a true Map, that there was Seas, Rivers, Mountains, a Lake, Cities and Villages, and for to make you ſee it more clearly, behold a Copy of that ingenious Map, that I carefully kept from that time.

At theſe words, Celeres gave a Map which follows in the next page, to the Princeſs of the Leontines, who was agreeably ſurpriſed at it: But to the end ſhe might know better all the devices of it, he explicated to her Clelia's intention, which ſhe had done to Herminius in the Note, which accompanied that Map, ſo that after the Princeſs of the Leontines had it in her hands, Celeres thus reſumed his diſcourſe.

You doubtleſs Madam, very well remember that Herminius prayed Clelia to inſtruct him how he might go from new amity to Tender, ſo that he muſt firſt begin by the firſt City, which is ſituated at the bottom of the Map, to go to the others, for to the end Madam, you may be fully acquainted with Clelia's deſign, you ſee ſhe hath imagined tenderneſs may proceed from three different cauſes, either from a great Eſteem, Recognizance or Inclination, which hath obliged her to eſtabliſh theſe three Cities of Tender upon three Rivers, which derive their names from them, and to make three different ways to go thither, ſo as we ſay, Cumes on the Ionian, and Cumes on the Tyrrhene Sea, ſhe makes us ſay, Tender on Inclination, Tender on Eſteem, and Tender on Recognizance.

In the mean time, as ſhe hath preſuppoſed that that Tenderneſs which is produced by Inclination, hath not need of any conformation. Clelia as you ſee Madam, hath not placed any Village along the banks of this River, which runs with ſuch a rapid courſe, that there can be no lodging along the ſhore for to go to new Amity to Tender, but for to go to Tender on Eſteem it is not ſo, for Clelia hath ingeniouſly put as many Villages, as there are ſmall and great things which contribute to the protection of it by eſteem of this Tenderneſs, of which ſhe intends to ſpeak: In effect you ſee that from new Amity we paſs to a place called great ſpirit, becauſe it is that which ordinarily begins eſteem.

In purſuit, you ſee thoſe agreeable Villages of pleaſing verſes, amorous and gallant Letters, which are the ordinary productions of the greateſt ſpirits in the beginning of Friendſhip, and for to make a greater progreſs in that way, you ſee Sincerity, Great Heart, Honeſty, Generoſity, Reſpect, Exactneſs, and Goodneſs, which are all againſt Tender. To make it evident that there cannot be true Eſteem without Goodneſs, and that we cannot arrive to Tender on that ſide if we are not endowed with that precious quality. After all that Madam, be pleaſed to direct your eyes to new Amity, to ſee by what way we may go from thence to Tender on Recognizance, ſee then I pray you, how we muſt go from new amity to complaiſance, and from thence to that Village named Submiſſion, and which is almoſt joyned to another called ſmall cares, ſee I ſay, that from thence we muſt paſs by Aſſiduity to make us underſtand, that it is not ſufficient to have that ſmall obliging care which give ſo much Recognizance, if we have them not aſſiduouſly. From thence you ſee we muſt paſs to another Village called Empreſſment, and not to do as thoſe ſlow people which will not haſten a moment what entreaty ſoever is made them, and which are incapable to have this impreſſment which ſometimes ſo ſtrongly obligeth, from thence you ſee we muſt paſs to great ſervices, and for to note there are few men which render ſuch; This Village is leſs than the others, from thence we muſt paſs to Senſibility, to make us know that we muſt be lively touched with the leaſt afflictions of thoſe we love, afterwards to arrive to Tender, we muſt paſs by Tenderneſs, for friendſhip attracts friendſhip. In purſuit, we muſt go to obey Divine, there being nothing which more engageth the heart of thoſe whom it obeys, then to do it blindly, and for to attain in the end to our deſired Port, we muſt paſs to conſtant friendſhip, which is without doubt the ſureſt way to arrive to Tender on Recognizance: But Madam, as there are no ways which we may not ſtray from, Clelia hath made as you may ſee that if thoſe which are at new Amity go a little more on the right or left hand; they will likewiſe deviate, for if we part from great ſpirit, we go to neglect and we ſee oppoſite to that Map, that if we continue this deviation, we go to inequality, from thence to lukewarmneſs, lightneſs, oblivion, and inſtead to find our ſelves at Tender on eſteem; we are at the lake of indifferency which you ſee marked on the way, and which by its calm ſtreams without doubt lively preſents the thing of which it bears the name in this place: On the other ſide, if we go from new amity to take a little more on the left hand, we go to indiſcretion, perfidiouſneſs, pride, miſchief, or obloquy, and inſtead of finding our ſelves at Tender on eſteem, we are at the Sea of enmity, where all the veſſels are ſhipwrackt, and which by the agitation of its waves, fitly agrees with that impetuous paſſion Clelia would repreſent: ſhe likewiſe makes us ſee by theſe different ways, that we muſt have many noble qualities to oblige her to have a tender friendſhip; and that thoſe which have bad ones can only acquire her hatred and indifferency, and ſhe willing to deſcribe to us in this Map that ſhe never had love, nor would ever have any thing but tenderneſs in her heart, makes the River of Inclination caſt it ſelf into the Sea which is called the dangerous Sea, becauſe it is dangerous for a woman to exceed the limits of friendſhip, and ſhe makes in purſuit that beyond this Sea is that we call unknown Lands, becauſe in effect we know not what they are, and that we believe no perſon can go further than Hercules his pillars, ſo that in this manner ſhe hath moralized friendſhip by a paſtime of her fancy, to make us underſtand in a peculiar manner, that ſhe never yet loved, nor could ever receive any.

Aronces, Herminius, and I found this Map ſo exquiſite, that we perfectly underſtood it before we departed; Clelia inſtantly prayed him for whom ſhe had made it not to to ſhew it but to five or ſix perſons whom ſhe deſired ſhould ſee it, but as it was not but a ſimple delight of her ſpirit, ſhe would not have it fall under the cenſure of thoſe ſtupid perſons, which neither know the beginning of it, nor are capable to underſtand the new gallantry, but ſhe could not be obeyed, becauſe there was a certain conſtellation which ſo reigned, that though we intended to ſhew this Map but to few perſons, it made ſuch a noiſe in the

the world, that there was nothing spoke of but this Map of Tender; all the ingenious wits of Capua writ something in praise of this Map either in Verse or Prose, for it was an excellent Subject for an ingenious Poem, gallant Verses, very agreeable Letters, and very pleasant Discourses; but Clelia, said they, set too high an esteem on it, and there was no person who was not demanded whether he would go to Tender? It furnished some such an agreeable subject of entertainment, that there was nothing more fit to exhilerate our spirits; at first Clelia was angry that there was so much spoken of it, for in fine (said she one day to Herminius) do you think I imagined, this spective fancy had any thing pleasant, but for our Cabala in particular to become publick, and that I made to be seen but by five or six persons which have noble spirits, should be seen by two thousand who scarce have any, and who hardly understand the best things? I know well pursued she, that those which know it began a conversation, which gain me only time to imagine this Map will not find this Gallantry Chymerical nor extravagant, but as there are strange men in the world, I extremely fear that they will imagine I seriously considered of it, that I have trifled away many days to find it, and that I believe to have designed an admirable thing, but it is a momentary folly, that I look upon as a toy, which hath it may be either some gallantry or novelty for those whose Spirits are well tuned to understand it, Clelia had therefore no reason to disquiet her self, Madam, for 'tis certain that all in general commended this new invention, which displayed the way how one might acquire tenderness from honest persons, except from some dull, stupid, malicious, wicked, whose approbations were indifferent to Clelia, whether they praised it or no, yet it commonly drew some delight from the most stupid of those men: for there was a man among the rest who demanded to see this Card with a strange obstinacy, and after he had heard many praise it, he dully demanded for what use it served, and for what profit was this Map? I know not (replyed he to whom he spoke, after he had diligently folded it up) if it will serve to every one but I know it will never conduct you to Tender.

The Destiny of this Map, Madam, was likewise so happy, that those which were too stupid to understand it, used to divertise us in giving us subject to deride their follies, but it seemed particularly to Aronces, because it prejudiced Horatius; for Madam, you must know that this Lover which as I have told you, troubled Clelia with his continual complaints, speaking to her one day of this Map, and willing to make use of it to speak of his passion, Alas Madam, said he to her, I am more unhappy than all those which approach you, since 'tis true that I do not see the way which may conduct me where I may go in that ingenious Map you have made: for I cannot touch your Inclination, I have not sufficient Merit to acquire your Esteem, I can never oblige you to any Recognizance, and in fine I know not what way to take, and to say things as I think them, I know not if I may go where some other more happy than I is already arrived, and if that Countrey where you say no person hath yet been, is not known to some of my Rivals; for Madam, from whence proceeds this durity of heart towards me, if you have it not Tender towards some others, you have naturally a gentle spirit, a sensible heart, I very well know you esteem me, you are not ignorant of my passion, you likewise know Clelius honours me with his friendship there is no disproportion of quality between us, and if fortune changes at Rome, I shall have riches enough to make a Roman happy: But after all Madam, added he, I am perswaded that far from having the power to pass to Tender, I shall never arrive there. Ah would to the Gods some unknown be not already arrived near those unknown Lands to hinder me from going thither, and that your heart is not already too much engaged to love him, of whom——You have done well Horatius, said Clelia interrupting him (her anger planting blushes on her cheeks) to remember me that my Father loves you, for if it was not by that consideration, I would treat you in such a manner that it would be in effect easie to know, that you will never arrive to Tender, but the respect I bear him somewhat retaining me, I content my self to tell you two things, the first is, I absolutely forbid you ever to speak to me in particular, and the second is, that that unknown of whom you speak, is not in these unknown Lands, because no person is yet there; nor can never be there, but to the end you do not imagine I conceal the truth from you, I declare to you he is at Tender, and that he shall always be there both by esteem and recognizance, for he hath all the merit one can have, he hath saved my life as well as yours, but the difference that is between you and me is this, that I am very acknowledging and you very ungrateful. In the interim, it seems to me not very judicious to appear ungrateful, when one desires to obtain favours from any one.

Horatius would have answered something, but Clelia would not hearken to him, and Aronces being arrived he was constrained to depart from her, and to leave his Rival with her, but hardly was he departed but Aronces gave her account of divers small Commissions she had given him the day before, for she had prayed him to oblige Aricidia to recount to him that which passed in a great Assembly where she was, he was likewise charged to procure flowers to make Garlands for a great Feast, which hath some resemblance with the Feast of the Terminales, so solemnly celebrated at Rome, and he had promised to give her some of Sappho's verses he had translated, for he very well understood the Greek, and she knew it not; so that willing to quit himself of all those things she ordained, he made at first a pleasant Narration of that Assembly where Aricidia had been; for in fine Madam said he to Clelia, I will declare to you the very words of Aricidia, tell Clelia said she to me, after I had acquainted her with your desires, that the Assembly was not fair because she was not there, and that there never had been one where there was so much melancholy: For all those Ladies which professs Gallantry, were unhappily this day there for all the jealous Husbands were there, and above half of their Gallants were wanting, in pursuit Aronces promised Clelia that she should have the next day four bushels of Flowers to make Garlands, and began his Version of Sappho's Verses, whose memory is very famous through all Greece, which were very amorous as ye may judge by four Verses which I shall tell you, which remains in my memory.

Love is a pleasing Malady,
For which my heart no cure can find:
Yet if I could get Remedy,
I'le rather dye than cure my mind.

But after Aronces had given her account of the Commiſſions ſhe gave him, and that Clelia ſmiled at all that Aricidia told him, that ſhe had thanked Aronces for his flowers and that ſhe had praiſed the Verſes he had given her, he ſaid to her half ſmiling, at leaſt Madam, permit me to hope that if I continue I ſhall ſoon paſs from that agreeable Village which is called Little Cares, and that if I cannot go to Tender on eſteem, I may one day arrive to Tender on Recognizance, not daring to pretend to go to the third, nor to think there is ſomething above Tender; for thoſe happy unknown Lands I can deſcry but at a diſtance, I find my ſelf ſo comforted by being ſtrongly perſwaded that others cannot go thither no more than I, that I ſhall think my ſelf happy when I ſhall arrive to Tender.

Clelia remembring the expreſſions of Horatius, could not conceal her bluſhes, and Aronces fearing to have incurr'd her indignation demanded pardon of her, not knowing wherefore he demanded it: are my wiſhes too much to deſire Madam, ſaid he to her? if they are ſo, divine Clelia, I crave your pardon, but I demand it not having power to do penance for ſuch a crime; no, no, Aronces, ſaid ſhe obligingly to him, I do not condemn you for deſiring my friendſhip, but on the contrary, am very well pleaſed you eſteem me worthy of it; but to deſcend a little nigher, I aſſure you you have as much part as your merit or obligations may claim: for in fine, I owe my ſelf to Clelius and Sulpicia; and likewiſe to you, and I aſſure you whilſt you do not force me to change my thoughts, and conceal my friendſhip and my recognizance, I ſhall be very glad to evidence to you in any occaſion that I am not ungrateful.

But Madam, replyed Aronces, what may I do to preſerve my ſelf in that glorious eſtate where you make me believe I am? you muſt live with me as you did formerly replied ſhe; But Madam, replyed he, you deſire an impoſſibility, for the means to live long without entertaining you of that I dare not tell you but by my ſighs and regards? I am reſolved, purſued he, to endeavour to obey you to oblige you if I can to deſiſt from ſuch an unjuſt command, for to teſtifie unto you Aronces, ſaid ſhe to him, that I have a tender friendſhip for you, and that I will preſerve it if I can by all means poſſible, I will unlock my heart to you, and rely on your diſcretion: Ah Madam, ſaid Aronces to her, but I fear this confidence will afflict me and not at all oblige me, I know not if you are equitable, replyed ſhe, but I am aſſured I ſhall not be unjuſt: If you do me juſtice, anſwered he, permit my love; and that I tell it you and you will be ſatisfied that I love without hope: if the Gods had diſpoſed your fortune and mine otherwiſe than they are, replyed ſhe, I ingeniouſly confeſs to you, you are the only perſon on which I could with my Father had fixt his eyes; but Aronces, things are not on thoſe terms, for not to flatter you, if you are not a Roman you muſt not pretend to Clelia, and there is great likelihood you are not a Roman, neither that you ſhall ever know your extraction, content your ſelf then to have acquir'd my friendſhip without pretending further; for if my Father ſhould diſcover that you had other thoughts than thoſe of a Brother, he would complain of you, he would forbid me your ſight, and I ſhould without doubt obey him, though I ſhould do it not without ſome difficulty: But Madam, replyed Aronces, I will only tell you I love you, and Clelius ſhall not know it, but better to keep this ſecret, replied ſhe, you muſt not tell it neither to me nor my Father; but Aronces purſued ſhe, this ſecret is no ſecret as you imagine, for Horatius who knows it may tell it to others, if he hath not already done it, and it may be for ſome reaſon he may acquaint Clelius with it: Horatius without doubt hath cauſe to deſire my unhappineſs, replyed Aronces, but I have ſo good an opinion of his Vertue, that I do not ſuſpect he will perform any diſhonourable Action, and I believe he will only imploy his merit to eclipſe my love: Though it ſhould be ſo, ſaid Clelia, ſeeing he knows you love me, I muſt give him no occaſion to believe I ſuffer your love, and I conjure you to confirm your Reſentments; if I could do it Madam, replied he, I would, but it is not poſſible, I and all that I can do is to leave you to take a free election, love me then or love me not, ſuffer my love or reject it, nothing ſhall oblige me to murmure againſt you, but nothing ſhall oblige me to alter my ardent affection, if you will not permit me to entertain you with it, added he, I will do it, but I am aſſured my vital faculties will fail when ſpeech is forbidden me, and you may, it may be, repent rather to have deſired my death, than to hearken to my Love, Aronces propounded theſe words with ſuch a paſſionate and reſpectful air, that Clelia remembring that hazardous attempt he performed to ſave her life, had not the power rigorouſly to treat that man ſhe had ſeen ſo valiantly kill thoſe which would have caſt her into the Sea, and ſhe took a mean and told him without doubt all that decency and modeſty dictated to her, in ſuch expreſſions which ſavoured not of any ſeverity, which evidenced to Aronces that only Clelia's Vertue retrieved her, and that he had no ſubject to complain of her, though he had not obtained the liberty to ſigh, but after he had left her, Clelia had ſome diſcourſe with her Mother, which gave her more boldneſs to abandon her heart, to the inclination ſhe had for Aronces, for as Sulpicia tenderly loved him, that ſhe had a ſecret averſion for Horatius, and that ſhe feared that Clelius had a deſign to give his Daughter to the laſt, ſhe confided to Clelia all the ſecret of her Soul, and made her underſtand that ſhe paſſionately deſired ſhe ſhould eſpouſe Aronces, and that ſhe ſtrangely feared Clelius would make her marry Horatius; 'tis not, ſaid ſhe, but that he is an honeſt man, but in fine, I have ſome ſecret reaſons which would afflict me if you ſhould eſpouſe him, and I ſhould be very glad if Clelius would turn his eyes to Aronces; I know very well added ſhe, that we know not his birth, but I know we are not ſtrangers to his Vertue, and that if he was not born at Rome, he hath at leaſt the heart of a Roman, yea, of a generous Roman: Moreover, Clelius owes his life to him and we likewiſe; I have likewiſe diſcovered without teſtifying any thing more of it, that he hath more affection for you than he ſhews, and I believe I ought to tell you my true thoughts for fear if he had been ignorant of them, you would have blindly conformed yours to thoſe of Clelius; I pretend not purſued Sulpicia, to make you diſobey him, but I would have you empty your addreſs to diſengage Horatius from the deſign I perceive he hath for you, that you make no rudeneſs to Aronces, and that you endeavour handſomly to make known to Clelius that you have ſome averſion towards Horatius, and that you have none for Aronces, for as I know he loves you, if you do as I direct you he will not conſtrain you, but above all my Daughter, added this prudent dent Mother, had your spirit always no estate to obey him without any reluctancy, if he would have you recede from my directions, for I intend not to employ but address only, to make him consent to my desires: You may judge Madam, that Clelia easily promised to her Mother to perform all her desires, and to give her one secret for another; she acknowledged to her that Aronces and Horatius loved her, but by a sentiment of modesty she could not resolve to tell her the sequel of the discourse which passed between these two Lovers and her. In the mean time being become more bold after that Sulpicia had told her she was more severe to Horatius and more affable to Aronces, to whom in the end she accorded the permission to tell her sometimes the thoughts he had for her, but she always forbad him the hope to be happy, without the consent of Clelius; but Madam, though Aronces lived with Clelia with much reservedness, Horatius nevertheless noted there was a greater familiarity between them than was usual heretofore; so that as Clelius more severely intreated him, since he mentioned that ingenious Man, it was not for that alone, but that his Rival had made a great progress in her heart, so that consideration much exasperating him, he felt a strange disposition in his Soul, to forget what he owed Aronces and to hate him, his natural generosity opposed the injustice of his love, but it was in the end constrained to yield to it; 'tis true that this particular friend he had which was named Stenius, contributed to incense him, for as he was a man which naturally lov'd these things which were more troublesome than agreeable, he had no sooner perceived that Horatius delighted not to hear that Aronces was favour'd by Clelia, but that he did nothing but tell him whatsoever his imagination fancied, for sometimes he said she cast a favourable eye on him at the Temple, another time that she praised him with exaggeration, or that she had whispered to him, and there was never a day but that he made some new observation of this nature, and that he told not his thoughts to Horatius; so that this Lover remembring that Aronces and he had mentioned that they should not hate one another, and break their friendship till Clelia had chosen one of them, I now believed it was time to desert his friendship: Nevertheless to be fully satisfied therein, he sought the occasion to find Aronces without going to his house, for in despight of the tumultuous resentments of his soul, he conceived he should act a strange part if he should go to quarrel in his own house with a man who had saved his life; but knowing that Aronces every morning recreated himself in the publick prementioned Garden, he went thither and there found him alone: As they yet retained some civility, Aronces instead of shunning him staid for him at the end of an Ally, for by a resentment of goodness and generosity, since he received some innocent testimonies of Clelia's affection, he commiserated his Rivals condition, and he would have alledged many reasons to him to cure his passion, only to mitigate the grief he foresaw he would have, when he should know Clelia had preferred his affection before his, but whilst he had this generous thought: Horatius whose heart was touched with jealousie, saluted him with a constrained civility, and taking the word, No, Aronces, said he to him, is it not time to cease to be your friend, and is not Clelia so favourable to you, as to put a difference between us? You demand it of me in such a fierce love, replyed Aronces, that I am perswaded if Clelia should much hate me, I should be obliged in honour not to tell it you; but lest you should think that the fear to make you my enemy makes me thus speak, I therefore tell you because I am sincere that I am not happy, but after that I leave it to your choice to be my friend or my enemy: As it is not there to be modest, replied Horatius, I know not whether I should be your friend or your enemy, because I do not positively know how you stand with Clelia; 'tis for you precisely to tell it me, for as I am a Roman I place sincerity above all other Virtues: though I know not my birth, replied Aronces, I know how to seat all Virtues in their right place, therefore as I am perswaded that after that you have told me, it is more just to be fierce than sincere, I say to you that I ever promised to tell you in what terms I should be with Clelia, and that I have not never pretended to know the like from you, you may therefore learn it from her mouth or divine it if you can, and it is for me to tell you once more that I give you your choice either of my hatred or friendship: If I may chuse, replied Horatius, I would chuse the last, because I owe my life to you, but it not being in my power, I gladly accept the other, and not to be altogether ingrateful (said he with a piquing rallery, putting his hand to his Sword) I must put my self in estate to give you that you preserved me, Aronces seeing him in this posture put himself in the like, and these two fierce Rivals began a Combat which had ended but with their lives, if Clelius and I had not casually arrived at this Garden as they had their Swords in their hands, you may judge Madam what was Clelius's surprise, when he saw two men whom he dearly loved, and whom he thought loved one another, to be in estate to kill one another, and he was so troubled at it that he ran as swift as I to separate them, for we both arrived together, fury having so transported them that they knew us not, but when we were two paces from them, Horatius seeing his blood run down from an hurt he had received on his left side became more furious: and casting himself on Aronces, Oh! too happy Rival, said he to him, since thou hast vanquished Clelia it will not be difficult to vanquish Horatius, Clelius hearing these words stayed himself one moment to look upon me, so he was so much surprised, but without staying my self or him, I put my self in estate to separate these two valiant enemies, and I did it more voluntarily because the advantage was on Aronces his side, and in effect Clelius being joyned to me, in despight of his astonishment we separated them without much difficulty; for as soon as Aronces saw Clelius, he retired some paces and put himself out of a fighting posture, so that having seized them both, and there being arrived other men which came to us and assisted us, we took from them the power to continue their Combat.

In the mean time, as Horatius was hurt and Aronces was not, Clelius accompanied the first even to his house, and I followed Aronces as my particular friend, but before they departed, Clelius looking upon them both thus said. What fury possest you? and whom ought I to quarrel with? for my self I have nothing to say, replyed Aronces, but that Horatius put his hand first to his Sword, and that I am not the assailer: yes, yes. Aronces, (replied Horatius in estranging himself from him) I am at once both culpable and unhappy, I am it may be more unhappy than you, replyed Aronces, but I am doubtless more innocent.

After

After that, Clelius not daring to examine the ground of their quarrel before so many Men, because of those words he heard at his first arrival to them: those two Enemies went with Horatius, as I have told you, and I went with Aronces, who was as much afflicted, as if his enemy had vanquished him, for he imagined what the event of this combat would prove, in effect, though Horatius was hurt and vanquished, he would tell nothing to Clelius of the subject of his quarrel with Aronces, because he had heretofore promised him never to tell him he loved Clelia; but he imagined a part of the truth, and was strongly perswaded in the opinion that Aronces and Horatius were amorous of his Daughter, but the better to know it, he return'd to his house, and taking Clelia aside, without telling Sulpicia of it, because he noted she did not love Horatius, I never believed (said he to her to affright her) that you had been capable to breed a quarrel between my two Friends, and I should never have thought the Daughter of a Roman so little esteemed glory as you do.

By your favour Father (said she to him) tell me what baseness I have committed? and what quarrel I have caused? You are the cause (replied he) that Horatius and Aronces have fought, and that one of them it may be, is in danger of death: What (replied hastily Clelia, who would not retain this first motion) have Aronces and Horatius fought? and is one of their lives in danger? Yes Daughter (said he to her) and you are doubtless the cause of this disaster.

Clelia would then have demanded of her Father, which of the two were hurt? but seeing her Father much disturb'd, and that he attentively lookt upon her, she durst not ask that question; but Clelius knew that she interested her self in the conversation of one of those two enemies, for a crimson tincture shadowed her cheeks, which sufficiently confirmed him, that she was not altogether insensible either for Aronces or Horatius: In the mean time, as he did not certainly know for which of them two she had a tender heart, because he had not named him which was hurt, he resolved subtilly to discover it, and concealing the truth, he told her that it was Aronces which was wounded, and that she had merited blame for what she had done.

Clelia hearing Clelius his words, was so much afflicted, that 'twas easie for her Father to know, that she had rather it had been Horatius, but though she said nothing whereon he might ground this conjectural opinion, her eyes betrayed the secret of her heart, and though she had power enough to hinder her from weeping, Clelius saw that it was only her prudence retained her tears; so that seeking no further confirmation, 'tis sufficient Clelia, said he to her, I know all the secret of your heart, and you will be glad when you know 'tis Horatius which is hurt, and not Aronces; for I am very certain you prefer Aronces before Horatius, and that you affect rather an unknown person then a Roman, yet I know not whether you suffer them both, though you love one better then the other: Ah Clelia cry'd he to her, Maids of your quality do not thus live at Rome; but to the end you may elevate your heart, and to add more confusion to your weakness, remember that your blood is of the most illustrious in the World, that the Nobility of your Race is ancienter then Rome, and if the famous City of Alba yet subsisted, that Crown should be your Hereditary right.

But without seeking these marks of greatness from the Tombs of those Kings from whom I am descended, and in the ruines of a State of which I might have been the Master; to the end to screw up your thoughts to a sublimer pitch of greatness, it suffices you are my Daughter, to find very strange that you should be capable of that weakness I reproach you: I know Sir, replied she, that I ought to take all things at your hands, therefore have I suffered you to accuse me without cause, but after all, as I am obliged to justifie my self, permit me to tell you that I am not culpable.

What? (replied Clelius) do you say that Aronces and Horatius are not amorous of you? and do you think to perswade me that you do not love Aronces better then Horatius? I do not positively know (replied Clelia) if those you say are effectually amorous of me; but if 'twere so I should not be culpable, since I never had any design to countenance their affections, and for the difference you say I put between Aronces and Horatius, I am not in that very criminal; for in fine, I saw Aronces as soon as I injoyed the light: you have commanded me from my infancy to love him as a Brother, and to give him that Title, you have always loved him with a Paternal affection, I have seen him esteemed by all those who knew him before I knew Horatius, 'tis not therefore strange that I have more disposition to have friendship for him then the other, though I have lived with an equal civility towards both of them.

If you have always lived so (replied Clelius) wherefore should they quarrel? wherefore should they fight? wherefore should Horatius be hurt? and wherefore should he say to Aronces in my presence, that he was more unhappy then he? I know not (replied she) the cause of their quarrel, but I very well know I contributed nothing to it, that I have no subject to complain of Aronces, and that if I had not feared your displeasure, I should have long since acquainted you that I had reason to accuse Horatius, because he persisted to give me marks of his pretended passion, though I had forbid it him; if you had defended it as severely to Aronces as Horatius, replied Clelius, things would have never come to these terms, and if you had not made a secret of that Gallantry, order should have been taken to prevent these things.

In the mean time I have to tell you, that though Aronces hath merit, I forbid you to look on him but as one ungrateful, that hath forgot all that he owes me, and I command you to dispose your self to live better with Horatius, if he escapes; for to tell you clearly my intentions, if he doth not esteem you unworthy of him, after that which hath happened, he is the only Man in the World that I can consent you espouse: He is an accomplished Man, a Roman, and Son to a Friend I very much loved; and in fine, he is Tarquin's Enemy, which is the greatest inducement for me to desire his Alliance; for Aronces I know he is endowed with transcendent qualities, but since he is both unknown and ungrateful, I will not only forbid him to look upon you, but command you never to speak to him till you are Horatius his Wife.

After these words Clelius left Clelia, grief seizing all the faculties of her Soul, after he departed from her her Chamber, he went to find Sulpicia, to whom he made ſtrange reproaches, accuſing her not to have taken ſufficient care in the tuition of her Daughter, ſince ſhe ſuffered her to put ſome diſtinction between Aronces and Horatius; for after all, ſaid he to her, if ſhe muſt put any between them, it muſt be for the diſadvantage of Aronces, and not Horatius: Sulpicia hearkned to her Husband's words with an extreme deſpight, becauſe they confirmed her in the belief that his friendſhip towards him principally proceeded from his former affection to his Mother, ſo boldly taking his Daughters part, whoſe innocency ſhe knew, ſhe took Aronces; in effect ſaid ſhe to Clelius, if Aronces is not a Roman born he hath a Roman heart, and if Clelia had not lived well with him, ſhe ſhould have diſobeyed the command that you and I injoyn'd her; if ſhe had ſuffered him as her Brother, replied Clelius, I ſhould have had nothing to reproach her, but ſhe hath endured him as a Lover, and hath without doubt treated Horatius as an enemy; by your favour (ſharply replied Sulpicia) blame not me indirectly by blaming Clelia, and be perſwaded that ſhe is altogether innocent, that ſhe loves glory and virtue, that ſhe hath not derogated from her birth, but you are ſo oppoſite to the pretenſions of Aronces, becauſe you do not know his Father, and favour thoſe of Horatius, becauſe his Mother hath been of your acquaintance.

At theſe words Clelius feeling himſelf touched to the quick at this reproach of Sulpicia (becauſe in effect there was ſome truth in it) felt in his heart ſuch a diſpoſition to anger, that for fear he ſhould not overpower himſelf, he departed not only from her chamber, but out of the houſe, and went to Aronces for whom he had yet a tender affection, but againſt whom likewiſe he was much angred, though he was reſolved to ſpeak to him rather like an angred Father than an enemy, for Aronces received him with his uſual reſpect, but with ſuch a profound ſadneſs imprinted on his Face, that it eaſily appeared that his Soul was much diſquieted; as ſoon as he was entred, Aronces thus ſays to him with as much ſubmiſſion as if he had been his Father, I doubt not but you believe you have cauſe to complain of me, for that which hath paſſed between Horatius and I, but I proteſt unto you, he hath been the Aſſailer, if he had not forced me to act what I have done, the reſpect I bear you would have obliged me to ſuffer any affronts from him.

I am willing to believe, Aronces (replied Clelius) that Horatius hath committed moſt wrong in that which reflecteth on your quarrel, and I am very much deceived if I do not make you confeſs, that you have been more culpable towards me, then he can be towards you; for in fine, you know Aronces what I have done for you, you know I found you in the Sea, that I expoſed my life to ſave yours, and afterwards far from treating you as a ſlave the gods had given me, I educated you as my Son, and that there might be nothing deficient on my part to your advantage, I deſired my Wife to love you as if ſhe had been your Mother, and commanded my Daughter to love you as if ſhe had been your Siſter; but O horrible and unparallel'd ingratitude! you uſe the familiarity I have given you in my houſe to cloak your affection to Clelia, and you pretend to enforce her from me, that ſhe might not obey my commands, I therefore declare to you by a tender reſentment which yet reſides in my heart, and to teach you to acknowlege thoſe obligations you have to me by a grateful recognition to you for ſaving my life, I ſay, that if you will ingeniouſly confeſs all that which is paſſed between Horatius and you, and ſwear to me never to pretend any thing to Clelia, nor once to ſpeak to her till ſhe ſhall be eſpouſed to Horatius, I will preſerve my friendſhip toward you, and I will bury in oblivions grave the cauſe you have given me to complain of you.

Would I had the power (ſaid Aronces to him) to ſhew you all that which hath paſſed in my heart, for if it were poſſible for me to do it, you would eaſily ſeal my juſtification, and my infelicity would (it may be) receive a great diminution, but ſeeing you cannot divine my thoughts, permit me to tell them you, and do me the favour to believe that I will conceal nothing from you, I will then ingeniouſly confeſs to you, that I have received continually from you all things I could deſire, and more then I could ever expect, and I have been, and I am yet linkt to you in ſuch a chain of gratitude, that nothing but death ſhall be able to untie, and if I could but once reproach my ſelf to have committed any thing voluntarily which might merit your indignation, I ſhould eſteem my ſelf the moſt ingrateful and perfidious of all Men; but generous Clelius, that love which hath made a deep impreſſion in my Soul, and which irritates you againſt me is not of this Nature: What have I not done to reſiſt and baniſh this paſſion from my heart, and for being juſt to you, Clelia hath reaſon to tax me with injuſtice, for I have been ſometimes ſo tranſported beyond my ſelf, that I have wiſht with a ſtrange deſire, neither to admire love or eſteem her; but my wiſhes were ſtill in vain, for I obſerve, love, and admire her, more than my tongue (too weak an inſtrument to blazon forth her perfections) is able to expreſs; but as I live without any hope to be happy, demanding no reciprocal affection, I cannot ſee how I ſhould be conſcious of any injuſtice towards you, and though my perſon ſhould be your captive, yet I muſt tell you that the reſpect I bear you, only hinders me from deſiring to ceaſe to be miſerable, and I muſt therefore ingeniouſly confeſs to you, that I am not capable to ſee Clelia in Horatius his power without contributing to my own Tragedy: neither give her to me purſued this afflicted Lover, and I conſent thereto; neither give her to Horatius if you will not give death to a Man whoſe Life you have ſaved.

I very well know my words do not fall in the compaſs of Reaſon, and that you have ſome ſubject to impute injuſtice to me, becauſe I ſeem to impoſe Laws on him from whom I ought to receive them, I would not have unript my thoughts to you in this occaſion, if I had not imagined to oblige you to compaſſionate my feebleneſs, I might have told you if I would, that as unknown as I am, there is ſomething inſhrined in my heart, which may merit the particular eſteem of Clelius; but I declare to you without murmuring againſt you, that if you never give her me, I ſhall without doubt complain of fortune, but never of Clelius: and if Horatius ſhall not be more happy than I, I ſhall not believe my ſelf to be the moſt unfortunate of all Men.

That which you ſay (replied Clelius) is ſo diſſonant from Reaſon, that I cannot give you any poſitive Anſwer, and all that which I may or ought to tell you is, that my Daughter is under my power; that the Romans are not only Maſters of their Childrens fortunes, but of their lives; and as Clelia's Father I shall bestow her on whom I please, and I shall never give her you, but according to all likelihood shall bestow her on Horatius, and I expressly forbid you either to see her or speak to her.

After that Clelius departed from Aronces, and left him in such a grand despair, that I think there was never any Lover whose afflictions equalled his; at least, I know that when he told me his discourse with Clelius, so many marks of despair were seated in his eyes, that I feared he was not able to support such a cruel adventure, and that his grief would act his lives Epilogue: who ever saw (said he to me) any misfortune equal to mine? for in fine, I have not the consolation to accuse any one of those miseries which have drowned me in a Sea of desperation; for I know Horatius ought not to yield Clelia to me, and that Clelius ought not to prejudice Horatius by giving her to me, whose birth he knows, and I suffer an affliction so much the greater, because I do not find it altogether unjust; and I am so miserable, that even the affability of Clelia towards me gives a continual augmentation to my despair, for if I was not beloved of Clelia, and had no hopes of gaining her affection, it seems to me, I should not so much hate my Rival, nor so much murmure against Clelius, and despair it may be would then somewhat mitigate my passion; but alas Celeres, I am not in this estate, for on Clelius and Horatius his parts I see an absolute impossibility to accomplish my designs, and on Clelia's I see such a seeming correspondency of affection which renders me more miserable, but not enough to make me happy; in effect, she would it may be without any repugnance obey Clelius, if he should command her to love me, but she doth not so much affect me as to disobey him, if he commands her to espouse Horatius; and the sweetness she expresses to me, doth increase my misfortunes; I should not therefore be the less unhappy by the cruelty of Clelia (added he) and all that I can desire for my consolation is, that my Rival should always be hated by her, and that she will always affect me with a correspondent affection: thus you see, Madam, the affliction of Aronces in this troublesome conjuncture; nevertheless as he durst not go to Clelius his house, after that he had told him, and that he desired to know Clelius his thoughts in this occasion, he prayed me to go to Sulpicia's house, but as I was known for Aronces peculiar Friend, I found that Clelius had given order to all his Servants to tell me that Sulpicia and Clelia were not there, so that the unhappy Aronces found himself in an unequal'd despair; Clelia on her side was not happy, for she sufficiently loved Aronces, sensibly to feel the privation of his sight, and she had a great aversion towards Horatius, to imagine she could never espouse him without an extreme displeasure: on the other side Sulpicia who had a jealous thought in her Soul; who hated Horatius, and tenderly loved Aronces, was not without Inquietude: for she would not directly oppose her Husband, neither would she suffer that he should pretend to give his Daughter to the Son of a Woman, which had heretofore given her such a cruel jealousie; for Horatius, he was more unhappy, for besides as he was hurt, he knew that he was not affected by Clelia; 'tis true, he had the consolation to know he was by Clelius, and to think this Father would employ all his Authority in his favour, if he escaped the hurt he had received, which was less dangerous then Clelius had told his Daughter.

In the mean time, as Love is ingenious, it made Aronces find the invention to write to Clelia, but he was astonisht when she defended him by a Letter to continue his writing to her, this rigorous command was without doubt conceiv'd in the most sweet expressions imaginable, but for all that 'twas a rigorous command, and rude, and it was done in such a manner, that Aronces very well knew Clelia would have him obey it, and he was during some time depriv'd of all consolation, till that Herminius who more lov'd Aronces then Horatius though he was a Roman, somewhat asswaged his grief, for as the true ground of the quarrel between Aronces and Horatius was now divulg'd, and the prohibition he had made his Daughter never to see him. Herminius made a Complement to that unhappy Lover, and pitied his condition as a Man which had a tender Soul, who knew the most sensibility of Love, who deplor'd all those which were miserable, and who used all means he could possible to comfort them, and he so much endeavoured to comfort Aronces, that his endeavours proved effectual; for as he said he had been at Sulpicia's, and that he had entertain'd a long time her admirable Daughter, he extremely pressed him to tell him if she did not mention him in her discourse; if I should tell you she spoke to me of you, replied Herminius, I should tell you a lie, but if I tell she carefully avoided to speak of you, I shall tell you a thing which is more advantagious for you then you imagine: For in fine, I so clearly know that, that hindred her from speaking of you, was, that she felt she could not do it without expressing more inclination towards you then Horatius, that I cannot doubt of it: for I have seen her blush at her own thoughts, I have seen her seem not to take notice what was spoken of you, yet I have seen her attentively hearken to it, and I have seen some marks of despight, when Stenius, who as you know is Horatius his Friend, hath said something to her to his advantage. Ah, ah Herminius, cryed Aronces, you would alleviate my miseries, and seek to diminish that malady which cannot be healed, I protest unto you, replied Herminius, that I speak to you with all the sincerity of a Roman: after that Aronces relying on the probity of Herminius, pray'd him to repair oftner to Sulpicia's house, and faithfully to relate to him all that he heard Clelia say, reflecting on Horatius or himself, but he durst not entreat him to say any thing to her on his part; for knowing the modesty of her humour and prudence, he judged that she would never discover the secret of her heart to a third person, and in effect, Herminius did all that Aronces desired, and for some days he was the most agreeable Spy in the World for his Friend, for he always reported to him some favourable observation he had made to his advantage; for my part I had likewise pray'd Fenice to report to me all that she heard Clelia speak of concerning Aronces and Horatius, that she then more frequently visited; so that either by Herminius or me, Aronces heard every day something which pleased him; he was therefore much troubled to know that Stenius saw her more often then ordinary: but after all he had some consolation in that he learnt by us that his Rival was not in estate to entertain her when he was forbid her presence.

In

In the mean time Clelius daily visited Horatius, and Aronces doubtless had no consolation, but that Herminius and I gave him: But Madam, we were not always in power to give it him as accustomed, for neither Herminius nor I had any thing one day favourably to tell him, so that there are none more suspicious then a Lover, and an unhappy Lover, he no sooner saw us but he knew we had doleful things to tell him. In effect, as he demanded of me if Fenice had not seen Clelia, I told him coldly no; and as he demanded of Herminius if he knew nothing of Clelia, he answered the same thing, so that this equality of Answer being suspected by him, he lookt upon us with eyes, which demanded us so many things, that once without having a design, told him more then he would know, for he saw grief in mine, and he noted that Herminius turned his head aside not to encounter his, and not having power to remain long in this incertainty; I pray said he to us, tell me speedily that you will not tell me, for if you do it not, I shall go to Clelia's house in despight of the defence of Clelius, and I will perform so many things contrary to reason, that you will repent not to have made known to me my misfortune: at first we would have concealed the truth, but there was not the means, and we were constrained to tell him that which we knew; for my particular I told him that Fenice having been at Clelia's house, was very much surprised to see her so reserv'd to her, and to hear her speak of him in a manner which made her judge that she thought to have cause to complain of him: for Herminius, he told him something which was more displeasing; for he not only informed him that Clelia had spoken in such a manner, that it evidently appeared her spirit was irritated; and moreover, that she had in an obliging manner inquir'd of Horatius's health, at the same time that Stenius came to her: So that Aronces having these two things, had almost sensible Dolour, and therefore not being able to live in such a cruel uncertainty, he was absolutely resolved to speak to Clelia, to know from her self what oblig'd her to vary in her thoughts concerning him. That which pusled me in this business was, that I did not know why Clelia gave such cold entertainment to Fenice, for to think it was because I lov'd Aronces, and that I likewise was lov'd by him, it were equally to wrong both the wit and generosity of Clelia, so that I knew not what to think of it. But in fine, Madam, after Aronces had conjectur'd an hundred ways to speak to this admirable person, he did so well that he met with one, it is true that he had it by the contribution of fortune, for there being a Person of Quality dead at Capua, and the custom requiring that his Wife should be visited, Aronces had the time so exactly watcht when Sulpicia should make her visit, thereby to order his own, and that he might do what he had before intended; and he so well fitted all things that he came to the door of this mourning house, at the same time that Sulpicia and her Daughter arrived there: so that I being with him, and that I knowing his design, I led Sulpicia, which received us very civilly, and Aronces presented his hand to Clelia, who as soon as she saw him blusht, and received him not with such a sweetness as her Mother, or if she had any it was very cold, and which had nothing of that obliging disposition she was wont to have for him; In the mean while there arriv'd to facilitate to Aronces design, that as we traversed a Court which belongeth to the house where we were, and that we were under a magnificent Portal which is at the lower end of the stairs, there happened I say, that Sulpicia met with a Kinswoman of the deceased, which was going out when we entred in, and who following the custom of some Women, which always tells more then they are ask'd, related unto her not only the sickness of her Kinsman, but besides all the distempers which had heated his blood, and had caused the disease which ended his life: In fine, continuing her discourse, and relating what remedies had been given him, how he had disposed of his means, and generally what had befallen this Man, since ten or twelve years to his last breath: so that our design not permitting us to leave these Ladies with whom we were, I gave attention to this long Narration, during which time, Aronces entertain'd Clelia: At first she would have approached Sulpicia, but as she endeavoured to do it, Aronces opposed himself with such a comely and civil manner, that she could not manifest all the rigour she intended for him; I am nevertheless perswaded, she was not angry to be constrained to speak to Aronces, who no sooner saw Sulpicia ingaged to hear the Ladies discourse, which she had met, said by your favour charming Clelia, I pray tell me from whence does it proceed, that you not only forbid me to write to you, but you speak of me as if I had offended you, and that I were not as innocent as miserable, though I am the unhappiest of all Men: I thought (replied she blushing) that you were in so good a correspondency with Fenice, that you did not care if you had none with Clelia.

What Madam, (replied he greatly astonished) do you believe that Fenice hath a part in my affections, Fenice whom I scarcely ever see, Fenice which is fervently loved by the dearest of my Friends, and Fenice in fine, which is not considerable to me, but because I know by her partly what you do or say, since I have no more the liberty to be my self a witness of your actions, and the admirer of all your words. Can you believe, Madam, that a heart which adores you can be able to adore another; and is it not sufficient that Clelius is offended with me, that it hath debarred me to see you, and that you have forbid me to write to you, and that I fear my Rival shall be happier then I, without your accusing me with an injustice which never had its equal: I know not, Aronces (said she) whether you love Fenice or not, but I know you have received Letters from her, and that you have been enough conversant to have some familiarity with her, yet said she (not giving him leisure to interrupt her) that brings no alteration to your fortune, for since my Father hath forbidden me to let you love me, and that he hath commanded me to receive the affection of Horatius, there will be no other change in the thing, but that I shall obey him with less repugnance then I should have done.

What Madam, (said Aronces, with a mortal anguish in his eyes) will you obey Clelius? will you no more suffer my affection? and will you entertain my Rival? Ah! if that be so, you have nothing to do, but to prepare your self to rejoyce for my death: for in the thoughts in which you are, it will without doubt cause you joy; but because I may at least have the comfort to die justified, accuse me exactly of my supposed crime, tell me when Fenice was loved by me, when we were familiar together, and if I destroy not all these impostures, esteem me as the basest of all Men, take from me wholly all hopes, that is to say, take away my life; speak then Divine Clelia, continued he, but speak without turning away your fair eyes, that they may see in mine all the innocence of my heart, and the fervour of my Love.

Clelia hearing Aronces speak in this manner, began to doubt of what had been told her concerning him, so that looking upon him with a more gracious eye then before, by your favour Aronces, said she to him, justifie not your self, for I had rather be in wrath then in sorrow, wherefore because 'tis upon necessity that I must lose you, leave me in the belief that 'tis I which have lost you: No, no, Madam, replied he, I will not indure this injustice, and I must be absolutely justified.

As Aronces ended these words, and that he was in hope to appease Clelia, Fenice followed by two of her Friends, came down stairs at the foot of which we were, insomuch that Aronces, who did not think that she had been there, and who knew that Clelia had newly accused him to have born her some affection, was so surprised by the sight of her, that it was not in his power to conceal those marks which demonstrated the agitation of his spirit.

Nevertheless, as he intended to clear Clelia of her doubt, he saluted Fenice with more reservedness then ordinarily, insomuch that this person not knowing what was the reason of the diminution of his wonted civility, and calling to mind the cold entertainment that Clelia gave her the last time she saw her, she could not hinder her self from making some reproaches for it: Ah Aronces! (said she to him) 'tis too much to be at odds both with you and Clelia; 'tis not added Fenice, but that her beauty deserves your regards, but she ought not to be possessor of all your civilities, Aronces and Clelia were so surprised by what Fenice had said, and she passed by so suddenly, that they had not the leisure to answer her, yet they both began to give her a reply, but as I have said already, Fenice gave them not the leisure to end it; nay, they were not able to say any thing to each other, and I could not go after Fenice, who had not seen me, because Sulpicia ended her discourse which she had with that Lady, which had stayed her, by this means, Aronces thinking to clear himself, found himself in a new labyrinth, for the alteration of his countenance, and what Fenice had told him, renewed the suspicions in Clelia's heart, insomuch that although he spake to her as he went up the stairs, she gave him no Answer, and she hath even acknowledged that she hardly understood him, you may then judge Madam, that when they were in this mourning Chamber, it was not easie for him to entertain her, and when Sulpicia departed, Clelia carried her self so dexterously, that she engaged me whether I would or not to lead her; it is true that Aronces was not prejudiced by it, for he found in Sulpicia whom he accompanied, so much kindness, that it did in some measure comfort him, yet she nevertheless told him but very displeasing things, for she confirmed him in the belief which he had, that Clelius was very angry with him, and that he would not be easily reconciled: it is true, that she testified to him a great deal of sorrow for it, which did infinitely oblige him.

But as she went about to joyn Clelia's thoughts with hers, and to make him know, that she also was very sorry for it: Ah Madam, said he to her, the equity of Clelia is far inferiour to yours, and I am far from having any subject by which I might equalize her goodness with yours.

Certainly you take the modesty of my Daughter (replied Sulpicia) as a Token of indifferency: but I assure you, she gives your virtue its deserved praise, and that if my perswasions could be ever able to cause an alteration in Clelius his thoughts, you should see what testimonies she would give of the esteem she hath of you: Aronces durst not tell her what Clelia had told him, for fear of angring that fair person to whom I spoke, but as soon as I desired to know of her for what reason she would put Aronces to despair, by treating him so cruelly: Aronces (replied she) it may be, is not so innocent as you think him to be, and you may chance to be a better Friend then you think for, in speaking to his advantage; Clelia told me that, in such obscure terms, that as I knew not, that she thought Aronces loved Fenice, I was far from understanding what she meant, and I likewise answered so ambiguously, and our conversation was so mysterious, that we parted without understanding one another; so that when Aronces and I were alone together, we knew not what to imagine, for he was so astonisht that Clelia should accuse him of loving Fenice; and I was so affrighted at it when he told it me, that I knew not what to think of it, and the grief which Aronces had for it was so great that it could not be exceeded: for my part I knew well after that which he had told me, that it may be I was a better Friend then I thought, for believing that Aronces was amourous of Fenice, whom I loved, she was perswaded that I did more then I ought in speaking in his behalf.

In the mean time, we in vain searcht from whence should proceed Clelia's jealousie, the cause of which was very far off, for you must remember, that when I told you, that when Horatius endeavoured the first time to know whether Aronces was in love with Clelia or no, he found him with a Letter in his hand, which Fenice had wrote me, of which Horatius knew not the writing.

Now Madam, it happened that during the time that he had kept his Chamber for the hurt which he had received—— Stenius fortunately shewed him a Song which was written by Fenice, which he saw sometimes, so that Horatius remembring it to be the same hand as that which he had seen in his Rivals hands, he began to imagine that Aronces loved in two places, and that I was his Confident only but by Fenice, so that relating this whole Adventure to Stenius, he began to exaggerate the injustice of Clelia, to prefer a Man to him which only gave her a divided heart.

So that Stenius effectively believing that Aronces had some intelligence with Fenice, and thinking to tender Horatius a good office, he went without informing him of it to Clelia's house, and he so contrived his discourse, that he gave this fair person to understand, that I was Aronces confident near Fenice, though I went for her Lover, or if that was not that Aronces betrayed me, he even assured her, that he had seen a Letter from Fenice to Aronces, and he did it without making any scruple of the likelyhood of this lie, because Horatius had effectually told him that he had seen one in Aronces hands, it was not a considerable falshood to change one circumstance of this thing, so Stenius did what he intended, since he had had put jealousie in Clelia's heart, which procured Aronces's miseries, for it was not possible to imagine what was the cause of Clelia's illegal proceeding, so that he found himself most wretched, principally because Clelius had forbid him his house, that Horatius did mend daily, that Clelius saw him assiduously, and that it was divulged through the whole Town, that he had promised him Clelia; Aronces knew well in himself, that being as he was so much obliged to Clelius, he ought not to contradict his design in disposing of his Daughter, and that equity permitted him not to seek means to destroy Horatius, since he lookt on him as a Man which he would have espoused to Clelia, so that love and equity counselling different things, he found himself greatly perplext, but in the midst of so many misfortunes, he resented Clelia's jealousie more then all things, so that the excess of his passion fram'd in his Cogitations the most elegant propositions in the World, though he was so equitable; for although he knew that I was sufficiently in love with Fenice, he would shew her some publick incivility, because Clelia knowing of it, should no more believe he lov'd her, he even would have me not see her during some days, and he would in fine, satisfie Clelia, not considering whether the remedies which he would employ were lawful or not: But at last, after we had well considered what might be done for him; we resolved that he should desire Herminius to speak to Clelia, and to desire her from him, to tell him what caused his anger, and I perswaded him also to imploy Aricidia, to perswade Clelius that he should not be so obstinate as to give his Daughter but to a Roman, for I was strongly perswaded, that if Clelius gave her not to Horatius, he would willingly bestow her on Aronces, though he was unknown; and in effect Madam, we went to Herminius, and Aricidia who promised us to perform our desires. But as diligence in this occasion was requisite, because Horatius was to go abroad (as it was reported within two or three days) Aricidia went the very next morning to see Clelius, and Herminius promised to go to see Clelia in the Afternoon. But to begin by the conversion of Aricidia, who had so much affection for Aronces, I shall tell you that this officious Woman was no sooner with Clelius, but entring in discourse, I know not said she to him, whether you will take in good part what I shall tell you, but I am sure I have no interest in it, but that of your Families repose, Aricidia is so accustomed, replied Clelius, to be a Promoter of the contentment of her Friends, that I am perswaded she can never have but good intentions: Since it is so, replied she, do me the favour to answer me, and that sincerely; I promise it you, answered Clelius, and I promise it fairly, for I can never do no otherwise: Tell me then I conjure you, replied she, is it not true, that Aronces is one of the most accomplisht Men in the World, that he is most couragious, most witty, most virtuous, and the most agreeable, and that he is, in fine, a Man whom you esteem above all the rest in the World, and which hath been most belov'd of you, I acknowledge it, answered Clelius, but since it is so, replied she, why have you relinquisht your love, and what hath he done to merit your hatred: He hath had the impudence to love my Daughter, replied Clelius, he hath been so ingrateful as to forget he owes me his life, and that 'tis I which have made him what he is, but I shall make him know, that the Romans know well how to punish the ungratefuls. Go not so fast Clelius, said she to him, and take heed that the Romans in thinking to punish the ungratefuls, expose not themselves to ingratitude: 'tis true, you have sav'd Aronces's life, but he was but a Child, so that it may be said, that he did not see what you did for him, but you beheld with your own eyes what he did for you, when he sought to save your life, as you have your self told me, so you must not count what he owes you, without counting also what you owe him, and you must precisely tell me, why you will match Clelia with Horatius, who never sav'd your life, who though he hath a great deal of worth, yet is far short of Aronces, and wherefore you refuse her to the latter; I could tell you, replied Clelius in two words, that 'tis sufficient that Aronces not knowing his birth, to make me take it very ill, that he durst have an intention to my Daughter, but as without doubt you will tell me that he hath so noble a mind, that 'tis not possible to doubt of his quality; I have another reason to tell you, which admits of no answer; for, in fine, Horatius is a Roman, and by all likelyhood Aronces is not; Ah Clelius, replied she smiling, this is not so strong a reason as that which you alledge not, and for my part I cannot endure the humour of the Romans which set themselves so boldly above all the rest of the World, for when all is done, Virtue belongs to all Countries, and of what place of the World soever Aronces is of, I esteem him as much as a Roman; believe me Clelius, added she smiling again, be not more curious then your Fathers were, who for to get Wives, ravisht those of their Neighbours; and be not more then one of your Kings who married a Corinthian Slave, though he was so great a Prince, not considering she was not of Rome, and for to shew that 'tis not sufficient to be a Roman, to have all things to discover to be lov'd by you, is not Tarquin a Roman, and the Son of Roman Parents, yet I have heard you say, he hath not the heart of a true Roman, that he is the Tyrant, and not the King of Rome, that he is an ambitious, a cruel, and a Parricide, that his Wife is an inhumane Woman, which hath passed over her Father's body, and that she is the wicked'st person of her Sex; after which, durst you maintain that 'tis good reason to alledge unto me that Aronces is not a Roman, and that Horatius is of Rome, for as there are Romans without Virtue; I maintain there may be virtuous persons, which are not Romans, therefore you must not say, you ought to prefer Horatius to the prejudice of Aronces, since the latter hath more worth then the other, and that you are more obliged to him, and that he is more esteemed by Clelia: if you had received your birth at Rome (replied Clelius) you should see what 'tis to be born a Roman, and you should know what is that invincible band, and that love to our Countrey which bindeth all its Citizens to each other, as for Tarquin I look upon him as a Monster which hath usurped the Soveraign Authority, which belonged not to him, and I neither consider him as a lawful King, nor as a Roman.

But since Tarquin's Vices (replied Aricidia) make him not to be considered by you as a Roman, let the same reason induce you to esteem Aronces by reason of his Virtues, as if he were one: No, no, Aricidia (replied Clelius) you shall not perswade me, since I am resolved Horatius shall be the possessor of my Daughter, and that Aronces never shall, and in effect

ſince he is not a Roman, and that he is ungrateful, I muſt not look upon him as a man capable to wed all my intereſts, for in fine Aricidia, I will have a Son-in Law, whoſe love for his Countrey and hatred againſt the Tyrant of Rome, ſhall be in the ſame degree as mine, it is therefore that I find in Horatius the accompliſhment of all my deſires.

In the mean time, as I foreſee it will be difficult for Aronces to ſee Horatius crowned with the title of happineſs, whilſt this paſſion predominates in him, I ſhall therefore oblige him before I reſolve on this marriage to return to the Carthaginian Prince, and command him not to return hither till he hath eradicated this paſſion from his heart.

Have you then poſitively promiſed Clelia to Horatius (replyed Aricidia?) No, ſaid Clelius, becauſe I would have him deſire her, but have only fed him with hopes, and I am reſolved ſo ſoon as he hath left his Chamber, to ſalute him with this agreeable news: but do you know, (anſwered Aricidia) that it will be as pleaſing to Clelia as Horatius? I believe it, replyed he, and preſuppoſe that her will is regulated by mine. In truth (replyed Aricidia) I did not believe you ſo dileſteemed him, and that no Chymera of a Roman could come in competition with the tranſcendent qualities of Aronces: for in fine, if Rome only were illuminated by the Sun, it might plead by that priviledge to have more vertuous perſons than any other City: but as you know the Sun ſpreads his beams through the whole Univerſe, and there are vertuous men in all parts of the world, I have heard ſay, continued ſhe, that in all Greece there were but ſeven men which above all the reſt were called wiſe, yet the Greeks think they are well furniſhed with wiſdom, and you pretend that all Romans are wiſe; believe me Clelius, if you would diligently peruſe the ancient Records of Rome, you ſhould find it ever ſince its being infected, with vices, and if there be any difference between Romans and others, it is that their Vertue is more rude and ſavage, and I am fully perſwaded that ſince you will not be perſwaded by me, that the over-ruling quality of the Romans is obſtinacy, for if that were not, you would yield to my reaſons, to your prayers and to your ſelf, for I am aſſured that during what I have ſaid of Aronces, your heart hath confirmed that I had reaſon, and that you were to blame.

Clelius hearing Aricidia ſpeak, and knowing her franchiſe, would no longer diſpute againſt her, and being reſolved to refuſe her, he would do it with civility, wherefore he gave her thanks for the intereſt ſhe took in his Family, but he ſtill ſpoke to her ſo fiercely of Aronces, that ſhe knew there was nothing to hope for, and knowing it would be to no purpoſe to delude him, ſhe gave him no hopes; on the other ſide, Herminius found Clelius's ſpirit ſo exaſperated, that ſhe would not ſo much as let him ſpeak to her of Aronces, and ſhe took it ſo ill that ſhe ſhould employ others to ſpeak to her ſtill of one thing, for though he had been well with her, this very occaſion had been ſufficient to cauſe a diſgrace from her, for the more ſhe eſteemed Herminius, ſhe ſo much the more took it ill that he ſhould juſtifie Aronces, ſo that this miſerable Lover was in unſpeakable deſpair. I had for my part ſome vexation, for as Fevice hath humours and is a little unjuſt, ſhe taxed me of Clelia's coldneſs, and of Aronces want of civility which they had ſhewed her when ſhe ſaw them together, and ſhe pretended that in conſideration of her I ſhould fall out with them, ſo that we had a great conteſtation, which did almoſt cure me of my amorous diſpoſition: But to return to Aronces who was far more miſerable than before, becauſe Clelius who being deſirous that he ſhould retire himſelf from Capua before Horatius ſhould marry Clelia, went to tell it him, and in effect told him ſo roughly, that he could not give him an anſwer, for as he was redevable to him for all things, and that he ſtill conſidered him as his Father, he durſt not be violent againſt him, and withal knowing very well that it would have been to no purpoſe, he therefore endeavoured by all the tendereſt words he could expreſs, to compaſſionate his heart, and when he ſaw that he could not work upon him, he conjured him to permit him to have the liberty to dwell with him, and if he would not, at leaſt to ſuffer him to take his leave of Clelia: but whatſoever he could ſay he could not obtain any thing of what he demanded, ſo that Aronces being tranſported with anguiſh, and not able to contain it in his ſoul; Ah pitileſs Clelius, cryed he, wherefore did you ſave me my life, or why at preſent do you kill me; 'Tis no matter, ſaid Clelius, you muſt depart, and it muſt be without a ſecond quarrel with Horatius, as alſo in not ſeeing my Daughter, Ah Clelius, replied Aronces haſtily, I ſhall not ſatisfie you in any thing, except I have a command from Clelia to depart without aſſaulting Horatius, 'tis not but that I know the reſpect which I owe you, but my reaſon is weaker than my love, and if ſhe which cauſes it does not command me to let my Rival be happy, I know not whether I ſhall not diſobey you, ſince you muſt be commanded by Clelia to depart, replied Clelius fiercely, going away ſhe ſhall command it you, but it ſhall only be but by a Letter, for I declare unto you that that ſhe ſhall not go out of her Chamber till you have left Capua: You may judge Madam, in what condition Aronces was, who a while after repented, for what he had haſtily ſaid to Clelius, yet notwithſtanding his love, he knew well that this illuſtrious Roman was not much to blame in giving his daughter rather to Horatius of whom he knew the birth, than to one whoſe true quality was unknown to him, and he ſaw alſo that he had no occaſion to complain of his Rival, and it is that which hath made him the more miſerable: But that which was to him moſt inſupportable, was Clelia's anger, for he feared that the hatred which he thought Clelia bore him, ſhould induce her to love Horatius, which above all things in the world he feared, and indeed he could not in the condition he was then in, harbour ſweeter thoughts in his fortune, than to think that Clelia ſhould hate his Rival in marrying of him: In the mean while, Clelius according to what he had ſaid to Aronces, made Clelia write a Note in which were only theſe words.

IF within three days Aronces leaves Capua, and that without ſeeing Horatius, I ſhall pity his misfortune, and if he obeys not the Command which I make him to depart, none ever hated ſo much as I ſhall hate him.

You may eaſily think Madam, in what a deſpair Aronces was then, after he had read theſe cruel words, it was ſo great that I thought his anguiſh would have deprived him of his life: But in fine forcing himſelf with an extreme violence, he anſwered Clelia in this manner.

Aronces

Aronces to Clelia.

I Will, Madam, depart within three days if my grief will ſpin my life ſo long as to obey you, but I will not go but for to dye of love and deſpair, and I aſſure you that the end of my life ſhall antidate your Nuptials, and I ſhall never have the grief to hear that my Rival hath poſſeſſed you, but you ſhall it may be, ſoon know the death of the moſt faithful of Lovers.

This was Madam, the anſwer of Aronces to Clelia, who ſaw it not ſo ſoon; for as it had been her Father which was the cauſe of her writing, he hindred Aronces Letter from being delivered unto her, for fear it ſhould mollifie her heart; for although Clelia was angry with him, Clelius nevertheleſs perceived that ſhe hated him not, and that ſhe had not any affection for Horatius. Things being in this manner, I ſaw Aronces an hundred times almoſt reſolved either to kill Horatius, or to dye himſelf, and if I had not in part retained his violences, I know not what he would have done; there happened a thing which did much embroyl theſe two Rivals, for as Aronces was going penſively along through a ſtreet which is near Horatius Lodging, this Lover was going forth as being the firſt time, and expreſly to ſee Clelius, to whom he was going to make his firſt viſit, for to thank him for the good will he bore him, though he had not yet promiſed him any thing, ſo that theſe two Rivals encountring, they approached together with different thoughts, for Horatius who thought he ſhould be ſoon happy, had leſs anger in his ſpirit and he ſtill acknowledged his Liberator in the perſon of his Rival: for Aronces as he was miſerable although he was generous, he only ſaw his Rival in the perſon of his friend, they both nevertheleſs ſaluted each other, for I had forgot to tell you that their friends during the time that Horatius kept his Chamber, had made a kind of agreement between them, without diſcloſing of their quarrel. But in fine, to begin where I left off, they ſaluted one another, and Aronces ſpeaking to his Rival the firſt, For ought that I can ſee, ſaid he to his Rival, by I know not what Sentiment which he could not retain: It is ſufficient to be born a Roman, to become happy, and the greatneſs of my paſſion availeth me nothing, you ſhould have done better to have ſaid your merit, replyed Horatius, thereby to exaggerate your miſery, for as I think my ſelf to be as amorous as you, it is not in that that we differ, nevertheleſs I can aſſure you, that my reaſon is not at preſent troubled with fear that I ſhall be perfectly happy, ſince I cannot be without rendring you altogether miſerable.

Ah Horatius! (replyed Aronces) it is not of theſe things you muſt ſpeak to comfort a generous Rival: on the contrary, you remember we made a bargain one day that we would not hate one another, till Clelia (to the prejudice of one of us) had made her choice: therefore as you are going to be he, I think I am fully diſpenſed of all the friendſhip I had promiſed you, and I am verily perſwaded that I may without breaking the laws of generoſity hate you. Hate me then unjuſt friend (replyed Horatius) for as it is not eaſie to love who hates us, think it not ſtrange if I have no affection for him that loves me not; far from taking it ill (replyed Aronces) you cannot do any thing which may ſeem to me more juſt, then to hate me, for I declare unto you, that if the reſpect which I bear unto Clelius did not retain me, Clelia ſhould never be yours as long as my heart ſhould beat within me, and I know not added he, if Clelius ſhould be ſufficient, if Clelia did not meddle in it: Although you have vanquiſhed me, replyed Horatius fiercely, if things were in that condition, I ſhould know how to defend Clelia with the ſame valour that one of my Predeceſſors defended Rome. That Horatius of whom you ſpeak (anſwered roughly Aronces) overcame three men it is true, but it was more by policy than valour, and though you ſhall have his valour, I ſhould not be the ſooner overcome.

As they were in theſe terms, and Horatius who prepared himſelf to give him a ſharp anſwer, Hermius and two more came to them, who knowing what paſſed between them, and ſeeing ſome alteration in their eyes, did not leave them till they were parted, in the mean while as this intervene was known by Clelius, he ſent again to Aronces to tell him he would have him be gone, ſo that in effect he was fain to reſolve himſelf to depart, at leaſt he did as one who intends to depart, for his followers were ordered to have all things in readineſs, there were for all that moments in which he thought more in killing of Horatius than in departing; but when he conſidered that the death of his Rival would not procure him his Miſtreſs, he a little refrained his violence, which he knew was not grounded on a lawful foundation, for Horatius had been in love with Clelia before him, Clelius intended her for him, and would not have Aronces have any thoughts that way, and in fine, Horatius was not very Criminal towards Aronces.

In the mean while, Clelia on her part was not without grief, for ſhe doubtleſs had an inclination in her heart powerful enough to cauſe in her a great difficulty to overcome it, principally ſince ſhe knew that Aronces prepared himſelf to be gone, and to obey her, for ſhe then knew well that if he had loved Fenice he would not have left Capua, ſo that her jealouſie ſuddenly ending, her affection for Aronces gathered new ſtrength, and her averſion for Horatius encreaſed ſo much, that ſhe knew not how to obey Clelius, and if a reſentment of glory had not reſiſted her deſigns, ſhe would have done things that ſhe had never yet done: on the other ſide, Sulpicia who was horribly perplex'd to think her Daughter ſhould eſpouſe Horatius, ſought all means to hinder theſe Nuptials, but after ſhe had well conſidered on it, ſhe believed that as he was generous, it might happen that if Clelia ſhould tell him freely that ſhe could not affect him, and that ſhe ſhould intreat him not to thiuk on her, he might reſolve himſelf thereto; ſo that telling her thoughts to Clelia, and Clelia thinking nothing difficult to do, ſo that it might conduce to the rupture of her marriage, told her Mother that ſhe would fulfil her deſires, and Sulpicia by a reſentment of her former jealouſie, aſſuming more boldneſs at this time than ſhe ſhould have done at another, told her Daughter that ſhe ſhould the better to accompliſh her deſign, write a Note to Horatius, to be at a certain hour which ſhe ſhould appoint him, in that Garden which as I have told you is common for all, there to acquaint him of an important buſineſs: Sulpicia adding that ſhe ſhould tell him, that it was without the knowledge of any that ſhe writ to him, becauſe Horatius ſhould not imagine that it was by her inſtigation that ſhe did this, at firſt Clelia told her Mother that ſhe thought it would be as well to ſpeak to him in her Chamber when he

he ſhould come to ſee her, but Sulpicia told her it would be more eaſie to diſcourſe with him privately in a Walk, then in her houſe; adding withal, that Horatius would be better perſwaded ſhe had no inclination to love him, by this extraordinary action, as was this of giving him an aſſignation.

So that Clelia obeying her willingly, writ a Note to Horatius, and gave it unto a ſlave, to deliver it him, and as ſhe concealed it as a great ſecret, told him ſoftly, that he ſhould carry it to Horatius: but as this ſlave had formerly carried divers to Aronces, and never but one to Horatius, he thought ſhe had ſaid Aronces, and withal not knowing how to read, he knew not that it was directed to Horatius, and truſting to what he thought to have underſtood, he delivered it to Aronces, who had at firſt (ſeeing this ſlave with a Letter) an extreme joy, but when he read it, and that he knew it was directed to Horatius, and not to him, it cauſed in him an extreme dolour, nevertheleſs, as he knew the ſlave was miſtaken, he made no ſign to perceive it, and only told him he ſhould not fail to do what Clelia ordained him, but this ſlave was no ſooner gone, but Aronces came to my Chamber, to ſhew me this Note, in which were only contained theſe words.

Clelia to Horatius.

PRay do me the Favour to meet me preciſely about the Evening, in the great Walk of the Myrtles, for I have ſomething of great concernment to communicate to you, and withal a great favour to demand of you.

Well Celeres ſaid Aronces to me (after I had read this Billet) what ſay you of my fortune? and what counſel you me to do?

I counſel you to go to the aſſigned place as if you were Horatius, and with an intention to make Clelia a thouſand reproaches, and if you can to make her change her thoughts, or elſe to change your own, if ſhe alters not hers: this counſel is eaſier to give then to follow (replied he) at leaſt as not to love Clelia; as for going to the place ſhe has appointed to ſpeak with Horatius, I am already reſolved, but that which terrifies me is, that I know not what ſhe would have with my Rival, I likewiſe fear, added he, that the ſlave which brought me the Note, will acquaint her with his miſtake, when he ſhall tell her that I will not fail to meet her at the appointed place.

But ſaid I to him you have not writ to her: no, replied he, and that which hindred me from it was, not impoſſible but that this ſlave in telling her that I ſhould do what ſhe deſired, might tell it her ſo, that ſhe ſhould find out the miſtake.

And (Madam) it happened according to their expectation, for it fell out ſo, that when this ſlave was returned home, there was a great deal of company in her Chamber, ſo that ſhe would not let him give her an account of his errand, for fear he ſhould be underſtood, but asked him aloud whether he had done what ſhe had ordained him? and he anſwering, yes, ſhe made him ſign to be gone, Clelia not doubting but that Horatius would come at the aſſigned place, thought on nothing elſe but to meet him.

Nevertheleſs, there happened a thing which had almoſt obſtructed her going, for Clelius would have had Sulpicia gone to a place where ſhe ſhould have been the whole afternoon, but Sulpicia who fervently deſired that the marriage between Horatius, and her Daughter ſhould be broken; did ſo well, that ſhe cauſed her Daughter to be with one of her Friends, whom ſhe knew did commonly walk in the place where Horatius was expected, and when ſhe left her, ſhe perſwaded her as much as poſſible ſhe could, to put Horatius into ſuch a deſpair, that he ſhould never hope to have her.

But whilſt things were thus favourable for Aronces, and ſo contrary for his Rival, this Lover who was ignorant of the agitations of Clelia's heart, was in a ſtrange perplexity, and in ſuch an inquietude as I cannot repreſent unto you, for his impatiency would not permit him to ſtay till the appointed hour, but he repaired thither long before Clelia came; for my part, as I had a great deſire to know what this interview would produce; I went alſo in the Garden, and walkt in an Alley from whence I might ſee thoſe which went into that place where Aronces was, where in fine, Clelia came with one of her Mothers Friends, with whom there was three other Ladies.

As ſoon as Clelia ſaw Aronces, her blood leapt into her face, 'tis not but that ſhe thought 'twas Fortune only which guided him thither, but that ſhe was perſwaded Horatius would come alſo, and that ſhe feared ſhe ſhould meet them together.

On the other ſide, Aronces who ſeeing the alteration of Clelia's countenance, and imagining that ſhe ſtaid there for his Rival, and that the commotion which he ſaw in her eyes proceeded from her deſpight to ſee him there, raiſed his grief to ſo high a pitch, that he reſolved to go either into another Alley, or elſe to make Clelia a thouſand reproaches: but in fine, his reaſon overpowering his paſſion, he became Maſter of himſelf, and he ſo dexterouſly diſguiſed his ſentiments, that the Ladies with whom Clelia was, could not perceive he had any particular deſign, for he ſaluted them very civilly, and without addreſſing himſelf to Clelia, he diſcourſed with the Conductreſs of the little Troop; ſo that according to the freeneſs which we enjoy at Capua, he fell in converſation with theſe Ladies, and ſometimes entertaining one, and then another, he at laſt ſpoke to Clelia, who was much ſurpriſed not to ſee Horatius, and that in all likelyhood Aronces was not to leave them very quickly, and there happened an occaſion which gave Aronces as much leiſure as he could deſire to entertain Clelia; for as this company came to a great rotundo of Trees, which divides this great Walk of the Myrtles, and the Ladies having ſeated themſelves, it happened that the places caſually were before almoſt all taken, ſo that there was no place left for Clelia, who ſeeing only a little Bench which was on the other ſide, where there could ſit but two, ſhe went thither, and Aronces took his place by her.

But when ſhe ſaw him approach, the fear which ſhe had that Horatius ſhould come, that he ſhould find her in a particular converſation with his Rival, and that it ſhould hinder her from perſwading him what ſhe deſired, cauſed her to ſpeak ſoftly to him; by your favour Aronces (ſaid ſhe to him) if it be true, that you have formerly had ſome friendſhip for me, I conjure you not to deſire any private diſcourſe with me to day, for ſince I durſt not recount unto you my life,

No, no, Madam, (ſaid he to her, looking attentively on her) it concerns you not ſo much as you think, for I aſſure you Horatius ſhall not come hither by your orders, and if fortune guide him not hither, I ſhall have leiſure humbly to intreat you to tell me, what I have done to merit your hatred, and what he hath done to gain your love, and from whence proceeds; that when you deny me the comfort of a laſt farewel, you writ him Notes, & gave him aſſignations in a place from whence you would have me be gone, becauſe you ſtay for him: but Madam, to deliver you from the unquietude which I cauſe in you; I muſt tell you that the ſlave which you ordered to deliver your Note to Horatius, did miſtake, for 'tis I which have received it; and I am come hither to conjure you to tell me, if I am worthy to know, that you had reſolved to tell Horatius: you may judge Madam, how Clelia was ſurpriſed when ſhe heard Aronces uſe theſe expreſſions; nevertheleſs, as her ſpirit was free from jealouſie, and that the love which ſhe had for Aronces was ſtronger then ever, and he lookt on her in ſuch a manner, which mollified her heart, that ſhe endeavoured not to diſguiſe the truth of that which ſhe perceived he knew, and ſhe was not very ſorry to make him underſtand that this aſſignation was not to be advantagious for Horatius. Alſo when Aronces had deſired her to tell him what ſhe intended to tell Horatius whom ſhe had ſtaid for: Aronces, ſaid ſhe, then to him, if you know what you demand, you would ſoon gain-ſay your ſelf, and you would deſire me not to tell you that which you ſeem to deſire of me.

Tell me at leaſt then anſwered he, what you would have me do; if it be true, anſwered ſhe, that you love me yet, I will have you reſolve your ſelf to love me no more but as a Siſter, and that you will be ſo equitable as not to accuſe me of your misfortune, ſince I am enough my ſelf, not to accuſe you of mine: But Madam, replied he, things are not alike between us, for I may juſtly accuſe you of all my misfortunes, but for my part, what is it that I do which may contribute to your unhappineſs? You are the cauſe, anſwered ſhe bluſhing, that I have a horrible repugnancy to obey my Father, you are he, which makes Horatius, who is a very deſerving perſon, altogether inſupportable to me, as ſoon as I conſider him as to be my Husband; and in fine, by all appearances, you are the cauſe that the reſt of my life will be miſerable: Ah Madam, by your favour, replied Aronces, permit me to give ſo advantagious a ſence to your words, that they may, if not make me happy, they may at leaſt render me leſs miſerable: I conſent thereunto Aronces, replied ſhe, but I alſo conjure you to tell me no more any thing: for as things ſtand now, I can no more innocently receive any particular mark of your affection, nor give you any of mine; you might nevertheleſs, Madam, if you pleaſe, acquaint me with that which you would have told Horatius; I would have told him, replied ſhe, ſo many things advantagious for you, that I ought not to tell it you, if I could effectually deſire you ſhould love me no more: for in fine, Aronces I would have ſeen Horatius, by the command of my Mother, to tell him freely I can never love him, and to endeavour by a reſentment of generoſity to induce him not to obſtinate himſelf to render me miſerable, ſince I can never render him perfectly happy: but to tell you the truth, I think I ſhall never perſwade him; you now ſee Aronces, added ſhe, the ſubject of this Aſſignation, for which you have reproached me. If it were permitted me, replied he, to give you thanks, and to require your pardon, I ſhould proſtrate my ſelf divine Clelia, at your Feet to teſtifie unto you my acknowledgement, and for to conjure you to tell me if you would hate me in caſe I ſhould diſobey Clelius, who will have me depart, and ſeek all means poſſible to forget you: I know not, replied Clelia, whether I ſhould hate you, but I know I ſhould live with you as if I lov'd you not. In effect, added this prudent Virgin, I ſhall do what I can, not to eſpouſe Horatius, but when neither by my prayers nor inventions I ſhall not prevail, there muſt be no more of any thing done, but to prepare never to ſee each other, for without any equivocation, I muſt tell you that though my Father ſhould not oblige you to be gone, I ſhould; 'tis therefore, that if the deſign which I have does not ſucceed, as I believe it will not, you muſt conform your will to my Fathers, becauſe you ſhould not neceſſitate me voluntarily to impoſe upon you a rigorous command.

As Clelia had ended theſe words, Horatius who heard by chance that ſhe was in that Garden, came thither, ſo that this fair Maid ſpying him afar off in an Alley which came into that where ſhe was, advertiz'd Aronces thereof, and deſired him to leave her alone, to the end ſhe might perform that which Sulpicia had enjoyned her to do: But Madam, replied he, who ſhall aſſure me that this converſation ſhall be ſuch as I deſire it to be; that which I have had with you, replied ſhe, going away; promiſe me at leaſt, replied he, that whatſoever happens you will ſtill have a little love for the miſerable Aronces; I promiſe it you not, replied ſhe, with an alteration in her colour, in caſting a favourable aſpect upon him, but I know not whether I ſhall not do it without promiſing you of it.

After that Clelia rejoyn'd the Ladies, with whom ſhe was, and after Aronces had ſaluted them, he went into another walk, without being perceived by Horatius, and came to me in that where I was walking: But it was with an extreme difficulty that he left his place to his Rival; but after all when he conſidered that ſhe ſpoke to him, only but to tell him that ſhe could not love him, and to pray him to think no more on her, he had an unſpeakable joy, though it was not accompanied with tranquillity, and having an extreme deſire to know the ſucceſs of this converſation, he deſired we ſhould walk in the Garden, till it was ended; becauſe if Horatius ſhould leave Clelia, he might know of her how his Rival had received what ſhe had told him: but Madam, it was eaſie to foreſee what would be the event of this buſineſs; for Horatius was very amorous, and he was perſwaded that notwithſtanding what Clelia had ſaid to him, ſhe would obey Clelius, who thought though he had not promiſed her would give her to him, and in effect though this amiable perſon employed all her ſubtleties and eloquence to perſwade Horatius, to baniſh her his thoughts, 'twas altogether impoſſible for her to do it, neither was it in Aronces his power to come any more to Clelia, for Horatius left her not, but went away with her.

In the mean time, as he could not reſolve himſelf to depart till he knew the ſucceſs of this diſcourſe, he engaged me to go and ſpeak to Clelia, who then knew knew that all Aronces ſecrets were known by me; ſo that leaving him behind, I went and mingled my ſelf with the Troop, where this fair Maid was, who was then going away; ſo that there being no other Men beſides Horatius with theſe Ladies, when they were to paſs a difficult place, by reaſon of a great heap of ſtones, which were laid to ſupport a Terraſe which was to be built there, he was obliged to preſent his hand to one of them which paſſed the firſt, hoping after he had done ſo to all, to lead Clelia: But making uſe of this occaſion to ſpeak to her, I led her over, and left her not till we were out of the Garden, and not for to looſe any of thoſe precious moments, I whiſpered to her, and told her, Madam, the miſerable Aronces ſends me to you to know whether he muſt live or die, you ſhall tell him (replied ſhe, with a moſt obliging ſadneſs) that I will not have him die, but that if he loves me, he ſhall ever be miſerable, and that he has nothing to do, but to depart from Capua as ſoon as he can; I was going to tell her that ſhe was too blame for not oppoſing her ſelf more ſtrongly to Clelius, but ſhe anſwered me with ſo much wiſdom, and in ſo tender a manner for my friend, that all I could do was but to admire her; it is true, that when we came to the Garden door, I was conſtrained to leave her, and Horatius likewiſe, ſo that we were alone together, and as he knew me to be Aronces particular Friend, his hatred did extend it ſelf almoſt as much to me as it did to him, and having exaſperated his ſpirit with that which Clelia had told him, we parted with ſmall demonſtrations of friendſhip; but as I was returning I found Clelius, who was entred in this Garden by another door, who had newly joyned himſelf with Aronces, whoſe departure he urged ſo ſtrongly, that he gave him but one day more to be in Capua, as I knew that Clelius could not tell him any agreeable thing, I made no great difficulty to interrupt them, but as I came near them, Aronces who had an extreme deſire to know what Clelia had told me, demanded it of me by my eyes.

So, that not having any favourable anſwer for him I made a ſign to him, whereby he might perceive his hopes were utterly deſtroyed, to the end he ſhould ſuddenly reſolve to be unhappy, and ſhould not feed himſelf with an uncertain and vain hope, which brought much confuſion in his ſpirit, for it ſeemed to him he had fallen to a leſs miſerable eſtate, if Clelia told him nothing advantagious this day; and I had no ſooner joyned my ſelf to them, but Clelius left Aronces, and went to find Stenius, Horatius his Friend, who expected him in another Alley. I will not tell you Madam, what Aronces ſaid to me after Clelius had left him, and that I had recounted to him the diſcourſe I had with Clelia, for it would give you much compaſſion, but that which made him quite deſpair was, that he muſt now reſolve to depart, if he had followed the tumultuous reſentments of his heart, he would not have left Capua till he had kill'd Horatius, but as he could not do it without offending both Clelius and Clelia, and without putting himſelf in a condition never to ſee his beloved Object, this conſideration more then juſtice bridled his fury, and though night began to vail the ſky with a ſable Mantle, Aronces could not reſolve to depart from this Garden, but ingaged me inſenſibly in ſuch tedious exaggerations of his miſhap, that it was more then half an hour ſince Cynthia guilded this Garden with her reſplendent Rays, which gave birth as it were to a new day; ſo that we hardly knew 'twas night, his diſpleaſure ſo much poſſeſſed him; but in fine, the exceſs of his own grief impoſing ſilence on him and me, becauſe I could tell him nothing which might comfort him.

We walkt ſometime without ſpeaking one word in a little Alley, along the ſide of an indifferent thick Wood, which is incloſed in that Garden, and it happened that Aronces going faſter than I, was ten or twelve paces diſtant from me, but as he went alone he heard on the other ſide of a Palliſſade, which was between him and that little wood, two Men who thinking themſelves to be alone in that place, ſpoke ſomewhat low, one of which raiſing his voice, addreſſing his ſpeech to the other; I know well (ſaid he to him in the Roman Language) what we have promiſed to Tarquin is unjuſt, but ſince 'tis promiſed we muſt obey, for in what place can we remain, if after we have aſſured him to bring the head of Clelius, we violate our words?

You may judge, Madam, what was the ſurpriſal of Aronces, when he heard theſe expreſſions from an unknown Man, and though Clelius had pronounced him the moſt rigorous ſentence imaginable, he did not look upon him in this occaſion as a Man which baniſht him, which eſloyned him from Clelia, and which rendred him moſt unhappy, but he conſidered him as the Father of his Miſtreſs, to whom he owed his Life, and attentively liſtening to hear the diſcourſes of theſe unknown Men, he heard, that he which had hearkned to him who had firſt ſpoke, anſwered him in theſe terms: I very well know (ſaid he to him) that Tarquin is the violenteſt Man in the World, that hating Clelius ſo much as to deſire his head, he would very much hate thoſe, who inſtead of bringing it to him, ſhould advertiſe him of the deſire he hath to deſtroy him; but it ſeems to me, not returning to Rome, 'tis eaſie to flye his fury, and the difficulty will be to know if Clelius is in eſtate to inrich us, if we prove what we may tell him; Ah too ſcrupulous friend! (haſtily replied he to whom he ſpoke) why do we thus trifle time? doth it not ſuffice that the Prince to whom we belong hath commanded us to kill one of his enemies, and that he hath promiſed us a great recompence, without expoſing our lives and fortunes to danger; by diſcovering it to Clelius, he will make, it may be, as though he believed it not, becauſe he would not recompence us, but will keep himſelf on his guard, and prevent us from executing our deſign? therefore without ſtumbling at theſe unprofitable intentions, let us only ſee if our Ponyards are ſharp enough to act to morrow the command of Tarquin.

Ah Villanous Wretch! (cryed Aronces, going on that ſide where the Aſſaſſinate was by an overture he accidentally found in the Palliſſade) I will fruſtrate your barbarous deſign, and you ſhall never Ponyard Clelius before you deprive me of my Life: Aronces pronounced theſe words ſo high, that it rouzed me from that Lethargick ſlumber in which my melancholly had buried me, and I went directly to him, whom I ſaw hold a Man which was ſtrugling to get from him; and that there was another who holding a Ponyard, told him that if he would not leave his companion, he would kill him; but that he had hardly the time to do it, for having ſuddenly ſeiſed his arm, and ſtaid his hand in which he held his Poniard, with which he menaced Aronces, I prevented him from acting his intention.

In

In the mean time Aronces having taken from the hands of him he held, the Poniard he drew, when he cast himself upon him, saw himself in estate to be Master of his Life; but as he thought 'twas important to discover to Clelius all he knew, he did not kill him, principally seeing that I held the others Arm, and knowing by that he had overheard, that him I held was the least impious, he believed 'twas easie to know by him all that which was requisite for Clelius to know; and Aronces seeing that I was without doubt strong enough to hinder this Man from using his Poniard, but that I was not able to take it from him, he threatned to kill him, and cried to him, if he would render it, he would recompence him magnificently for the good design he had to tell Clelius, but whilst he thus said, the other whom Aronces had disarm'd, watching his opportunity, drew a second Poniard he had, thinking to sheath it in his heart, but as Aronces saw it glister, by the reflexion of one of Cynthia's beams on it, he guarded himself and warded the blow with the other he held, and no longer sparing the life of that Traitor, he seised his right arm with his left hand, and gave him two blows with the Poniard, which made him fall half dead at his feet.

In the mean time, him which I held, endeavoured to disingage himself, but I held him so strongly that he could not finish his intent, but as soon as he saw his companion fall, he let go his Poniard that I took, and emplored the clemency of Aronces, whom he saw to interest himself so much in the life of Clelius, and the better to obtain it, he drew the other Poniard he had, and casting it at the feet of Aronces, I pray Sir, said he to him, since you heard what I said to my companion do not treat me as him; I promise it you replied Aronces, but you must discover to me all you know, and all which may assure the life of Clelius which I will defend as my own: As Aronces had thus spoke, Clelius and that Friend of Horatius, with whom he walkt, as I have told you, arrived in this place; so that they were very much surprised to find us in that estate, and to see a Man half dead at our feet, and another which seemed to demand pardon, and to see Aronces and I with each of us a Poniard in our hands, but the Father of Clelia was much more astonisht, when I first speaking, see Clelius said I to him, see what Aronces hath done to save your life: and if he merits death at your hands; for I had perfectly understood that it was for the interest of Clelius that he assaulted these two Men; Clelius being amazed at my words, could not tell what to answer, but Aronces drawing him from this astonishment, told him in two words, without any exaggeration what was newly happened, so that Clelius was so sensibly touch'd, to see in a moment after he had pronounced the sentence of his banishment, he had hazarded his life to assure his, that he could not hinder himself from testifying to him the admiration he had for his virtue, and without demanding any thing of that which concerned him: Ah Aronces cryed he, your generosity charms me, and Aricidia had reason to say, that if you were not a Roman, you had a Roman heart; therefore seeing I have not promised any thing to Horatius, I must leave Clelia to dispose of her self, without intermeddling with it; Aronces ravisht with joy to hear Clelius speak in this manner, rendred thanks to him in few words, whilst Stenius privately murmured at it, but after that Aronces telling him, that this place was not fit to entertain those Assassinates, and some Slaves of Clelius who sought their Master, being arriv'd, they gave order to carry this person to a Man's house which depended on me, to have his wounds dresst, and we brought the other to Clelius his house, who would have Aronces and I go thither; for Stenius he left us at the Gate, and went to advertise Horatius that his affairs were not so prosperous as he imagined; but arriving at Clelius his house, we met Sulpicia and her Daughter, who were much surprised to see us, and to hear Clelius say, he owed his life a second time to Aronces, and that he was the most generous of all Men, and these two persons easily giving credit to the words of Clelius, received Aronces with an extreme joy.

In the mean time, as he was impatient to know the contrivancy of that plot, the execution of which Aronces had hindred, they enclosed the Conspirator in a Chamber where we were going to interrogate him, when Herminius arriv'd, who told Clelius he had a business of great Importance to acquaint him with: But as Clelius told him, that he might now tell all he knew before Aronces and me, he shewed him a Letter he had received from Rome, where amongst many other things there were these words.

THe proud Tarquin is more diffident, cruel, and vindicative then ever, for he had no sooner known that Clelius was returned from Africa, and that he was at Capua, but he believed he approached Rome, to plot some conspiracy against him, and one of my intimate friends hath told, that he believes the Tyrant hath a design on his Life, at least I assure you, that few days have been added to the age of time, since two of those he uses to employ in such horrid executions, departed from Rome and having taken way of the company, if you think fit advertise Clelius to take care of himself.

After Clelius had read aloud this fragment of a Letter, and that Herminius had named him who wrote it, and told him that he was a Man well informed in all things, and that he had counselled him not to go forth but well accompanied: I am much obliged to you, said he to Herminius, for the advice you have given me, but I shall be infinitely more if you help me to set forth the praises of Aronces; for in fine, he hath nigh kill'd one of those of whom your friend speaks, and if you please, you may hear from the other the confession of his crime, and after we had recounted to Herminius in two words, that which was passed, we entred together into the Chamber where this Man was, from whose mouth we would know the cruel intentions of Tarquin, but to the end he should more ingenuously declare all he knew, Aronces confirmed to him the promise he had made him magnificently to reward the repentance he had had, and he effectively spoke with very much ingenuity; 'tis true, that which the more obliged him was, that Herminius knew he was heretofore one of his Father's slaves, and making himself known to him, what miserable wretch (said he to him) hast thou learnt this Trade thou practises in the house where thou wast brought up? No Sir (said he to him, but changing my Master I have changed my conditions, since 'tis true, that as long as I lived with a virtuous Master, no crime could be imputed to me, but as soon as your Illustrious Father had given me to a Man who is become Tarquin's Favorite, I degenerated to what you see: 'tis true said he, the remembrance of the beginning of my life hath stirred up much compunction in me, and him who promises to recompense me for my repentance, heard, I would perswade my complice of my crime not to commit it I remembred you, and imagined those reproaches you would make me, if you should know the life I led.

Sure it is so, (said Herminius) make an ingenious confession, and in effect this man told Clelius, that Tarquin had commanded him and his Companion not to return to Rome without bringing his head, and he assured him they had resolved to kill him the next day in that Garden, where Aronces had ore-heard their contestation, for they had known 'twas the custom of Clelius to go thither every night, and oftentimes alone.

This man likewise said that when Aronces heard them, some remorse invaded his Conscience for that barbarous action he was going to commit, but as his companion was the most resolute of all men, he was assured he would not have admitted of any perswasion but executed Tarquins command the subsequent day, though he should have done it alone: and he appeared so repentant for his crime, and demanded so many pardons for his fault, that Clelius effectually knowing by Aronces that he opposed his companions intentions, generously pardoned him and gave him a recompence sufficient to carry him to the wars without Tarquins power, but for the complice of his crime he used him in another manner, for he would not have his wounds dresst, and when by force there was plaisters put upon them he would tear them off, neither would he take any nourishment, and whatsoever could be said to him he would not answer neither Aronces nor Herminius, who interrogated him to see if he did not know more than the other: on the contrary, he used all the means he could possible to dash out his brains against a wall, and in the end died as an enraged man, to whom the regret not to have executed the crime he promised to commit, and the sight of an approaching death hurried on to such a furious action.

In the mean time Sulpicia not losing such a favourable occasion, told Clelius so many things to oblige him to acknowledge the vertue of Aronces, that in the end he was resolved to leave Clelia to a free election, since he had not yet promised her to Horatius, and that he had only given him hopes to obtain her, whilst these things were acting, that Lover which had believed to be happy, no sooner knew by Stenius the adventure of the Garden, but fearing it might make Clelius change his thoughts, he went at the same time to find him, but as Clelius would have some time to settle his resolution and thought, he had some tenderness and recognizance for Aronces, he had some difficulty to give his Daughter to an unknown, he carefully shunned Horatius this day, which happened to be the Eve of that day Clelia celebrated for her birth, for though she was not born at Rome, Clelius nevertheless made her observe all the Roman Ceremonies, therefore as her birth was the next day, he would have the Feast be more magnificent than usual, because it had been preceded by one in which he had shunned death, and he found that this day was not numbred amongst those dismal ones, carefully observed by the Romans, and not finding any unhappiness in this favourable day, Clelius would have it solemnly celebrated; Clelia on her part who knew the alteration of her Father's mind, and who had a little before thanked Aronces for saving his life, had an extreme joy to hope she should not espouse Horatius, Sulpicia was so glad that she thought of nothing, but magnificently to solemnize the Feast of her Daughters Nativity.

For this effect as it was a custom in such like occasions to offer an innocent Oblation to those Divinities the Romans call Genij, every person as they believe having a particular one: Clelius made an Altar to be adorned with Vervine and Flowers, in a Temple where the Romans residing at Capua perform their Ceremonies, and all the principal Ladies of the City being invited to accompany Clelia when she went to the Temple, where they came in their most Gorgeous Attire; for Clelia as it is the custom at Rome, as well for men as women, to be invested in white on their birth-day, she had a white Robe, but for to beautifie the simplicity of that Vestment, Sulpicia adorned her with those stones she had heretofore casually found, when that after she was shipwrackt she had been saved by a faithful Slave, and had again found Clelius, to whom the Gods had given a Son for him whom they had lost, and though the Habit of Clelius was not at all magnificent, it received a great imbellishment from them: for as in these occasions Ladies are not covered as usually they are, and that they are dresst like those which are married, she had part of her fair hairs hanging on her shoulders negligently curl'd, for the others they were pleated in many rings along her cheeks, and tyed on the hinder part of her head by a rose of precious stones the fairest were ever seen: Moreover, as her Neck was shadowed but with a thin Vail of Tiffany, it transmitted the lustre of her beauty through it, it was likewise enclosed with a Collar of Diamonds, her wast being surrounded with precious stones of an inestimable value, her sleeves of her Robe which were great and hanging down, were fastned on her shoulders by two knots of Diamonds.

In fine, her Habit was so gallant and rich, that Clelia in this posture could do no less than attract all eyes, she had such a pure tincture, such sparkling eyes, and such a charming and agreeable air in her looks, that I can assure you my eyes never met with a fairer Object.

Clelia being such as I have represented her to you, went afoot from her house to the Temple without any discommodity, for the streets by which she was to pass were large and very dry, and the Sun had stole behind a Cloud lest he should be outvi'd by the splendor of her eyes.

Moreover as it is the custom that those persons which celebrate their birthday, should offer an innocent Offering to the Gods, Clelia carryed in her fair hands a sumptuous Basket in which was her oblation, but this Sacrifice was so covered with Orange and Jasume Flowers, that it dispersed ore all places where she passed an odoriferous Odor; she went alone, her Father and her Mother followed her, all the Ladies of the City preceded her, going two by two, and all the friends of Clelius following him in in the first rank, whereof were Aronces and Horatius; but Madam, as Clelia's beauty was divulged through Capua, and this Ceremony being different from ours, and that novelty excited the curiosity of the people, the streets were thronged where Clelia should pass, as if there was to be seen enter one of our Captains Crown'd with a Triumphant Laurel, but Clelia seeing this concourse of people of all conditions, which looked from their windows, doors, and streets, only

ly to behold her, and hearing all the acclamations they gave her, was surprised with such a modesty, that it much heightned her beauty, for blushing at her own praises, her tincture appeared more resplendent, her eyes more lively and tempting, Aronces and Horatius this day so contemplated her beauty, that their love augmenting, their hatred encreased towards one another, they spoke nothing together whilst this Ceremony lasted: for as Horatius his hope was not quite extinct, because Clelius had not spoke to him in particular, and that Aronces would not destroy his, they both thought not to irritate Clelius by a new Combat, and though they were Rivals they assisted at this Ceremony as though they had been friends; it is true that it was not very strange they should master their thoughts in this occasion, for the admiration they had for Clelia, without doubt suspended a part of the hatred that was between them.

But in fine, Clelia went to the Temple to offer to the Gods the Offering she carried, and she put it with so good a grace on the Altar adorned with Garlands of Vervine and Flowers, that she seemed rather to be the Goddess to whom the Sacrifice was offered, than her which offered this oblation: I shall not, Madam, weary your patience by telling you all those Ceremonies which were performed in this occasion, for it is not for that intent I mention this Feast, but I shall acquaint you that amongst this great multitude of persons who looked upon and admired Clelia, I take notice that a man and woman who bore the characters of persons of quality, casually saw her as she came from her house, and I likewise noted when I was nigh them, that they beheld her with an extraordinary attention, that they whispered together, and when they saw Aronces they testified so much admiration, that they followed them as if they had been invited to the Feast, and fortune was so propitious to me, that I saw them once more in the Temple very attentive, sometimes looking on Clelia sometimes on Aronces, I likewise noted that this Lady whom I did not know, and who had a very good presence for a person of her age, passed by many others to come nigh Clelia when she was at her devotion, but I was astonished to see her more attentively to look upon the precious stones than Clelia, and it seemed to me she lookt with a more curious eye on that which was on the hinder part of her head where was the rose of Diamonds, and not to admire the beauty of her face; nevertheless thinking it was a curiosity usual with Ladies to look more upon that which adorns, than those which are adorned; I diverted my eyes otherways, and I looked upon Fenice, which except Clelia, was without doubt the fairest in that company.

But in fine, when Clelia had finished her prayers, and was going to place her self in that order in which she came, this man and Lady whom I did not know, and who had looked so much on Aronces and Clelia, approached to me, and demanded civilly who that beautiful Virgin was? and who was Aronces? whom they shewed me with their hands not knowing his name: For that admirable person, said I to them, she is called Clelia, and Daughter to an illustrious exiled Roman, but for him you shew me, all that I can say is, he is the most virtuous in the world, and he is called Aronces, for he doth not himself know his birth: what (cried this Lady changing colour) doth not he know his Parents? He is far from knowing it, answered I, since the Father of Clelia found him floating in a Cradle after he had been shipwrackt himself, and whose life he saved without knowing to whom this Child belonged, which he hath carefully nourished as his own.

By your favour (added this Stranger which was with this Lady) tell us on what Sea, and in what place this Child was found in a Cradle? It was nigh Syracusa, (repled I) if my memory deceive me not: At these words these two persons looked one upon another, shewing many marks of astonishment and joy on their countenances, and demanded of me if I did not know from whence Clelia had those stones which adorned her? so that telling them the same shipwrack which had taken a Son from Clelius, and which had given him Aronces, had likewise given him these stones.

We need not doubt (said this Lady somewhat low to him which was with her) but Aronces is the same we imagine him to be: What! (said I to her transported with joy,) do you know the birth of Aronces I pray (added I looking upon them both) if it is so, tell it the dearest of his friends: for as I cannot doubt that he should not be worthy of his great heart, I make no difficulty to demand it of you: That which you demand (replyed this Stranger) is of so great consequence, that Aronces ought first to be acquainted with it, but lest we should commit an indiscreet action, I intreat you to tell us all you know how he was saved?

And as I had often heard Clelius tell it, I told him the day of this shipwrack, the place where it hapned, and I described to him the Cradle in which Aronces was found, for Clelius had shewed it me, when we found him in the Pyrates Vessel, I told him likewise that a Casket full of stones then came into his power, and in fine, all I knew of this adventure, giving many praises to Aronces, which evidencing to him that I effectually was his particular friend, obliged him to speak more freely before me, ah Martia! (said he to this Lady, who as you know is his Wife) I do not doubt but Aronces is the child we lost, for the day of his shipwrack agrees with that when we thought we should perish, the place where it hapned is the same; the Cradle in which Aronces was found is like it, the stones we see Clelia have are those we had in our power, but that which clears all suspicion is, that Aronces is the very Picture of the Father of that Child we lost, so that we must necessarily conclude he must be his Son.

I confess Madam, the discourse of that man (who is the same Nicius now in this Castle) much perplexed me: for in the beginning when he spoke to Martia, and told her that Aronces was assuredly the Child they had lost, I believed he was their Son, but when he said he was his Fathers Image, that belief soon vanisht, when I perceived he did not resemble him which spoke; so that dying with desire to be satisfied in that I would know, I pressed Nicius and Martia to tell me who Aronces was? but they answered 'twas first to him they must disclose this secret, and they earnestly prayed me to bring him to the sight of them, and without deferring the time any longer, I knew the place where they lodged, and I promised them to bring Aronces thither before the day was past.

And I presently went to Clelius his house to rejoyn my self with that fair company I had left; for 'tis the custom at Rome that the day that one celebrates for their birth, there is prepared a feast to entertain thoſe friends which are invited to accompany them at this Ceremony, ſo that finding the Tables covered and the company ready to ſit down, I at firſt believed that I ought to attend the end of this repaſt, before I told to Aronces that I knew, but this great ſecret ſeems to me ſo difficult to keep, that I could not reſolve my ſelf thereto, and drawing Aronces handſomly apart, Can you believe, (ſaid I to him) that Clelia's Birth-day is that which is deſtin'd for the diſcovery of yours, and before night you ſhall know who you are? No Celeres, ſaid he to me, I do not believe it, for by what ſtrange adventure can I know it? As I ſaw he gave no credit to my words, I ſpoke to him more ſeriouſly, and in few words recounted to him that which had happened to me, ſo that diſpelling that doubt, I ſaw in his face different motions, at firſt I ſaw joy, a little after I noted inquietude and fear, and a moment after impatience to know that he feared to learn, nevertheleſs the greatneſs of his Spirit reaſſuring him, and that which I told him of thoſe ſtones, giving him ſome certainty that he muſt be of illuſtrious birth, he remitted himſelf ſo well, that as he would not now depart without cauſing ſome diſorder, he reſolved to expect the end of this repaſt to content his curioſity, and in effect it was executed as he had reſolved, for as ſoon as the Tables were uncovered we ſtole from the company, and went to find Nicius and Martia, who expected us with an impatience, which could not be equalled but by that of Aronces, he ſtayed two or three times going to find them, for though he believed he ſhould not fear any thing which might trouble him, the love for Clelia made him fear, that his Parentage would not be worthy of her: but in the end, being arrived to the Lodging where Nicius and Martia were, they met us with the greateſt demonſtration of joy in the world, for the more they looked upon Aronces the more they ſaw him reſemble the King Porſenna, but that which redoubled their ſatisfaction was, that when he began to ſpeak they found he had the ſound of his voice ſo like to the Queen Galerita his Mother, that they could not doubt but he was the ſame Child which was committed to their charge, whom they had loſt by a ſhipwrack. In the mean time, Aronces no ſooner ſaw them, but he thus ſaid to them, after what my dear friend hath told, I know not what I ought to ſay to you, knowing not who I am, neither do I know whether I ought to wiſh to know it; Nevertheleſs as the incertainty in which I have lived is the cruelſt torment imaginable, tell me I entreat you who I am, though you tell me my heart ſoars higher than my birth, and do not fear if it pleaſe you to reveal this ſecret in the preſence of him to whom you have ſpoken of me, for all my ſecrets are his, and you cannot tell me any thing in particular which reflects on me, but I ſhall tell it him a little after: Since 'tis ſo, ſaid Nicius, I have two favours to demand of you before I tell you any thing, the firſt that you permit me to look upon your left hand, the ſecond that I will ſhew thoſe two knots of Diamonds to Martia, we have ſeen that beautiful Virgin wear, which is the cauſe of your diſcovery, ſince if ſhe had not been adorned with thoſe Jewels, to give us the curioſity to look more attentively on this Ceremony, we had not, it may be, ſeen you: for in fine, if you are he I wiſh you are, you have on your left hand a little black mole, like to one we believe to be on your Mothers face, and which becomes her admirable well: and if thoſe ſtones we ſaw are thoſe we imagine, there is two Portraits in the two knots of Diamonds, that I pray you to ſhew my wife. For the mole whereof you ſpeak, (replied Aronces ſhewing him his hand) you may ſee it's ſuch as you tell me it ſhould be, but for the two knots of Diamonds you would have me ſhew you, I have ſometimes handled them, and I did not perceive they opened, neither that they had Portraits incloſed in them: If they are thoſe we think, replyed Martia, you may handle them an hundred times before you can perceive they open. But in fine, added ſhe, that which I ſay is not ſo neceſſary to know, and after I have preciſely known the day of your ſhipwrack, and what manner of Cradle in which you were found, and after I had ſeen you and heard you ſpeak, and have found in your hand the mole which ought to be there, and ſeen the Jewels of Clelia, there is no queſtion to be made but you are the Son of the King Porſenna, and the Queen Galerita, and him which hath put Nicius and I to the expence of ſo many tears: Yes Sir, added Nicius, you are aſſuredly the Son of a great Prince and Princeſs, and would to the Gods you were more happy than they.

Aronces hearing Nicius and Martia ſpeak in this manner, was ſo ſurpriſed at it that his aſtoniſhment appeared in his eyes, but it appeared there without cauſing any tranſportment of exceſſive joy in his heart and I may very well ſay that never any perſon gave ſuch an illuſtrious mark of moderation. In effect, the firſt motion which came into his ſpirit, was, to give me a new demonſtration of his friendſhip: For 'tis true, as ſoon as Nicius and Martia had related to him his birth, he beheld me with an obliging eye, in which there appeared without the confirmation of any words, that he was glad to ſee himſelf in eſtate to requite my affection by effectual courteſies. In the mean time, he learnt to Nicius and Martia all that I had already told them, and they learnt to him all that I have recounted to you in the beginning of this Hiſtory; that is to ſay, the War of the precedent King of Cluſium with Mezentius Prince of Perugia, the impriſonment of Porſenna, his love for Galerita, by what means he had been delivered, his marriage, the death of Nicetale, the ſecond impriſonment of Porſenna and Galerita, his birth, the manner how he had been conveyed from the Willow Iſland to put him in their hands, their flight, their embarquement, their Shipwrack, and the reſolution they had taken to go to Syracuſa, and not to declare to Porſenna's friends, that the child was truſted to them, had periſht, not becauſe they did not poſitively know he was dead, but becauſe they durſt not tell it, for fear it ſhould abate the hearts of the friends of Porſenna and Galerita, but though, is it poſſible, ſaid I then to Nicius and Martia, that the child of Porſenna and Galerita hath not appeared ſo long; and how could it be concealed ſo many years, that they did not know where he was? The thing hath been very eaſie, replyed Nicius, for you muſt know that having a year very carefully concealed the loſs of this young Prince, the friends of Porſenna making a ſecret League, reſolved that they muſt have this Child in their hands to endeavour to excite an inſurrection among the people, ſo that one amongſt them knowing where we were, came thither, and as we muſt neceſſarily confeſs our ſhipwrack to him, and as 'tis natural to flatter our ſelves with hope, and to diminiſh as much as we could the misfortunes of others, we told to this friend of Porſenna, that this Child would would be one day, it may be found, and that there had so many escaped ship-wrack, that it may be this child should be escaped as well as the others; whether it should be so or no, replied he, to whom we spoke, we must not publish his death, if it were not for no other reason, then not to give joy to the enemies of Porsenna, and grief to his friends, and conforming our selves to his will, published it not, and since that, have always said that Porsenna's Son was not dead, and to endeavour to excite the people to Rebellion, we spread a bruit that Mezentius had taken him from us by force, and that he kept him prisoner as well as his Father.

In the mean time, as we durst not return into our Countrey, because of the Perusian Prince, we always remained at Syracusa; but as Martia had a long and grievous sickness, from which she hardly recovered, we agreed to leave Sicily for some time, and to choose a more healthful Air, and finding no place more agreeable then Capua, we came hither, and we came hither without doubt conducted by the gods, for to find you here, since that in the state in which things are, your presence is wholly necessary to save the life of the King your Father, for Mezentius is more incensed then ever; Bianor hath always love and ambition, the Princess of Perusia his Sister, doth all she can that he may obtain his ends, and Mezentius despairing to have other Children then Galerita, seems resolved to put to death Porsenna; to the end to enforce this Princess to re-marry with Bianor, for though she is your Mother, she hath not compleated above thirty six years, and is yet as I have heard, one of the fairest persons in the World; You may judge Madam, with what attention Aronces hearkned to the discourse of Nicius, and how many different thoughts possessed his heart, for he was glad to know he was a King's Son, he was afflicted to learn in what a deplorable estate the Prince was to whom he owed his Life, the certainty of not being a Roman gave him some inquietude, because of Clelius, the thought that he could not espouse Clelia without doing something contrary to exact prudence, gave him displeasure, and his soul was strangely agitated, but at last got the Victory. In the mean time, as there lackt the shewing of the two knots of Diamonds, to finish the discovery of Porsenna's Son, though it was not necessary; Aronces after he had said a thousand obliging things to Nicius and Martia, and after he had recounted to them the obligations he had to Clelius, and a part of that which was happened to him, except his love for Clelia, he left them to return to Clelius his house; but returning thither we met Herminius, who came from thence, and who told us that it was accounted a very strange thing we should so suddenly leave them, adding that a part of the company was already gone: In effect, when we entred Clelia's house, there was but four or five of her friends with her, who walkt together in her Father's Garden, for we went so timely to the lodging of Nicius, that it was not so late when we came from thence, but we might walk without any incommodity, so that Clelia no sooner saw Aronces, but she made war to him for leaving her when she celebrated her Birth-day. If you knew what obliged me to do it, (replied he to her) I am assured you will not murmure against me; it may be (replied she to him) and shall not accuse you of it, but you cannot hinder me from complaining of you: that which you say is so glorious for me (replied he) that if I should have gained nothing by leaving you, I ought to be consolated for leaving you: But in fine, Madam, (said he to her, separating her five or six paces from the company) I must tell you that which hath obliged me to leave you, and that you know I have not done it, but to cease to be that unknown Aronces, without Name and Countrey, who hath sometimes been so cruelly treated by Clelius for that reason. What Aronces! (replied she blushing) do you know your Birth? Yes Madam, (said he to her) I know it with some joy; though I am not a Roman, because that as Son to the greatest King of all Etruria, I can pretend with more boldness to the possession of the perfectest person in the World: permit me then I conjure you, that now I know my self to be the Son of the King of Clusium, whom Mezentius detains Prisoner, I offer a second time to you my heart, and that I assure you when I shall be peaceable possessor of an Estate, that my Grandfather hath nigh intirely usurped, I'le lay my Crown at your feet, and without leaving those chains you have given me, I will boldly publish, it would be more glorious to be your Slave then to be King o're many Realms, and because I see, added he, that which I tell you ought to surprise you, and that I perceive you are surprised: I shall not tell the whole narration of my story, but leave it to Celeres to acquaint you with it, whilst I shall go to seek Clelius, to the end, to learn him my adventure, and to conjure him to suffer those knots of Diamonds you wear to be seen by those who have learnt me my birth, and likewise to entreat him to prefer me before Horatius.

Clelia was so surprised to hear that which Aronces said, that she knew not what to answer him, 'tis not that she suspected the truth of it; but the thing was so surprising, that she could not imagine it to be possible, though she did not doubt of it: she therefore answered him as a person infinitely prudent, for without affording him so much time as to think she doubted of what he said, she gave him cause to make known all the particulars of his adventure; and Aronces going to seek Clelius, who was in his house; I remained in this Garden, and whilst the friends of Clelia, either entertained themselves together, or with Sulpicia who then came thither, I told her in few words all that Nicius and Martia had told Aronces, and I gave her a most sensible joy, to know that her Lover was of such an Illustrious birth, I saw in her eyes that she feared this greatness would be an obstacle to her felicity, but she did not tell it me. In the mean time Aronces went where Clelius was, and telling him he had an important business to communicate to him, he entred into his Cabinet, where he told him all he knew, but he told it him with the same respect, he accustomed to have when he knew not his birth, and Clelius having consented to his desire, I returned to find Nicius and Martia, from whose mouths the Father of Clelia learnt all they had told us; and to confirm that which they said, those two knots of Diamonds being shewed him, they demanded to see, they opened them, and in one there was a Portraict of a very beautiful person; and in the other a Portraict of a very handsome Man, who so much resembled Aronces, that one could hardly think but this Picture was made for him, and Nicius seeing our astonishment, told us that the Portraict which resembled Aronces, was the King his Father's, and that the Picture of that fair Woman was the Queen his Mothers, and that those Portraicts were made a little after Porsenna's first Imprisonment, and since his marriage they remained in the hands of Galerita, and that this Princess having desired to gain all her Jewels to her Son, and thought not in the trouble where she was then, to take those two Portraicts from those two knots of Diamonds, which were made with such Artifice, that one would not perceive they opened, at least not to know the secret to open them: and Clelius seeing all these circumstances concur together, could not harbour any sinister thoughts of the truth of what Nicius and Martia had declared unto him, it appearing by so many indubitable conjectures, so that Clelius now looking on Aronces as the Son of a great King, would have used more civility towards him then ordinary, but Aronces opposed it, and told him with much generosity, that his birth should not change those obligations he had to him, neither should it change his heart, nor any thing between them; In pursuit of which Nicius and Martia said, that 'twas not yet time to publish the birth of Aronces, and that this great secret must be concealed some time, but the principal business was to think of saving the King his Father's life, and to hinder Adezemius, as I have told you, from forcing his Daughter to marry Bianor, adding that it was necessary they should speedily go to advertise the friends of Porsenna and Galerita, that the Prince their Son was living, and that he should a little after follow them, to the end, to advertise with you what is best to be done. Nicius exaggerated with so much eloquence, the danger in which the King of Clusium was, that Clelius joyn'd himself to him, to perswade Aronces to come speedily to Perusia. In the mean time, as he had a passion in his Soul, which would not agree with this Voyage, though he had resolved to take it, and said he would, it was easie to see that he had something in his heart which contradicted his words: But in fine, Madam, without tyring your attention with any trivial relations; I shall tell you Sulpicia was admitted to this secret, and Clelius and she forced Nicius and Martia to leave their lodging, and to lodge in their house, where they staid but two days, for they had so much impatience to carry this agreeable news they knew to the friends of Porsenna and Galerita, that they would not defer it longer; but before they went they told Aronces the place where he might hear of them when he came to Perusia, I shall not tell you, Madam, what were the discourses of Aronces and Clelia those two days, for it's easie to imagine they contained much delight; but when Nicius and Martia were departed, and that Aronces saw both Honour and Nature would have him go: he felt in his heart an inexpressible emotion, and he told me in fine, after a long agitation of spirit, that if Clelius would not give him Clelia, he would not go till he had forced Horatius from Capua, as well as he, 'tis not, said he to me, but I know that I do not follow the direct course of reason, by thinking to espouse Clelia now I know I am Son to a Prince, to whom I owe so much respect as not to marry without his permission; but Celeres, it is Aronces which is amorous of Clelia, it is Aronces which ardently wishes her possession, it is Aronces which cannot suffer his Rival to enjoy her, and it is not the Son of the King of Clusium who hath this diversity of thoughts. In effect, I shall not pass for such, but when I shall have saved his life, and if this beatitude happens to me, it will be easie for him to seal my pardon, for having a passion in my Soul which is unknown to him, and to have loved more then all the rest of the World, the most amiable person of the earth.

I must likewise see if Clelius is in the resolution to leave Clelia the liberty to dispose of her self; for if he is so, I dare hope she will prefer me before Horatius, and that I shall not go to Perusia, till after I have rendred my Rival unhappy; but Madam, whilst Aronces thus reasoned, Horatius who saw a great change in his fortune, since Clelius owed his Life to Aronces, went to find that Illustrious Roman, for to demand of him if he would change the hope he had given him, to give him Clelia for an effective fruition; but as Horatius hath a heart sensible and fierce, and that he was nigh assured he demanded a thing he should not obtain; spoke to Clelius in a manner which incensed him, and seeing the difference there was between the proceedings of Aronces and Horatius, it was the cause that he answered less favourably to the last.

I know well, said Clelius to him, after this Lover had alledged all the reasons he could imagine, that I have given you hope to obtain my Daughter, but I likewise know I never promised you her, and that the least I can do after the last obligation, I have to your Rival, is no more to force Clelia to espouse you, and to leave her the liberty to choose between Aronces and you, and not to be unjust towards her by being favourable to you: I thought, fiercely replied Horatius, that though 'tis long since you resided at Rome, that you had not forgot that the Romans never used to give their Daughters to their slaves, and that Aronces might never pretend to Clelia with your consent. Ah Horatius interrupted Clelius, Aronces is not a slave, and you and I should have yet been the Pyrates slaves, if he had not delivered us by his valour. You are now more acknowledging, replied he coldly; you are now more ingrateful, replied Clelius, and I cannot comprehend what obliges you so ill to requite the obligations you have to me, for so ill treating Aronces for the love of you; you treat him so well now, replied he, that I should think my thanks ill bestowed, if I should thank you in a time when you think to render him happy, and me miserable, but Clelius, fortune, it may be, will revenge me on your Injustice, and you will one of these days know that you have given Clelia to the Son of some Roman Enemy, and it may be likewise to some miserable stranger, without Birth and Virtue: yet once more Horatius, replied Clelius, speak not of Aronces as you do, if you will not have me tell you, you degenerate from a Roman.

I should too much, Madam, trespass on your patience, if I should relate to you all the discourse of these two Men, and it suffices that you know they separated ill satisfied one with another: and this conversation made Clelius resolve not to give his Daughter to Horatius, though he should not give her to Aronces, as in effect, he did not believe Aronces ought now to espouse her, though he spake to Horatius as if he believed it; but he soon changed those thoughts: for after that Aronces had had conference with Sulpicia, and that some passionate expressions had passed between him and Clelia, he went to find Clelius, to conjure him to give him his Daughter, and to let him espouse her before his departure, but he spoke to him in the presence of his Wife; at first Clelius told him that he had too far extended his his generosity, and though he had resolved to give him Clelia when he last saved his life, he believed to be obliged, now he knew him to be a King's Son, not to give her to him; 'tis not, said he, but Clelia is of an illustrious blood, sufficient to enter in alliance with all the Princes in the World, but since you have a Father, I ought not to give you my Daughter without his consent; you must then let me kill Horatius, replied Aronces with precipitation, for I declare to you I cannot depart without doing that, if you give her not to me, therefore if you will not let me dye my hands in the blood of a Man which hath been my friend before he was my Rival, and let me renounce all sentences of Nature and Honour, give me Clelia I earnestly intreat you, for if you do it not, I shall be criminal towards all the World. I shall be unworthy of my birth, and that goodness you have had, and have yet for me, Horatius shall have reason to hate me, and Clelia even shall have, it may be, cause to despise me; commiserate therefore an unhappy Lover, who feels Virtue will forsake him if you do not satisfie his love, and think after that as Nicius hath recounted to you of the life of the King my Father, and since he believed not to have done an unworthy action by engaging himself to espouse Galerita, when he was the Prince of Perusia's Prisoner, who was the King of Clusium's Enemy: think I say, that if I am so happy as to deliver him, he will not easily pardon me, for having espoused a Virgin which possessed my heart before I knew I was his Son.

In fine, without deferring any longer, to tell you the good hap of Aronces, Clelius who had his spirit irritated against Horatius, resolved to render him happy: 'tis true, that Sulpicia who had an extreme joy to see things in this estate, was she which finished them, for she handsomely told Clelius, that if Aronces espoused their Daughter, it would be the means to see himself one day in power to give a redoubtable injury to Tarquin, so that this puissant reason for the interest of revenge, having fortified all those of Aronces, he consented he should espouse Clelia before his departure: but to the end it should be privately done, he was resolved that the Nuptials should be kept at an house of pleasure I had nigh the River Vulturnus, about half a days journey from Capua, and as 'twas necessary for Aronces speedily to depart, and that Clelius was glad that this Marriage should be made before Horatius knew of it, he was resolved it should be solemnized but with a small number of persons, and this Voyage should be pretexted with a simple design to injoy the pleasures of the Countrey; and in effect, there was at this little feast but three or four of Clelia's friends, and Herminius and two others who knew of it, and who were invited to the Nuptials.

I shall not stay my self, Madam, to tell you the satisfaction of Aronces, nor to recount unto you in what terms he expressed it, for it would be needless, but I shall only tell you, that this little Troop whom joy conducted, went where these Nuptials were to be kept, they were no sooner there, but the River Vulturnus over-flowed its banks, as you have known without doubt, and made such a strange disorder, that they must necessarily stay till this inundation was passed before they could make a Feast. After this, Madam, I shall not exaggerate to you the terriblest adventure in the World, by recounting exactly how the morning after this inundation was passed (which was the day which should have preceded the Nuptials of Aronces and Clelia) there was a terrible Earthquake, for you are not ignorant of the effects of it, since 'twas known further then Sicily, and by consequence further then Perusia, but shall only acquaint you, that this terrible day where the winds, flames, and burning stones, made such an horrible disorder; during this Earthquake, was an unhappy day for Aronces, since he was separated from Clelia by a whirl-wind of scorching flames, just as he perceived his Rival, that a little before he believed to have been at Capua.

But in fine, Madam, to conclude his mishap, Fortune cast Clelia in the Arms of his Rival, he not knowing who had brought Horatius in that place, or how Clelia came into his power, and all that which I know is, that Aronces saw her no more, but when this great disorder was passed, he believed that she was dead, that he returned to Capua with those which escaped so great a danger, and I did not so much afflict my self for the loss of my house, as for the grief of my friend whom I followed to Capua, where he soon knew that Horatius was not there, and that Stenius had received a Letter from him, and in pursuit he went to find him to indeavour to discover if he knew nothing of Clelia, that he refused to tell him, that Aronces forced him to fight, that he vanquisht him, that he took from him the Letter he had received from Horatius, by which he knew he had Clelia in his hands, and that he carried her to Perusia; so that seeing his Love, his Honour, and Nature commanded him to go thither, he resolved with Clelius that he would depart, which he did, for Herminius as he had some affairs which induced him to leave Italy; Aronces and I gave him Letters for Amilcar, and I would not desert my friend, but leave Venice, of whom I was not too much satisfied, and of whom I was but a little amorous.

But after that, Madam, imagine what was the grief of Aronces, when he saw upon the Lake Clelia in a Barque which Horatius defended, and what was his astonishment to see in the other the Prince of Numidia, whom he did not believe to be his Rival; imagine, I say, his grief to see he could not go to assault Clelia's Ravisher, and succour him which assailed him; imagine the deplorable Estate wherein he was, when he knew by a Slave, that they would assassinate the Prince of Perusia, whose death would have delivered the King his Father, and the Queen his Mother: and in fine, imagine the miserable condition in which he now is; for Madam, Aronces knows not where Clelia is, he knows she is in the power of his Rival, and he hath found one in the person of his dearest friends.

The life of Porsenna is in danger; Galerita is still a Prisoner; Mezentius saith, she shall never depart from Prison if she will not re-marry: there is danger to hazard to make Aronces known to the Prince of Perusia for Porsenna's Son, he is at present incapable to act because of his wounds; Sextilia always favours her Brother Bianor: Tiberinus who is now Mezentius his Favorite, hath more then one Interest to induce him to desire the loss of Porsenna, and to oppose the discovery of Aronces, and though he hath saved the Perusian Princes life, his without doubt would be in great danger, if he was known to be Porsenna's Son, and what ought he to hope if he is not so? Madam, Aronces is every way unhappy for Honour, Nature, and Love assault him with most rigorous thoughts, when that fortune mingles it self to make continual combates in the heart of a Lover, therefore I dare hope, Madam, that being sensible of the mishaps of so generous a Prince, you'l render to him all the Offices which are in your power.

Doubt not of it (replied the Princes of the Leontines) seeing Celeres had finisht his Narration) for I am so touched with his misfortunes that I shall forget nothing that lies in my power, to testifie to him that I have a true compassion, therefore I conjure you to pray him to inform what I shall do or say, for though I have an inveterate hatred against Tiberinus, I will constrain my thoughts in this occasion, and indeavour to put him in his interest, though as things are it will be a difficult enterprise; you have so much address and so many charms, replied Aurelia, that we must despair of nothing; you are so generous, added Syca[illegible], that we ought to expect from you all things in such an encounter.

In truth, replied she, I merit no great praise to be capable to have compassion for another's misfortunes: for you so sympathize in mine, and have thereby brought me so much consolation, that I should be armed with cruelty, if I should but seem to refuse mine to an Illustrious unhappy person.

After that, Celeres seeing it was late, rose up and went to Aronces, with whom he found Nicias and Martia, who assured him the next day, the principal friends of Porsenna would come to the Castle where he was, to the end to consult what was expedient to be done in such an important conjecture.

CLELIA.

BOOK. II.

LOve being the most predominant Passion in the heart of Aronces, it prompted him to be a most assiduous visiter of Clelia, and finding her interest to be the only square of all his actions, it may very well be said, That she was the only object of his mind, and that his thoughts ran wholly upon her, and nothing else besides. The Prince of Numidia as well as he, was wholly taken up with thinking upon the most admired Clelia, and he did most passionately wish for a sight of Aronces, that he might cheer up himself a little with some amorous discourses. As for the Princess of the Leontines, she had so many various discourses with her self, that had she not been of an infinite generosity, she would not have spared so much time as she did to think upon the miseries of Aronces, Celeres for his particular, his heart being not then infested with any violent passion, and being composed more of friendship than Love, his whole thoughts were how to cheer up the wretched Aronces, so as complying with Silanus, Aurelia, Nicius and Martia, whose minds ran all upon the same business, all of them were wholly busied in discanting upon the present condition and state of the matter.

But at last the expected friends of Porsenna being arrived, Sicanus presented them unto Aronces, as soon as Nicius and Martia had informed themselves in all such circumstances as made it evident that he was really the Son of Porsenna; so as then seriously considering the State of the business and falling into council about it, there grew a very great contest amongst them; some thought that the sooner the better, if Aronces were made known unto Mezentius, considering the services which he had done him: But Sycanus was of a contrary judgment, and said, that if they did so, they should too much put Aronces in danger: and that to go prudently to work they ought to tarry until the Prince of Perusia had some affection to him, grounded upon his merit; and also that it was requisite to keep close, they not being in a capacity to oppose Mezentius, in case he should prove unjust.

Others of the Company, arguing after another method, advised that Aronces should go into Clusium, there make himself known; add after he had there secured himself, then to send unto Mezentius, and let him know he was there, and demand of him the life and liberty of the King his Father. Aronces no sooner heard this advice, but he did utterly disgust it, because he conceived that by this way he should stand too much upon his own safety, and too much hazard the safety of Porsenna. Also being perswaded that Clelia was within the Dominions of the Perusian Prince, he had no genius to be far from thence: So as after a very serious consultation upon the matter, the result of their arguing was, that as soon as Aronces was recovered, he should go unto Perusia; that he should Court all occasions to win upon the affections of Mezentius and all his Court; that in the interim, he should make sure of all Porsenna's friends, and prepare them to unite themselves and take up Arms if need were: that they should hold intelligence with some in Clusium. That the Princess of the Leontines should use all her endeavours to engage Tiberinus in the service of Aronces upon all occasions that should present themselves: And in order thereunto she should be intreated to quit her melancholy way of life, and go into Perusia as soon as Aronces was in a capacity of going thither.

After the Session of this private consultation, all these friends unto Porsenna separated themselves, and each one in particular went about the execution of these resolutions, except Nicius and Martia, who sculked in the house of Sicanus until a fit time of shewing themselves useful in the service of Aronces. In the interim, this Prince was strangely perplexed that no tydings could be heard of Clelia; and the more, because the Prince of Numidia was also concern'd in it: But in spight of all these fretting inquietudes, which in probability might have retarded his recovery, yet recover he did, and that sooner than could be hoped. The Prince of Numidia also began to mend upon his first dressing, so as Celeres now seeing nothing which could hinder these two Rivals from seeing her, he began to be exceedingly perplexed; for he knew that the Prince of Numidia was ignorant that Aronces loved Clelia; and his heart longed to impart himself unto his friend: On the other side, he was sure that Aronces knowing how Adherbal and he adored one and the same Saint, Aronces would no longer continue a lover of Adherbal: He did apprehend some danger in acquainting the Prince of Numidia with the truth of this matter; and in trusting the secrets of one Rival unto another: Also he conceived that this confidence would be to no purpose, and that when Adherbal ſhould know both the quality and affection of Aronces, it would not at all alter the thoughts of Clelia: therefore the advice which he gave unto Aronces was, to diſſemble his thoughts from that Prince: For truly (ſaid Celeres to him) what will it concern you, though Adherbal do love Clelia, as long as he cannot come to the ſight of her, nor ſo much as know where ſhe is? Let him therefore be puling and telling you of his love to her: And to ſet him packing further off from you, give me leave to infuſe ſome falſe intelligence unto him concerning Clelia, to the end he may be wandring in queſt of her; and you be thereby rid of that vexation which his preſence cauſeth you. How's this Celeres (ſaid he to me) can you think I am able to endure Adherbal ſhould ever come and tell me that he loves Clelia? That he will do ſo for ever; and that he intends to ſeek her all the world over; that he will pull her out of the Arms of Horatius, and never yield her unto any? Would you have me Celeres, ſuffer you to part from me with falſe intelligence, and perhaps ſend him nearer unto Clelia; for ſince you know not where ſhe is, how can you tell but that you may direct him the way to find her. No, no, Celeres, (added he) I have other thoughts than theſe; and though ſometimes I would be contented withal my heart, never again to ſee the Prince of Numidia's face ſince he is my Rival; yet I would never have him out of my ſight, until I know where Clelia is. In the mean time, it goes againſt my ſoul to diſſemble with him, I neither know how I ſhould ſpeak to him, nor whether it be expedient to let him know my thoughts; therefore if you will, let us leave the matter at hazard; for when I do ſee him perhaps I ſhall not then be able to ſpeak what I now think I am able to do.

Truth is Madam, ſome two days after this diſcourſe, though the Prince of Numidia was much weaker and unable than Aronces, yet he gave him a viſit at his Chamber; and he came in ſuch a nick of time that he found Aronces alone, for I was then gone with the Princeſs of the Leontines and Aurelia. You may eaſily imagine how Aronces was ſurpriſed; yet for all that he received him very civilly, but did not anſwer the careſſes of the Numidian Prince with his uſual freeneſs; he began to thank him for the pains he had taken in coming to ſee him, but Adherbal obligingly interrupting him: No, no, (ſaid he unto him) my dear Aronces, you need not thank me for what I have done: but if you ſaw into my heart perhaps you would complain againſt me, for this viſit is not a viſit of bare friendſhip, ſince my love unto Clelia hath a ſhare in my affection to you, and I come as well to make you the confident of my Paſſion, as of my ſorrow for ſo much ſadneſs in your looks, both the laſt time you came to viſit me and now. Sir, (replied Aronces faintly) I am ſo far unfit to be the confident of your Love, that if you will be rul'd by me, you ſhall never make choice of me for it. And yet replied Adherbal, you are furniſhed with all the qualities requiſite in a moſt agreeable and faithful friend, for you flow in wit, ingenuity, and ſpirit, you have a moſt tender ſoul, you know Clelia as well as I do, you are her friend, and doubtleſs yet you love me, for ſince abſence hath not diminiſhed the leaſt ſpark of my affection to you, I will judge of you by my ſelf, and believe that your affection anſwers mine: That I may truſt you with the whole ſecrets of my ſoul, and diſcover all my infirmities unto you. 'Tis true Sir, (replied Aronces) that indeed I have a tender heart, and do know Clelia; but alas, (added he, out of his exceſs of love, ſincerity and jealouſie) it is not ſo true that I am her friend.

How, replied Adherbal, what alteration is this? How is it poſſible you ſhould ever hate that moſt tranſcendent perſon? Nay, nay, miſtake me not, (replied he) for I do love her in the ſame degree you do: Now judge whether or no I am fit to be your confident, and whether I could poſſibly give you a more heroick teſtimony of my friendſhip than this, in acquainting you with my love of Clelia. Oh Aronces, (cried out the Prince of Numidia) it is a moſt cruel teſtimony, for truly ſince I ſee that you do love Clelia, I need not ask any further why I am not loved my ſelf. Upon this Adherbal was ſilent, and ſo a while continued; in the mean while Aronces was ſomething pleaſed in thinking that his Rival did not now look upon him as the confident of his love; ſo as growing a little bolder, I know not Sir (ſaid he unto him) whether you may accuſe me for being the cauſe why Clelia doth not anſwer your affection, but I am very certain that I my ſelf am not in the Catalogue of the happy, nor in all likelihood ſhall be a long time. Yet I conceived that being acquainted with your generoſity, it was a piece of my duty to tell you ingeniouſly, that I have loved Clelia, ever ſince I was at Carthage. That I did love her at Capua, and that having hah the happineſs to do Clelius ſome conſiderable ſervices, he freely beſtowed Clelia upon me, and I was upon the very point of marriage, when a moſt horrid Earthquake did make a ſeparation between us. Thus, and with reaſon looking upon her as my own, ſince Clelius and Sulpicia gave her unto me, and ſince never contradicted their wills, I conceived it fit to acquaint you with the ſtate of the buſineſs, and that to diſſemble with you, did derogate from the maxims of true generoſity.

How Aronces! (ſaid Adherbal then unto him) hath Clelius and Sulpicia both made a promiſe of Clelia unto you? and hath Clelia given her ſelf unto you? Yes Sir (replied he) and that is it which renders me the more miſerable. But Sir you know that you are no Roman, replied Adherbal, and when ſhe was at Carthage, Clelius then would not beſtow her upon any but a Roman, but talked as if he would give her unto an ordinary Citizen of Rome, before the greateſt King upon Earth. 'Twas ſo indeed, replied Aronces, when we were at Carthage, but it is as true, that though I am no Roman, yet I had been a moſt happy man had fortune been pleaſed. Since you have thus far informed me Sir, replied Adherbal, I know very well how I ought to anſwer, but to tell you truly Aronces, I doubt I cannot; I am ſo grieved to meet with a Rival in the perſon of my friend, and to hear I ought not in reaſon pretend any more unto Clelia, that I dare not anſwer for my own thoughts. And I am ſo little maſter of my ſelf, (added he in riſing up) that leſt I ſhould vent ſomething in my tranſport of grief, that might make me repent it all my days, I will take my leave of you not knowing what I ſhall think when we meet next. Sir, replied Aronces, your virtue makes me aſhamed, and I will uſe all the virtue that I have, to be both your Rival and your Friend: My deſign is the ſame, replied the Prince of Numidia, but I cannot ſay that I am able to execute it, nor do know whether I am able to be both at once, the moſt miſerable and the moſt generous man. Upon this Adherbal retired, he himſelf not knowing his own thoughts of Aronces, for his ſoul was ſo saddened to hear that he could not pretend any more unto Clelia, as he was not the master of his own mind. Aronces himself could not chuse but grieve that he had such a brave man to his Rival: But Horatius being then the most legitimate object of his hatred, and finding no likelihood that the Prince of Numidia could ever prejudice him, his vertue surmounted all motions of any aversion towards that Prince, and overcoming himself, he went to visit him the next morning betimes. The Prince of Numidia emulating the generosity of his Rival, and unwilling to yield unto him in point of generosity, he gave him a most civil reception, and such high discourses passed between them, as made them admire each other, though their hearts did beat such a pulse as secretly moved rather to hatred than love of each other. After this, these two Rivals did meet at the Princess of the Leontines Chamber and at Aurelia's, but they met not without many standers by.

The truth is, they continued not long in a power of seeing each other, for both being perfectly recovered together, they were forced to sever; for Aronces was constrained to go unto Perusia, and transact about the preservation of the King his Fathers life: And the Prince of Numidia seeing no rational hope for himself, resolved to wander up and down the world, and not to be any longer in quest of Clelia, since now he had no pretence unto her: and the principal reason of this his resolve was, because he would try whether change of place would work a change of mind, and whether he could recover that tranquillity which he had lost. But finding it a piece of difficulty to take a handsome farewel of his Rival, he opened his heart unto Celeres, who being very desirous that two such great Princes should part fair without a quarrel, he did approve of his intention in departing without visiting Aronces, who being ready to go unto Perusia was mightily perplexed: For not knowing where Clelia was, he could have willingly wished, that though the sight of a Rival was a mote in his eye, yet he would have had the Prince of Numidia there as well as himself. But that wish was in vain: For Adherbal went that same night to take his leave of Sicanus and Aurelia, and giving them thanks for all favours received from them, he gave order that all his equipage should be ready by break of day; but before he went he left two Letters with order to be delivered unto Celeres, one for Clelia the other for himself, which contained these lines.

Adherbal unto Celeres.

FOr all you are an intimate friend unto my Rival, yet I have seen you so passionately grieved at my misery, that I will desire a favour from you. 'Tis true, it is a favour of a strange nature, since I heartily wish that you may not be able to do it; for I conjure you to keep this inclosed Letter, for the most admirable Clelia, but that it may not be a breach of that fidelity which you owe unto my Rival, I do not desire you to deliver it unto her, until she hath made my Rival most happy. This being all I ask of you, I dare hope that you will not deny me this office, since I do not desire it may be done me until fortune hath put me into a capacity of meriting the compassion of my Rival. I hint not a syllable to you of him; for what can that man say of him, who hath found in the person of Aronces, all that can possibly move the highest friendship, and the highest hatred? Adieu. Pity me, since you may safely do it without offence unto my Rival and your Friend, and believe that you could never pity a person who doth more merit it than my self.

When Celeres had received and read this Letter, he was much surprised, and the more because that directed unto Clelia was sealed; however since he was not desired to deliver it until Aronces was first happy, he did not scruple at the doing of this Office for the Rival of his Friend. But as he was ruminating upon this adventure, Aronces comes suddenly into the Chamber, and sees Adherbals Letter unto Clelia, upon the Table; this sight much amazing him, he asked Celeres in all hast whether he knew where she was, and how it came about that the Prince of Numidia directed this Letter unto him, for he knew his hand. Celeres perceiving the agitation of his Spirits, and Adherbal not having obliged him to conceal it from Aronces, he shewed him the Letter of his unfortunate Lover, and acquainted him with his departure, for till then he knew not of it. Aronces recollecting himself by degrees as he read this Letter; Alas, alas, Celeres, (said he unto him after he had read it) I am afraid that you must never deliver my Rivals Letter unto Clelia, since you must not deliver it until she hath made me happy: No sooner had he said so, but a fresh gust of apprehension rowsing his thoughts, he lamented the absence of Adherbal, in a thought that perhaps he might come to find out Clelia. Yet notwithstanding Celeres so convinced him, that he was perswaded the absence of Adherbal would be advantageous unto him. For truly Sir, (said he unto him amongst many other reasons) there is not a more intollerable torment under the Sun, than to have a Rival whom virtue compels one to love; and whom love compels one to hate, to be perpetually in ones eye. 'Tis right Celeres (said he unto him) but this is not the first time that such a passion as mine, hath hurried a man into unreasonable thoughts.

Whilst this Prince was thus talking, he held in his hand his Rivals Letter unto his Mistress, and looked upon it as if his looks would have broke open the Seal: after restoring it hastily unto Celeres, take it Celeres (said he) and keep it, lest a spark of jealousie should force me to open it: And that my fidelity may be the more manifest, I will be faithful unto an unfortunate Lover and Rival, let my desire of seeing what he hath written unto Clelia be never so great: So Celeres took the Letter and told his friend, that had he offered to have opened it, he would have given a stop to his curiosity. After which Sicanus being come, and telling them that the Princess of the Leontines prepared her self to go next morning unto Perusia, and transact in the service of Aronces, they went both together unto her Chamber, where Celeres related all passages; shewing them the Prince of Numidia's Letter, and applauded the power which Aronces had over himself, in not opening that Letter which his Rival writ unto Clelia, though he had a most strong desire unto it. Were it possible to esteem Aronces more than I do (replied the Princess of the Leontines) doubtless I should, for I do think no quality under Heaven more laudable than fidelity is; especially when it is preserved in such cases, wherein it is easie to be otherwise, or where good excuses may be had, or examples to authorize infidelity. How many men are there in the World, who never use to make the least scruple of opening all the Letters which come unto their hands? who invent devices how to open and then shut them again unperceivedly? and who have such a general curiosity to be prying into all manner of Letters, that no Seal escapes them: As the Princess of the Leontines was saying so, Aurelia entred, and no sooner entred but Sicanus addressed himself unto the Princess of the Leontines; Madam (said he unto her) if you desire to be informed further of their curiosity who love to be opening Letters, I beseech you intreat Aurelia to tell you; for she is acquainted with a fair Lady, whom you Madam also know, that put such tricks upon her; and therefore since she is better able to inform you then I am, I will leave it unto her to tell you all the passages of it.

So Sicanus having Letters to write unto Perusia, he went out, and left Aurelia to supply his place who did become it excellently well; for she apprehending at first the business, did smilingly ask the Princess of the Leontines, whether it was concerning the opening of any Letters; for if it be (added she) none in the World can give a better account of such a matter then my self, unless I have forgotten; though for my part I have renounced ever making use of any such ways, as heretofore have brought upon me abundance of delight, and as much sorrow.

The Question (replied the Princess of the Leontines) is not concerning the opening of any Letter, but whether we ought absolutely to condemn or excuse such Men as are so inquisitive as to open them; such as make a mock at those who are so scrupulously faithful, as not to open the Letters of their very enemies, although they were perswaded they contained some concernments of themselves. Madam, replied Aurelia, I am able to give you all those fond and false reasons, which are alledged by those who are inquisitive, for a friend of mine hath instructed me in the Art: Aurelia had no sooner said so, but the Lady of whom she spoke entred; for she living within three miles of the Thrasimenian Lake, towards the Isle of Saules, she used often to visit Aurelia; also she had seen the Princess of the Leontines two or three times. Yet this Princess never before knew of her humour in opening Letters; because no occasion concerning it did present it self; but as soon as she was entred, Aurelia knowing her humour, and also knowing that she affected raillery, and that she did not think she did ill in opening all the Letters which came under her hands, she told her that she came in a very good time to help her out in the maintenance of a good cause: For truly (said she unto her) as I was boasting of my skill in opening and shutting of Letters, they would needs perswade me that I put my self unto a great deal of trouble, which could hardly ever procure me any great delight; and besides, they would make me believe, that such an act was neither just nor generous.

For matter of justice and generosity (replied this Lady whose name was Statilia) perhaps it will prove a little difficult to prove that it is; but for matter of pleasure (added she) I will maintain that there is nothing fuller of delight then to make ones self Mistress of anothers secrets unperceivedly, and never be beholding to them for it: and I am perswaded, that there is always some kind of pleasure in knowing that which others know not, and which they do not know, that others know it, be the thing of what nature it will.

For my particular (said the Princess of the Leontines) I am not of your opinion, for there are a thousand sorts of secrets, which never move the least curiosity in me. For my part, added Aronces, my mind is not at all inquisitive after such things, as in which I have no interest, and as I should not think well any should dive too far into my heart, so I will never offer to dive into the hearts of others; and I am so far from opening their Letters (said he and smiled) that I think if their hearts were in my hands, I should not screw any thing out of them; always excepting the heart of my Mistress, and the hearts of my Rivals. For my part (replied Statilia) I should not use the matter so: and since it is more easie to open Letters then hearts, and since sometimes opening the one, the other is discovered, I will never omit any opportunity of satisfying my curiosity; but that I may never be taxed with any malicious curiosity, I assure you, that though I have opened almost all the Letters which ever came unto my hands, yet I never raised any mischief between the parties, or set them at variance. But I beseech you tell me (said then the Princess of the Leontines) to what purpose is it that you are so desirous to open Letters, since you make no use of the contents? To do so once out of an humour of gallantry, I confess some small delight may be taken in it; but to make a matter of care and continual practice for nothing, I must confess, that I cannot understand it: First, this must be an infallible position, that of a hundred Letters which you open, there is not one wherein you have any concernment nor wherein you can take any pleasure in seeing, for those who have a mind to speak of you, will not trust the mention of you in their Letters; such as hold any intrigues of gallantry will not commit them to such hands as come within your walk; Domestick business never diverts; general news can be no subject for your curiosity, since that is known to you as well as them that write; common complements cannot be any pleasure to you, and for Letters of wit, they will be shewed unto you without your opening them; so as I must conclude, that you commit a very unjust Act for a very poor pittance of pleasure. And I am perswaded, that nothing in the world ought to be more inviolable then the fidelity of Letters; so as though I had in my hands a Letter which came from one of my professed enemies, directed unto a person whom I neither loved, nor he loved me, yet I would let it pass without an opening. Indeed the facility in committing this kind of crime, is an argument to me, that it ought never to be committed, and that nothing ought to be more inviolable then Letters.

For my part (said Statilia) I may conceive it may be with this, as with Theft in Sparta, where they punish only those who steal ill-favouredly, and are taken in the Act. So as I must conclude, that when one hath the art of handsome opening them, so as it shall never be perceived; and that when one knows how to conceal the contents of the Letter opened, it can be no great crime to open them. This were reason enough to keep you from it, replied Aronces, that oftentimes you put your self to abundance of trouble about the opening of a Letter, wherein you find nothing, when as you might employ your time and pain much better. If that consideration would have have corrected her (replied Aurelia) she had been long since corrected: For such an Adventure happened unto her one day, which I shall relate unto you, if she will give me leave. I consent (said Statilia) provided you will give me leave to relate some Adventures which have passed, and which have accustomed me to open Letters. This condition is so just (said Celeres) as I believe Aurelia will not be against it. I shall not be against any thing, answered Aurelia, which may excuse Statilia. But since it is my turn to speak first, (pursued she, and addressed her self to the Princess of the Leontines) be pleased to know Madam, that there was in Perusia some four or five years, a Lady and a Widow, whose beauty was in competition with Statilia's, this is sufficient to make you think there was no great love between them. I must tell you in general terms, that both of them had beauty enough to divide between themselves, all the hearts that were in a most gallant Court. They were perpetually making usurpations upon one another, and could never keep within the limits of their own Empires. I beseech you (said Statilia and interrupted her) come to the business of Letters, if you will have me let you go on with your story. I shall come to it presently (replied Aurelia, and turned towards the Princess of the Leontines) that Statilia passionately desiring to know the secret thoughts of her pretended Rivalless, received a Letter which was not directed unto her, but was amongst many others which were directed unto her. As soon as she saw the Superscription, she knew it to be the hand of that Lady whom she loved not; and she saw written upon it, the name of a Man who was deeply in love with Statilia, and whose fidelity she suspected; for of late he was less assiduous in his visits to her then ordinary, but more unto the other Lady. So that musing upon the matter, and considering all circumstances, she believed him to be in love with this Lady; she concluded it upon a hundred consequences, which she believed to be infallible, as upon conjectures which she thought to be unquestionable. I coming into the Chamber, she acquainted me with the Adventure, and with her resolution of opening the Letter; but, said she, I must use all my art in the opening of it, for I would by no means have the two interested persons to know that I have seen it; but on the contrary, it being delivered without any suspicion of me, I may carry it so as she who did write it shall think her new Lover hath revealed all unto me, and as for him to whom it is directed, I will endeavour to make him believe, that I know of it by some other of this Ladies Lovers. Therefore it is requisite, I use extraordinary care in the opening of it, that it may be done and not perceived.

At the last Statilia after two hours muse upon it, and after two hours more spent in experiments upon other Letters, to try which way was the best, she opened this Letter which procured her so much anger and curiosity. And that you may the better apprehend her awonishment, I must acquaint you, that this Lady who writ this Letter had a very pleasant house in the Countrey: In this house, there was a Man who had an excellent faculty in certain curious works. This Man by an odd piece of Fortune was called by the very same name of him that was in love with Statilia, though their qualities were much different: So as in lieu of finding matters of Courtship and gallantry, as she expected in this Letter, she found several orders relating unto the Gardens and works of this Lady; in some places she desired he would have a special care to plant rows of Orange-Trees, in another place she desired might be a Fountain circled about with a Palizado of Myrtles, and many other things which were absolutely impertinent unto the imagination of Statilia. However, she never went about to undeceive her self, but still would needs have it, that this was a Letter of some private correspondency, which had in it some amphibious sence; for as you know, since the famous Sybil who came unto Tarquin at Rome, and writ a book of Verses called Acrosticks, which by taking the first letter of every Line makes up perfect sence on the side, many after her made use of this invention. Statilia was above an hour in turning and winding the words and lines of this Letter every way, in hopes to find some sence fitting to her fancy; but as she was thus busying our self, the Slave who brought it unto her amongst many others, came to ask for it, and to tell her that it was directed unto a certain Man who had the oversight of such a Ladies works. Upon a more strict examination and consideration of the business, Statilia perceived that all her discants and conceits upon this Letter were upon false surmises; that she had taken a great deal of pains to no purpose, and that she was not a jot the wiser in that thing which she most desired to know. Yes, replied Statilia, I drew thus much advantage out of my curiosity, that I knew there was nothing in the Letter worth the knowing, for had I let it pass without a sight, I should have believed all my life long, that this Lady had written a Letter of gallantry, and that this pretended gallant was perfidious. But Madam, added she, the better to acquaint you, how I came unto this humour of opening of Letters, be pleased to know, that the first person I ever loved, was the most cunning wench that ever was, and after a hundred testimonies of my affection to her, I took a journey into the Countrey for eight days, where we were almost continually together at an Aunts house of hers, who was my Cousin. In this solitude we were never asunder, and as in friendship nothing is so sweet, as to be talking unto each other upon what we think of all our acquaintance, so did we, she being naturally ingenious, and loving me very tenderly. I did truly tell her my opinion of every one she named me, not withholding my most secret thoughts from her. At last, I was to return unto Perusia, and leave her in the Countrey; she sent above twenty several Letters by me, she shewed me many of them before the sealing, and I did not suspect that there was any of the rest which she shewed not unto me that any ways concerned me, for she carried it so cunningly, that I believed she would have shewed me all if I desired. So as taking into my charge these Letters, as soon as I came into Perusia, I thought of delivering them according to directions: But as chance would have it, one of them was unsealed, and I must confess I could not seal it before I read it; it chanced to be one of those which she had not shewed unto me, and it was directed unto a Man, who at that time did not hate me, and was her Cousin. I having spoke much good of him unto her, I found that she acquainted him in her Letter with all I had spoke in his advantage, and gave him the greatest hopes in the World: I blushing for anger, and finding what I expected not, I resolved to open all the rest which I had not seen; and truly I did not repent it, though she moved me to be extremely angry. For I found in one of them (which was directed unto a Woman who was owner of as many bad, as good qualities) that ſhe had imparted unto her, a great part of what I had ſaid of her: I found in another of them a notable piece of Railery, which ſhe had put upon me. And to be ſhort, I diſcovered, that ſhe was the moſt crafty Wench upon earth, and the leaſt worthy of my friendſhip. In the heat of my anger, I ſent her back all her Letters open; and I made a ſolemn vow moſt religiouſly to be obſerved, that I would open every Letter which came under my hands, which I did not ſee before ſealing, becauſe I would never expoſe my ſelf unto any ſuch diſaſters, as then by good fortune I prevented: Ever ſince my curioſity hath been ſo well ſatisfied, that I knew not how to repent of it.

I perceive, replied the Princeſs, you have found out an invention not to be deceived your ſelf, but is it not worſe to be upbraided with deceiving of others, then it is to upbraid others with deceiving you? Having had experience of both (replied Statilia and laughed) I can aſſure you, Madam, that in theſe matters it is much better to deceive others, then to be deceived by them. Truth is (added ſhe) that if I could charge my ſelf with any wicked action, I ſhould be aſhamed; but I cannot think the opening of a Letter to be a crime ſo hainous. For if there be no matter of conſequence in it, then I do no harm unto any: If there be any matter of mirth in it which relates not to my ſelf: I can laugh at it in a corner; and if there be any injurious matter which reflects upon my ſelf, I have injured them only, who would have injured me: So as I muſt conclude, that of all the ſins which one can commit, this I ſpeak of is the leaſt, the moſt eaſie to be acted, and the moſt pleaſant. You cannot perſwade me with all the wit you have (replied the Princeſs of the Leontines) but that the opening of Letters is a moſt dangerous habit; it is ſo much againſt the maxims of juſtice and generoſity, that I dare maintain it is a violation of all manner of rights, and that it is a leſs folly to rob another, to uſurp Kingdoms, and to be revenged upon ones enemies by ſword, or poiſon, then to blemiſh ones fidelity by ſuch things as thoſe. For by robbing one may inrich himſelf; by uſurping a Kingdom, one may ſatisfie his ambition, and by revenge upon enemies one may guſt the ſweets of it; but there is neither pleaſure nor profit gotten by opening of Letters, at the leaſt not by one in a hundred. Yet experience makes it manifeſt that it is the crime of many, and the cuſtom of it ſo eaſily gotten, as I cannot tell how Aurelia could break her ſelf of it. Alas Madam, replied Aurelia, I was eaſily broken of it, for I think never was any one more ſeverely puniſhed then I was for my curioſity: But I am very much obliged unto that charitable Friend who was my puniſher and correcter. Oh I beſeech you (replied the Princeſs of the Leontines) tell us how you came to leave off that trick which Statilia taught you. Since you command it Madam (replied Aurelia) you muſt know, that after I had learned of Statilia all her inventions of opening Letters, and had practiſed them five or ſix days together, and did nothing elſe: After I ſay, that I was grown very cunning, I made uſe of my skill upon ſeveral occaſions; but having another friend beſides Statilia, whom I loved very well, and was alſo loved again, I would have made her my Confident in a buſineſs of a Letter which I opened, and would have told her all. She being a perſon more ſcrupulous in ſuch matters then Statilia, ſhe reſolved to put a trick upon me which might correct me, for a thing which ſhe thought not juſt. For a whole month together I received abundance of Letters, ſeveral ways, upon ſeveral ſubjects, all directed unto Men of my acquaintance, wherein I ſtill found ſomething which vexed me; for ſhe who cauſed them to be written, knowing all the ſecrets of my whole life, ſhe had contrived them ſo cunningly, that I burned above a dozen Letters after I had opened them, not ſuſpecting that ſhe had any hand in them. At laſt I was ſo pitifully perplexed that not being able to continue any longer, I went to empty my ſelf unto this charitable friend; for though I loved Statilia very well, yet at that time there were ſome things which I could not impart unto her. As ſoon as I began to complain, ſhe unto whom I made my moan, began to mock me, and ſaid I deſerved no pity, and that thoſe who were miſerable by their own folly, deſerved no compaſſion. Alas (replied I) my miſery proceeds from what others have written; but if you would not have ſeen their Letters (replied ſhe) this had not been written of you. After this, ſhe would have perſwaded me, that this was a puniſhment for my curioſity: But I was deaf in the ear, inſomuch, as ſhe did not queſtion, but that I would open the next Letter I met withal: And indeed, in order to her deſign of converting me, ſhe did write one Letter directed unto her ſelf, though it was really intended for me, as being to paſs through my hands, thinking that I would open that Letter as ſoon as any's elſe: This Letter I received, ſimply believing it intended for my friend, and according to her hopes I did open it. But Madam, I was moſt ſtrangely aſhamed when after the opening of it, I found that in lieu of being to her, it was from her, and intended for me, and more damped when I read it: For, Madam, it contained all the arguments that could be deviſed againſt that ill quality of opening of Letters, and to make me aſhamed of it: The Letter was long, and full of wit, and concluded that it was a thing never to be excuſed, unleſs it were done out of a reſentment of jealouſie. Therefore (ſaid ſhe in the end of her Letter) if you will ever go about to juſtifie this ill quality unto me, you muſt accuſe your ſelf of two things more, you muſt confeſs that you are both in love and alſo jealous, and the ſuſpicion which you have of every one, makes you look for that which you would never find. Thus, Madam, was the cure of my curioſity, for from that time I made a promiſe unto my ſelf, never to open any more Letters; and I was ſo convinced with the arguments of my generous friend, that I went and acquainted her with my reſolution, ſhe in recompence confeſſed, that all thoſe Letters which had ſo perplexed me, were writ only to correct me: but they had not the ſame influence upon Statilia; for ſhe hath opened ſeveral Letters which were directed unto me, and put her ſelf to much trouble in making them up again: After all this, Statilia being excellent at Railery, did very ingeniouſly defend her ſelf againſt all the ſolid reaſons which the Princeſs of the Leontines, Arontes, Aurelia, and Cleves brought againſt her, yet ſhe was forced to confeſs, that they were in the right, and ſhe in the wrong; but withal ſhe proteſted, that ſhe ſhould for ever continue in the wrong, and as long as ſhe live live never be broken of it; after this, she concluded her visit and went away. And the Princess of the Leontines continuing her applauds of Aronces for his fidelity even unto his Rival, they began a most solid league of friendship. Indeed this Princess according to her promise went into Perusia, Aurelia went also: But as for Sicanus, he staid with Nicius and Martia to give all directions concerning Aronces, when the time did require. In the mean time Aronces finding himself in a fit condition to go, and seeing the interest of the King his Father, his own, and of his love, required that he should go as soon as possible he could to Mezentius, he went two days after the Princess of the Leontines departed from the Isle of Sauls, and he was entertained with so much honour, that Mezentius lodged him in his own Palace, and would have every one look upon him as a Man unto whom he owed his life: So that as it is the custom of all Courts, Aronces had not only the favourable aspect of the Prince, but of every one besides. Bianor and Tiberinus also did him all imaginable honours: And as Aronces was infinitely amiable, so it was an easie matter for him to get love. The heart of Mezentius was so much moved, as he spoke it openly, a few days after he came to Perusia, that though he had not been a Debtor to him for his Life, yet he should have most tenderly loved him, and think him worthy of his highest favour. These advantagious words being reported unto Tiberinus, he began to be jealous of this growing Favorite, so as to give him a handsome remove, he told Mezentius that it was a shame for him to keep a stranger so long in his Court, and that it were good to pack him away with some magnificent Present, to the end he might go about his business. But Mezentius being of an apprehensive wit, knew well enough the jealous thoughts of Tiberinus, and without giving any direct answer, told him that e're long he would do what did become him. Mean time, the Princess of the Leontines, out of her zealous and generous devotion to serve Aronces, did force her self to look upon Tiberinus a little better then ordinary, and endeavoured to make him love Aronces, she did still preserve very carefully that amity which she had gotten amongst all the Grandees of that Court: And scarce a day passed without some secret conference with her, from the friends of Porsenna and Galerita, Sicanus and others who negotiated for Aronces, did continually communicate unto him what each of them in particular had done. But the greatest affliction upon Aronces was, that he could not hear a word of Clelia, though by order from Mezentius a strict Inquisition was made for her throughout all his Dominions. So as since he could not then depart from Perusia, considering the condition wherein the King his Father was, nor knowing where to seek her, he resolved to stay until he could better dispose of himself, and in the interim to send secretly unto the Towns which were then Enemies unto Rome; for he conceived that Horatius who was upon ill terms with Tarquin, could not seek a safer retreat then amongst his enemies. So as in order to this design, he sent unto all such places where there was any hopes to hear something of her. After which, he did wholly devote himself to save the life of Porsenna. For Mezentius desiring a Successor, and to marry his Daughter, he having no Children, did accuse Porsenna that he went about to murther him, and did charge him indeed with some shews of probability. Indeed the Man who would have killed him, and whom Aronces killed, was a Friend of the Prisoner King, and if his virtues had not been apparent unto all the World, it might have been thought, that desire of liberty might have prompted him to consent unto such an unworthy action. So as Mezentius having some colour to accuse him of such a crime, he made it be prosecuted, and they proceeded against him as a Delinquent. Aronces then being in great favour and familiarity with Mezentius, he talked one day with him concerning this accusation, and told him that he believed it had no good foundation, and beseeched him to take a business of that great importance into his serious consideration. How Aronces said Mezentius unto him, did you give death to him, who would by order from Porsenna have taken away my life, and would you now save his life, and who would have been my death? Sir, replyed Aronces, I desire to keep you from doing a thing which afterward you may repent of, when it is too late: And if an unfortunate Stranger, to whom you have given leave to utter his mind, may be still permitted to speak, I would ingeniously confess that I think there is nothing of greater consideration, then for a Soveraign Prince to be very cautious how he meddles with those of his own quality; for if he put them into the Rank of other men, then doth he lose his own priviledges, and makes himself capable to suffer that which he inflicts upon others. Therefore Sir, I beseech you be not too hasty in proceeding against Porsenna, but make a difference betwixt a great King and a common Subject. Your language, replied Mezentius, is indeed both prudent and generous, but the life of Porsenna is so great an obstacle unto all my designs, that since fortune hath given me a just cause to ruine him, I ought to do it, unless I be the most imprudent man upon earth. I do know very well, Sir, replied Aronces, that Porsenna is accused; but I cannot tell whether there be any proofs against him: 'Tis true you were assaulted by a man who was tyed unto his interest; but Sir, you have kept him under such strict guards, as it is not credible he should ever have a hand in such a horrid act: And therefore Sir be careful, least in seeking for a pretence to ruine the innocent, you become guilty your self, and least you should provoke the just gods to revenge his death: Sir I beseech you pardon the boldness of my language, for I take so great an interest in all that concerns you, as I hope that my zeal will plead my excuse: I thank you, replied Mezentius, and my love is so tender towards you, that you may speak any thing; but for this love to you, you are more obliged unto me then you imagine; for you have so great a resemblance of a Man, whom of all the World I most hate, as I wonder you can be deep in my affection. However, I must tell you, that I do not wonder you should speak as you do, for you are young, you know not the several interests of my state, nor the secret reasons which I have to ruine Porsenna: Therefore being neither angry, nor perswaded by any thing you have said, let me tell you, that if I do not ruine Porsenna, he will ruine me; and in the choice of these two, I had better ruine then be ruined. Aronces had further replied, if Tiberinus had not come in; who seeing them in such private conference, grew extremely jealous; for he knew by the countenance of Mezentius, that the discourse was very serious, and concerned something of great importance. So as discontent appearing in his eyes, Mezentius perceived it and was angry; and to punish Tiberinus for taking it ill he should talk with Aronces, he spoke not a word unto him, but continued talking with that Prince, insomuch as Tiberinus being extremely netled, he went out abruptly, & went unto the Princess of the Leontines. Mean time, Mezentius talked no more of Porsenna unto Aronces; but pressed him to tell who and from whence he was. You know (said he unto him) that I have often asked you, and could never get a direct answer from you. 'Tis very true Sir, replied Aronces, and I beseech you let me be silent still; for truly Sir, I have several reasons to conceal my self; and all I can say at this time is, that as soon as I can I will let you know it. Your answer doth a little stagger me, replyed Mezentius, for it makes me think you were one of those Children who were left in the Street, exposed to the Will of Fate, and ignorant of your extraction. No, Sir, replyed Aronces, I am none of those, I know my Progenitors are noble; but I know withal that I ought not to discover it, until some matters be over, which perpaps will be very shortly. As Aronces was saying so Bianor entred, who came to tell Mezentius, that he had met with many circumstances which made it conjecturable, that Porsenna was knowing to the design of him who would have assassinated him. But whilst these passages were at the Palace of Mezentius, Tiberinus was with the Princess of the Leontines, inveighing against the new favourite Aronces: It is desired Madam (said he unto her after many other matters) I shall ere long be as much out of my Masters favour as out of my Mistresses, and considering the fresh favours of Aronces, I shall be as unfortunate in my ambition as in my Love. That I may remove half of your misfortunes (replyed the Princess very wisely) I pray follow my counsel. Your language Madam, had been more obliging, replied Tiberinus, if you had said, I command you. Which you will (said she) if your case were mine in lieu of crossing the growing favours upon Aronces, I would comply with him and his interests, and perswade him that he was a debtor unto me for the good fortune he enjoys; and in order hereunto I will take upon me to make this union betwixt you; for I cannot conceive that you can continue long in favour, unless there be some who is in favour with Mezentius about his pleasures, whilst you are about his great affairs: You know this Prince as old as he is, hath all the inclinations of a young man: So as whilst you are transacting in State affairs, the other may be the companion of his diversions: make choice of Aronces for it, he is young, he is a stranger, he is not in a capacity to move factions in the Court, nor any way hurt you; and in all likelihood will be contented with a pleasant life, and enjoy the sweets of his favours in that kind. But I beseech you Madam, replied Tiberinus, how can you tell whether Aronces will not supplant me in the place which I enjoy, if once he enter into the heart of Mezentius: If you be in power to supplant him (replied the Princess) then do it; but take heed lest in going about to ruine him you ruine your self. But on the other side by taking that course which I propose, you run no hazard, for by not crossing the favours of Aronces, but complying with his interest, Mezentius finding no stop to his inclinations, will of himself leave off those things which now divert him; but say he should not, however you have thereby obliged Aronces; and it is not probable that he who seems to be of a most notable generosity, will ever dishonour himself by any publick ingratitude, and therefore the best expedient is as I advise principally, because he may not be looked upon as a new Favourite, but rather his favours may be looked upon as an effect of yours. The Princess of the Leontines also used many other arguments unto Tiberinus; so as none being fitter to perswade than a Mistress, Tiberinus thought all her reasons to be very good, and he thought himself so happy that she would interest her self in his fortune, as he told her that he did absolutely put himself into her hands, and that she might tell Aronces what she pleased; So as Aronces coming in, to lose no time, she resolved to unite them before they parted; but to do it the more handsomly, and the better to deceive Tiberinus, she no sooner saw Aronces; but she began discourse: You come very happily Sir, said she unto him, to thank Tiberinus for those favours for which you are obliged unto him: For truly Aronces to be plain with you, you are a debtor unto him for all those favours which you receive from Mezentius: Truth is, that Prince intended to have packt you away with a Princely Present, the next morning you came hither, for those who have seen Porsenna at your age, do say that you do extremely resemble him: And Mezentius could hardly have endured the sight of you, if Tiberinus had not stopped his aversion, which he carefully hides from you, by reason of his obligations to you; which aversion he had never overcome without Tiberinus: I thought it to be expedient that you were acquainted with the state of things, to the end you might apply your self unto the fortunes of him unto whom you are obliged, and so make your own the more secure. Aronces knowing the meaning of the Princess, did answer her as handsomly as she spoke. Insomuch as Tiberinus suiting with the intentions of that Princess, did contract a league so great, as he discovered unto Aronces all the ways that would most work upon the spirit of Mezentius. But that which was most remarkable in this business was, that to testifie the confidence in Aronces, and the more to engage him in his interests, he told him that above all it was most expedient to hasten the ruine of Porsenna. For truly (said he) as long as that Prince is living, the life of Mezentius is not secure: Aronces durst not at the first openly contradict Tiberinus, lest he should render himself suspected: So as this conference ended with reciprocal protestations, never to prejudice each other unto Mezentius: And indeed, they did negotiate together as men who stood in need of each other. Tiberinus confessed unto Aronces, his love unto the Princess of the Leontines, and he perceived, that if he would be in the favour of Mezentius, he must comply with Aronces, so as he neglected nothing in order thereunto.

This being the state of things, the people of Arezzes and Cortones made such an unexpected eruption and entred so far into the Country of him whom they took for their enemy, that Perusia was hotly alarm'd: and Mezentius as stout as he was, did think of leaving the Metropolis of his Dominions, and retire himself unto an Isle of the Thrasimenian Lake, until he had mustred his forces. But Aronces, who had great favour and familiarity with him, was against it; and perswaded him that upon such occasions, it was very dangerous to fly or shew any signs of Fear, so as he resolved to stay and make head against his enemies as well as he could.

There being some Forces still on foot, by reason that that he was never a quiet poſſeſſor of Cluſium, he gave orders that they ſhould be drawn into a body. The People of Peruſia offered of themſelves to Arm; and Aronces beſeeched Mezentius for leave to go and view the enemy. And accordingly he went in the Head of Two Hundred Horſe only, to ſee what he could diſcover of their true force; he behaved himſelf ſo bravely in this employment, that he defeated one party which he met, and took many Priſoners, from whom he knew the true ſtate of things. So as returning to Mezentius after this glorious attempt, he exhorted him to meet the enemy. And accordingly, as ſoon as their Troops were muſtred, and ſome Diſcipline uſed amongſt the freſh Soldiers, who were liſted to defend their Houſes and their Wives, he went out of Peruſia, followed by Tiberinus, Bianor, all the Grandees of the State, Aronces and Celeres. But what neceſſity ſoever there was of Soldiers, the Guards upon Porſenna were not leſſened, ſuch fears there was of his eſcape; nor were the Guards upon Galerita diminiſhed. But to be ſhort, Mezentius marched towards thoſe, who ſtruck a terrour all before them; and who were Maſters of the Field, and who carried themſelves as in a Country which they intended to ruine, the better to ſubject it. Aronces, knowing that it concerned him to ſignalize himſelf upon this occaſion, and that Tiberinus was not ſorry in his heart that he would expoſe himſelf, it was an eaſie requeſt to obtain the moſt dangerous command. And indeed, it was he who commanded a ſmall Party of choice men, deſigned for the Forlorn Hope, unto all the dangers and perils of the Army: Celeres was the faithful Companion of his Adventures in War, as well as in his Adventures of Love. Aronces did acquit himſelf ſo heroickly in this deſperate employment, that as it may be ſaid he ſaved the life of Mezentius many a time; for by his diligence he came to underſtand the ſtate of his Enemies, and he hindred the Enemy from having any knowledge of that Princes Condition; for as ſoon as any party appeared, he aſſaulted and repulſed them, and he was the Actor of ſo many glorious exploits in this rencounter, that if they were all related ſeverally, they would ſeem incredible.

At laſt, after ſeveral days of only facing each other, and both ſides declining Fight, they were both equally forced to give Battel; which though it was not fought by ſuch formidable Armies, as the very ſight of them ſtrikes terror, yet it was more terrible than if theſe two Armies had been more numerous: For when a Battel is fought betwixt four or five hundred thouſand men, commonly a great part of them are only Spectators of the Fight, and the Victory is oftentimes gotten more by a panick fear or a tumultuous rout, which huge multitudes are ſubject unto, where order is hard to be kept; than by any true actions of valour, or conduct of the Captains. On the other ſide, when two ſmall bodies fight there are none idle, all are in equal danger, death is in every Rank; all beſtir themſelves, all fight, and every particular Soldier is the Carver out of his own glory, ſince chance of War here is not to be expected, nor is the victory to be gotten by the capricious humour of Fortune, but by true valour and prudent Conduct. But if ever great actions were done in a ſhort time, and between a few Troops it was at this time; when Mezentius was ready to periſh, if the valour and good Fortune of Aronces had not reſcued him. Theſe two little Armies were no ſooner in ſight of each other, but without ſo much delay as to ſeek advantages, the Fight began, and that with ſuch animoſity and fury, as uſeth to be amongſt ſuch as are deſperate. At the firſt, the right wing of Mezentius was broken, and Bianor who commanded it was killed: But Aronces whoſe Body upon that occaſion, was joyned unto that which Bianor commanded, he having taken his place, he made Fortune wheel about, and rallying the broken Troops, he routed them who broke them. On the other ſide, Mezentius being aſtoniſhed to ſee that Bianor had made ſo poor reſiſtance, he cooled the courage of his men, by his wonder at it: So as the enemy making uſe of this favourable opportunity, they charged through the Battel where he was: Inſomuch that things were in a very bad condition, when Aronces obſerving what paſſed, left Celeres to keep things in the condition he had brought them: He went then to help Mezentius, carrying only two hundred Horſes with him, and infuſing freſh ſpirits into the Soldiers, by a thouſand actions of Valour which they had ſeen him perform, he came to the place where Mezentius was, but he came juſt as that Prince, whom he found forſaken of his men, and environ'd with enemies, was ready to render himſelf and be their Priſoner. But Aronces aſſaulted his Enemies with ſuch vigour, as the vanquiſhers became vanquiſhed, and were forced to let go their Priſoner of that great importance. And as if Fortune was reſolved that Aronces ſhould have all the glory of the day. As ſoon as he had ſetled the Battel, he perceived that the Wing which Tiburinus commanded had need of help: So as without more delay, he haſted to the place where neceſſity invited him, he alter'd the face of things, and got a moſt perfect victory. For indeed the enemy loſing their hearts, after they had loſt their advantages, he broke them all; and did ſo abſolutely defeat them, that thoſe who died not at this bloody skirmiſh, threw down their Arms, and implored the mercy of the Conquerors. It was moſt obſervable, that though Aronces commanded only a little Body, yet he commanded the whole Army, as ſoon as Bianor was dead: For his admirable Valour got him ſuch credit in the minds of all the Soldiers and Officers, that they did both acknowledge and obey him. Mezentius, Tiberinus, and the whole Army did publiſh, that it was he only who won the day: Celeres did highly ſignalize himſelf that day; and by high acts rendred himſelf worthy of that eſteem which Aronces had of him. In the mean time, the Enemies General being dead, and no Enemy appearing, Mezentius after he had left the command of the Army, unto the Conduct of an old Commander, and taken order for the Funeral of Bianor, he conceived it beſt to return unto Peruſia, to aſſure the people of Victory. And Aronces having no mind to leave him, leſt he ſhould attempt ſomething againſt the life of Porſenna, he returned thither alſo: And he return'd with ſuch Trophies of Honour, as he was received with ſuch acclamations, that they raiſed a moſt timely jealouſie in Tiberinus, and did not over-well pleaſe Mezentius, as much as he was obliged unto Aronces, and as well as he loved him. For indeed the fright being very great in Peruſia, every one looked upon him as the deliverer of the Town: Inſomuch without a word of Mezentius or Tiberinus, nothing could be heard but the name of Aronces; every ſtreet was filled with multitudes of men, who preſſed to behold him as if they had never ſeen him. Thoſe who had ſeen him in one ſtreet, ran a back way to ſee him in another; Women with Children in their arms, did ſhew him unto them as the man who had ſaved the lives of their Fathers, and preſerved their Liberties; and ſuch glorious applauds were given Aronces at his entry into Peruſia, that his modeſty made him bluſh.

Tiberinus yet diſſembled the ſecret ſorrows; and he went unto the Princeſs of the Leontines, as ſoon as he had lodged Mezentius in his Palace, but he went with a moſt dejected look; thinking it a ſhame for him to appear before a Princeſs with whom he was in Love, ſince he could not bring with him the chief glory of the Victory. And he was no ſooner there, but Aronces and Celeres came in alſo; ſo as Tiberinus ſtriving to conſtrain himſelf, he began to commend Aronces, (who modeſtly interrupting him) began to commend him again, and preſently after to talk of ſomething elſe, asking the Princeſs how Sextilia received the news of Biamor's death; ſhe received it, anſwered ſhe, with much ſorrow: Yet it is believed that it is not ſo much out of tenderneſs, as ſome reſentments of ambition; for ſhe is ſo confident that Mezentius will put Porſenna to death, and that Galerita will be married unto his Brother, that ſhe may be comforted after his death. For Mezentius being old, ſhe fears her Fortunes would not change if he ſhould die before he put the King of Cluſium to death, and before he had married the Princeſs his Daughter unto ſome of her Relations. At the laſt, there is one that pretends to know her thoughts, did aſſure Aurelia that theſe were hers. After this they talked of many other things; and much other Company coming in, Tiberinus could not ſpeak a word of his Paſſion unto the Princeſs of the Leontines. But the day following, he found an opportunity whether ſhe would or no: Yet being of an infinite ingenuity, and knowing it was not a time to treat him ill, if ſhe intended to ſerve Aronces, ſhe carried her ſelf with ſuch a civility towards him, as did put him into ſome hopes, though her words did not ſignifie ſo much. In the mean time, as ſoon as the Victory of Aronces had put Peruſia into a Calm, Mezentius began to think upon Porſenna's death, and at the ſame time to marry the Princeſs his Daughter. But ſince there was no thinking upon the laſt of theſe, until he had executed the firſt, he began to renew the execution of the buſineſs, and to draw up a charge againſt Porſenna, for complying with that Aſſaſſinate who would have murthered him. On the other ſide, all the friends unto that Prince, being advertiſed by Sicanus and Nicius, they began to negotiate ſecretly for the prevention of ſo great a misfortune, and to acquaint Aronces, who was then in a moſt miſerable condition; for he could not hear any news of Clelia; and both honour and nature would not permit him to depart from Peruſia, or if he ſhould he knew not whither to go, nor where the perſon whom he loved was. Moreover, though he was much in the eſteem of Mezentius, yet he knew that his hatred unto Porſenna was above it: And he conceived, that if ever he ſhould acquaint him that he was his ſon, he would then change his mind, and hate him as much as ever he loved him. All he could do was to try if he could prolong the matter, until the friends of the King his Father, had ſome power to help him, when he ſhould ſpeak unto Mezentius, as the Son of Porſenna. In order to that, as he was one day talking unto that Prince, concerning the weighty matter he asked him, whether it were not convenient to endeavour the diſcovery of the truth from the mouth of the Priſoner King? For indeed Sir, (ſaid Aronces to him) if you ſhould upon bare conjectures put a great Prince to death, you would eternally ſtain your glory by it: I would adviſe you to ſend ſome faithful and unbyaſſed perſon unto him, who in a diſcourſe which may appear to be without deſign, may endeavour to find out ſomething, which may clear him or juſtifie him: and if you would be pleaſed to permit me the liberty of ſeeing him, I am confident to make him ſpeak more freely than otherwiſe he would: For ſeeming to enter into his intereſts, and willing to ſerve him, he may chance truſt me ſo far as to impart ſomething, which will either keep you from deſtroying him unjuſtly, or make it appear you may do it juſtly. At the firſt, Mezentius did reject this propoſition; and told Aronces, that Porſenna had long ſince deſerved death: That it was ſufficient he was able to Ruine him, and that he was to blame for letting him live ſo long.

Do you not ſee that this Prince is an eternal colour for Civil War, in all the mutinies in my Dominions? Sometimes reports are ſpread abroad, that Porſenna hath a ſon living, and wandring up and down the World, and that he will ere long appear, ſometimes again, that he was in my power, and that I kept him Priſoner, and there is nothing uninvented to draw upon me the hatred of my Subjects: And therefore to be rid of ſuch a perpetual perſecution, it were fit and expedient to deſtroy him, though he have no hand in the buſineſs of the Aſſaſſinate: and if he have a Son living, I wiſh to the Heavens, I could at one blow ruine both the Father and the Son: But to tell you truly, I am confident he hath no Son, but that he is periſhed, and all reports of his life are nothing, but only the fictions and devices of my enemies.

Truth is, if this Son be dead, he is more happy than if he were living, and if he be living he ſhall live no longer than he is out of my power. Aronces hearing Mezentius ſay ſo, was out of his exceſs of generoſity and boldneſs, in a hundred minds to tell him that he was the Son of Porſenna; for ſometimes he had a fancy that Mezentius owing him for his life twice, and for a victory would not hurt him. But at laſt, reaſon telling him that he ought not to hazard a buſineſs of this importance, wherein more than he had concernment, he recalled himſelf and diſſembled his thoughts: Alſo thinking, that if he ſhould haſtily diſcover himſelf, the leaſt puniſhment would be impriſonment, then the intereſt of Clelia more than his own, reſtrained him from telling truth unto Mezentius: But according to his firſt deſign, which was to protract the matter, he did negotiate ſo well, as that Mezentius gave him leave to ſee Porſenna: And accordingly ſome two days after, Aronces went unto the place where he was guarded, with orders unto him who commanded the Caſtle, to let him have the liberty of diſcourſe without any witneſſes: So this Prince not known to be ſon unto the King of Cluſium, went unto the place where this miſerable King was, who knew nothing of all the Paſſages againſt him; nor what Galerita did, nor whether he had a Son or no: A place wherein he lived a moſt melancholy life, that his Conſtancy was high, and though he had a ſoul, that could look grim death in the face, without alteration of countenance; yet when Aronces entred into the Chamber, he was ſurprized; for beſides besides his being unaccustomed to the sight of any but his guards, he found in the face of Aronces so great a resemblance of himself in his younger days, as he could not chuse but be moved at it; but much more was his wonder, when Aronces telling him that he had obtained liberty from the Prince of Perusia to see him, and confer with him about some matter which concerned him, he knew the tone of his voice; for being very like that of his dear Galerita whom he did most tenderly love, in spight of so long an absence, he changed colour, and was so moved, that Aronces perceived the turbulency of his spirit.

Porsenna could not with-hold some expressions of joy to see him, though he knew him not. So as when the Man who conducted Aronces unto the Chamber, retired, he began to speak, and looking most fixedly upon him, who ever you are honest stranger (said he unto him) I am obliged to thank you; for I profess, the very sight of you hath been the first pleasure I have had since I came into this Prison, though for ought I can judge by your face, I have been longer in it than you have lived. Sir (replied Aronces) you are much in the right, in comparing the time of your imprisonment with my age and life, for having the honour to be your son, you may conceive there ought to be no difference between the length of the one and the length of the other. I see Sir, added he, that my discourse does amaze you; but if you will do me the honour to hear me out, I shall make that apparent to you, which at the first seemed incredible. Your face, your voice, and my own heart are so suitable to your words, replied Porsenna, that I am apt to believe it: Therefore speak on I beseech you, and omit not the least circumstance, which may perswade unto a belief of that which does infinitely please me, but which seems to be impossible; for if you be my son, how comes it to pass Mezentius should give you leave to see me? hath he repented of his injustice? is his reason returned? how came you to move his heart? Aronces seeing Porsenna in such a good disposition to hear him, he began to relate his birth; the manner how Flavia got him out of the Isle of Saules, where Galerita was guarded; his Ship wrack, how he was saved by Clelius; his sojourning at Carthage, and again at Capua, the rencounter of Nicius and Martia; her acknowledgements, and every circumstance concerning them two; and in general, all that was needful to make him see that certainly he was his Son, and that he was worthy to be so: For he related unto him the design which he had to come unto Mezentius to deliver him; how he had saved the life of that Prince in a Wood, near the Lake of Thrasimene, and what happened unto him since; but he told him not of his love unto Clelia: On the contrary, though he was not able to relate what had happened unto him, without naming her, yet he was as careful as he could to avoid it, thinking that if he did pronounce the name of that admirable Lady, he should discover some of his souls resentments. But after he had told Porsenna of a thousand convincing circumstances, he shewed unto him a private mark which he had in one of his hands, and was so like that which Galerita had upon her face, that Porsenna seeing her in seeing Aronces, hearing the voice of his dear Galerita in hearing him, and understanding a hundred passages which were impossible to be forged, he imbraced his Son with abundance of tender joy; but Aronces in lieu of joy, was extremely sad. Porsenna observing it, asked the cause? Alas, alas, Sir (said he unto him) how is it possible but I should grieve, to see that at the very same time in which I bring you joy, I must also bring you sorrow? For, Sir, Mezentius believes, that the Man whom I killed, and who would have killed him, would never have attempted it without your contrivance, and he is so extremely incensed, as he is ready to take any violent course. I my self come now unto you under the notion of your enemy; and I took upon me to visit you, under a pretence of pumping you, whether what Mezentius believes, be true or false. Since you are my Son, replied Porsenna, I will think that you believe you cannot have a Father who would wash his hands in the blood of your Grandfather; and I am so far from desiring the preservation of my life by a crime, as I charge you to attempt nothing upon the life of Mezentius, though there should be no other way to prevent my death: For after the indurement of a prison three and twenty years, with glory I am able to indure death, which is only a moment of pain. Therefore, dearest Son, I charge you not to hinder Mezentius from putting me to death, so it be by just ways; and be sure never to commit any crime to prevent him. After this Aronces gave him an account how all things stood, and of the design which Mezentius had to marry Galerita: For perceiving the great constancy of the King his Father, he did think it not fit to disguise any thing, to the end he might have his advice. So as after a full consideration of every thing, they resolved, that to gain time, Aronces should tell Mezentius, that without all question Porsenna was innocent in the business of Assassination; but withal, he was perswaded, that it was not impossible but that he might be induced unto a consent that his Marriage might be broken off, provided things were not done with too much precipitation. Aronces did not yet leave the King his Father, until he had assured him that he would sooner die, than consent he should; and until he had yielded him all possible testimonies and expressions of virtue and generosity. At his return he gave an account unto Mezentius according as it was resolved upon. But though the Prince of Perusia wished to have found Porsenna rather guilty of the Assassination than innocent, yet he durst not shew as much, but only told Aronces, that though Porsenna should consent unto the breaking off the Marriage, yet he would not set him at liberty in a long time: For, said he, Prisoners of his Quality must not be dealt withal like others; they must never be set at liberty until they be brought into such a condition, as they shall not be able to take revenge. Aronces replied unto all this, according as his great soul did suggest unto him; and he did so well know how to manage the mind of Mezentius, as he promised not to be too hasty upon the death of Porsenna. But as to the Marriage of my Daughter (added he, after many other things) I will do as if Porsenna were already dead; for if he will not consent his Marriage shall be broken, he dies; and if he do consent, it is time that I think upon whom to bestow my Daughter. Indeed Mezentius was so wholly intent upon this, that he resolved to put it in execution, and to bethink himself upon whom to bestow Galerita. Sextilia having a great power with him, he never used to do any thing of consequence without imparting it unto her, and therefore he asked her advice in this buſineſs. But ſhe made ado, and did not like it; for her intereſt was to marry her unto one, who depended upon her, but not being beloved by the Grandees of the State, ſhe knew not whom to prefer, and therefore deſired ſome days of conſideration upon a choice of that importance. As for Mezentius, he did caſt his eye upon Tiberinus, not dreaming upon the violent love that he bore unto the Princeſs of the Leontines; for beſides the ignorance of it, he ſuppoſed that the ambitious conſideration of Reigning would be ſo prevalent in him, as to make him quit all other pretenſions whatſoever. So as whilſt Sextilia was conſidering, he employed a friend unto Tiberinus with orders to know his mind. Tiberinus was put to a terrible perplexity, for his heart was divided between a violent love and ambition: So as not knowing which way to take, he gave an ambiguous anſwer which ſignified nothing: But preſently after his love did check him into repentance; yet for all that he was not fully reconciled in himſelf; for preſently after he thought himſelf too haſty in returning an anſwer, that he did not conſent unto the propoſition; at leaſt he thought it good to be ſure of ſatisfaction in his love before he refuſed the ſatisfaction of his ambition. Mean time, as chance was, Aronces came to know of this propoſition made unto Tiberinus, and he went unto the Princeſs of the Leontines, beſeeching her to be ſo generous, as to flatter up the paſſion of this Lover, purpoſely to keep him from conſenting unto this Marriage; ſince the Princeſs was very tender of Aronces, and ſince it concerned her to promote his happineſs, and ſince ſhe thought the deſire of Mezentius to be very unjuſt, ſhe promiſed Aronces all he deſired: So as when Tiberinus came to tell her what Mezentius had offered him, and to beſeech her ſhe would ſet a value upon this ſacrifice which he made unto her, he did not at all ſurpriſe her, but found her prepared the moſt in the World; for without any engagement of her ſelf unto him, ſhe gave him ſome ground to think, ſhe deſired that he ſhould not marry Galerita. So as expounding what ſhe ſaid unto his own advantage, he thought himſelf to be better in the opinion of the Princeſs than ever he believed. At firſt, ſhe told him, that ſhe would not give him any counſel in the matter, but bad him conſult with his own heart: Yet after he had vowed never to think upon this Marriage, and that he demanded nothing from her, but that ſhe would ſet a value upon this refuſal, as done for the love of her; then this wiſe Princeſs told him, that ſhe eſteeming him ſo much as ſhe did, thought her ſelf obliged to tell him, that this propoſition which was made unto him was more dangerous then he imagined. Then ſhe told him that it was not handſome to marry the Wife of a great and unfortunate King, who was to be forced to yield her, or die the day before the Marriage. She told him further, that the common opinion being, there was a Son of Porſenna in ſome part of the World, it was not likely that ever he would let him reign in quiet; but upon the firſt occaſion the ſubjects of Porſenna would revolt, and perhaps deliver him up unto the Son of that King as the Murtherer of his Father; and therefore ſhe conceived it to be much better to refuſe a thing which had in it nothing but a bare ſhew of grandeur. Adding, that it would be a thing abſolutely impoſſible ever to eſteem a Man who can find a heart to marry Galerita. Tiberinus hearing the Princeſs of the Leontines ſpeak thus, did believe ſhe could not give him any greater hopes, than by counſelling him to reject this propoſition: So as his love flaming more violently, being blown up by theſe freſh hopes, he never ſtuck upon the matter, but vowed a thouſand times that he would never reign unleſs he could reign and not loſe her favour. The Princeſs of the Leontines wiſhed to have him ſtill keep in that mind, and therefore ſhe ſeemed as if ſhe were obliged unto him, and without any further engagements, Tiberinus took his leave of her fully reſolved to refuſe Galerita. He went unto the Man who was employed by Mezentius, and told him he could not accept of that honour which was offered him; telling him after all that the Princeſs of the Leontines had ſaid, purpoſely to prevent his further thoughts of it.

Mean while, Aronces thinking that Mezentius out of his obſtinacy of will, would offer Galerita unto all the Men of Quality in the Court, he employed Aurelia and Sicanus (who were newly come to Peruſia) to diſſwade them all from a thing which would be extremely prejudicial to them, though it ſeemed advantagious. In order thereunto, Sicanus and Aurelia told them confidently, that they were certain the Son of Porſenna was not a Priſoner unto Mezentius, as reports went, but that aſſuredly he would e're long appear; adding what a ſhame it would be to conſent unto ſuch an unjuſt motion. And the buſineſs was tranſacted ſo handſomely, and with ſo much good fortune, that after Tiberinus had returned his refuſal, Mezentius made the motion unto all that were in any capacity of marrying his Daughter but found in none of them that diſpoſition which he deſired; ſo as his mind being exceedingly incenſed at it, he fully reſolved to put Porſenna to death, and to marry his Daughter as he fancied, not doubting but then any one would with joy accept of the offer. So as conſulting with Sextilia thereupon, ſhe approved of the deſign, and both of them contrived how to put it in execution; and afterwards to ſerve their own intereſt: To that end, Mezentius gave order that the Princeſs Galerita ſhould be brought from the Iſle where ſhe was kept, and lodged in his own Palace, yet not ſuffering any whoſoever to ſee, or ſpeak with her.

This Order being executed, that fair and virtuous Princeſs, who knew nothing either of her Huſband, or her Son, or the cauſe of her being brought out of Priſon, could not imagine whether ſhe had reaſon to hope, or to fear; but the wonder was, ſhe was never fairer in all her life then now, and none would have thought ſhe had been above five and twenty, had they not known her to be much more. When ſhe came unto Peruſia, there was ſuch an univerſal murmure amongſt the people, againſt the injuſtice of Mezentius, for keeping ſo fair and good a Princeſs Priſoner; That this Prince reſolved to make all haſt poſſible in the execution of his deſigns, for fear of ſome commotions. To that end, he ſent ſecretly his orders unto the place where Porſenna was kept, and he ſent for Aronces, with ſuch expreſs command to come preſently, that he imagined ſome matter of importance was on foot, he was told by ſome of his intelligence about Mezentius, that this Prince had ſent unto the place where Porſenna was guarded: So as all the friends of the Priſoner King was in a Condition to attempt ſomething for him; and Nicius and Martia being come to Peruſia, rufia, Aronces sent unto them by Celeres, all that he knew, and appointed them to assemble themselves at the Princess of the Leontines house, there to act further as occasion should require. Celeres would have disswaded him from going unto Mezentius but he could not, for he went, and was received with demonstrations of extraordinary joy. Sextilia was then with him, who treated him with more testimonies of amity then ever before. Then Mezentius began to speak, Aronces said he, I have hitherto been loadned with obligations to you, and obligations of that high nature, as can never be sufficiently acknowledged; you have saved my life twice, you have made me victorious over my enemies, and have thereby preserved my State: For all these, I have not done any thing for you; but now, you shall receive a recompence so great, as all Italy shall talk of it. Sir (answered Aronces in a surprise) I have a Soul so little interested, as that it values not the greatest gifts which fortune can give; I set a far greater value upon some demonstrations of your esteem, then I should upon all your treasures should you bestow them upon me.

Your expressions (replied Mezentius) doe speak you so worthy of what Sextilia and my self intend for you, as it were unjust any longer to detain you from the sight of it. After this, Mezentius called for the Captain of his Guard, and whispering with him, he went out, and presently returning again, he brought Galerita into the Closet where they were. Galerita was no sooner there, but casting her eye upon Aronces, she changed colour, for he had such a resemblance of the King her Husband, as he was the last time she saw him, as that she thought it was Porsenna whom she saw. Yet this pleasing errour lasted not long, nor hindred her from saluting the Prince her Father, with as much reverence, as if he had not been the cause of all her misfortunes. But as for Sextilia, the salutes between them were very hollow and cold. As for Aronces, as great as his wonder was at the expressions of Mezentius, yet he was most sensibly joyed to see the Queen his Mother, for he knew by the behaviour of the Captain that brought her in, that it was she, and he knew it better by the mark which she had upon her Cheek, resembling that upon his hand. So as looking as earnestly upon her, as she upon him, one would have thought they had known one another, though it may (in a manner) be said, that they never saw each other.

At last Mezentius began to speak, and looking upon Aronces, here generous defender of my life (said he unto him) here is the recompence which I have designed for you, in testimony of my gratitude for all the services you have done me; This Princess whom you see here is my Daughter, she shall possess my estate, and you shall possess it with her as long as the gods shall let you live; you have assured me, that your Birth is very Noble; your actions confirm me in the belief of it: I do owe you my life and estate, and I do give you no more then you have given me, in giving you my Estate, and my Daughter: And all, upon no other condition, but a promise to protect Sextilia when I am dead: For Porsenna hath consented unto a Divorce from Marriage, and there is nothing which can hinder yours now with Galerita.

This discourse of Mezentius did so timely surprise the Queen of Clusium, and Aronces, that it was a long time before they could recover themselves out of their wonder. Aronces was so affrighted, to hear they should motion him to marry his Mother, that he could not well tell whether what he heard was real or a Dream: And Galerita did so wonder that Porsenna should consent unto a Divorce, that she knew not what to think. So as not being able to indure long in such a cruel incertainty: How Sir (said she unto Mezentius, before Aronces could answer) Doth Porsenna give his consent that I shall be no longer his Wife? Oh good Sir, if it be so, let me hear it from his own mouth; but if it should be so Sir, never expect I will ever consent unto a second Marriage: I have a Son in some part of the World who must one day be your Successor, and who perhaps will by his obedience, repair the infidelity of his Father, if it be so that he is culpable. For my particular, Sir, (said Aronces then unto Mezentius) I have such prevalent and powerful reasons not to accept of this honour which you are pleased to do me, as when you shall know them, you will say that you desire impossibilities. I perceive very well Aronces (said Mezentius unto him) that it is only out of respect and generosity you speak as you do; and that because Porsenna is yet living, therefore you will not marry Galerita. But to remove that obstacle, know that Porsenna hath already either consented unto my desires or else he is dead. Oh Sir (replied Aronces) what do I hear? are you not afraid lest the Son of this unfortunate King, should come and revenge the cruelties used upon his Father? Let him come (answered he in a rage) let him come, if he have a mind to be a sharer in the punishments, and die by the same hand that his Father did, unless he have obeyed my last orders.

Oh Sir, (replied Aronces then) I should too long conceal the truth from you, if I did not tell you that the King of Clusium is the most innocent and the most generous Prince in the World: And to manifest it unto you, know that I have the honour to be his Son: That when I saw him by orders from you, I discovered unto him who I was, and he did more commend me for saving your life, then he should if I had saved his: Send back Sir, send and recall your Orders, unless you will be branded with the Title of unjust. Mezentius and Sextilia, hearing Aronces speak so, were strangely surprised, Galerita was astonished, and so glad both, as that she was not able to testifie her wonder and satisfaction. Yet her heart told her that Aronces spoke truth, and both Mezentius and Sextilia sought the same: For the resemblance betwixt Aronces and Porsenna, and the boldness of his language did convince all doubts of it: Also it chanced that as he spoke with much action, he shewed the hand which had the mark, so resemblant unto that of Galerita's Cheek, so as it was apparent Aronces told the truth. However, this acquaintance in lieu of producing a favourable effect, it did the more incense Mezentius, who not knowing what to do, nor whether the Orders to put Porsenna to death in case he refused the Divorce were already executed; he vented the most sharp and bitter expressions in the World against Galerita, and against Aronces, for all his tenderness over that Prince. Again, what satisfaction soever Galerita had in the finding of her Son, yet she durst not shew any signs of joy, until she were a little better assured, and until she knew in what condition Porsenna was: Mean while, there being some of Aronces's particular friends, in the Chamber of Mezentius they heard how that Prince ſpoke in choler; and he who kept the door (who was alſo obliged unto Aronces) hearing the menaces and ſharp language of Mezentius, went and acquainted the friends of Aronces with it, who went in all haſt to impart it unto thoſe who were at the houſe of the Princeſs of the Leontines; all who began to ſtir themſelves in the behalf of that Prince, who for his part was in a moſt inconceivable perplexity; yet maugre all the confuſion of his thoughts, he could not chuſe but think upon Clelia, and to fear that if Mezentius did arreſt him, he ſhould not be able to reſcue her out of the hands of Horatius; moreover, he knew not whether his Father were dead or living, he ſaw the Queen his Mother in a pitiful condition, and he ſaw himſelf in a likelihood of periſhing by the orders of his Grandfather, whoſe life he had twice ſaved.

Mezentius for his part was not at reſt, for the ſight of Galerita gaull'd his heart, and the remembrance of what he had made her ſuffer, made him aſhamed, but this ſhame was ſo far from moving him to repentance, that it did the more incenſe him. As for Aronces he had ſo obliged him, and he had ſuch inclination to him, as he would not acknowledge him for the Son of Porſenna, though his heart told him it was true. However amidſt all theſe tumultuous thoughts, he moved Sextilia to ask Aronces, what proofs he could make of what he ſaid? but he would not ask that queſtion himſelf, leſt he ſhould ſeem inclinable to believe it; for whether Porſenna were alive or dead, he was reſolved not to acknowledge Aronces; for ſaid he if Porſenna be dead, I muſt not acknowledge ſuch a Prince for my Succeſſor, whoſe Father I have put to death; and if he be living, to acknowledge a Son of ſo much merit, would too much fortifie his party. But whilſt he was thus contemplating with himſelf, Sextilia coming towards Aronces and Galerita who were talking together, ſhe asked that Prince the queſtion which Mezentius deſired her, ſo as Aronces whoſe great Soul could never be ſhaken by any bitter blaſt of Fortune, unleſs by the guſts of Love; did make her a conciſe relation of his birth; of his exile, of his ſhipwrack, and all the paſſages of his life: So as Galerita not doubting but that he was her Son, after ſo many particulars told unto Sextilia, ſhe broke out into the moſt tender and paſſionate expreſſions in the world, mixed with much ſadneſs, for ſhe could not ſpeak of him, but ſhe muſt needs ſpeak of Porſenna alſo. Mezentius being more and more incenſed, called for the Captain of his Guards, and commanded him to carry back Galerita unto the Caſtle from whence he brought her, and afterwards to ſecure Aronces in ſuch a place as he might be very ſafe: As things ſtood upon theſe terms, a great hurley burley was heard in in the Palace Court: Preſently after, the noiſe was heard on the Stairs, and in the Anti-Chamber; in an inſtant after this, the Captain of the Guard whom Mezentius had called, came into his Cloſet, and ſeeming much amazed, Sir (ſaid he unto him) behold the King of Cluſium in the Head of all the Grandees in your Eſtate, and followed by a huge multitude of people coming all hither. Oh ye juſt Gods (cried out Galerita then) muſt I ſee that illuſtrate and unfortunate Prince once again? She had no ſooner ended her exclamation which ſhe could not reſtrain, but Mezentius almoſt mad cried out, is Porſenna living? Oh is Porſenna eſcaped? Then all my Subjects have betrayed me, and my enemies come to murther me in my own houſe. I beſeech you Sir, replied Aronces, think better upon the King my Father, I think of him by my ſelf, (replied the Prince of Peruſia moſt fiercely) for as I would ruine him were he in my place and I in his, ſo I cannot look for any thing but death, and therefore I will prepare my ſelf for it with courage, and will go and meet him.

Then he asked for a Sword but none would obey. Porſenna followed by a croud of ſtrange men of all conditions, entred: and no ſooner entred, but Aronces going towards him; I hope Sir, (ſaid he unto him) you have no intention to be revenged upon the perſon of Mezentius, for what Fortune hath made you ſuffer by him: Nay, nay, replied the Prince of Peruſia, never offer to flatter me in my miſery, and ſince my ſubjects have betrayed me, and ſince I have not a ſword to dye by, I am ready Sir, (ſaid he to Porſenna) to take upon me thoſe Fetters which I have cauſed you to wear, and to take my death from you as I did intend to beſtow it upon you. Since I never uſed to ſin by example, (replied the King of Cluſium) I ſhall not do as you ſay: But though I am Maſter of your life, yet I will content my ſelf with giving liberty unto the Queen your Daughter, which taking my ſon and my ſelf out of your power; and with entring into my own Dominions, without any deſire of uſurping yours; I will promiſe you an everlaſting peace betwixt us, unleſs you will force me unto a war. And to make it manifeſt that my words and my actions do agree, I do declare unto you that though all your forces be at my command, yet I will continue in the head of them only, until ſuch time as you have reſtored unto me thoſe places of mine which you hold from me; until I have carried away my Wife and my Son, and until you have given orders for all theſe: Then will I leave you to be Maſter in your own Dominions, and reſtore back all your Troops, without any other condition than not to puniſh any of thoſe who have helped me to my liberty.

Mezentius hearing Porſenna ſpeak with ſo much Heroick generoſity, was in a confuſion far different from that wherein he was before, and looking upon Sextilia (who ever did feed the fewel of his hatred unto that Prince) Oh you unjuſt perſon, (ſaid he unto her in a low voice) why did I ever follow your opinions? But afterwards perhaps higher, what is paſt cannot be recalled (ſaid he) but at the leaſt I muſt admire that Generoſity which I want, ſince the condition wherein I am is ſo miſerable, as I am not able either to do or ſay any thing which can merit any glory. The truth is, (added he, and addreſſed his ſpeech unto Porſenna) ſhould I tell you my heart begins to change, out of conſideration of what you have done, and out of my affection to Aronces, you would think I ſpoke it out of weakneſs; but I am naturally ſo reſolute and firm, that I can never undo a thing of which I do not really repent. But ſince you are not bound to believe me; I will only tell you that I will perform more than I will promiſe; and that I cannot think any thing unjuſt which you ſhall do againſt me. At theſe words Galerita began to ſpeak, and expreſſed her ſelf ſo paſſionately and tenderly unto the Prince her Father, unto the King her Husband, and unto her Son, as ſhe did almoſt eſtabliſh a confidence between theſe three perſons. Afterwards they cauſed that crowd of people who followed Porſenna to go out of the Chamber of Mezentius: Sextilia alſo went out into her own Chamber: Aronces he

he ſtayed, and aſſuming the Office of a Mediator between his Grandfather and his Father, talking one while unto one, another while unto the other, to regulate their conditions, with the ſweet ingredient of Galerita's prayers, he compleated the pacification between them. But whilſt this Princeſs was talking, Celeres, who ſtayed in the Chamber, acquainted Aronces with the manner how Porſenna got out of priſon. He told him how Nicius had quitted the Ile of Saules, and was gone diſguiſed to acquaint all the Commanders in his name, that the Son of Porſenna would ſhortly appear, and that they ſhould all prepare themſelves to ſave the life of that King, in caſe Mezentius ſhould attempt any thing againſt it; and that ſince the Troops were quartered very near the Caſtle where the Prince was guarded, ſo it hapned that thoſe who Mezentius had ſent that morning to make Porſenna either conſent unto the Divorce, or die if he would not, did meet with Nicius whom they knew very well, and their minds being troubled with the Order which they had received, they had ſome conference with him about it. Nicius aiming at nothing more than to procure Friends for Porſenna, he told them as much as he told all the reſt whom he deſired to gain; and he was more zealous with them, becauſe he underſtood they were to go unto the Caſtle where Porſenna was kept. So as they, imagining what would be their deſtiny in caſe they ſhould put to death a King, whoſe ſon ſhould one day be their Maſter, fears did ſo ſeiſe upon them that they believed Nicius; ſo as having made them change their minds, they made uſe of a Letter of Credence which they carried unto him who commanded the Caſtle, moving him thereby to let Porſenna come out; Theſe two Men telling him, that Mezentius intended to have him carried unto another place. The matter ſeemed the more likely, becauſe Nicius having all the Commanders of the Troop for him, there was four hundred horſe at the foot of the Caſtle, the Commanders ſaying, that they had orders to conduct and guard this Prince. To be ſhort, the things was done, and Porſenna at his coming out, the ſame time that Galerita was carried unto Peruſia, ſhewed himſelf unto the Army. And after a ſpeech to the Commanders and Souldiers, deſiring their aſſiſtance for the liberty of a Princeſs who one day would be their Soveraign; they all did promiſe him fidelity. He went firſt with four hundred Horſe only unto the Gates of Peruſia, appointing all the Army to follow, and his intention was to demand the Queen his Wife, and Aronces of Mezentius. But as he was ready to execute this intention, Sicanus met him, and telling him that all the people at the ſight of Galerita were in a great diſpoſition to riſe, he changed his mind, and reſolved to enter into Peruſia; and after he had ſent forth freſh Orders unto the Army to make haſt up, Porſenna in the head of theſe four hundred horſe entred the Town, after that Sicanus had acquainted all the friends of Aronces, who were at the houſe of the Princeſs of the Leontines; but as he related the buſineſs unto them, they received intelligence of all the paſſages at the Palace againſt Aronces, Galerita, and him, ſo as changing the deſign, they went to meet Porſenna, whom they adviſed to go ſtrait unto the Palace.

This King from whom his Priſon had not taken away his brave mind and Majeſty, marching through the ſtreets of Peruſia, followed with thoſe four hundred Horſe, and all the friends of Aronces and his own, which amounted to no ſmall number, did infinitely win upon the minds of the people; for he ſaluted them with all civility, and told them that he looked for nothing but the liberty of Galerita. Adding that Aronces was his Son, and that Mezentius knowing it, would have put him to death. The people were charmed with him, followed him to the Palace of Mezentius, as I told you, and would have helped him in the execution of his deſign: But to make it moſt manifeſt concerning the knowledge of Aronces, Flaura and her Husband deſired to enter, and did ſo, for then it was not a time to inſiſt upon Ceremonies. Nicius and Martia arrived alſo, and brought with them a Man whom Clelius ſent unto Aronces, by whom he ſent the ſame Cradle in which he was found floating upon the Sea, after Nicius had ſuffered ſhipwrack. So as there wanted nothing concerning the knowledge of Aronces, and Porſenna doing all things with unparalelled generoſity. Mezentius was ſo moved unto repentance, that he would needs reſign the government of his Dominions unto him that gave him his life: But Porſenna being both generous and prudent, he would not let Mezentius ceaſe Reigning: But what repentance ſoever appeared, he would not for all that remain under the power of a Prince who had uſed him with ſuch rigour: nor would he let Galerita, Aronces, nor any that had a deep hand in his liberty remain there. So that after Mezentius had ſent Orders unto all thoſe who commanded in the Towns which he had uſurped, Porſenna left him, and carried with him the Queen his Wife, and the Prince his Son. 'Tis true, he did not go out of the Town as ſoon as ever he was out of the Palace; for ſuch multitudes did choak up the ſtreets, by their eager deſires of ſeeing their Princeſs and Aronces, that they could not paſs. Aronces told Porſenna, that he owed his liberty chiefly unto the Princeſs of the Leontines, and that he would never go out of Peruſia before he knew whether it was her pleaſure or no to go out with them: So as for all the preſs he got into her houſe, and thanked her for all her favours. Mean while Galerita, who was in the Coach, willed the people to obey Mezentius; that they ſhould forget the rigour which had been uſed unto her, and keep within the compaſs of their duties. Whilſt ſhe was thus talking with much prudence and generoſity, the Princeſs of the Leontines was entreating Porſenna to let her be protected in his Court, ſhe conceiving her ſelf not ſafe with Mezentius, conſidering how ſhe had tranſacted. Alſo conſidering the love of Tiberinus to her, ſhe could not counterfeit with him any longer, ſince Aronces had no need of her, and therefore ſhe was very deſirous to go out of Peruſia; ſo as without more delay, Aronces went to acquaint the Queen of Cluſium, and preſently after did fetch this Princeſs, whom the Queen received into her Coach: Aurelia, Martia, Flavia, and the Women of the Princeſs of the Leontines did follow in other Coaches. All being ready, this Illuſtrious company went out of Peruſia; Tiberinus being gone into the Countrey for three days, was aſtoniſhed when he returned at night, and heard all this news, eſpecially that his adored Princeſs was not in Town; yet ſhe was not very far off, for Porſenna and all his Train paſſed away that night to a Village, where they took thought for nothing but how the Princeſs might paſs it away with the least inconveniency that was possible; and in the morning they took the way towards Clusium, where the news of Porsennas liberty and life of the Prince his Son was no sooner heard, but all those who opposed the party of that Legitimate King went out of it, so as the joy was universal; and when Porsenna came thither, he was received with extraordinary acclamations. Thus it may be said, that this Prince did upon a sudden pass from the lower degree of adversity unto the highest top of felicity; for he saw himself seated upon a glorious Throne, his Dominions were entirely restored unto him, he enjoyed his dearest Galerita, he found her still most rarely fair, and to sum up his felicities, he saw such a successor of his own as his own heart could wish. He offered publick Sacrifices in thanks to the Gods for his good fortune: The ancient magnificence of the Clusian Kings might be seen in the Palace of Porsenna: Feasts, Revels, and Pleasures arrived, and the publick tranquillity was so setled, that the Court had nothing to do but divert or be idle. The young Gallants of quality talked of nothing but delights, whilst the grave sort discoursed upon the designs of the Roman King, who was upon sitting down at the siege of Ardea, of which various reports went throughout all Italy. But whilst every one according to his genius was talking of War or Love, Aronces, the unfortunate Aronces, amidst so many apparent felicities, esteemed himself the most miserable of men; for he was never so much in love with Clelia as now, and had never less hopes. All the consolation he had was in talking of his misery unto the Princess of the Leontines and Celeres, who only knew of his affection unto this admirable Roman. He fancied, that if he could but only know where Clelia was, it would be a high comfort unto him, but he was not far from so much happiness: For one of those whom he had sent unto all the Towns of Italy, which were then Enemies to Rome, to enquire whether Horatius as the enemy of Tarquin was not retired thither, came and told him that he was at Ardea; that Clelia was there also, and that she was sick of a languishing disease. So as still he found himself in great perplexity, for all reports being that Tarquin was going to besiege Ardea, he knew not what course to take. He did not upon any terms think it convenient to acquaint the King his Father with his affection to Clelia, because as soon as ever he was set in the Throne, the King of Rome desiring to make sure of such a potent neighbour, had sent his Ambassadors unto him, to renew that ancient alliance which formerly had been between those two States: And indeed, the King of Clusium seeing that Rome was the most considerable Town of all Italy, and that there was none able to dispute against her, he was glad to accept of such an Allie, lest Mezemius should close in to his disadvantage. Thus there was a renewing of the Alliance between Porsenna and Tarquin, which made Aronces nor dare to tell the King his Father that he loved the daughter of one that was greatest enemy to the King of Rome, or that he was resolved never to marry any other; however he would not entertain the least thought of striving against his passion, but courted all possible opportunities to cherish it. If Ardea had not been besieged before he could get thither, there had been some hopes of a possibility to get Clelia out of his Rivals hands: But the Siege being begun already, he could not contrive his satisfaction any manner of way. All being secure in the Bed of Peace within the Dominions of the King his Father, the violence of his love prompted him to go out of Clusium without ever telling him, and try what he could do to procure the liberty of Clelia, and make himself happy: but the great difficulty was what he should do then; For truly (said he unto Celeres) what in any reason can I do in this unlucky conjuncture? Shall I get into Ardea, and defend my Rival by defending her? Dare I attempt to kill him in a beleagured Town, where when I have done it I cannot get Clelia out? For it is not credible that they who have given Horatius a retreat, will ever let me be master of my self if I should kill him. Or shall I go and fight under Tarquin who would have murthered Clelius? And shall I go and help him to take a Town, which when it is taken will expose Clelia unto servitude? What, what shall I do unfortunate man that I am? And yet something I must do, and I must do it presently if I mean to have it in my choice, whether I will go into Ardea, or into the Camp of Tarquin. Celeres knowing how he loved, he had no mind of fighting, but would have perswaded him to see the success of the siege before he fixed upon any resolution. Oh fie Celeres (replyed he, after he had heard all that his friend had to say) do you think I am able to be so tamely idle, as to stay in expectation of what will be the success of the siege; especially since I know that Clelia is there, and that she is sick? If you think so, you think me to be a very calm Lover; but to remove any such thoughts be assured, that though I know not whether I shall go into Ardea, or whether into the Army of Tarquin; though I know not whether I shall be Besieger or Besieged, yet one of them I will be, and therefore I will depart and that to morrow. Though it be not above two hours since I heard where Clelia and my Rival is, yet I think it to be an age; and that I should be the most unworthy of men, if I do not go immediately where my love invites me. But to let you see, my dear Celeres, how violent my passion is, let me tell you that I am a little joyed to hear that Clelia is sick of a languishing disease; for flattering my self I believe that her disease is not dangerous, and that I may look up. on it as an effect of her hatred unto Horatius, and of her affection unto Aronces. I believe I say that only melancholy is the cause, that my Rival is as ill as she; and such is the fantastical humour of my passion, I should be extremely grieved if when I see Clelia next, I should not find her somewhat less fair than the last time I had the happiness to see her. Do you think after all this, my dear Celeres, that a man whose love prompts unto such fantastical conceits, is able to stay out the success of a Siege? No, no, Celeres, my passion is not of so cold temper, and if you will continue the faithful Companion of my Fortunes, prepare your self to depart in the Morning. Aronces then embracing him by way of thanks, consulted with him whether he should acquaint the Princess of the Leontines with his design, but fearing lest her friendship unto him should induce her to reveal this secret unto the Queen of Clusium, who loved her very well, it was resolved he should only write unto her at parting, as well as unto Porsenna and Galerita. So as busying themselves only in taking Orders for his voyage, he dispatched a messenger into Capua to be informed of all passages from Clelius and Sulpicia, and to know what was become of Clelia and Horatius; and for this he made choice of the same man whom Clelius had entrusted with such things, as might make him him be known who he was. But to the end his Journey might be the more private, he took with him only two truſty ſlaves which he brought from Capua. Then after they had provided themſelves of all neceſſaries for ſuch a deſign, Aronces, Celeres, thoſe two ſlaves and Guide, went out of Cluſium juſt at midnight; for the King's Palace being at the Towns end, there was a Gate there; ſo as the two ſlaves being gone out in the Evening before, with ſuch Horſes as Aronces ſhould need for the journey, he and Celeres went out at this private Gate, by ſuborning the Man who kept the key, and unto whom he gave ſuch recompence as might be a ſufficient reward againſt the anger of Porſenna.

Thus after he had left Letters for the King his Father, for Galerita, and for the Princeſs of the Leontines, he went out of Cluſium, in ſuch a night as when the glittering Stars uſe to diſſipate the horrour of obſcurity, ſo as by that gloomy light coming neither from Sun nor Moon, they might very well travel, and know the way: But Aronces had not rid above three or four Miles, before he found a great cordial in his ſorrows: and how extraordinary ſoever the thing was which he did, yet he did it without any pain, becauſe he did it for Clelia. And when he imagined, that perhaps the day would come when ſhe ſhould know what he did, and would thank him for it; he was ready to ſacrifice himſelf and all the World unto his Love: He thought alſo, (ſo much did his paſſion flatter him) that Clelia did divine what he did for her; ſo as riding on with extraordinary ſpeed for fear of being followed, and meeting with none upon the way, Aronces for all his faſt riding, had leiſure enough to contemplate upon his paſſion; but the end of the night drawing on, and as it is uſual, growing darker than before, he was forced to ride a ſlower pace, until ſuch time as the Clouds began to be guilded from the Eaſt; and beſtow upon all the fields ſuch a pleaſing light, as imperceivably diſſipating all obſcurity, it ſeems to reſtore life unto all the beauties of Nature; ſince there was that morning no miſts, and Aronces being upon the top of a little Mountain, when day was light enough to diſcern all the varieties of the Earth which offer themſelves to the eye, he diſcovered a vaſt extent of Hills and Valleys; he eſpied a little Village, which Celeres ſeeing as well as he, the motion was made to reſt their Horſes ſome few hours, that afterwards they might make the more haſt from Cluſium. And indeed the guide told them that if they reſted not there, they could not reſt in any other within twenty miles: So as Aronces as forward as his love did prick him, conſented unto the propoſition, and leaving the road wherein they were, he rode to the left hand, to make towards this Village, which ſeemed as they did ride to ſteal out of the Paſſengers eye, for the further they rid the leſs they perceived it, by reaſon of ſeveral Hills which were about it. But he had not gone five or ſix hundred paces, before they diſcovered coming out of the moſt delectable Valley in the World, four Horſemen, and ſome ſlaves coming towards them: So as none being more cautious then a Lover who would conceal himſelf, Aronces asked Celeres, whether it were not better to take another way more on the right hand, and ſo ſhun thoſe whom they ſaw, who had taken up their Inn at that Town where he intended to ſtay, and who had began their Journey as he had ended his. For Celeres (ſaid he) it would be very diſaſtrous, if theſe Men ſhould meet us, and go afterwards unto Cluſium; there divulge which way we take, and you may well imagine that my departure makes a great noiſe in the Town, and when theſe Men hear of it, they will inform how they met two Men with two ſlaves and a guide. 'Tis true, ſaid Celeres, all this may chance; but if we ſhould turn out of the way, we ſhall make our ſelves more ſuſpicious unto theſe Men, then if we follow on our way; for ſince you ſee it is ſo little beaten, as if we take it, they muſt needs imagine that we took it only to avoid meeting with them; ſo as Aronces ſeeing ſome danger in his over prudence, he went on the way he took; but he had not gone a hundred paces, before he heard one of theſe Men ſing, and ſing very well. Ah Celeres (ſaid Aronces) certainly the Man whom we ſhall meet is not in love; or if he be, he is much more happier then I am. But coming nearer, he ſaw him leſs, though he heard him better; for the Road turning in that place, the corner of a Hill did hide him though he was nearer; ſo as diſtinctly underſtanding what he did ſing, he heard that the burthen, or Chorus of every Verſe ended thus:

And if Deliſa unfaithful be,
Barce is ſo, as well as ſhe.

Aronces no ſooner heard this Verſe, but the name of Barce, and the voice of him who ſung it, being not unknown to him: Oh Celeres (ſaid he) I am extremely miſtaken, if he who ſings be not Amilcar; at leaſt, I am ſure he made the Song which I hear. Celeres not hearing it ſo well as Aronces, becauſe he was talking to the guide, he did not believe it, and ſaid there was no likelihood of being him. He had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but the way turning again, he did not only ſee Amilcar, but Herminius alſo: So both being equally ſurpriſed, and equally glad to meet, they both alighted from their Horſes together; for Aronces would not then paſs for the Son of a King, nor be known for any ſuch by thoſe ſtrangers.

And he was always wont to ſay that friendſhip equals all Men, be of what quality they will. So as being alighted ſooner than they, and he went more of the way to meet Amilcar and Herminius, then they did in meeting him. But in requital, Amilcar ſpoke the firſt; for as Aronces did very tenderly embrace him, I am extremely glad (ſaid he unto him with a low voice and ſmiled) to find ſtill the generous Aronces in the perſon of a great Prince; for after I had ſeen Clelius at Capua, I was afraid, that I ſhould only find you to be the Son of a great King unto whom I could only be a ſervant, and not find you any longer my friend. Oh my dear Amilcar (replied Aronces) you had no reaſon to fear that; but you ſpeak it in ſuch a pleaſant manner, as I am very ready to pardon you, upon condition, that you always believe, I will always be Aronces unto my Friends, and will never be the Son of a King, unleſs to recompence them, when any occaſion ſhall preſent it ſelf. After this, he imbraced Herminius with abundance of joy; and he imbraced him as a Man whom he eſteemed moſt of any Man in the World. But in imbracing, is it your pleaſure, Sir (ſaid Herminius to him in a low voice) that Men ſhall not reverence you ſo much, but that they may alſo ſhew their amity and friendſhip? I wiſh it, generous Herminius (replied Aronces) and ſhall do as long as I live; for ſhould I not be the ſame unto you, that I was at the beginning, I ſhould be unworthy to be what I am.

After this, Amilcar and Herminius, preſented unto Aronces two Illuſtrious Grecians who were with them, and aſſured him, that they were Men worthy of his eſteem and friendſhip. Theſe Strangers being of a haughty mind, Aronces did eaſily believe what his Friend did tell him: One of theſe Illuſtrious Grecians, whoſe name was Zenocrates, was very tall, the features of his face pleaſing, and his Phyſiognomy ſo noble, as it did invite all eyes at the firſt ſight, to judge more favourably of him than of the other Greek, whoſe name was Artemidorus, though though the laſt of theſe was a Prince, and very handſome. But the greateſt advantage of Zenocrates was, that he had more in him than he promiſed, though he promiſed very much: And Amilcar alſo ſpoke more advantagiouſly of him unto Aronces, then he did of Artemidorus, whilſt Herminius was imbracing Celeres. After all which, Aronces began to ſpeak; by what happy adventure (ſaid he) hath fortune brought together an Illuſtrious African, a generous Roman, and two worthy Grecians? And what good Fate made us meet them? For when I parted from Carthage, Amilcar was in a mind never to ſee Italy a ſecond time: When I parted from Capua, Herminius was gone into Africa; and yet I meet them in a place, where I never could imagine to ſee them: But the worſt is (ſaid he unto them) that you go towards the place from whence I came, and that I cannot return with you, and that my Deſtiny doth call me on.

Since our buſineſs to Cluſium was only to ſee you, Sir (replied Amilcar) we will go whither you will. As for Herminius ſo he be not in Rome, where he dares not appear, he is willing to be where either you or I am. And as for Zenocrates, he is a Freeman of all the World except one place only, and he hath this advantage that he loves to be any where, where there is good company. 'Tis true, added he, that for Artemidorus, he cannot meet with any happineſs in any place, but only one, where he cannot be: And there is ſome kind of magnetick thing at Rome, which makes Herminius think himſelf not very well any where elſe: But for all that, ſince they cannot be where they would, they had better be with you, than in any other place of the World: And therefore it is you, Sir, that muſt ſhew us our way; for, as for me I am ready to face about, and for three months you may diſpoſe of me as you pleaſe. You may do the ſame, Sir (added Herminius and ſmiled) without any great obligation unto the incomparaple Amilcar; for his humour is ſuch, that he is well any where, and it may well be ſaid, that he can make his own felicity. After this, Aronces asked ſome news of the Prince of Carthage; and then all taking Horſe, they went unto that Village where Amilcar, Herminius, and thoſe worthy Grecians did lie the night before. And though the ſoul of Aronces could not be at reſt until he was further from Cluſium, yet he was very deſirous to talk with Amilcar and Herminius in private, whilſt their Horſes reſted. During which time, Celeres whom Amilcar had embraced, did entertain thoſe illuſtrious Greeks; for he ſpoke their language.

As for Aronces, he being the moſt obliging perſon upon earth, and knowing that every one had rather relate their own adventures, than hear others, he did very obligingly deſire to know the fortunes of two friends; but they had no mind to ſatisfie his curioſity, until he had ſatisfied them why he left Cluſium, and travelled in this private condition. For they underſtood by Clelius, that he was the Son of Porſenna, and they heard by the way that he was owned to be ſo. So as he acquainted them in as ſhort a manner as he could, with all paſſages ſince his departure from Capua, for Amilcar ſaved him the labour of relating what happened ſince he came from Carthage, by telling him that Herminius had related it to him. But as great a care as Aronces took to ſhorten his relation, the time which they deſigned for reſting their Horſes was expired before he ended: So as he could know no more of Amilcar and Herminius, but that the laſt of theſe met the firſt upon the Sea, who had thoſe two illuſtrious Greeks with him, and that the Prince of Carthage who had reconciled himſelf with that Republick whoſe name he bore, had ſent him into Italy, upon a deſign which concerned Sicily, and which he ſhould know when they had more leiſure. After which, all taking Horſe they took their way towards Ardea, and yet they would not come too near it, until they knew the ſtate of things: So as finding a little Town in their way, which was not above ten miles off it, they ſtayed there to inform themſelves: For ſince Aronces was not well reſolved whether he ſhould go into Ardea, or unto Tarquin, who was yet at Rome, though he had ſome Troops alteady about the Town, it was requiſite for him that he ſtayed there: Alſo Herminius could not follow him neither unto the Camp, nor into Rome: He was willing to go into Ardea, both as friend unto Aronces and as enemy unto Tarquin, but he would not venture himſelf in the hands of a Prince, with whom he would not be reconciled if he could. So as after they came to this little Town where they ſtayed, they reſolved that ſince Celeres could not be known in Rome, and ſince he had no enemies, that he ſhould go and know certainly whether that Prince had any real deſign of beſieging Ardea: At the ſame time Aronces ſent one of his Slaves who was both witty and truſty unto Ardea, to know whether or no Clelia was there ſtill; for he was afraid to reſolve upon any courſe, which in lieu of bringing him nearer that perſon, it ſhould ſet him further off.

So as Aronces, Artemidorus, Zenocrates, Amilcar and Herminius, reſted in expectation within that Town, where nothing was talked on but the power of Tarquin, his violences and injuſtice. But how is it poſſible (ſaid Artemidorus) that this Prince can be ſuch a one as Fame ſpeaks him, ſince it appears that he bears ſome reverence unto the Gods; for he ſent two of his Sons unto Delphos with offerings, and I have heard ſay, that he hath built a ſtately Temple in Rome, which he did dedicate unto Jupiter. Did you know Tarquin, replied Herminius, you would not wonder he ſhould make a ſhew of ſome reverence to the Gods; for then you would plainly ſee, that all the Religion he hath is to ſerve his policy. Not but that there are ſome men, who ſay that he is not very well reſolved in his own thoughts, and that he does not well know whether he ſhould or he ſhould not believe there are are any Gods. And for my part, I can never believe that a prince whoſe ambition hurries him to violate all manner of rights, and to commit all ſorts of crimes ſo long time together, can believe there are any Gods. Men queſtionleſs may ſometimes out of weakneſs fail, (ſaid Zenocrates then) but when they do obſtinately continue in a long courſe of wickedneſs, I think it may well be concluded that thoſe who live ſo, do not believe there is any thing above their heads which they ought to fear. Truth is (ſaid Herminius) did Artemidorus know what the actions of Tarquin are; what are his Laws, and by what ways he came to the Throne; how he hath maintained it, and what are his maxims, he will with me believe that he never thinks of any Gods. Since happily I may have ſome negotiations with that Prince, ſaid Amilcar, I ſhould be very glad to know all his life: For my particular, ſaid Artemidorus, I am extremely full of curioſity to know it. And for my part, added Zenocrates, I ſhall be glad alſo to hear it; though I know very much of him already. As for me, ſaid Aronces, though I have heard him diſcourſed of a thouſand times unto Clelius, yet I muſt confeſs I do not know the whole Series of his Hiſtory, and Herminius would much oblige me in telling of it: for ſince I know not yet whether I ſhall be on his ſide or no, I ſhall be very glad to know him a little better than I do; eſpecially ſince we have now leiſure enough to hear his Hiſtory. For my particular (ſaid Artemidorus) I would if I durſt deſire a little more, for I muſt confeſs that I do as much deſire to hear the Hiſtory of Rome, as the Hiſtory of Tarquin. The Story of that Prince is ſo mixed with that of Rome (replied Herminius) as one cannot tell the one but he muſt alſo tell all that relates unto the other. Since ſo (ſaid Aronces) I beſeech you ſatisfie the curioſity of Artemidorus, and addteſs your ſpeech unto him, ſince he hath the leaſt knowledge in the things which you are to tell. Zenocrates approving of what Aronces ſaid, and Herminius conſenting unto what theſe three illuſtrious perſons deſired, he recollected into his memory all that was requiſite for their better underſtanding the life of a Prince, whoſe name made ſuch a noiſe through all Italy: And after he had ſhut the Chamber door to the end none ſhould interrupt him, he began in theſe terms, but he ſpoke in his own language; which Artemidorus did underſtand, though he ſpoke it not.

The Hiſtory of Tarquin the Proud.

I Am to relate ſuch great, ſuch excellent, and ſuch terrible things unto you; as I cannot tell whether I am able to order my method ſo, as ſhall make my Relation pleaſing; for I know not very well how I can in few words contain the Hiſtory of a great City, which hath been governed by ſix Kings, which ſeemed to have ſhared among themſelves all the virtues; and after them I know not how I ſhould ſpeak of a Prince who is branded with all manner of Vices and Crimes. I know not I ſay, how I ſhould in a ſhort time acquaint you with the moſt diſmal effects that ever Love and Ambition cauſed theſe many ages: and yet I am reſolved to touch upon all that is neceſſary to make the injuſtice of Tarquin to appear, or at the leaſt to paſs ſo ſlightly over the Reigns of thoſe Kings who did precede him, that I may have time enough to aggravate all the Crimes of a Prince, who can never be enough hated. I will not therefore inſiſt upon a previous diſcourſe of Romes Original; for is there any men at Africa, that knows not the prodigious adventures of the famous Remus and Romulus, who are ſaid to be ſons of Mars by a Veſtal? Who knows not, I ſay, unto what they were expoſed by the Commandment of the King their Uncle, called Amulius, who had uſurped that Kingdom which belonged unto their Mother? who knows not alſo that the Cradle wherein they were, and which was left in the midſt of a Deſart, was found out by a She Wolf, which the cries of theſe two Infants invited thither? who knows not how it is ſaid, the Wolf did let them ſuck her under a Fig-tree, which at this day is called the Romulian Fig-tree? and that others ſay; a Shepheard finding them, did carry them home to his Wife who nouriſhed them? However it be, they lived and came to be great and brave men. Remus was taken priſoner and delivered by his Brother, after which they both of them joyned in the killing of him who had uſurped the Kingdom which belonged unto them. After this, they made a peace with Numitor, Brother unto him whom they had killed, and leaving him quiet in his own Dominions, a deſire took them to build the famous City of Rome, which Tarquin at this day would deſtroy, and they built it in the ſame place where they were left in the Deſart, and where they were found: Theſe two Brothers began to build it the One and Twentieth day of April, in the eighteenth year of their age. Indeed, generous Artemidorus, ſince I ſuppoſe you know how that the deſires of Reigning did divide them, and that the death of the one did eſtabliſh the Throne of the other, I ſhall not trouble you with any more. But let me tell you that in a very ſhort time, this new City unto which Romulus gave his own name, was as potent as any of the moſt ancient about it. The cauſe of its being ſo ſoon populated was, becauſe Romulus eſtabliſhed an inviolable Sanctuary between two little Groves, which were held for ſacred, and whither whoſoever retired was in ſafety. So as by this means, he drew ſubjects unto himſelf from all the Neighbour Towns, where any men were who feared puniſhment for any crime. Moreover, it is well known, that he did worſhip all thoſe Gods, which thoſe of Altes adored, and that he would have Hercules reverenced as he is in Greece. Afterwards that famous plundering of the Sabines made him talked of through all Italy: He eſtabliſhed excellent orders in the Town; he did wonders in feats of War; he defied all his enemies; he killed the King Tatius with his own hand; he Triumphed in Rome: The Wars with the Cernebans, the Cruſtivanians, the Antemians, the Sabines, were all glorious unto Romulus, though the power was divided for a while. Afterwards the War with the Fidenatians began, then the Vientaneans followed, and in both Romulus got eternal glory. But after he had puniſhed the injuſtice done unto his Mother, after he had eſtabliſhed ſeveral good Laws; after he had performed many glorious Feats of War; killed Kings, triumphed ſolemnly, and given peace to his people, he ceaſed to Reign in ceaſing to live. Some thought that the hundred Senators whom he had eſtabliſhed, procured him to be murthered that they might Reign: Others ſaid, that he only vaniſhed; but the opinion of ſuch as do not uſe to follow the vogue of the blind vulgar was, that there was one whoſe name was Proculus, who ſeeing the people ready to fall upon the Senators; to appeaſe them came and told them; that Romulus did appear unto him aſcending up into Heaven; and aſſured them, that their Town ſhould be Miſtreſs of the whole Earth. So as the immortality of Romulus, and this happy preſage qualifying the people, their whole thoughts were, how they ſhould render ſuch honour unto him as unto the Gods. This Artemidorus was the original of Rome: and this was their firſt King, who doubtleſs was both valiant and wiſe, and fully accompliſhed for the eſtabliſhing of an Empire. For my part, it is ſuch a terrour to me when I conſider how the ſame people who never were governed, but by valiant wiſe and vertuous Kings, can brook the government of a Tyrant, that I tremble at it, And to induce you into my opinion, before I ſatisfie your Curioſity, I would ſpeak ſomething of all thoſe who preceeded him. Know then that according to the firſt Law which Romulus had eſtabliſhed, which was, that the people ſhould chuſe their Kings, and that this election ſhould be confirmed or refuſed by the Senators which he had inſtituted: A man of high vertues called Numa Pompilius, was choſen King of Rome by univerſal conſent; and certainly moſt deſervedly, for he was indowed with all the virtues of the ancient Sabines from whence he was deſcended. He was prudent, pacifique and religious; and it may well be ſaid, that the Gods would by his Prudence and Piety eſtabliſh that Throne which Romulus had erected by his Power and courage; he ſpent the whole three and forty years which he reigned, only in regulating matters of Religion, making of Laws, extinguiſhing thoſe vices which the War had introduced; in teaching virtue, in woing men to Peace, in building Temples; in doing Juſtice unto men, and in reverencing the Gods, It was he who ſet up the Veſtals in Rome, the inſtitution whereof was before at Albez: This was he who inſtituted the Salian Prieſts and all their Ceremonies: This was he who did regulate the Months; it was he who built the famous Temple of Janus, which is alwayes open in time of War, and always ſhut in time of Peace, this was he, who to teſtifie his love of the Sciences and Arts, did conſecrate a Grove unto the Muſes, unto which he would often retire himſelf. It was ſaid, that it was there where a Nymph named Egeria, came to inſpire him in all things he did. But after a three and forty years peace had given him leaſure to inſpire his people, with the love of Wiſdom, he died; and one of the moſt valiant men upon Earth was choſen in his place: But this Prince being a greater Souldier than Romulus, he began the famous War of Albe, which had ſuch glorious ſucceſs, that he ruined one of the greateſt Cities upon Earth, or to ſay better, he joyned it unto Rome, and of two Peoples, made but one: The famous Combate of the three Horatij, againſt the three Curatij, was fought during his Reign; after which the Fideates and the Vecentines incited by thoſe of Albe, renewed the War: But Tullus, maugre all oppoſition, vanquiſhed his Enemies, deſtroyed the famous City of Albe, and augmented the glory of Rome, he had after another War againſt the Sabines, whom he vanquiſhed; but after he had beſtowed half his Reign in imitation of Romulus, he beſtowed the other half in imitation of Numa; for he did not only become Religious as he was, but even ſuperſtitious.

But at laſt, a Thunder-bolt having ended his life and his Reign, another man, called Ancus Martius, who was Son unto a Daughter of Numa Pompilius, was choſen King of Rome, ſo as emulating the glory of reſembling his Grand-father, he began to cauſe all his Ordinances to be obſerved. But fearing leſt his neighbours, ſhould draw ſome advantage from his Piety, he began to beſtir himſelf in matters Military, wherein matters of Religion had no ſhare, that his enemies might ſee, he thought of War in time of Peace. And indeed the people of Latium falling upon him; he vanquiſhed them, and alſo the Sabines, and afterwards he lived in Peace: It was he who built the firſt Priſon in Rome, and who built a Bridge over Tiber; it was he who incloſed the Mount Aventine and of Janicula within the Wall of the Town, and who built the City of Oſtia? but after a Reign of four and twenty years, he died: But after he had prohibited all his Subjects from ſetting up any new Religions of their own fancy; and commanded them to be conformable unto that which was eſtabliſhed in the State. Hitherto, Generous Artemidorus, all I have ſaid hath no relation to the ſtory of Tarquin the Proud: nor would I have related it, but becauſe it was your deſire. But now I am to treat of the fifth King of Rome, I muſt tell you that if he had not been King, Tarquin who Reigns at this day, had never been her Tyrant. And therefore it is requiſite I ſpeak a little larger upon the firſt of the Tarquins; who as he was a Greek originally, and Ambition made him do many brave things, ſo it is the ſame paſſion which cauſed ſo many Crimes in his Succeſſor, and for divers reaſons I muſt enlarge my ſelf upon this Subject: Know then, that a man called Demarathus of the City of Corinth, being forced to leave his Countrey, becauſe it was divided, and the ſide which he took proved the weaker, he came to dwell in a Town called Tarquinia, where he married and where he had a Son called Lucumo, and another who died.

Mean time, Lucumo being heir unto his Father who was very rich, he married a Woman of great quality and high ſpirit, who was called Tanaquil. And not enduring that her Husband ſhould dwell in a Town, where Ambition was an unprofitable paſſion, ſhe perſwaded him to go and dwell at Rome, where vertue was recompenced, and where the happy might happily become Kings, as experience had ſhewed. And in order to this, they ſetled their affairs and came to Rome. But in coming Lucumo a happy Omen which is known over all the World; alſo ſuppoſing you have heard what happened unto him as he was in the Coach with Tanaquil, I will only tell you how an Eagle hovering in the Air came gently to him, and took off his Head a Cap which he wore, according to the Tuſcan mode, and after the Eagle had ſoared with it as high as the Clouds, ſhe came down and put it upon his head again: And I muſt tell you that Tanaquil being a Tuſcan, and having ſome skill in Augury, ſhe was ſo extremely joyed at this happy Preſage, and ſo aſſured her ſelf it would be ſeconded with happy effects, that ſhe imbraced her Husband and told him, that there was no grandure ſo high but he might hope for it. So as Lucumo ſuffering his Ambition to be flattered by ſuch ſweet hopes, he entred Rome; where he no ſooner was but he went to the King, and offered him his perſon, and all he had for the ſervice of the State; and the truth is, he diſburſed much towards the Wars upon divers occaſions. And to be ſuitable every way unto the Cuſtom of Rome, he quitted the name of Lucumo, becauſe it was the Roman Cuſtom to have two names, whereof one is particular and the other is the name of the family.

So

So he took the name of Lucius for the first name, and of the Town Tarquinia where he was born, he made the name of Tarquinius; so as he called himself Lucius Tarquinius; and left off the name of Lucumo. Moreover he was affable, civil, and popular; he Courted occasions to do men courtesies, to the end he might oblige them; and he got such credit during the reign of Ancus, that this Prince determined upon nothing without him; also he was very powerful in the Senate, and extremely beloved of the people. The King left him Guardian of his Children by his Testament, so as making use of this favourable conjuncture to satisfie his Ambition, he did openly labour for the Crown before Ancus was dead: Declaring that though he was a stranger, yet that ought not to be any obstacle, since Tatius and Numa were such and yet Reigned. But to the end his design might take effect, the day that the people were to elect a King, he sent the young Princes unto whom he was Guardian to a hunting, lest their presence should put the People in memory of the great qualities of their Father, and invite them to elect one of them two. And the common opinion was, that but for this trick Lucumo had not been King as he was: The truth is he was a very glorious King, for he acted nothing but great things ever since he was chosen: His very pleasures were magnificent, for it was he who instituted the Circensian Games, so famous throughout all Italy, and who built that which we call the Circle, which is between the Mount Palatine and the Mount Aventine. He was wont to say, that in all things there ought to be a difference between Kings and Subjects, even in their very Pleasures; and that it was absolutely necessary, there should be a character of Royalty upon every action of a King, be it in great or little matters, As for Martial matters, he is eternized, for his Acts against the Latines were all glory; he triumphed over the Sabines, and brought the City of Collatia unto subjection, as he had before the City of Appiola; afterwards undertaking a second War against the people of Latium, he became Master of all their strong places one after another; for he took Cornicula, Ficulnia, Cumeria, Crustumerla, Ameriala, Medulla and Nomenta.

After all this he employed himself in building publick places of eternal memory; and he built one purposely to keep the people from being idle: After many great and good works which he did, either for the conveniency or Ornament of the Town; he laid the foundation of the Temple of Jupiter, which is within the Capitol, only to fulfil a vow which he made during the War against the Sabines. But before I speak of his death, I must tell you several passages purposely to make you the more hate Tarquin the Proud when I shall come to relate his life, and acquaint you with his Crimes. Know therefore, that at the taking of Cornicula, there was among the Captives, a woman, (whose Husband died at this Siege) who was said to be very handsome and of good quality, and who was preferred unto the Service of Tanaquil; also she being big with Child, she was brought to bed in the Palace; for both being fair and witty and vertuous, Tanaquil did love her, and took a care of her: So as being delivered of a Son, he was brought up in the Palace; where they said this Child whose name was Servius Tullus, had his head all environed with a flame always when he slept, This Prodigie making a great noise, the King went to see it and Tanaquil also; who would not suffer any Water to be cast to quench the flame, but assured her Husband out of her knowledge in presages, that this Child should one day be the light of the State, and the greatest support of the Royal Family. The King remembring what Tanaquil said concerning the Eagle, and that all came truly to pass; he gave credit unto her this second time, as at the first; he took so great a care for the good education of the young Servius Tullus, that he grew to be so excellent in every thing, as the King gave him his Daughter in marriage. But after this, the Son of the Predecessor unto Lucius Tarquinius, who pretended that he had hindred him from Reigning, being much incensed to foresee that Servius was like to Reign in his prejudice, he resolved upon a revenge for him, from whom they thought the injury proceeded: And indeed, they caused him to be murthered by pretended people, who upon a pretence of going to ask Justice of the King, did kill him in his own Palace; but since all the assassinates fled after the fact, Tanaquil not using any fruitless Complaints caused the Gates of the Palace to be shut, to the end this News should not be divulged, she encouraged Servius Tullus to mount the Throne; she spoke unto the people out of the Windows, and told them that the King was not dead; but that he recovered, and that ere long they should see him; and that in the mean while Servius Tullus should do them Justice: And Servius Tullus being gone out of the Palace in the Robe Royal, which we call Trabea, he did render Justice unto each one in particular, seeming as if he referred all to the King, as if he were not dead: indeed both Tanaquil and Servius Tullus did carry all matters so cunningly, as the death of the King was concealed many days. During which time, the Children of Ancus Martius, who had caused the Successor of their Father to be murthered, retired unto Pometia; for those whom they employed in the crime being taken, and perceiving the power of Servius Tullus established, they knew not what course to take: And the truth is, Tullus having all the Patricians for him, was declared King, without any insisting upon the Suffrages of the people. 'Tis true, he was in very great esteem, and so generally beloved that this Ceremony was useless. Thus Tullus mounted the Throne; and with so much glory as none of his Predecessors did ever exceed him. For it was generally agreed by all sides, that he was the owner of all the virtues, and not of one vice. He had also the good fortune to have the advantage in Martial affairs, for he won a famous Battel against the Vejentines. And at his return to Rome he did an act which merited immortal Praise: For hearing how those who envied the grandure of his fortune, did say, that he was only chosen by the Patricians, and that the People had not contributed their suffrages, he resolved though those who said so were not in any capacity to hurt him, yet to surrender his Authority; and publickly declared that he would not stand upon the legs of Patrician election, but that if the people would not have him Reign he was ready to quit the Crown. But believe it, in thus descending a step lower, he ascended a step higher upon the Throne; and by submitting to quit a Crown, he fastned it upon his head.

For the people being always much taken with surprising actions; the people of Rome were so charm'd to see a King submit unto their suffrages, that he was pro-proclaimed King the second time, with more acclamations and applauds than ever any of his Predecessors. However, as soon as he was settled in the Throne he shewed his Authority; for it may be said that he shook all the foundations of his State, by the several Laws which he made, be it either by regulating all qualities, or distribution of Goods, or contribution of all particulars towards publick affairs, or Military Discipline, or by the general Rule of the whole Kingdom. He enclosed the Mount Viminal, and the Mount Quirinal within the City, he built a Temple unto the honour of Diana, and many other publick edifices.

All this while, he found great happiness in the society of Tanaquil; and much more in the rare virtues of the Queen his Wife: But his sorrow was that he had only two Daughters; and to hear that Tarquin the Proud who Reigns at this day, and a Brother which he then had should murmure in secret, that they being Children of the late King, should be so far from the Throne. So as Servius being all goodness, generosity, and prudence, he began to look upon him with a very favourable eye, and to speak, as if he intended to bestow his two Daughters upon those two Brothers. But before I tell you any more, I must describe unto you these four persons, of whom this History is composed, to the end you may the more clearly see the crimes of Tarquin. Know then, that the two Daughters of Servius Tullus, were then both of them very fair, though they were different one from another in every thing, yet the name of them both was Tullia; but for distinction in our Court, the Elder was called the Princess without her name, and the younger the Princess Tullia. But to tell you truly, the Elder was the Elder in all things; for she was fair, full of wit, sweetness, modesty, civility, vigue, and infinitely charming. Her beauty was brown, but lovely, especially by reason of a certain kind of sweet langnor which she had without any affectation, which inspires tenderness, and moveth love, far sooner then a sparkling and sprightly Air. Her stature was of the middle size, her eyes sweet, all the composure of her Face was lovely, and there was an unconceivable charm in every part of her person. Her humour was equal, and her Soul tender; she affected glory, and she would not buy any grandeur, at the rate of any baseness; for she did not think it impossible, but one might be happy, and not be a Queen. The Princess Tullia was nothing like her, for she was big, fair, and that very fair, but her beauty had that fierceness in it, as resembled an Amazonian Air, and it may be said, she was fair, but not lovely; her looks were bold, her actions disordered, her voice shril, her spirit imperious, her soul ambitious, and she was so naturally inclin'd, never to submit unto any, that from her very infancy, she always made her Elder Sister stand in awe of her, whose disposition was rather to obey, then obstinately to resist. Moreover the Princess Tullia was ever full of dissimulation, malice, and disguisement, and above all she was ambitious; so as though the Princess her Sister was one of the most sweet and charming Persons in the whole World, as I have heard a Cousin of mine say, who had the honour of her acquaintance, yet she did most horribly hate her, without any other reason in the World, but only because she was Elder, and because she imagined that Servius Tullus loving her the better, her fortune would be better. And on the other side, Tarquin and the Prince his Brother, they also were very unresemblant, and as much unlike, as these two Princesses were unto each other. But it was after another manner, for the younger of these was fair, handsome, of a sweet, moderate, and agreeable spirit, and all his inclinations were noble, and though he did affect glory, yet ambition was not the predominate passion of his heart, but was more inclinable unto Love then that turbulent passion. But as for Tarquin he did not resemble him in any thing; for he was big though far from a handsome stature; his Physiognomy was gloomy and fierce, his looks were melancholy and disdainful, his mind base and poor, but he had the boldest heart in the World, the greatest spirit upon Earth, and the most prodigiously ambitious, that ever was any. Moreover, his fancy was quick and ready, which made some turbulency appear in all his actions, so as one would say he was always upon some grand design. As for matter of pleasure he never seemed sensible of any, and doubtless his supreme felicity consisted only in this, that he could see nothing above him, so as it may very well be said, that he loved grandeur only for it self, and not at all for those diversions which follow it. He would always make use of any thing which might conduce to the satisfaction of ambition; when he thought it convenient to express some signs of his Piety, to blind the people, he would then send offerings unto Delphos, he would build Temples, and his prophane intentions would imploy all sacred things, when he thought them conducing to the execution of his designs. But on the contrary when he thought there was no need of any pretences, cloaks, and colours to dazle and blind the people, then he would make no scruple at ruining of Orphans, and both by Steel and Poison murther Innocents; and indeed, he never thought that to be a paricide, and ungrateful, were crimes. This Artemidorus, is the true Character of Tarquin, as he was, and as he is: The Elder of the two Princesses was fair and virtuous; the younger fierce and ambitious: and in contrary to this order, the Elder of the two Princes who were designed for them, was ill-favoured, proud, and wicked; and the younger was pleasing, handsome, and virtuous. So as according to the order of Nature, he who had no virtue, was to marry her who was virtuous; and he who had all noble inclinations, was to marry her who had all the ill; but to take the matter a little further off, be pleased to know, that before the King had explained himself concerning this marriage, Tarquin and the Prince his Brother, had ever a great familiarity with these two young Princesses. For the Queen, who was the Daughter of Tanaquil had so dearly loved the first of the Tarquin's who was her Father, that she took a particular care, these two young Tullia's should live very respectively with these two young Princes who were of the same house, But there being a great suitableness between Tarquin and the Princess Tullia; and the like also between the Princess and the Brother of Tarquin (who was called the Prince of Ameriola, because he had preserved that Town by discovering a Conspiracy) so it was, that the Virtuous loved the Virtuous, and ambition had a natural inclination to ambition. Yet notwithstanding, since he was the Elder, and she was not; and since he observed that the King loved the Princess, better than the Princess Tullia, he concealed his inclination. But on the contrary, the Princess Princeſs Tullia conceiving it would be more advantagious to her to marry Tarquin, then the Prince of Ameriola, becauſe he was the Elder, and more ambitious then his Brother, ſhe uſed all her endeavours to get him for her Husband. In the mean time, there being a ſympathetical conformity of humours, between the Prince of Ameriola and the Princeſs, they knew that they loved one another without telling of it; and there was ſuch a violent inclination to each other, that they were not able to hide it. And indeed, there was always ſuch a conformity of mind between them, as they were never ſeen to differ in any opinion. On the contrary Tarquin and Tullia were always ſo oppoſite unto them, that no two contraries could be more; for never any conference hapned, though of matters never ſo indifferent, but the Princeſs Tullia would be ſure to contradict her Siſter and the Prince of Ameriola; alſo Tarquin and the Prince his Brother, were never of one opinion.

I remember one day above the reſt, when theſe two Princes and Princeſſes were all together, that the converſation of that day were upon ſuch ſubjects, as made the various opinions of theſe two Princeſſes and theſe two Princes moſt manifeſtly appear. You muſt know, that the King who bore a particular veneration unto the Veſtals finding that thoſe four who were already inſtituted, had much ado to keep in the ſacred fire, would have two more added unto the number. And this Ceremony not being often to be ſeen, the two Princeſſes had a mind to ſee it, and did ſo the day before this converſation which I am to relate unto you. Indeed this Ceremony was worth the ſight, and therefore worthy of my relation unto you. At the firſt, the High Prieſt makes choice of twenty Virgins of quality, all under ten years of Age, and all without any defect either in body or mind: Then caſting their names into a Lottery, the firſt who is drawn is the new Veſtal: Then the Parents committing her into the hands of the High Prieſt, they cut her Hair off with a great deal of Ceremony, and after do go and receive her at a certain Tree deſtined unto this uſe, which we call Lotos. And afterwards they put upon her the habit of a Veſtal, which is, a great, long, and high Caul, from which hangs negligently, variety of Ribonds and Taſſels: then they put her ſuch a Veil as the Veſtals uſe to wear when they ſacrifice, which is buckled under their Chins with Lockets of Diamonds: As for their Robes, they are white, plated, and very ornamental; and over all they wear a purple Mantle which renders their dreſs very handſome and noble. And this habit being given them with a great deal of Ceremony and obſervance: there are always much company to ſee them. And when the Veſtal is once within the Temple of Veſta, no more of any paſſages is to be ſeen; for they only are priviledged to enter except the High Prieſt. So there being two Veſtals choſen at once, it was the whole diſcourſe; and the two Princeſſes according to their ſeveral inclinations diſcourſed upon this Ceremony. For my part (ſaid the Princeſs Tullia) I conceive, that ſince they will have Veſtals, they did very wiſely to make choice of them under ten years of Age, and before reaſon had imprinted it ſelf in them; for maugre all the fine priviledges they enjoy, and all the honours which are done unto them, I had rather be any thing then a Veſtal. For my particular (ſaid the Princeſs then) I am not of your opinion; for I do find ſomething ſo noble and glorious in the Function of the Veſtals, that I never ſee them, but I do envy them. For it is only in them, that our Sex is held in any Rank and Conſideration, ſince in all other conditions, they do not hold their own rank, but only that of their Parents: If a Woman be not married, then ſhe is more or leſs valued according to the rank of her Father, and if ſhe have a Husband, it is according to his quality that ſhe is more or leſs honoured. But as for the Veſtals their conſideration is from themſelves; and they are honoured by all that is greateſt in Rome, ſince they are honoured by the King. What the Princeſs ſaith (replied the Prince of Ameriola) is ſo judiciouſly ſpoken, as I conceive, none can contradict her. Though there was no other reaſon (replied Tarquin) to make me think the Veſtals but a ſort of miſerable things, then that they muſt dream out thirty years, and ſtill be nothing elſe but a Veſtal, and never aſpire higher, this I ſay, keeps me from envying their condition; for I care not for a dry and unprofitable paſſion, which can never be ſerviceable to me. For my part (ſaid the Princeſs Tullia) I am clearly of Tarquin's mind, and ſay again, that ſince they will have Veſtals, they do very well to take them before reaſon comes into them; for I am ſo far from eſtabliſhing new Laws and Slaveries, as I do freely allow the ſame Liberty unto all which nature and cuſtom have allowed Women: And if I ſhould freely ſay, what I think, perhaps I ſhould tell you, that were it in my choice either to be a valiant Souldier, or a Veſtal, or even what I am, I ſhould make choice of being rather valiant, than either a Veſtal or a Princeſs as I am, ſo little am I ſatisfied with my own Sex. How Madam, (replied the Prince of Ameriola) can you renounce your beauty and the Empire which it gives unto your Sex over the hearts of Men, to be a ſilly Souldier, rather then a great Princeſs? Yes (replied ſhe ſharply) and I am ſometimes ſo aſhamed at my being born a Slave, that were my Fetters ſuch as could be broken, it ſhould not be long before I would break them. Oh Siſter (replied the Princeſs) doubtleſs you know not what you ſay; for methinks our Sex hath a thouſand advantages above that of Men; for firſt it injoys an eternal peace, ſince we are not obliged to go unto the Wars, and the ſame honour which invites Men unto it, forbids us. Beauty, as the Prince of Ameriola well obſerved, is our ſupreme Prerogative; we have the deſtinies of Men in our hands: Alſo we are diſpenced with, for taking the pains in obtaining the Arts and Sciences; ignorance in us is no fault, there is no neceſſity of being valiant, a little wit, and much modeſty will ſerve to make a complete Woman; but on the contrary to make a complete Man, there muſt be a thouſand great qualifications both natural and acquired. It is confeſſed (replied Tarquin) that there is much wit in your language; but for all that I am of the Princeſs Tullia's mind, and had rather be a private Souldier then any Woman. For to tell you truly, a Souldier may become a King, but a Woman can never become free. I pray tell me (ſaid the Princeſs Tullia) in what condition can we find liberty? When we are firſt born, we are not only Slaves to our Parents, who diſpoſe of us as they pleaſe, and make Veſtals of us when fancy takes them; but we are ſlaves alſo unto cuſtom and decency; for as ſoon as reaſon begins to make us diſcern things, they tell us that we muſt ſubmit our

ſelves unto the cuſtom and faſhion. Alſo we are more miſerable at Rome than any where elſe, where the Ladies have a fancy, that becauſe the Romans are more valiant than other people, therefore their women muſt be more ſevere, more reſerved, more ignorant, and more ſolitary; it is true as my Siſter ſaid, that a few good qualities will ſerve one of our Sex to get much reputation, but it is as true alſo that this is an infinite ſhame unto us; for it is as much as to ſay, that we are not capable of more: Oh Madam, replied the Prince of Ameriola, I muſt needs be the defender of your Sex againſt you; for I am fully perſwaded that Ladies are capable of all the virtues, and that they have more wit than we. For if we do carefully obſerve both men and women in places where their education is alike, as in the Country, we ſhall find much more wit in the women than in the men, and conclude, that Nature hath given more unto you than us.

I do grant all this to be true (replied Tullia) and to ſpeak in general we have better fancies, and fuller of imagination than men; but it muſt be confeſſed withal that we do want courage and hearts; we are contented to be the chief Slave of the houſe, and oftentimes worſe uſed. Nay we have not ſo much liberty as to make choice of our Maſters, for we are oftentimes forced to marry againſt our inclinations and it is commonly ſeen that all the great wit which the Gods have given us, is employed only in trivial talk, and thoſe who are moſt eſteemed amongſt us, do make leaſt uſe of their wit but conceal it as careful as they can, and endeavour to be owner of only one virtue which in my opinion is very difficult to be practiſed. Mean time, becaule the world hath a fancy that women are weak, and that they are put to a great deal of pains to keep themſelves from loving thoſe who love them, they are forced to live with ſo much conſtraint and warineſs; as in my opinion this vertue which is thought ſo requiſite amongſt them, is no great glory to them: Truth is, they muſt ſet a guard upon their own eyes, they muſt ſhun the company of thoſe men they like, and they muſt not go any whither alone. Lying abroad is forbidden us, ſolitude it ſelf is ſometimes ill interpreted, and we are ſo unfortunate that when it is not known what we do they think we are doing ill; and we muſt always have ſome body to anſwer for our actions, or elſe they will be ill interpreted. So that as the world goes, we are born with paſſions which inchain us; for we are not allowed either to love or hate any thing: Ambition is unto us of no uſe, obedience only is our ſhare; judge therefore whether I have not reaſon to chuſe rather the being a valiant Soldier than what I am; and I aſſure you there is not a day paſſeth, in which I do not envy the Sex of which I am none. When I ſee a man walking alone, I envy his liberty; when others travel my envy goes along with them alſo; nay ſome that are angry and can revenge themſelves have my envy; for men may revenge, but women be they never ſo much wronged muſt not complain; or if they do, it muſt forſooth be ſo tamely, that their complexion muſt not alter, nor their eyes loſe their languor, as if nature had made us inſenſible, and all by vertue of the Laws of Decency, which I aſſure you I cannot chuſe but murmur againſt, and thoſe that made them. For my particular (replied the Princeſs) I do think my ſelf very happy in the calm mediocrity of my ſpirit; and I find that my Sex hath a thouſand advantages over the other, ſince of the virtues the leaſt difficult are required from us; and I do find it much more glorious to Reign without force than by violence, and that it is the eaſieſt thing in the world to ſubmit ones ſpirit in matter of Decency. It is unqueſtionable, that Ambition is not a paſſion fit for Ladies; but it is a paſſion ſo full of tumultuous turbulencies, that I think it a great advantage to be without it. As every one loves to be arguing according to their own humours (replied Tullia ſharply) ſo I do not think it ſtrange we ſhould not be of one opinion. For as you Siſter, do find diverſion in walking under ſhades, in gathering of flowers, in making Noſegays, in hearing the birds ſing, and liſtning to the murmur of Rivers, ſo I am often tired with that which diverts you.

The Princeſs being accuſtomed to indure a hundred ſuch contradictions from her ambitious ſiſter, ſhe turned her diſcourſe another way, leſt Tullia ſhould have uttered more then ſhe deſired to hear; for ſhe was accquainted with the impetuoſity of her humour. So as inſenſibly falling upon other diſcourſe, they began to talk of Paſſions, and to examine whether Love was a more Noble Paſſion than ambition; and in caſe both chanced to be in one heart, one of them muſt yield unto the other.

So as ſince this queſtion had ſome congruity with the Fortunes of theſe four perſons, becauſe Targuin was in love with Tullia, yet his Ambition required that he ſhould marry the Princeſs her Siſter, rather then her; and on the other ſide the Princeſs loved the Prince of Ameriola, yet ambition and conveniency required ſhe ſhould marry Targuin; each of them having a ſecret intereſt in the buſineſs, they ſpoke according to the preſent ſtate of things, rather than according to their own thoughts; for had they ſpoke their thoughts, the Princeſs would have ſaid that ambition ought to be made a ſacrifice unto love: The Prince of Ameriola would have ſaid the ſame: And the Princeſs Tullia doubtleſs would have ſaid that Love ought to ſubmit unto Ambition.

But ſince ſhe would that Targuin ſhould marry her, though ſhe was the younger, ſhe found her ſelf a little gravelled at this rencounter. Alſo ſhe ſpoke leſs than the reſt, but as for him he did not diſſemble his thoughts, but maintained againſt his Brother, that Love ought to yield unto Ambition. For, ſaid he, love is to be looked on only as a fading paſſion, which ſeldom laſts out a life; but Ambition is a Paſſion which continues unto the laſt gaſp of breath, and it is glorious to die ſo; and it hath this particular quality, that it is a remedy againſt Love; for it is ſo buſied, and hatcheth ſo many ſeveral deſigns, as the other Paſſion which is both hatcht and nouriſhed by idleneſs, can hardly ever ſubſiſt with it. But though perhaps Ambition doth not quite extinguiſh Love, yet it ought always to ſacrifice it ſelf unto Ambition, ſince one is not always certain to love his Miſtreſs, but ſure always to love Grandeur. For the favours of Love are limited, beyond which there is no pretending, and as ſoon as one is come unto the higheſt point it can arrive at, Love leſſens: but it is not ſo with Ambition, for fortune is a Miſtreſs whoſe favours are inexhauſtible, who as ſhe ſatisfies her Lovers augments their deſires; and who hath no ſooner given them one thing, but ſhe ſhews them a thouſand more which ſtill are in her gift: So as continually ſhewing them guilded baits to catch new deſires, Ambition hath always the force of a new paſſion. 'Tis true (replied the Prince of Ameriola) that Fortune hath more to give than Love. But let me tell you, her favours are not so sweet, and the torments which she causes are not accompanied with a thousand secret Consolations which unhappy Lovers have in the midst of their sufferings. Oh Brother! (replied Tarquin hastily) these Chymerical Consolations which you talk of, are not considerable in comparison of that pleasure which one finds in trampling ones enemies under his foot, and raising himself over the heads of others; and did you know what sweetness there is in plotting an Ambitious design to see it thrive happily, you would not speak as you do. I who have a heart sensible of this Passion, I must confess I do wonder how any can be without it, and how one can disclaim it for matter of Love; for I will affirm that few miserable people ever make any Lovers and to speak rationally, Love ought to be the consequence of Ambition. And truly if Love be without its pleasures; if the sports, the mirth, and all its graces do not accompany it, it is a very pitiful thing. And I think it to be extreme folly in those who cannot satisfie both their Love and their Ambition, not to prefer the last before the first, what joy can be expected from a poor Lover who wants an estate? how is it possible his Mistress should discern the sighs for the poorness of his Fortune, from those sighs which are caused by his Love? how miserably does he divide himself between his cares to please her and his cares to maintain himself? he cannot be liberal but he beggars himself; he cannot be merry unless forcedly; he dares not ofttimes thwart his Rival, lest he should prejudice his Fortune; and he entertains in his fancy so many things which are not within his reach of Gallantry, that of necessity he must needs be a troublesome Gallant. So as I must conclude, that it appertains only unto Ambitious, happy Ambitious men, to have any thing to do with Love: And those who quit the interests of their fortune, to content their passion, deserve to be forsaken by their Mistresses, for whom they have forsaken all things: And were I a Lady, and should see at my feet one of those faithful Lovers, who would sacrifice all the interests of their Ambition unto their Love, I would advise him to go and get the favour of Fortune, before he pretended to get mine: and would tell him that a greater injury cannot be offered unto a Lady, than to desire she should love him before he be happy. At the least I know (said he, and looked upon Tullia) that were I in love with a person of a high and heroick heart, and could not enjoy her unless I ruin'd my fortune; I will tell her ingenuously, that both for the love of her and the love of my self, I would think no more upon her: for I am sure if she be such a one, she will esteem me the more, and in her heart prefer me before such Lovers as will tell her, that they had rather live in a Cottage with one they love, than upon a Throne without her. But for my part I am none of those, and openly declare that I could never be happy, if I could reproach my self with an act of that nature. For my particular, said the Prince of Ameriola, I must confess I have no thoughts so Ambitious, since I think it not impossible but one may be happy in the poorest Cottage with a person I could Love; and since I could not be so upon a Throne unless she were upon it with me. Whilst these two Princes were talking so, the two Princesses who heard them had thoughts very different: For the Princess thought, the Prince Ameriola was in the right; and she gave such an interpretation upon his words as he desired she should.

But as for the Princess Tullia, though her ambitious humour did concur with the opinion of Tarquin, yet she was angry with him, because what he said was not consonant with her designs. Her Wit did not furnish her with many arguments against what he had said, but since she would contradict him in something, she agreed with him that one ought to sacrifice all unto ambition; but she said after that the great difficulty was to know, what one should do to content it. For there are sometimes some Loves which may serve Ambition as well as prejudice it, if all advantages be well considered. Tarquin hearing what Tullia said, he made a right application of it; but he seemed as if he did not understand her, because he was not then perswaded that it was advantageous for him to prefer her before the Princess; and that on the contrary he believed, that if he married the eldest Sister, he should the sooner be King: Not that the Crown which Servius Tullus wore was a right of Succession, and that Eldership was any nearer Title to Reign.

But Tarquin was perswaded, that the tenderness which this Prince did bear unto his eldest Daughter, would move him to get the Senates Consent for him unto whom he should marry her; and that this would be a shorter, and more sure way to get upon the Throne. Also the People loving the Elder much better than the other, he preferred her out of Ambition, before her whom his own inclination did prefer as most amiable.

And therefore without any direct answer unto what Tullia said, he said that there needed no examination of any particular adventures; for he maintained onely in general that it was requisite to sacrifice Love unto Ambition. And I maintain the contrary (said the Prince of Ameriola) that one ought to sacrifice Ambition unto Love. For my part (said the Princess and turned aside, lest she should meet the eys of the Prince of Ameriola) since I have nothing to do either with Love or Ambition, I know not what to say unto this dispute: All I can say is, that if any loved me, I would not be sacrificed unto any other interest. You are so fit to satisfie both Ambitiou and Love (replied Tarquin) that you are not in any danger of such an adventure. Tullia hearing what this Ambitious Lover said, she was in such a chafe, that she rise up and broke off the discourse: And imagining which way she might be revenged upon Tarquin, and satisfie her own Ambition, she conceived her self mistaken when she thought that it would be more advantageous to her to marry him, then to marry the Prince Ameriola. For (said she, in that angry mood) Tarquin is indeed more ambitious then the Prince his Brother. He is more busie and daring, and able to surmount all considerations that may bring him to his proposed end; but he would be his own chuser of the way by which he would come to the Throne: and if he rest upon his own choice, perhaps he may be mistaken and lose his way; for in all probability he will not know how to manage those opportunities which Fortune shall present unto him: Whereas, on the contrary, the Prince of Ameriola is of a more sweet temper, and more agreeable to the People then Tarquin is, and I may become Mistress of his spirit, either by the way of Love or Fear: And when I be in that state, I shall make him do as I please, and shall be then much more happy then If I were tied to the Fortune of this ambitious Lover. For the Prince of Ameriola is queſtionleſs moſt accompliſhed to Mount a Throne.

Tullia arguing thus with her ſelf began to flatter the Prince of Ameriola, and to diſguiſe ſome part of her thoughts. Yet he ſtood conſtantly faithful unto that Princeſs who alſo entirely reſerved her heart for him: But the fidelity which they had unto each other, conduced to render them the more miſerable; for they underſtood preſently after, that Servius Tullus was fully reſolved that Tarquin ſhould marry the Princeſs, and that the Prince his Brother ſhould marry Tullia. Not but that this wiſe King knew well enough, that there was no great correſpondency of humour between the Princeſs and Tarquin, nor between Tullia and the Prince of Ameriola, but in lieu of joyning Virtuous with the Virtuous, and the Ambitious with the Ambitious, he thought on the contrary, that ſince he made theſe two marriages only out of policy, and to keep theſe two Princes from raiſing any ſtirs in the State, he ought to ſeparate intereſts, the Ambitious from the Ambitious. And he reſolved upon it the ſooner, when he knew the diſcourſe which I have related unto you. for by it he came to know what the humour of Tarquin was. If Tarquin and Tullia be joyned together (ſaid he one day unto a Senator) there is no violence which they will not attempt; and unleſs I ſhould ſet them upon the Throne upon their marriage day, it were folly to make the match; for both of them are ambitious ſpirits, both violent, bold, and ſcruple at nothing; but in ſeparating them, perhaps I ſhall correct their tempers; and in giving unto the ambitious Tarquin a perſon who hath no ambition, who is fair, ſweet, and virtuous; one who loves and fears the Gods, it is probable ſhe will ſweeten the harſhneſs of his temper, and will keep him from all attempts againſt juſtice: Alſo it is likely that in giving unto the Ambitious Tullia, a Prince who is handſome, generous, and incapable of any injuſtice, he will win upon her heart, and alter her mind. Alſo he having a legitimate authority over her, ſhe cannot attempt what ſhe would, as ſhe might if ſhe had a husband of her own temper. Servius Tullus being thus reſolved, the Prince of Ameriola ſeeing all hopes of changing his reſolution taken away, he was in extreme deſpair.

On the other ſide, the Princeſs having employed the Queen her mother, to endeavour the alteration the Kings reſolution, ſhe found by her that the King of was unalterable, ſo as ſhe was extremely ſad. But the moſt particular of all this Paſſage was that though the Prince of Ameriola did moſt paſſionately love the Princeſs; and though the Princeſs had exceeding tender thoughts of the Prince of Ameriola; and though they knew each others thoughts, yet they did never tell one another that they loved. For the Princeſs was ſo full of modeſty, her Lover was ſo full of reſpect, they both of them ſaw ſo little hope of happineſs, Tarquin kept ſuch a vigilant eye upon his Brother, the two Princeſſes were ſo ſeldom a ſunder, that the Prince of Ameriola never met with any favourable occaſion to expreſs his thoughts unto his Princeſs. He had told her a thouſand times that ſhe was the perſon whom he moſt eſteemed; he had told her that ſhe was the moſt lovely Princeſs upon earth; but he never told her in plain terms that he loved her, However when both ſides had received ſuch intelligence as put them out of all hopes, then melancholy did ſo much damp their ſpirits, as they were ſcarcely knowable: Yet they ſet the beſt faces upon the matter that they could, and did the ſame things they were uſed to do. Not long after the Princeſs uſing to walk almoſt every evening, in a Garden which was in the Palace of Servius Tullus, by the Mount Palatine which he built, becauſe he thought his Lodging at that houſe near the Mount Eſquiline was not convenient, ſo it hapned that they going thither to walk according to their cuſtom, the two Princes whom they were to marry were there alſo; and as chance would have it, Tarquin which ingaged to talk with Tullia; for he knowing her to be extremely ambitious, though he had no mind to marry her, and though he was reſolved to ſacrifice his love to her unto his ambition, yet he deſired to appeaſe her a little.

Tullia as fierce as ſhe was, had a deſire to ſee whether ſhe could work any change in his mind by a private conference: So as having engaged Tarquin to talk with her, he durſt not deny her; and by this means, the Princeſs and the Prince of Ameriola, whoſe ſorrows were extreme, had the liberty of talk together. But being both of them equally melancholy, they were no ſooner ſeparated ſome few paces from thoſe who were the troublers of their felicity, but looking upon each other, they ſaw ſo much ſadneſs in each others eyes, as the Love which they had unto each other was thereby much augmented, for they did eaſily divine the cauſe. So the Prince of Ameriola being grown more bold by the melancholy which he ſaw in the fair eyes of his Princeſs: Oh Heavens! Madam, ſaid he unto her, I beſeech you tell me truly, whether or no you think I may not wiſh, that thoſe two perſons which I ſee together, may never part; and whether you will give me leave to tell you, that if I have not my wiſh effected, the grief which I ſee in your eyes will be my death? and that a death moſt deſperate, unleſs to make me expire the more calmly, you will permit me to believe that I have ſome ſhare in thoſe ſorrows which I ſee in you. For truly Madam, you know that I love you; I think you cannot love my Brother, and I am ſo preſumptuous alſo as to think, that you have leſs averſion unto me than unto him. Your language doth ſo much diſtract me (replied the Prince and bluſht) as I know not how to anſwer you; unleſs this, that at at this time I dare not tell you what I think.

Oh Madam (ſaid the Prince of Ameriola) I am infinitely obliged unto you for this anſwer. And I beſeech you, give the moſt miſerable Lover alive, leave to imagine what thoſe thoughts are which now you dare not tell him; and believe that the pureneſs of my paſſion doth merit ſo much indulgence from you. I know very well that as the ſtate of things ſtands, it is hard to find a remedy, againſt that evil which afflicts me. But however, one may dye more quietly one way than another, and therefore Madam, I muſt conjure you not to deny me this. Since I am very ingenuous (replied the Princeſs) I will tell you that I have a very high opinion of your virtue, and I think you are well perſwaded of mine: I muſt confeſs that there is a natural antipathy betwixt your Brother and me, which makes me wiſh that the King had not commanded me to marry him; and I will confeſs further, that there is ſuch a ſympathy of humour between you and me, as I wiſh either that Tarquin reſembled you, or that you were in his room. Alſo I am perſwaded that you do hold me in ſome eſteem; and I muſt tell you truly that I do much eſteem you. But when I have ſaid this I have ſaid all, unleſs this, that when I have have done all that Decency will permit me to break my marriage with Tarquin, then I muſt reſolve upon obedience, and to be the moſt miſerable perſon upon earth. But I beſeech you Madam, (ſaid he unto her) if Ambition be not the predominate paſſion of your Soul, as it is in the Princeſs your Siſter, why ſhould you marry my Brother? leave him to the ambitious Tullia, let us not oppoſe their fidelity as they do ours; I am originally of Corinth, let us go and ſeek that ſecurity in Greece, which we cannot find in Rome: Do you abandon Tarquin as I will Tullia, and take up a reſolution worthy of the Love I bear you and of your own virtue. For, Madam, I am confident, that as ſoon as ever you are the Wife of Tarquin, he will move you unto ſuch things which your generoſity will never conſent unto. I know very well, that as his Brother, I ought not to tell you thus much, but as his Rival, it is permitted me to tell you any thing that may ſerve my ſelf.

Alſo Juſtice requires it, that I ſhould not ſmother a truth from you, which may be of ſuch a conſequence, as the well-being of the King may depend upon it. The truth is Madam, I know that my Brother dares not love you, and that he doth love the Princeſs Tullia: Nor would he ever marry you, but that Ambition hath a greater prevalence with his heart than love hath. Imagine then Madam, what ſuch a man is able to do who can act againſt his own felicity. Expect and fear all that is ill from him, Madam, and beware whilſt it is time: Moreover I know of an infallible certainty, that the Princeſs Tullia doth love my Brother and cannot love me; but I value not the laſt of theſe, for knowing that I ſhall never love her, and that I ſhall ever love you, Madam, I ſhould be unjuſt if I ſhould take it ill from her. But I beſeech you conſider, that I am in a moſt miſerable ſtate, for knowing that the King is fully reſolved that I ſhould marry Tullia, and that you ſhould marry Tarquin, I know not what courſe to take. If I refuſe this honour which he would do me in giving me his Daughter, then I muſt go out of Rome, and muſt never ſee you again: And if I ſhould ſtay with you, then I muſt marry a perſon who hates me, and whom I do not love, and muſt ſee you enjoyed by my Brother, who thinks it no happineſs to injoy you.

Imagine therefore, Madam, if I have not great reaſon to beſeech you, that you will be pleaſed to take theſe things into your conſideration, ſince they may produce ſuch dangerous conſequences: I do verily believe all that you ſay (replied the Princeſs) but I believe them without ſeeing any remedy againſt them; for my honour will not permit me to go with you into Greece, and though a reſentment of glory ſhould not give a ſtop unto it, yet my tenderneſs of the King and Queen is ſufficient. Alſo I think my ſelf obliged to adviſe you to marry my Siſter, becauſe I think ſhe ſtands in need of your virtue, to temper her ambitious humour, and to reſtrain her from any unjuſt attempts. Oh! Madam (ſaid the Prince of Ameriola then) I perceive I was much miſtaken, when I thought you did not hate me; for where there is any tender affection, there cannot be ſo much wiſdom; but one ſhall have more compaſſion upon the miſeries of the perſon whom one loves. Since I have none for my ſelf (replied the Princeſs) you would be unjuſt, if you ſhould murmur that I have none for you: Then Madam, I beſeech you (ſaid he unto her) reflect upon your own condition; ſhould I do as you adviſe, and marry Tullia who loves not me, nor I her, but ſhould ſtill continue my love to you, then Tarquin would marry you but love Tullia; and it may ſo chance that you may love me then, more than now you do, and that I my ſelf ſhould contribute unto your miſery; for I cannot think it poſſible you ſhould ſee me ſo full of miſery as I ſhall be, and your heart nothing touched with Compaſſion: Think well therefore upon what I ſay, Madam, and afterwards favour me ſo far as to tell me, what courſe you would have me take; I would have you (ſaid ſhe) ſubmit your mind unto your fortune, ſince you cannot make Fortune ſubmit unto your mind; and I would have you (if I could ſpeak it without a bluſh) be as miſerable as I ſhall be; that you ſhould marry Tullia with as much averſion as I ſhall Tarquin, and yet live as well with my Siſter, as I am reſolved to live with the Prince your Brother. But I would have you to believe withal, that if I could baniſh you from me, I ſhould do it this very hour, and believe alſo, that this day is the firſt and laſt that ever you ſhould tell me of your love. I ſhould take it as a ſingular favour if you would change your paſſion into amity and friendſhip, and to love me only as a Siſter. Oh! Madam (replied he) it is impoſſible I ſhould ever love you any otherwiſe than as a Miſtreſs; and you have brought me into the moſt pitiful condition in the world: For I muſt love you without the leaſt ſpark of hope; I muſt hate my brother as a Rival; and I muſt hate the Princeſs your Siſter as a perfidious woman, all whoſe inclinations are oppoſite unto mine. Take heed Madam, and fear leſt my virtue ſhould forſake me. I ſhould fear it in any other but you, (replied the Princeſs) but judging of you by my ſelf, I fear no violence nor injuſtice to proceed from you; for I know very well (if I can ſpeak it for ſhame) that I can never love Tarquin, and that I can never hate you; but I know withal, that I ſhall never do any thing but what I ought. After this, the Prince Ameriola talked unto this virtuous Princeſs of many things; in a language full of paſſionate expreſſions, unto which ſhe anſwered with as much tenderneſs and virtue: So as finding new cauſes of admiration at each others great and noble thoughts, they ſtill continued loving one another very tenderly. But for all that their virtues were ſtill much ſtronger than their Loves; and ſay what this Prince could he could not obtain any thing further from this Princeſs. And truly, though ſhe made him abſolutely deſperate, yet was he not tranſported ſo far as to attempt any violent reſolution. But whilſt theſe two were talking thus, the Ambitious Tarquin, and the no leſs Ambitious Tullia, were diſcourſing after another manner: For they were no ſooner at liberty to talk, but Tarquin) who knew that Tullia had intention to diſſwade him for her Siſter) he ſpoke the firſt, and began to complain of what he himſelf did: Well Madam (ſaid he to her) what do you think of capricious fortune, who diſpoſeth of us in ſuch a cruel manner, and will have me (for your intereſt) deprive my ſelf of a thing which is infinitely dear unto me? Yet reſolve upon it I muſt, and yet there is no remedy againſt this misfortune: Did I ſpeak unto one whoſe heart were inferiour unto yours, I ſhould not ſpeak thus; but knowing the Grandure of your Soul; I dare tell you how I am perſwaded, that all the Kings favours will follow him who ſhall marry the Princeſs, and that the King hath as great an averſion to you, as he hath affection to her. So as if I ſhould let my Brother marry her, and I marry you, then we must both of us prepare our selves to be their Slaves. Therefore Generous Tullia, I must marry the Princess, purposely to keep you from being her Vassal. And you must resolve to marry my Brother; for he being naturally of a sweet and compliant temper, you may mould him unto my interests which shall be always yours, for my marriage shall not keep me from loving you as much as ever I did, and as between a Wife and a Mistress, the Mistress is always most dear; so it shall be you who shall be really the Queen, if I be King. Tullia hearing Tarquin say so, she did not answer as her virtuous Sister would, if it had been her case; but on the contrary, perceiving she had yet some share in Tarquins affection, she used all possible expressions to flatter up both his Love and his Ambition: But seeing it would be more advantageous for him to marry her Sister than to marry her, she went not about to alter his mind. So as this most abominable woman seeing she could not be his Wife, and foreseeing that perhaps she should have all the authority, she rested her self contented with the hopes of being his Mistress, though he married her Sister, and she married his Brother.

Thus out of a resentment both of Love and Ambition, together with their want of virtue, these two resolved not to marry, and yet not to break off. After which, they went and joyned with the Princess, and the Prince of Ameriola whose thoughts were quite opposite, since all that virtue could inspire were theirs. In the mean time, since Servius Tullus, required that these two Marriages should be solemnized out of hand, they were married within fifteen days after this conference, and done with all possible magnificence Royal; but with such sensible grief to the Princess, and the Prince of Ameriola, as I have heard say, that the day before the marriage they thought they should have died with sorrow, and that they did bid each other adieu, in the saddest manner imaginable. But afterwards, their virtue being stronger, they recovered themselves, and set the best face they could upon the matter, and behaved themselves with so much Wisdom, that few did perceive their despairs.

As for Tullia, her mind was full of tumultuous turbulence, but upon her consideration of things, she imagined, that perhaps she should be able to induce Servius Tullus to do as much for her, as for her Sister: And at worst, if she could not reign in the person of her Husband, yet she should in the person of her Lover. As for Tarquin, though he loved Tullia, yet he was glad his Brother had married her, because he was sure of her heart still, and because he looked upon his marriage with the Princess, as many steps nearer the Throne. Thus this great solemnity was passed over with thoughts very different amongst these four persons. Mean time, though Tarquin loved Tullia in his heart, and Tullia him again, yet did they secretly prejudice one another in things wherein there was any interest of Ambition. For if the Prince of Ameriola could be King, Tullia had rather been his Wife than Tarquins, because his mildness made hope to have all the Rule and Authority. Tarquin on the other side, who knew the humour of Tullia, was not sorry that he could be King without her assistance; yet they dissembled their thoughts, since their marriage kept a great league of correspondency. As for the Princess, and the Prince of Ameriola, it was not so with them; for though this vertuous Lover asked nothing but the friendship of the person he loved, and though she would not grant him any more, yet as far as civility would give her leave, she shunned all occasions of speaking with him in private. On the other side, the King who equally feared both Tarquin and Tullia, was very cautious how he inclined more unto one side than another; and lest he should incense Tullia, he shewed no greater favour unto Tarquin, than unto the Prince of Ameriola; and lest he should incense Tarquin, he shewed no more unto the Prince his Brother than unto him.

But in thinking to be very prudent, and striving to carry even on both sides, he contented neither Tarquin nor Tullia; for never were two spirits greater enemies unto all equality than those two. And indeed it was most insupportable unto them to see the King favour both alike: Mean time, since they perceived the intention of Servius Tullus, they gave no rest unto the persons whom fortune had tyed them unto; for Tullia was continually persecuting the Prince of Ameriola, because he stirred no more both against the King and against Tarquin; and Tarquin would never let the Princess his wife be in rest, purposely to oblige and move her to draw some unto him and her self from that tenderness which the King had over her; and would needs force her to negotiate against the Prince of Ameriola. So as by this means Tarquin was perpetually acting against his Brother, and against his Mistress; and he would needs have his Wife act against her Sister and her Lover. Tullia for her part, her whole thoughts were how to ruine both her Lover and her Sister; how to pull the Crown off her fathers head; and to persecute her Husband, purposely to force him to do all he could against his Brother, and against the person he lov'd above all the World, and all to throw Servius Tullus out of the Throne: But let the Ambitious Tarquin, and the Ambitious Tullia do what they could, the virtue of these two illustrious persons did not stagger: for the Prince of Ameriola never did any thing which could displease the King, nor which might anger Tarquin, nor which was against the interest of that Princess whom he loved. But as for that admirable person, her vertue went further; for in such things as could not be done without injustice, and which were advantageous to her Husband, and disadvantageous to her Lover, she never medled with them; yet at the very same time she bore a most horrible hatred against the one, and a most violent affection to the other; she served him whom he hated, and hurt not him whom she loved. 'Tis true, this was but upon certain occasions, where reason required it; for when Tarquin moved her by any unjust ways, either against her Father, or her Sister, or the Prince of Ameriola, she denied him with incomparable constancy; though yet it was always with a sweetness full of respect, able to allay even cruelty it self. However, out of her excess of virtue, and knowing that the thoughts of her Husband were extremely violent, that he stood not in any fear of the Gods, and that he scoffed at the Laws of men: She did much endeavour to get his love, and win some credit in his thoughts, in hopes to sweeten the sharpness of his humour. On the other side, the Prince of Ameriola, who ever bore a violent affection unto the Princess, and a most horrid hatred unto Tullia, did constrain himself; and for his own honour, because it should not be said he had a Wife who could be accuſed of any wickedneſs, he did what he could to correct his, by a million of examples of goodneſs and complacency, which he daily ſhewed. But it was in vain for theſe two virtuous perſons to think of ſweetning the natural fierceneſs of Tarquin and Tullia; for do what they could it did daily encreaſe. So as Tarquin deſpairing of ever inſpiring any Ambition into his Wife; and Tullia ſeeing no likelihood of ever making her Husband to commit any Crimes, though to get Crowns by it, they began to ſcorn and hate them, and all that were not of their own minds. They began, I ſay, to love one another more then ever they did, and to repent they did not marry each other. But the chief reaſon of their repentance was becauſe if they were married, then they ſhould the ſooner arrive at their deſired ends; ſo as the fire of Love and Ambition both joyning together in their hearts, it broke out in ſuch violent and unjuſt flames, as the moſt innocent talk, they had never ended under a promiſe of committing ſome crime or other, to unite their loves the more firmly.

Truth is, they talked of nothing but things moſt terrible; for ſometimes they would ſay, that it was the moſt egregious folly in Men, to loſe a glorious deſign for a little ſcruple of virtue, or out of a fond Chymerical imagination of Glory; or for Men not to eſtabliſh themſelves unleſs by actions of generoſity, which are abſolutely incompatible with the execution of great enterpriſes. For my part (ſaid Tarquin one day unto Tullia, as I underſtood by a witty Wench who waited upon this Princeſs) I take this for a moſt undoubted maxim, that thoſe who will keep themſelves within thoſe bounds which the vulgar uſe to preſcribe unto Juſtice and Generoſity, they ſhall never arrive at any great matters by the way of Fortune: And unleſs Men will make bold with Laws they ſhall never exalt themſelves above others; nor had there ever been any Kings, Kingdoms, or inequality of conditions. And therefore without any further dorring at Laws, which thoſe who made them will not keep, let us make uſe only of ſuch as will ſerve our own turns, and never preciſely inſiſt upon it whether the thing be juſt or unjuſt.

Theſe (generous Artimedorus) were the diſcourſes of thoſe perſons at that time, and many more ſuch, which I will not now relate; becauſe hereafter, I ſhall tell you of things much more execrable. Mean time, ſince they had not always fit opportunities of talking together, they began to write very often unto each other: And as it is not eaſie for Perſons of their Quality, that they ſhould long conceal themſelves, the Princeſs came preſently to know, that there was a ſecret correſpondency held between her Siſter and her Husband: and the Prince of Ameriola alſo knew the like between his Wife and his Brother. However, out of a reſentment of virtue and prudence, the Princeſs would not acquaint the Prince of Ameriola with the irregularity of his Wives courſes, becauſe this perfidious Woman was her Siſter, and becauſe that Prince was her Lover. The Prince of Ameriola on his ſide, it was long before he would diſcover unto the Princeſs, the infidelity of her Husband, thinking it would grieve her to no purpoſe.

Thus was he in a pitiful Condition; for it went againſt his mind to diſcover the Crimes of his Wife; he could not think of any revenge upon his Brother, becauſe he was Husband unto her whom he loved; who being all virtue, would never have looked upon him again, if he ſhould kill her Husband. And therefore he did hide the matter as much as poſſible he could; yet ſince he knew the humour both of his Brother and his Wife, he was deſirous to know the very bottom of their correſpondency. And to that end, though he was never jealous, yet he employed all his diligence to diſcover it, and he carried the buſineſs ſo well, that the Slave who carried their Letters was abſolutely his. So cauſing a Seal like unto theirs ſecretly to be made (for their Seals were both alike) he met with a Letter of Tarquin's unto Tullia, and the Anſwer of Tullia unto Tarquin. But theſe two Letters being the moſt horrid Letters of Love that ever were writ, and alſo being made publick, there was not a Man in Rome who was a hater of Tarquin, which knew not of them. And I knew them better then any others, and more hated the injuſtice of them, than any whoſoever.

But before I acquaint you with the Contents of them, you muſt know, that the Prince of Ameriola was ſo ſurpriſed, as now thinking it not fit to diſguiſe any longer, but that it was abſolute requiſite, the Princeſs ſhould know the ſtate of things, he reſolved to go and acquaint her. And having taken Copies of theſe two Letters, he went unto the Princeſs, though he did not uſe to viſit her in private, becauſe ſhe had forbid him, and he went in ſuch a happy hour that he found her alone. Alſo he had the advantage not to fear his being interrupted either by Tarquin or Tullia; for the one was gone out to Hunt, and the other kept her Chamber, being a little ſick. So as finding the Princeſs alone, according to his wiſh, he was very glad of it, though he had none but ſad ſtories to tell her. But as for her though ſhe ſtill loved him very tenderly, yet was ſhe troubled at the ſight of him: So as this Prince perceiving it, I ſee, Madam (ſaid he unto her) this my viſit doth more diſpleaſe than oblige you: But, Madam, I beſeech you do not condemn me before you hear me, and the cauſe of my coming: For truly I have ſo accuſtomed my ſelf to obey all your commands, and to deprive my ſelf of the happineſs in ſeeing you, that thoſe reſpects I have ever paid unto you doth merit a grant of that audience which now I deſire. Since the Princeſs knew the great virtue of the Prince, and ſince ſhe found ſomething in his looks, which told her, that he had ſome matter of importance to impart, ſhe granted his deſire; ſo as bidding him ſit down by her, ſhe began to lend an Ear unto what he would ſay.

It grieves me to the Soul, Madam (ſaid he unto her) that what I have now to tell you, is of the moſt diſmal conſequence imaginable; but it doth ſo much concern you to know it, as I am fully reſolved not to conceal it, that the diſcovery makes me aſhamed. But before I explain this ſad Enigma unto you, I beſeech you give me leave to conjure you into a belief, that I aim at no other advantage in all I ſhall tell you, but in preſerving the life of the moſt fair and virtuous Perſon in the World, in preſerving yours.

Alas Generous Prince (ſaid ſhe unto him and ſighed) I know not whether that be any great ſervice or no: But however, I am much obliged unto you; and therefore I beſeech you impart what you have to ſay. I will not tell you, Madam (replied he)

he) that if Tarquin were not my Brother, nor your husband, that you ſhould have heard of his Death before you knew his Crime; for I hope you are better acquainted with that heart wherein you have long reigned, then to believe it capable of ſo much baſeneſs, as to let Crimes of that Nature go unrevenged an hour. But Madam, to hold you no longer in ſuſpence, I beſeech you read this Letter from Tullia to Tarquin, and alſo this Letter from Tarquin to Tullia. You may perceive, Madam, that theſe two Letters were preceded by many others, which perhaps treated concerning your Life and mine. After this, the Prince of Ameriola giving the Copies of the two Letters unto the Princeſs, ſhe took them, and opening that of Tullia's firſt, ſhe read theſe words.

Tullia unto the moſt Generous and moſt Ambitious Prince upon Earth.

SIR,

I Have told you a hundred times, that if you will Reign in my heart, you muſt make me Reign in Rome. For as you would have me ſacrifice all things unto your love, ſo you muſt ſacrifice all unto my Ambition: Not but that I know this Paſſion is as much in your Heart, as in mine, and that you love me more, as I am Ambitious than as I am Fair: But yet methinks you are a little too ſlow in your Buſineſs. Make haſt therefore and preſently fix upon the day deſtined for our Liberty: And believe it, that it cannot be ſooner than I deſire, and that I have not a greater deſire to ſee you Maſter of Rome, than to ſee my ſelf abſolute Miſtreſs of your Heart. Be quick therefore, and ſacrifice thoſe two victims, which muſt render both Love and Fortune equally propitious, and be aſſured, that for my part, I ſhall not fail in any thing which I have promiſed.

Whilſt this Letter was reading, the Princeſs changed colour above twenty times; and after ſhe had attentively read it over again, ſhe ſhut it up, and reſtored it back unto the Prince of Ameriola, who told all at night, unto him, who told it unto me: Then lifting up her Eyes, and taking the other Letter, Oh! ye juſt Gods (ſaid ſhe) is it poſſible that my Siſter ſhould be ſo abominably wicked? Afterwards opening Tarquin's Anſwer, ſhe found thus.

YES my deareſt, and moſt Ambitious Tullia, I ſhall e're long do all things requiſite to make you Reign in Rome, that I may Reign in your Heart: And before the next Ides be over, we ſhall be free, and in a condition to ſubject all others. Mean time, appoint you the day which you have deſigned for the ſacrificing of thoſe two Victims, which will ſecure our reſt, for all things are ready for it. Adieu, be ſtill your ſelf, I conjure you, that is, incapable of any weakneſs, of any ſcruple, and of any repentance.

Well Madam, (ſaid the Prince of Ameriola unto the Princeſs after ſhe had done reading the Letters) what do you think upon theſe two Letters? and what is to be done for the avoiding of thoſe misfortunes which threaten us? for you may plainly ſee, that you and I are the two Victims that muſt be offered, and who muſt ſet Tarquin and Tullia at liberty. They cannot mean the King and the Queen, ſince if they were dead, they cannot be in their places, nor yet free; therefore I muſt conclude they mean both you and me. Since Tarquin is your Husband, and Tullia your Siſter, I will not make my ſelf a judge of their crime, though Tullia be the moſt perfidious Wife in the World, and though Tarquin be the moſt wicked and ungrateful Brother upon Earth. Speak therefore Madam, I conjure you, and conſider that it concerns your Life; as for my own intereſt I do not value it: and if there be a way to ſave your Life by expoſing mine unto a thouſand dangers; I would be ſure to take it: and the truth is, ſince I muſt never injoy you, Madam, death is as welcome to me as Life, and I cannot die with more glory, than in dying to do you ſervice. Speak therefore, Madam, and ſpeak quickly; for minutes are precious upon ſuch an important occaſion. Alas, Generous Prince (replied ſhe) what would you have me ſay, or what can I ſay in this trouble, that I am in; for I am ſo affrighted at the crimes of Tarquin and Tullia, that did I not know you to be moſt ſincere and generous, I could hardly believe what I ſee. How is it poſſible I ſhould think the hearts of two perſons ſo illuſtriouſly born can be capable of ſuch black, wicked, and horrid thoughts? how is it poſſible Love ſhould inſpire them with deſigns of ſuch a Nature? which way can Love (I ſay) ſubſiſt with ſuch a turbulent paſſion as Ambition? who can believe that a Daughter of Servius Tullus, that is the moſt virtuous Prince in the World, ſhould ever offer to pull her Father from his Throne, and murther both her Siſter, and her Husband? how can the Brother of the Prince of Ameriola ever contrive his death and mine? Alas, Madam, (replied the grieved Prince) 'tis not now a time to conſider how things are poſſible; but to conſider how we ſhould preſerve your life. It is ſo hard a matter to find out harmleſs remedies (replied ſhe) that I think the beſt way is to ſeek for none, but reſolve to die. Oh! Madam (replied the Prince of Ameriola) I am never able to conſent unto your ruine; and if you do not find out ſome way to ſave your Life, I will rather go preſently and Poniard my Brother and my Wife; then hazard the ſeeing of you die by the cruelty of two perſons who are ſo nearly related unto me. But Madam, there are examples of Marriages being broken off; one of our moſt famous Citizens have authorized what I ſay; and if ever it were expedient to ſeparate two perſons whom Marriage hath united, it is moſt fitting to ſeparate you from Tarquin, and me from Tullia: And therefore, Madam, if you pleaſe, we will take one of theſe two courſes; either tell the King your Father all we know, to the end, that by his Regal Authority he may break off your Marriage and mine, and baniſh Tarquin and Tullia; or elſe without making any great noiſe of the matter which cannot help us, becauſe the King is very ſlow in his reſolutions, let us ſteal away from the violences of Tarquin and Tullia; your Marriage and mine may be broken, as well when we are not here, as when we are: We have no reaſon to miſtruſt the gods; and we have our own virtues to guard and comfort us againſt the cruelties and calumnies of Men, if you will but be pleaſed to fly unto ſome ſafe

Sanctuary,

Sanctuary. And to testifie unto you, Madam, how pure, and un-interested my Love is, if you think it not permittable I should be your Husband, since you have been my Brother's Wife; I am contented to be with you as a Brother, who would protect and defend you as his Sister, and never pretend any further. Thus without shedding the blood of an inhumane Brother, and an unjust Wife, and without your consenting unto the ruine of an Ambitious Husband and cruel Sister, we may sit safe in some Sanctuary where their cruelty cannot reach us; we may be there in security and live happily, if you will but hold me in the degree of friendship; for I do find my Love so subjected unto my reason and your virtue, as it will never move me unto any thing that will anger you, nor say any thing that will displease you. Consent therefore, Madam, I beseech you unto this happy Exile, if you will not consent unto the ruine of Tarquin and Tullia. No, no, generous Prince, (said she unto him) I will neither consent unto the one, nor the other. For if I should go as you propound, doubtless I might save my life; but since I cannot do it, and save my reputation also, I must not entertain the least thought of it: For what Calumnies will not the unjust Tarquin asperse upon me? and what scandal will not the cruel Tullia belch out against me? Pardon me, Madam, I beseech you, replied the Prince of Ameriola, if my zeal to your service will never suffer them to ruine you. To take the medium between these two extreams (replied she) we must indeavour to let the King my Father see one of those Letters, either that from Tarquin to Tullia, or that from Tullia to Tarquin; to the end that by his Prudence and Authority, he may shrowd us from these two dangerous persons. Perhaps he will think it convenient to put me in some place of safety for a while, upon some pretence which he will invent, and will command you to travel into some Country, until such time as reason hath wrought upon the spirits of our enemies; or else he will find out some other way to secure us.

But Madam, (replied this Prince) whilst you are contriving ways how to let the King see these Letters, you may perish; and not to deceive you, I beseech you do not think, that as things stand I am able to be far from you: And therefore, Madam, if you do not approve of either of these ways which I propose, you must let me go this very hour unto the King your Father, and impart all I know unto him; and I advise you that under some pretence or other, you do not eat at your own house, nor lie there; for I cannot tell whether it be by poison or sword, that the inhumane Tarquin and the cruel Tullia would have us perish. But if you should go unto the King (replied she) and are not able to prove what you inform, you will thereby make such a noise as perhaps will forward our deaths, in lieu of preventing them. And therefore, if you will be advised by me, have a little patience: Perhaps, those who desired our deaths have repented, and since the slave who useth to carry their Letters is for you; since you have a Seal like unto theirs, and since you can see all they write, we are yet in safety. For Tarquin would know from Tullia, the day which she will design for our deaths; so as when you see that, then let us take heed unto our selves; and since it is lawful for any to defend their own lives, I give you leave to use all your endeavours to save ours; but I will never allow of any violent remedies; for I had rather die for want of prudence, and by excess of goodness, then to ruine others by too much unjust precipitation. But, Madam, (replied he) can it be any injustice to prevent ones death? However (replied she) Death is not so terrible to me, that to avoid it people should say, I had ruined my Husband; and I had much rather that Tarquin should be eternally branded with my death, than I should be suspected to contribute unto his. And generous Prince (said she and blusht) since my heart tells me that it hath a tender share of friendship for you, I ought to be more circumspect then otherwise I should; and it is fit I conjure you to be gone, lest this long conference (should it be known unto our enemies) should give them a colour to hasten their wicked designs into execution. However, I conjure you to take a care of your self, for it would grieve my Soul to hear that I should have a Sister who was the cause of your death. Oh! Madam, (replied the Prince) I beseech you never think of me; but think how to prevent I may never hear the dismal news that a Brother of mine hath been your death. After this, abundance of tender expressions, passed between these two virtuous persons; never proceeded so many heroick, so many passionate, and so many innocent thoughts from any two upon Earth, as from them; they resolved at parting to communicate unto each other what they discovered: After which, the Prince of Ameriola went unto the King, in such a profound melancholly as it was impossible for him to hide it, and it was observed by all the people, and the King himself. As for the Princess, as soon as the Prince of Ameriola was gone, she went unto her prayers, and prayed both for Tarquin and Tullia; and in lieu of praying for their ruine to hinder her own, she only prayed they might repent. But whilst the Prince of Ameriola had been with the Princess, it happened unluckily, that Tarquin who was gone to hunt, returned sooner than he intended; and in lieu of going to his own house, he went unto Tullia's, who kept her Chamber that day: The reason of his so sudden return was, that resting himself under a Tree while they were mending his Bridle, which was broken by riding through a thick Wood, he began to read over Tullia's Letter unto him; and in reading of it in the open light, he plainly discovered that it had been opened, and that there was some small difference between his Seal, and that wherewith it was sealed. So as being naturally suspicious and violent, he made no question, but that it was either the Prince of Ameriola or the Princess who had opened it. And judging others by himself, he feared being prevented, if a remedy were not immediately applyed. But lest the business he was about should be too much noted, he seemed as if he intended to hunt out the day, as soon as his Bridle was mended he got on Horseback, and upon the first handsome opportunity, he stole away and came with all speed to Rome. In lieu of going home, he went as I told you to Tullia, where he heard, that the Prince his Brother, was with the Princess his Wife. So as according to his natural impetuosity, his thoughts ran upon nothing else but what poison he should chuse to give them. With these thoughts he entred into Tullia's Chamber; he told her that his last Letter had been opened, and desired her to look whether hers had been so also; and indeed this cruel Woman with Tarquin looking upon upon it, they plainly saw that it had been sealed with a counterfeit Seal; which no sooner spied, but Tullia speaking first, well (said she) had I not good reason to say that you were too slow in your courses, and that you must make all haste possible to remove all these obstacles which hinder our happiness? Yes my dear Tullia (said he unto her) you are in the right, and I am in the wrong; but to make amends I will make the more haste, and therefore without any more delay, these two persons who hinder our happiness must be poisoned this very day. It hath been so long resolved upon, and their ruine is so requisite unto our rest, and unto the Grandeur of Rome, as it it is injustice to defer the execution any longer. Make sure work on your side, as I will on mine; be not so simply weak as to repent; and be sure your eyes do not betray the secret of your Soul: Look unto your self (replied the wicked and violent Tullia) be sure the fair eyes of your Wife do not change your heart: Never think upon either gods, or Men, or Laws; but think only upon the Crown which you aim at: Remember how Romulus got the Crown by the death of his Brother, and that by this death the people will rank you among the gods. Consider how those who make a long War to get a Crown, do sacrifice many more Victims then you shall; and above all consider, that Tullia will be yours, as soon as the enemies of our happiness are dead. For generous Artemidorus, you must know, that though Tullia was not capable of any scruple, nor any Religion, nor any virtue, yet she would never let Tarquin enjoy her, until he was in a condition to marry her; for her fears were, that if he should satisfie his Love, he would not be so diligent to satisfie her Ambition: And therefore desiring that the passion of this Prince, might help on her Ambitious designs, she was very reserved in that point, though she expressed as much affection to him, as he to her.

Mean time you must know, that Tarquin and Tullia having both of them impetuous spirits, and shrill voices, and their souls being wholly taken up with the grand Crimes which they were to commit, they were not so cautious, but a Woman over-heard them, one who had been brought up with the Princesses, and waited upon Tullia in particular, only since she was married, she heard this dismal discourse; and plainly understood how Tarquin told Tullia at parting, that he would send her the poison as soon as he came home; insomuch as this Woman who loved the Princess, and had some goodness in her, she had so much horrour against the crime of her Mistress, as being desirous to prevent the death of these two innocent persons, whose sentence of death she heard pronounced, she went unto her Chamber, where she writ two notes, the one to give the Prince of Ameriola when she saw him, and the other to send unto the Princess. But since some time was taken up in writing, and some in seeking out a slave trusty enough to carry a note of that consequence unto the Princess, her good intentions took no good effect; for you must know, that Tarquin after he had been a while with the King, because he heard the Prince of Ameriola was there, and after he had observed that melancholly in his eyes which every one saw, he went home in all haste to send poison unto Tullia, and to give it unto his Wife. But as ill fortune was for that virtuous Princess, this Tyrant came in before she was acquainted with the conference of Tullia and him; and he came in so just in the nick to hinder her, as the Slave (who had the note which would have saved her Life had she received it) was speaking unto one of her women in the Anti-Chamber, as he came in. He offered to take the note from him, the Slave refused to give it, saying he was to deliver it unto none but the Princess; but Tarquin being naturally suspicious, and thinking he was interested in all manner of whispers, he took it from him, and said, he would take upon him to deliver it; you may well imagine that the Slave and the Woman were much surprized.

Yet Tarquin was so terrible unto all that knew him, as that they durst not murmure, though they were extremely troubled; for the Slave knew the note was of some great concernment, because he had such a charge with it, and the Woman thought so as well as he, seeing the obstinacy of the slave to part with it, unto any but the Princess. However, they must be patient, the slave went away, and the Woman went into the Chamber of her Mistress, whilst Tarquin was reading the Note, where he found what he imagined; so as seeing that if the business were not quickly dispatched, it would be difficult to effect; he presently sent away the poison to Tullia: after which he went into the Chamber of the Princess, who was not a little troubled, for the Woman who had told her what Tarquin had done. So as since the Prince of Ameriola, and she had agreed to advertise each other of all they heard, she believed, knowing the slave who brought the note was his, that it was this Prince who had written unto her. So as being extreamly jealous of her glory, and valuing it above all things else, she feared left this note should induce Tarquin to think that she held some criminal correspondency with his Brother. But he rested not long in those fears; for this cruel Tarquin intending to delude her, and judging by the sorrow he saw in her eyes, that she knew more then she spoke, he went unto her with more freeness of spirit than usual. And to execute the violence which he had used in taking away the note from him that would have given it unto her, he told her with a laugh, that he would have her guess from whom it came, and what it concerned, adding that if she could not guess right, she should not have it until the morning: The Princess seeing him so pleasant, suffered her self to be deceived, not but that she knew Tarquin could dissemble as well as any Man living; but as commonly persons that are highly virtuous can hardly believe that any can be extreamly wicked, so she thought the note to be of no great importance; and she thought moreover, that the Prince of Ameriola and she had given too bad an Interpretation upon the Letters; or else that surely Tarquin had repented. So as setting the best side outward, she indeavoured to guess from whom this Note should come, which he would not shew unto her, though she knew not whom to name, for she would not mention the Prince his Brother, and Tullia was not used to write unto her. But after this forced mirth had lasted a while, supper was ready; and Tarquin that he might have the satisfaction to see her take the poison, he would sup with her. I have heard a Man say, who saw her that night, that though she was melancholly, yet she never in her life looked fairer; and he assured me, that Tarquin himself was a little troubled, and that when she called for drink, and he knew it to be the poyson, which he had had prepared, he changed colour. But when he found that the ſight of ſo great a beauty did mollifie his heart, this cruel Man turned away his head, that he might not ſee her drink the poiſon: And indeed he talked unto one of his Servants whilſt ſhe took it: After which, glorying that he had ſurmounted the weakneſs, and fooliſh qualms of his heart, he was ſo impudently inhumane as to look upon her as before, and ſo cruel as to jeſt ſeveral times with her during this fatal repaſt. But to the end, that the poiſon might have the more leiſure to work its effect, he ſeemed to have ſome private buſineſs to communicate unto her; ſo as carrying her into his Cloſet, he obliged her to be there near two hours, though ſhe began to find her ſelf ill within half an hour after ſhe entred; for the Man of whom he had the poiſon, aſſured him, that if no Antidote was applied within one hour after the taking, all remedies after would be in vain, and the party would certainly die. So as though this fair and virtuous Princeſs did complain at firſt of her being ill, yet this Tyger Tarquin did keep her there, telling her it was nothing; and talking to her of divers things which he deſired her to tell the King. But at laſt, after he thought the poiſon had wrought its effects, he ſeeming very buſie in helping her, he would be always by her, leſt if ſhe ſhould ſuſpect the cauſe of her death, ſhe ſhould not diſcover any thing unto the by-ſtanders. Thus this admirable perſon did, ſo her Murtherer ſeemed to intereſt himſelf in the pain which ſhe indured. And indeed, when ſhe went out of the Cloſet, her Women ſeeing a mortal paleneſs in her face, did perſwade her to go to bed: But ſhe anſwered very mildly, that ere long they ſhould carry her to her Grave. And as they were very earneſt to ſend for the King's Phyſicians; I pray do, (ſaid ſhe) ſee they bring intentions with them to make me die more eaſily; for to cure me (added ſhe and ſighed) they cannot, nor do I deſire they ſhould. Mean while, amidſt all the hatred which ſhe might well have againſt her Husband, and her Siſter, and notwithſtanding, the Love ſhe bore unto the Prince of Amriola, yet ſhe uſed not one ſharp word againſt thoſe who killed her, nor one ſweet expreſſion of him whom ſhe tenderly loved; but ſhe whiſpered one in the Ear, whom ſhe truſted with all the ſecrets of her Life, and commanded her to tell that unfortunate Prince, that ſhe deſired him not to revenge her death, but to preſerve her memory: After which ſhe asked twice to ſee the King and Queen; but though Tarquin ſaid he had ſent unto them, yet ſhe never ſaw them, becauſe he hindred any from going, ſaying it was too late of the night and that he hoped the Princeſs would paſs it over, and that ſhe her ſelf would be ſorry they ſhould obey her. The Princeſs having a great Soul, knew very well ſhe asked in vain, nor was ſhe very earneſt upon it, but lifting up her eyes unto Heaven, let me die then (ſaid ſhe with a deep ſigh) in hopes long to ſtand in need of no Conſolation. After this her pain encreaſed, and ſhe grew very weak, but when the Phyſicians came, they did a little revive her, but they hoped never the more for that, but on the contrary ſaid they could not ſave her; and in ſaying ſo, one might have ſeen by their eyes, that they durſt not tell the cauſe of her death, and that they imagined Tarquin would not have them to tell it, but they ſpoke in ambiguous terms, enough to make it known. Mean while, this cruel Murtherer ſtood by ſtill; and he had ſo much diſſembling inhumanity as to feel the Pulſe of this deplorable Princeſs, that he might gueſs how long ſhe had to live: So as this languiſhing perſon did in a manner pull back her Arm, and being out of all patience, turned towards Tarquin, with a languor able to inſpire compaſſion into cruelty it ſelf, I ask you pardon, Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him and bluſht) for being ſo long a dying, but it is not my fault (ſaid ſhe and turned another way) for I took all the poiſon that was given me, and never looked for any remedy; yet theſe words were not heard by any but Tarquin, and that Lady who knew all the ſecrets of this deplorable Ladies heart. But ſhe was ſo full of ſorrow as ſhe could not ſpeak, and Tarquin who was as bold as wicked, beginning to ſpeak, he ſaid ſhe began to ſwound, and that ſhe would never recover out of it. And indeed, loſing her ſpeech, a little after ſhe fell into a Trance which laſted four or five hours. But as ſoon as Tarquin ſaw her ſwounded, and thinking ſhe would never ſpeak again, he ſent to acquaint the King and Queen, who coming in all haſt were extreamly grieved to find the Princeſs in that condition; yet they never thought her to be poiſoned, nor of any thing elſe but remedies, but all in vain, for ſhe died ſome two hours after the Sun was up: Afterwards the unjuſt Tarquin bethought himſelf how to render her all imaginable honours after death. But whilſt this inhumane Butcher was ſacrificing this fair Princeſs unto his Love and Ambition, the cruel Tullia was offering the ſame ſad ſacrifice that he was, and as ſoon as the Prince of Ameriola was returned home, and according to his cuſtom went into a Bath, he began to find himſelf ill; for Tarquin had made up his Doſe of ſuch a Compoſition, as when Tullia had put it into the Bath, the very vapour of it did ſtifle him, and took away the uſe of his reaſon as ſoon as he was in.

The two Servants who waited upon him, being privy unto Tullia's Conſpiracy, they had Antidotes to keep this vapour from hurting them; and Tullia had cunningly ſent away all others that were not of the confederacy: But after this poiſon had wrought its effect, and the Prince in that condition, the cruel Tullia her ſelf took him out of the Bathe, and put him into Bed, cauſing thoſe who were of this horrid plot, to ſay that he deſired to ſleep, and had forbidden any to enter into the Chamber. She her ſelf ſeeing he did not die ſo ſoon as ſhe deſired, ſhe would not go to Bed that night, and going often into the Chamber of this unhappy Prince, her impatience was ſuch, as ſhe cauſed him to be ſtrangled with two Handkerchiefs tyed together, to the end there might be no ſigns of a violent death, and that it might ſeem he was choked with a Fluxion of Humours. However it was, this Prince died the ſame night with the Princeſs whom he loved, which made ſo great a noiſe in Rome, that nothing elſe was talked of. Yet Tarquin and Tullia were ſo terrible unto all the World, that People durſt only whiſper what they thought concerning the ſudden death of theſe two both at one time, though none called the cauſe of their death by the name of any diſeaſe: Theſe moſt cruel and inhumane Barbarians, did well enough forſee that cauſing them to die ſo both at one time, people would think as they did; but they foreſaw more danger to themſelves, in cauſing them to die at ſeveral times; for if the Princeſs had ſurvi-ved the Prince of Ameriola, she would have told the King her Father what she knew concerning his death: And Tullia would not poison her Husband until she was sure that Tarquin would poyson his Wife; lest after he was rid of him who might dispute with him about the Crown, he should not go on in his business. Tarquin for his part would not poison his Wife, had he not been sure of his Brothers death; for he was sure that if his Brother survived the Princess, he would revenge her death, so as seeing much less danger in the mutterings of the people, they resolved to commit these two horrid Crimes both at once, with as much boldness as cruelty.

And as Tarquin did render all imaginable honours unto the Princess, as soon as she was dead; so did Tullia unto the Prince of Ameriola, as soon as he was expired. This cruel person had the impudence to go and comfort Tarquin after the death of his Wife: And Tarquin also sent this Complement unto her, that he was more sorry for the Prince of Ameriola's death, as he was her Husband than as his Brother. All this while the wise and prudent Servius Tullus was strangely amazed; for though at the first he did not suspect that the Princess his Daughter was poisoned; yet he was of another mind after the Prince of Ameriola's death, and knew that Tarquin and Tullia were they who sent them into another World, which grieved this good King to the very heart: These two virtuous Persons who were dead, were extremely dear unto him, and their deaths struck deep into his sorrowful Soul; Tarquin and Tullia after this horrid Crime were a horror unto him, but they were a terrour also and he feared the same treatment to himself, which he saw used unto others. Yet this Consideration had not kept him from publishing his resentment, had not a reason of honour restrained him. For (said he unto one whom he trusted with all the secrets of his heart) why should I stain my own glory, by accusing my own Daughter for poysoning her Husband and her Sister? Why should I accuse my Son in Law for murthering his Wife and his Brother? When I have accused these two persons can I prove their Crime, or am I assured that I can punish them? for it is likely that Tarquin and Tullia would never have attempted a thing of this nature, unless they were sure of some great party in the Senate. Besides I know no further than by conjectures; and say I had a certain knowledge, it is hard for a Father to punish his own Children, unless they be obliged unto it, for conspiring against the Senate; for in that case the general interest ought to be preferred before the particular, and ones Country before Nature. But this is only to be revenged for the death of a Daughter, and a Son in Law, Rome hath no interest in the business, or if it have it is in a different manner: For I conceive it is a shame unto all Romans to have a King that shall convict his Son in Law for poisoning his Wife, and that shall convict his own daughter for poysoning her Husband. I conceive it better to dissemble it, and look upon Tarquin and Tullia as innocent. This certainly is the best and most safe way for my self; and certainly the most advantageous unto Rome: for unless I should poyson Tarquin and Tullia as they have others, they will raise a Rebellion in the City which may hazard my Crown, and therefore it is the best way to dissemble my Resentments. You may imagine Sir, that the man unto whom he spoke, did not contradict what Tullus said; for besides the strength of reason which was in what was said, it had been a hard tale, to tell a Father that he ought to put a Daughter and a Son in Law to death; knowing well that there was no middle way to take, and the banishment of such persons was not enough. So as this being the resolution, the King did dissemble the matter so well, that all the World were constrained to dissemble with him, and seem as if there was not any suspicion either of Tarquin or Tullia, for causing the deaths of that illustrious Prince and Princess. But Sir, not to relate what discourses Tarquin and Tullia had, nor what kind of Love this was, which was begun by the impoysoning of so great a Prince and so great a Princess. Give me leave only to tell you, that as soon as the time of mourning was past, which amongst us lasts Ten Months, Tarquin did marry Tullia, and Tullus could not hinder it.

Not but that this marriage appeared most horrid and execrable unto him, as oft as he considered that Tarquin poysoned his Wife purposely to marry Tullia, and Tullia poysoned her Husband only to marry Tarquin; but Tullus having begun to dissemble and cover their Crimes, so he would continue it. Also since it was extremely expedient for him to unite the family of the Tarquins with his own. Policy allowed of that which vertue and justice would not, so as suiting himself to the times, this abominable marriage was made up with all magnificence: For the King knew very well that Tarquin as wicked as he was, had gotten much credit in the Senate and minds of the people: Not but that, as is said before, the Crimes of Tarquin and Tullia were most horrid in the eyes of all the World; yet the people being inconstant, changing every minute, and equally forgetting both vertues and vices, the memory of this cursed act did insensibly wear out, as if the people of Rome quite forgot it. For you must know, that since the death of the Prince of Ameriola and the Princess, Tarquin seeing himself a step nearer the Crown, and desiring all might be forgotten, he became that out of policy which naturally he was not, for he grew exceedingly civil, and was more forward to salute the common people, than persons of quality; he always went through the most popular streets, purposely to meet with more occasions of shewing his civility unto those, from whom he expected one day a Crown. Moreover, he would very earnestly interest himself in private business; he would needs be the only Pacificus, and taker up of all Quarrels; he would be the Arbitrator and ender of all differences; he divided those whom he thought might prejudice him, and united all such as he conceived fit for his service; he lent money unto some; he gave money unto others; his Gates were open unto all comers; he itched to serve such as he called his friends; and was infinitely zealous to do all good Offices: Again, he would sute himself most admirably well unto the humours of any, when he was in private with them: And unto such as were religiously devoted, he would seem religious even to a very scruple; he was a very Libertine with the Libertines; he would scoff both at the Gods of the Grecians and the Gods of the Romans. He was voluptuous with those that were so, and he was a Philosopher when he met with men of that profession. Yet I have heard say, that for all these various forms into which he would transform himself, he was still Tarquin, and when he would be the most sweet and courteous, he had still a sullen, gloomy, and fierce look: But for all that the people looking more upon his Civilities than his Physiognomy, he deceived them; and this most abominable Tarquin did get great credit, under the Reign of the most virtuous King on earth. As for Tullia, it was not so with her, for her spirit was not able to vary into so many several shapes as Tarquin was. But on the contrary she thought her self above all she saw, that all the world was her Vassals, and that she owed not observance unto any; that Fortune owed her a Crown, and that she needed not to endeavour the pleasing of any, or getting their Loves. She did extremely slight all Women, and would not admit of any conversation but men. As for her reputation she did not care for any; and when any told her that if she carried her self as she did, unto all the Ladies who did visit her, she would procure their hatred; she would then return answer, that so she could make her self feared, she cared not for being loved. And indeed, she never used any of those trivial obligements, which Custom hath established as a Law among Ladies. Not but that she loved to be commended, though she said she did not care for it, but she could not endure to commend or flatter any: And indeed she was never commended or flattered by any, but out of fear; and certainly they had great reason to fear her, for her actions were all violences, and she was terrible to all the world.

It happened once that she put a most horrible affront upon the Wife of a Prime Senatour, who being of a high and sensible spirit, could not chuse but complain as soon as she was out of that Princesses Chamber. For meeting with one of her intimate friends, she no sooner saw him but beginning to speak; Good Friend (said she) rejoyce with me, for being delivered during all my life from one of the most scurvy visits in the World; for I am fully resolved never again to go unto the Princess Tullia, no not though she should become Queen. She is so accustomed to be uncivil, (replied her friend) that you need not wonder at her; but I am so little accustomed to suffer incivilities, (replied this incensed Lady) as I cannot endure them. But do you know one (added her friend) that ever went unto Tullia, who received no affront from her? and do you think it is a shame for you to endure what all others do? I think (replyed she half angry) that such as do endure them are people of poor and base hearts, and that I am sure mine is none such. If I could not live unless I went unto Tullia, were I born her Slave, or at least, did my fortune depend upon her; were I sure she would do some great matters for me, then perhaps it might be said, I was too delicate and nice, and that I were to blame if I did not go unto her: But since none of these things are so, for I can live and never visit a Princess who is void of virtue, I am none of Tullia's Slave; my fortune depends not upon her, nor will she ever do any thing for me, and therefore my best and shortest course is never to come at her; for I am not troubled with the disease of those Ladies, who when they have been with Tullia on one of those days, when she did not treat them very ill can go all the rest of the day from house to house, bragging, whether to the purpose or no, that they were to see her, and that she spoke to them. And I remember one whose whole discourse was of that nature, and who had such an art of bringing in all she had to say, to make it believed she was high in Tullia's favour, as I wondred how she could link her discourse together. For at every word, I came from from the Princess, the Princess told me, I spoke of that business unto the Princess, the Princess took me unto the window to talk with me in private, the Princess made me promise her to come again to morrow; and the Princess did at every word so fill up her discourse; as if that word had been taken away all the rest had been non-sence. However she was very well pleased with her self, and thought her self very happy. But I who cannot pay any open respect unto any who are not virtuous, or such as affect incivilities, I will never visit any but such as receive me as I conceive they are obliged to do. And this is my way of behaviour, when I am amongst my inferiours, I am as careful as I can to use my Civilities unto them, when I am amongst my equals I use to measure my civilities with theirs, and I care not how they carry themselves to me so there be no strangers in the Company, though I conceive that familiarity and affability, never ought to banish Civility; but when I am in the company of women whom fortune hath set above me; I am very circumspect, and have an eye upon their very looks, I cannot endure to be Browbeaten, and if those of that quality be not civil, they have naughty hearts and ill wits; for as the world goes it is so easie a matter for them to oblige every one that sees them, or if they do not, it must be concluded they have no wit, or else so foolishly proud, that they think all their inferiours not considerable. And I do openly declare, that I would not be Tullia with all her Grandure upon a condition to have all her ill inclinations. This Lady being in the heat of her anger, did not take any notice that she spoke before some people who were not obliged to be faithful unto her: And indeed this discourse being reported unto the furious Tullia, she threatned her in such a terrible manner, as the Lady was glad to go out of Rome, purposely to avoid an ill turn. However the secrets of the Gods being inscrutable, the marriage of Tarquin and Tullia, as abominable as it was, seemed to be concordant to their wills, for all things prospered according to their wish: Tullia had three Sons and a Daughter; abundance was in their House, Tarquin and she were never sick, and every thing prospered unto them; Tarquin did signalize himself by his courage upon several occasions in War; and one would have thought that the great Governour of the World had forgotten their Crimes, so happy did they seem in every thing, and yet it was but a seeming happiness; for because they were not upon the Throne, and Tullus lived longer than they would have him, they thought themselves very miserable. And indeed Tarquin from the very first day of marriage with Tullia, never durst attempt any thing against his Father in Laws life; but rather endeavoured to make the people forget that Crime which he was accused of, and get a strong party in the Senate. But the most cruel Tullia being of a more impetuous temper, and having less prudence in her Ambition than he, she thought the way which Tarquin took to ascend the Throne to be too long; and that if he would have his design to prosper, he must take a nearer cut. She would have been glad if her Father would have been so good natur'd as to have given over the Government into Tarquin's hands; But she saw quite contrary, that this vertuous King did not intend he should Reign; and that if he did part from his Royal Power, as some reports went; yet he intended it should be upon conditions, that he should not be King: So as not seeing in Tarquin all those virtues that were requiſite to be in a good Prince, he kept the Royal power in his hands, and uſed it with ſuch moderation as deſerved to be a pattern for all the Kings upon earth.

But as it is very hard for Kings to hide their thoughts, ſo Tullia quickly diſcovered that the King her Father did not intend to put the Crown upon her Head: So as being in a mighty rage, ſhe made it reflect upon her Husband, who did not act according to her mind in the ſpeedy compaſſing of her deſired ends; and not being able any longer to diſſemble the thoughts of her heart, ſhe began to look upon Tarquin with eyes full of extraordinary fury. And this Prince being of his own nature very ſenſible, he asked her from whence this alteration in her humour did proceed? It proceeds (ſaid ſhe) from your tame ſitting ſtill, and from your putting your ſelf into ſuch a ſtate, as you ſhall never be able to remove; for truly Tarquin to be plain with you, I did not conſent unto the death of my Siſter, nor Poyſon my Husband to become the Wife of a bare Citizen of Rome; for the Daughter of Tullus needed not to employ ſuch violent means to find a Husband of that quality, but I thought to find in you a Prince worthy to wear a Crown, and one that would do all things neceſſary to get it. Know then that if your thoughts be high, you will remember that you are of the Blood of the firſt Tarquin; you will aſpire to ſit in his Seat, and out of an heroick impatiency of Reigning, you will force Tullus to ſurrender his ſeat unto you, and will not tarry until death drive him out, or till old Age make the Scepter to drop out of his hand. Know, I ſay, that if you do this day begin to make the firſt ſtep up the Throne, if you do it with a firm reſolution never to retreat but go on, and either dye or Reign; and if you will do all I bid you, then I will hold you for my Husband and my King: But know withal, that if your thoughts go leſs I will hold you for my Slave; for my Slave that is Criminal; for Tarquin I muſt repute thoſe culpable, who commit Crimes to no purpoſe: And therefore I conclude, that if we do not ſit upon the Throne, we deſerve to be reproached with the death of thoſe two perſons, whom we ſacrificed unto our Love and our Ambition: But on the contrary, all Crimes will be blotted out, when they are followed with happy ſucceſs. Make haſt then Tarquin, and keep the promiſe which you made when you married me; you are in ſo fair a way, that I wonder you ſhould go no faſter. You came from Orinth, and are deſcended from Tarquinia to make your ſelf King of a ſtrange people, as the firſt of the Tarquins did: you are of a Royal Family, you ſee in every publick place, Statues erected unto the firſt of the Tarquins, you dwell in the ſame Palace which he built, you ſee the ſame Throne which he did ſit upon; you have the ſame heart, ſpirit, and ambition; you fear neither any thing above your head nor about you; the authority of the Laws nor ſervile fear of Imaginary Penalties do not affright you; you have friends in the Senate and among the people, and if you had not been over prudent, you had been upon the Throne already; and if you ſhould continue ſtill upon this prejudicial Prudence, all that you have already done is to no purpoſe; what good will all your extraordinary Civility, which you have uſed unto the moſt baſe and abject of the People do you? unto what end ſerves all your cringing complacency unto all the Patricians? why have you lent out ſome monies, given others, and been unprofitably Prodigal, will all your Ambition and turbulent Pangs of Soul ſerve to no end? Truly Tarquin, if you will make no more haſt, I will even adviſe you to return unto Tarquinia and Corinth, and to ſeek out for felicity, by ſome other way than by Ambition. But as for me, ſince Tanaquil who was a ſtranger, was ſo bold and happy as to diſpoſe of Crowns, either in the perſon of her Husband or her Son in Law, I will ſee what I can do, and not ſtay till Tullus refer it to the Senate, who will not render it unto you; nor will I ſtay ſo long as till he die, which perhaps will be a long time: Speak then Tarquin will you be a Slave, or will you be a King? In telling you that I will be worthy of you, (replied he) methinks I tell you as much as need; but to let you ſee that you accuſe me wrongfully, I will diſcover unto you thoſe reaſons which move me to defer the execution of ſo great a deſign. And indeed, Tarquin told Tullia all his ſeveral plots, which he had in the Senate and among the People, but ſay what he could to move her unto patience, and not to go precipitately to work, he was forced to promiſe her, to make more haſt than well he could; for every minute ſeemed an Age unto this Ambitious and cruel perſon, which was employed in the advancement of her abominable deſign. However ſhe went unto the King, and asked and obtained favours for men unto whom ſhe would not have done them, but upon conditions to ſerve her againſt that Prince who did them, whenſoever ſhe ſhould need. Thus this vertuous King did by his own benefits contribute to his own ruine; for not a day paſſed wherein Tarquin or Tullia did not obtain ſomething from him for thoſe whom they had engaged in their wicked deſigns.

In the mean time Tarquin lived the moſt wretched life in the World, for he reſted neither night nor day: he had always a hundred ſeveral matters which tended all unto one end; for labouring to engage all ſorts of people in his deſign, he held all manner of correſpondencies, ſome men under pretence of eating at his Table came to confer with him, others whom he never ſaw but at the Temple, others alſo unto whoſe houſes he went; and ſome in the Kings own Palace whom he treated with to ruine him: Moreover, ſcarce a night paſſed but he went out of his own houſe in a diſguiſe, to confer with ſome of the Senators who were of his Intelligence, during which time it was given out that he was gone to Bed. Alſo he employed the moſt ſacred things to ſerve his abominable ends; for he engaged ſome of the Salian Prieſts, and he made an under hand Propoſition unto the Grand Veſtal to enter into his intereſts, but ſhe would not, though he promiſed to ſecure her from all danger. Mean while, the common opinion was, that he courted her to extinguiſh the ſacred fire, to the end it might be ſaid, that Rome was menaced with ſome great misfortune, and that this accident did ſignifie the authority to be weak in the hands of ſo old a Prince as Servius Tullus; for he knowing very well the nature of the common People, he knew that matters of Religion make a deep impreſſion in their ſpirits, and that a ſilly ſcruple aptly applied to the multitude, will work more with them than all the ſolid reaſons in the World. Moreover, though Tarquin was always full of tumultuous buſineſs, though he ſcarcely ever ſlept, though his mind was perpetually unquiet, and though he ſaw himſelf always upon the very brink of a diſmal precipice, ſince if his deſign was once diſcovered, he was utterly ruined; ruined; yet he was as healthy and as vigorous, as if he had enjoyed the greateſt tranquillity of any man alive. But for the better advancement of his deſign, he asked divers things of the King, particularly concerning Rome, which were of ſuch a nature, as neither ought nor could be granted, ſo as they were denied him; and he asked them, purpoſely that he might have a pretence of murmuring againſt Servius Tullus; and at the ſame time he began to complain, thoſe whom either he or Tullia had ſuborned began alſo to declaim againſt the government, and to belch out a thouſand bitter invectives againſt the beſt of Kings. And it is very obſervable, that Servius Tullus who was the firſt of our Kings who made money, and brought in the uſe of it amongſt us, did thereby make the way of ſuborning thoſe whom Tarquin had need of, more eaſie. For thereby gifts might be given in private, and without a noiſe unperceived, which before could not be. Alſo Tarquin had ingaged abundance of all ſorts; there was not any Trade or Art, but he had ſome in it ready to do what he would, he had a Party alſo working among the very Slaves; ſo as it was eaſie for him to ſcatter what reports he pleaſed againſt the King, ſome ſaid therefore, that he was but a Slave born of a Slave, who after the death of the firſt Tarquin had uſurped the Crown by the Artifice of a Woman, who got him made King without the ſuffrages of the people. Others told the Senators, that Servius ſmelling of the baſeneſs of birth, had taken the goods of all the rich Families, and divided them among the poor; others told the People, that the King had taken from them the nomination of all their principal Officers, and beſtowed them upon the great ones, to the end they might oppreſs the weak: And others ſaid, that this Prince who had cauſed the particular Eſtates of every one to be numbred, had done it onely to know unto whom he ſhould addreſs himſelf, when he had a mind to undo his Subjects and inrich himſelf.

So as every one going the way of his own intereſt and cunning, diſperſing ſeveral reports amongſt the dull multitude (who are not able to diſcern juſtly, and who always are apt to murmur againſt Authority, eſpecially againſt an old King) they were preſently perſwaded, that the moſt juſt Prince upon earth, was Tyrannical. Tarquin and Tullia ſeeing ſo happy a beginning in their enterprize, they were beyond meaſure joyed; yet it was a joy not communicable unto others; for the diſcourſe at Tullia's houſe was onely ſuch as were of the intrigue. And I have heard ſay, that they would ſometimes paſs away a whole afternoon in nothing but whiſpers; for all that came thither had ſome ſecret or other to tell Tullia, or Tullia them.

But atlaſt, the fatal Punctо of time deſtined for the ruine of Servius Tullus, and the Grandure of Tarquin being come, Rome was a witneſs of the moſt horrid adventure, that ever happened in any place of the World. Be pleaſed to know, that this Ambitious Prince, having ordered all things for the execution of his Barbarous deſign, and being fully reſolved to kill the King, he went that fatal day unto the Chamber of the Devilliſh Tullia; for he had paſſed away all the night in going from ſtreet to ſtreet in a diſguiſe, and from houſe to houſe, to make ſure of all thoſe who were of his damned Faction. He was no ſooner there but that deteſtable Princeſs went to meet him with eyes ful of joy; and ſpeaking firſt, courage Tarquin (ſaid ſhe unto him) you have but one ſtep now to make, before you are upon the Throne, aſcend it boldly, and render your ſelf worthy to be the Husband of Tullia by an act ſo heroick: Leave tenderneſs and pity, and ſuch puling qualities to the dull vulgar, and know that I permit you to ſacrifice all unto your Ambition, not excepting the King himſelf. Go then this very day, and with undaunted reſolution either aſcend the Throne or deſcend into your Grave; for as the caſe ſtands with you there is no middle way to take. No, no, Generous Tullia (replied this Prince) you never need to fear I will ſtartle back, nor need you doubt the happy ſucceſs of my deſign, be aſſured you ſhall be a Queen before the Sun ſet, and you ſhall never ſee me again unleſs upon the Throne. After theſe expreſſions, this inhumane Prince left her, and went with a great number of armed men unto a place cloſe by the great Theatre where all the publick Aſſemblies were held. But in going thither the common Crier who was gained by that Prince, did command all the Senators in a tumultuous manner to aſſemble themſelves, and come before King Tarquin to know his Will. Mean time, you muſt know Sir, how that which the ſooner advanced this Princes deſign was, that the firſt of the Tarquins had augmented the Senate unto a very great number; ſo as all the laſt addition of the Senators were of the ſecond faction, and were much diſpoſed unto a Revolt. And there was not one who did not obey the ſummons of the publick Cryer, and came to Tarquin.

Thoſe of the ancient Senators who had been gained by him came alſo; the friends of Servius came likewiſe, ſome out of fear, others out of a perſwaſion that Tarquin did act by the conſent of Servius, who during his life would have him ſit upon the Throne; for they could not believe that any Son in Law unto ſuch a virtuous Prince would offer to pull the Crown ſo violently off his head. So as both friends and enemies did all equally obey, and followed Tarquin, who without more ado did ſit down in the Royal Seat.

This action ſeeming very ſtrange, and there being a great multitude of the conſpiracy gathered together in that place, ſo it chanced that this great Croud of men and the great noiſe of the thing, did in an inſtant draw thither a vaſt multitude of people and that which Tarquen did was ſo ſtrange unto them, as thoſe who were of his faction themſelves, could not chuſe but ſhew wonder in their Countenances; ſo as never ſuch a general conſternation was ſeen. Mean while, the arrogant Tarquin aſſuming a new pride, as ſoon as he was ſet in the Royal Chair of State, he began to accuſe Servius Tullus as an Uſurper, and told the people all that he had cauſed to be infuſed into them before: After which, he began to aggravate the great virtues of the firſt Tarquin, he treated Servius as a Slave, and ſpoke in ſuch bold and arrogant eloquence, as if Tullus had been the Tyrant and he the legitimate King. So as there ariſing a great noiſe of acclamations amongſt thoſe who were hired to it, and a great murmur amongſt thoſe who did not approve of what was done, the confuſion of voices was ſuch that Tarquin could not be heard. Things being in this Condition, Tullus being advertiſed of this diſorder, he came upon the place, at the leaſt to die upon the Throne which he had ſo worthily enjoyed. When this venerable King was within four paces of Tarquin, he looked ſtedfaſtly upon this Arrogant Uſurper who inſolently took took his place; and beginning to ſpeak, Tarquin (ſaid he unto him) how durſt thou be ſo bold as to aſſemble the Senate, and to ſit in my Seat? Thou art miſtaken Tullus (anſwered this cruel Uſurper) for the Royal Chair wherein I ſit, belongs unto the firſt of the Tarquins, from whom I am deſcended; and thou art only an old Slave whom Fortune only hath elevated, and whom I will put into Fetters that I may take from the Romans the ſhame of having ſuch a Maſter. At theſe words the noiſe redoubled, and there was ſuch a hurly burly as Tarquin might plainly ſee, all the World was not for him: So as fearing leſt the ſight of this old and good King, ſhould turn any of them who were for him, and leſt ſo great a number of people ſhonld come, as that he ſhould not be the ſtronger party, he reſolved to execute his reſolution in caſe he found any reſiſtance; for he being tall, young, nimble and ſtrong; and Servius Tullus being old and weak, this Tyrant without any reſpect either unto the quality of a legitimate King or unto his Father in Law, or as the Grandfather of his Children, he did moſt inſolently lay hold upon him, and throw him down with a moſt horrible violence from the top of the ſteps to the bottom.

Thus the unfortunate Servius Tullus as his laſt and greateſt misfortune, ſaw himſelf forſaken by his Guards, and almoſt all his friends; except my own father, who preſerving a moſt conſtant fidelity, did help this miſerable King to riſe, and to get unto his own Palace, for he could hardly walk: But alas, he was no ſooner got unto the end of that ſtreet, which then was called the Cyprian ſtreet (and which the people ever ſince called the deteſtable ſtreet in ſpite of all Tarquins Tyranny) but this miſerable King was pulled out of my fathers Arms who defended him, as long as he could: and preſently after was killed by ſome whom the cruel Tarquin had ſent purpoſely to that end. And my father after he had ſtriven in vain to incite the People unto a revenge of the Kings death, was forced to retire home. Mean while, the cruel Tullia who had given orders to advertiſe her every moment of all that paſſed, ſhe no ſooner heard what inhumane Tarquin had done, but ſhe took Coach in all haſt, to go unto the place where the Senate was aſſembled; and ſending to call her Husband, ſhe told him that ſhe was come to render him the firſt homage, and ſalute him as King of Rome. But he having buſineſs of neer concernment in hand, he adviſed her to ſtay no longer among the croud of people, where Peace was not yet eſtabliſhed. Tullia returned to her Coach; and when the Coach came to the further end of the Cyprian ſtreet, and the Coachman ready to turn upon his right hand towards the Mount Eſquiline, he eſpied the body of Servius Tullus all blood and dirt: and ſpying this pitiful Spectacle he ſtopped his Horſes out of reſpect and humanity both, and turning towards this cruel Princeſs whom he did drive, he ſhewed unto her the body of the King her Father, thinking the ſight would have obliged her to ſtay: But the pitileſs Tullia inſpired with cruelty it ſelf, did chide him for his reſpects, and with inconceivable inhumanity and anger, commanded him to drive on without any ſtay, for any way unto a Throne was good: So as the Coachman not daring to reſiſt her, gave the Bridle unto his Horſes, who being fuller of pity than the Barbarous Tullia, did out of horror at the ſight of the dead Corps, avoid treading upon the feet of this great King; but the Wheels of the Coach touching the body of this great and unfortunate Prince were all bloody, this ſad horrid ſpectacle not moving the heart of cruel Tullia unto the leaſt ſign of Compaſſion. But on the contrary when ſhe was told that the Coach had gone over the body of her Father, ſhe turned her head to look upon it, and was ſo far from any ſorrow as ſhe looked upon it with joy. Thus ſmeared with the blood of her own father, ſhe was ſo impudent as to return unto her Domeſtick Gods; but to ſpeak truly Tullia regarded neither Domeſtick Gods nor any other; and indeed it is not to be wondred at, for ſhe being naturally cruel and wicked, ſhe was not capable of any humanity, but all ſigns of joy were to be ſeen in her eyes and all her actions. Mean while, Tarquin being the ſtronger party, he impoſed Laws upon the weaker, and commanded ſo abſolutely the very firſt day of his Reign, as if he had been the peaceable Poſſeſſor of that Throne out of which he had thrown his Father in Law, he could not have carried it otherwiſe than he did: But to ſhew his inhumanity to the height, he would not ſuffer a burial to be given unto the Corps of the late King, leſt it ſhould move the people to compaſſion: ſaying in moſt cruel rallary, that Romulus who was ranked amongſt the Gods had none: And that his cruelty may appear beyond all that imagination can conceive, the Widdow of this unfortunate King went in the Night, (accompanied with my Mother, who was the only woman that did not forſake her) unto the place where the Corps of this Prince did lye, and being aſſiſted with ſome old Domeſticks, ſhe got the Corps as far as the Palace, which the moſt cruel Tarquin and Tullia hearing of, they ſent to ſtrangle her; at leaſt, it is certain that this deplorable Princeſs having ſent my Mother to take ſome courſe for the private Funerals of the King her Husband, ſhe found her dead at her return, but could not diſcover any further, for the Kings Palace was grown to be a deſolate Deſart, preſently after he was aſſaſſinated.

However, all Rome was in a moſt horrible conſternation; for moſt of thoſe who had ſerved Tarquin, no ſooner ſaw him upon the Throne, but they repented that ever they helped him up, and found that in lieu of having a King they were like to have a Tyrant. For as ſoon as Tarquin was Maſter of Rome he flattered the people only to get ſo much power from them as to leſſen the Authority of the Senate; and therefore he was reſolved not to augment either their Authority or their number; he made himſelf Maſter of all the ſtrong Forts in the City, and kept always a ſtrong Guard about his Palace. After which intending to become terrible, and to Reign by fear, he put to death a great number of the moſt illuſtrious Senators, he exiled many, and became ſuch a terror, as not any were able to oppoſe his will. Nor did he content himſelf with putting to death and exiling all thoſe who were in a capacity to hurt him; but he charged divers Citizens with ſuppoſed crimes, purpoſely to pick or make holes in their Coats, and ſo inrich himſelf by their Ruines. He took away all medling in matters of State from the Senate; he made both Peace and War, as he pleaſed; he contracted Leagues and Alliances with his neighbours, according as he fancied; he was himſelf ſole judge in all criminal cauſes wherein the honour of many noble Families, and lives of many illuſtrious Citizens were deeply concerned, and he did ſo unite all the Authority in his own ſingle perſon; that he was more abſolute Maſter of Rome than ever any was.

This Tarquin who was so sweet, so civil and so courteous in appearance, who did salute the people so humbly, favoured so many men, helped so many poor, and was so complacential unto all, now he had got upon the Throne, did not desire or indeavour to be beloved, but all his care was how to be feared: For (said he one day) it is the maddest folly in the World for those who Reign, to pretend unto love of the People, since it is the onely way to be scorned; but on the contrary, Prudence and Wisdom bids him make himself a terror unto those from whom he expects obedience. For a people who obeys a Prince only out of Love, will descant, and deliberate upon the Commands which are put upon them; but when the Commander is accustomed severely to punish such as do not obey, and hath rendred himself terrible, as soon as ever the command is heard of, the imagination is so taken up with the thought of punishment, in case of disobedience, as that the people for their own interest will blindly and presently obey, without any examination or deliberation upon the matter: And therefore I conclude, it is better to make himself feared then loved. And I am perswaded, that none do love any that are above themselves; but that which is called Love among the people, is only a Love of their own Liberty, which is alwaies greatest when they have an easie and weak master, one who is not absolutely enough, nor knows how to make himself feared and obeyed. This Sir, is the true character of Tarquin, unto whom the sirname of Proud was given; but it must be said to the shame of all Romans, that they all did sit still, with their hands in their Pockets, and all submitted themselves. For, except Clelius, the Father of Horace, and my Father, and a man of noble quality called Publius Valerius, who couragiously maintained the interests of the Senate and People, all obeyed the Tyrant. But at last, the three first of these, whose courages for two years together did resist against the violences of Tarquin, they were banished by this Usurper. But Clelius is there still; as for my Father, and the Father of Horace, they died presently after they went out of Rome. The truth is, that in dying my Father did an act so extraordinary as is worthy of a relation, which if I do, I shall do an act extraordinary also, since I needs must make an Elogy in praise of him unto whom I ow my life; and since the knowledge of his vertues will help you to hate Tarquin and Tullia the more, I shall without any scruple let you know them. Be pleased to know then, how that virtuous person whose name was Sevilia, was one of the faireſt women in all Rome, and one who after she had been adored and courted by the most illustrious persons in all our City, did marry my Father, followed his Fortunes, went with him into exile, with such admirable Constancy, as she was not affrighted at the troubles of travel; nor the sufferings of such as are exiled. For besides that Sevilia had a great and high soul, and was so perswaded that her duty was to be preferred before all things, she never made any difficulty to do what she thought she was obliged unto, especially when it was a duty which amity imposed upon her. And her Amity was ever so un-interested, as she considered only the persons whom she esteemed, never considering her self; and if it was more advantagious for them, whatsoever it was she consented unto, she generously consented unto it; so joyning together, a great beauty, a great spirit, and a great wisdome, it is not strange, if when she went out of Rome with my honoured Father, the People should murmur, and say openly that Tarquin had banished virtue in banishing Sevilia. But to return from whence I digressed, be pleased to know, that my Father falling sick, and perceiving he should not escape it, did speak unto Sevilia, like a man who feared not the approaches of death; so as my mother seeing his Constancy, and desiring not to dishearten him by shewing all her sorrow, she concealed a part of it, and striving with her self, she spoke to him with extraordinary Constancy. It may be, Sir, (said she unto him) that the Gods will hearken unto my Prayers; but in case they are not pleased to let me injoy the happiness of your life: I would gladly know, what your pleasure is, I should do? and what education you would have me give unto your Children? for they being very young (added she and shewing me and two others unto him) perhaps I may be able to inspire them with such thoughts as you desire: Tell me, I beseech you, in what part of the World you would have me live, until they are grown able to follow those ways of virtue which I shall shew them? I would have you return unto the place from whence we are banished replied my Father) to the end my children may be affectionate unto their Country, and may not learn strange Customes, which may keep them from hating the Tyrant of Rome. I would have you use all the ingenuity you can, to infuse into their hearts, the Love of virtue and the hatred of vice. But, Sir, (replied she) should we return to Rome, we must be known unto Tarquin, we must obey him, and ask his permission to enter: Consider well (I beseech you) whether honour will allow me to do what you desire, and whether it were not better do die out of Rome, then enter into it upon such conditions? However (said my Father) I would have my Children brought up in Rome, to the end they may hereafter be Thorns in the sides of the Tyrant; and that I may die with so much comfort as to hope I have left behind me, Children who will contribute unto the Liberty of their Country; as for the waies of getting them thither, I do refer them unto your Prudence, for I cannot divine what will happen when I am dead. After this, Sir, my Father grew weak upon a sudden, and could say no more, for he died the same night. Sevilia's intentions, were to obey her dead Husband as exactly, as if he were living, and she carried her self with so much Prudence and Wisdom, that her kindred and friends who lived in Rome, did get her leave to return, and bring her Children, Tarquin himself not believing that she desired it, nor that she was any thing obliged unto him for it. Yet her firm Constancy was such, after she returned to Rome, that she would never go and see the cruell Tullia; and she hath inspired such generous and noble thoughts into me, that I were the most ungratefull of men if I did not publish and acknowledge it. I remember one day when she understood that I had been solicited to be one in a Plot against Tarquin, and coming to me in my Chamber when I was alone, you know Herminius (said she unto me) that hitherto I have punctually obeyed your Father, whose last words you did hear, and that I have laboured to inspire your heart with the Love of your Country. But to tel you truly, my care hath been more to make you hate the Vices of the Tyrant then the Tyrant himself: And I have ever thought, that attempts to ruine him are not lightly to be undertaken, lest by indeavouring to set your Country at Liberty, you should bring it more into Slavery. Do not therefore ingage your self to no purpoſe, not ſo much for fear of expoſing your life which is ſo dear unto me, as for fear of expoſing Rome unto a more cruel ſervitude; for Trees that are onely ſhaken with the Wind, and not blown down, will take deep root.

This, Sir, was the ſage advice of Sevilia, which I did blindly follow, yet was ſhe but ill recompenced: For there was no perſecution which that vertuous Perſon was not put to ſuffer; but the truth is, ſhe did not ſuffer alone; for to return unto Tarquin, it may truly be ſaid of him that ſince the firſt day he aſcended the Throne, unto this hour, he never did any act in which there was not ſome injuſtice, or ſome cruelty, or ſome couſenage in it. All the Wars which he made have alſo the ſame character, and one may more properly call the Towns which he hath taken, rather thefts, then conqueſts; and ſubtile craft, and deceit have the greateſt ſhare in all his actions during his Reign. After he had made Alliance with the Latines, he deceived them, in mixing their Troops with his own, when they had no Commanders of their own Nation. He cauſed a man whoſe name was Herdonius, to periſh upon a bare ſurmiſe, he cauſed him to be loaded with Chains, and thrown into a place where he was drowned. 'Tis true, he took the City of Pometia with ſome honour, and he ſhewed himſelf a great Captain in that Recounter: But afterwards he took the City of the Gabians by ſuch a terrible piece of craft, as if it did not more relate unto the Prince Sextus his ſon, then unto him, I would tell you the whole paſſage; but after he had made that City deſolate, and put all the Riches of it into the hands of the People, except what he reſerved for himſelf, he indeavoured to taſte the ſweets of Peace and to blind the People: And for a guiſe upon all his injuſtices, in ruining ſo many, he ſet himſelf to finiſh that ſtately Temple of Jupiter, whoſe foundation the firſt of the Tarquins had laid. But there being many other Temples in building near the Tarpeian Rock, where the foundation of this was laid, and Tarquin having a mind to make this greater than the Prince who laid the firſt foundation intended, he made no difficulty of pulling down all thoſe Temples, and not to incenſe the People by it, he made a ſhew, as if he would firſt obſerve the flying of the Birds; but certainly the Augures were hired, and though the Gods had given ſuch an evident ſign as ſhould have reſtrained him, yet he would have done it. There was yet one Temple ſtanding which was dedicated unto the God Thermes, and Tarquin deſiring to make uſe of all, ſeemed to give credit unto the predictions of the Tuſcans, to the end, that giving this example, the People alwaies follow the mind of the Prince, might alſo beleeve with him, and be perſwaded of what he thought good; and as they were digging up the earth to lay the foundation of this ſtately Temple, they found the head of a man whoſe face continued ſtill in form; and Tarquin to make ſome uſe of this accident, he ſent into Tuſcany; and procured the Divines with whom he conſulted to ſay, That it was a moſt certain ſign, that Rome as Tarquin had ordered it, ſhould be the chief City of all Italy, and Miſtreſs of all the World; and indeed, they gave unto that place the name of Capitol which it bears at this preſent. So as after this, he preſſed forward the building of this Temple; after this he made Seats and Scaffolds about the Theatre, at an extraordinary expence. He eſtabliſhed two new Colonies; but in doing all theſe things, he ſtill was doing injuries, injuſtices, and cruelties. He put the eldeſt ſon of his own Siſter to death, he had not married his own Daughter but with an intent to be perfidious; and he omitted nothing which might merit the Title of a perfect Tyrant. All this while, Tullia in the midſt of all her Grandure, ſhe never had any content ſince ſhe was upon the Throne; for ſhe was ſtill ſo jealous of authority; as ſhe did not think that Tarquin gave enough unto her, and that having more inhumanity towards Tullus then he had, ſhe thought that ſhe might at leaſt divide with him in the Soveraign Power. So as time wearing out of her heart, that love which ſhe bore unto Tarquin, ſhe grew moſt horribly jealous; for as ſoon as ſhe ſaw this Prince regarded her no more than another woman, ſhe began not to regard him, and treated him ſo ill, that ſometimes ſhe made him go out of Rome. Alſo, ſhe was ſo horribly hated there, as when any took the liberty of ſpeech, they called her the deteſtable Tullia. As for Tarquin, in ſpight of all his Guards and Power, every one called him Tarquin the Proud. At the firſt, he did not take this well, and did moſt ſeverely puniſh ſuch men, as had no other Crimes but calling him ſo; but afterwards he was ſo inſenſibly accuſtomed unto it, as he thought this Title not injurious, nor did he take it ill, men ſhould call him ſo. And to merit it he grew ſo abominably terrible, as thoſe who were his moſt private Confidents of all his Cruelties, were ſometimes ſo terrified themſelves, that they durſt not come near him. That famous Sibyl who came unto him, did yet bring him to her ends for all his cruelty, and it hath been wordred a hundred, and a hundred times, that a Prince ſo violent as he was, did not treat her as ſharply, as he was uſed to do others who denied him any thing. Yet this Sibyl whoſe name was Amalthea did bring him unto her Bow, though he thought to bring her unto his; for when ſhe had preſented unto him the nine Books which ſhe had compoſed, and which were ſaid to contain ſuch high matters, as ſoon as he denied her the price ſhe demanded, ſhe burned three of them: Tarquin thinking her to be out of her wits, and having a Curioſity to ſee thoſe which remained; he asked her what ſhe would have for them? but Amalthea anſwering him that ſhe would have as much for thoſe ſix, as ſhe would for the nine, this Prince took her for one that was abſolutely mad; but Amalthea without any aſtoniſhment at all, took three more of the Books and burned them as ſhe did the firſt; inſomuch, as Tarquin being more aſtoniſhed, he changed his mind, and admiring the Conſtancy of this Woman, he asked her the third time, what ſhe would have for the laſt three Books? and ſhe anſwering as before, Tarquin did verily believe that they did contain ſome great matters, therefore he aſſembled the Augurers; for though he made a mocking ſtock of Religion, yet ſtill he obſerved the Ceremonies. But thoſe whom he had aſſembled thinking it fit, he ſhould buy thoſe Books at any rate, he gave the Sibyl her demands for them, after which ſhe went her way. Yet the People ſay, ſhe vaniſhed; and thoſe who knew things beſt, did ſay that Tullia commanded her to get out of Rome. However it were, theſe Books were to be keept as ſacred, and conſulted with upon every thing; but that Rome might feel all ſorts of miſeries, it was infected with a moſt contagious diſeaſe, which was ſo mortall, eſpecially amongſt Children, as there was not a family in Rome which had not ſome subject for tears. So as since Tarquin had always the outside of Religion, he sent two of his Sons unto Delphos with grand offerings. A Nephew of Tarquins called Brutus went with them, though his true name was Lucius Junius, but they called him Brutus because his blockishness did resemble that of Brutes. Yet he was in such a condition to be envied by those of the wiser sort, and his folly made him more safe under the Tyranny of Tarquin, than all their wisdoms could. He had a father of a great spirit whom Tarquin put to death, but for this man he being harmlesly incapable of hurting any, Tarquin was contented to take his estate which was very great, without sacrificing him unto his cruelty. I shall not insist any longer upon a particular relation of all his wickednesses, nor his reasons which moved him to banish me; for that would be to relate the whole History of my life, which I will not mix with the story of so wicked a man. Yet I must be so just, as to confess that of four Children which he hath, three of them deserve to have a Father less cruel, and a Mother more virtuous, for the second of his sons who by his first name is called Arruntius, and afterwards named the Prince of Pometia, because he did signalize himself at the taking of that Town, is a Prince that is every way admirable, the third who is called Titus is also a man of very noble inclinations, and the Daughter of Tarquin who is married, hath all the sweetness and modesty of a good woman. But as for the Prince Sextus, who is also called the young Tarquin, he is much different from his Brothers, though he be not so very bad as Tarquin the Proud; for he is handsom, of a good mind and a pleasant spirit, he is naturally eloquent; his Ambition is not unmeasurable; he is merry, frollick, and of a quick fancy; his inclination is to love all manner of pleasures, without any distinguishing of the innocent from the Criminal; and of the two, he loves those of a Licentious Debauchery, better than those who are not so: So as having a smack of his Fathers fierceness, and a little of his Mothers cruelty, and mixing these two with his Libertinism and Debauchery, it may well be said that he hath a hundred dangerous qualities for one good one. This Sir is the Character of Tarquins Family at this day, and this is the character of Tarquin himself, who now intends to besiege Ardea; and who maugre all his Crimes, is so terrible and considerable unto all his Neighbours, as no Prince in all Italy more; and this Sir, is the original of the famous City of Rome.

Herminius having ended his Relation, was thanked by Artemidorus, by Aronces, by Amilcar, and by Zenocrates, for the pains he had taken, and the pleasure they found in his History of the greatest City in the World, and the greatest Tyrant that ever was. After which reasoning upon all they had heard, and considering that Love and Ambition were the chief causes of all these miseries; Artemidorus wished, that there were no passions in the hearts of men. Oh for Heavens sake (said Amilcar and smiled) make no such dangerous wish; since I conceive that if men had no passions, in lieu of wishing to live they would wish to dye; for nothing is more odious than to have a sluggish luke-warm life, without either desires or fears, a life that is no more sensible than that which we see in Flowers or Leaves. I conceive indeed (said Herminius) that all pleasures have their rise from passions: That is so true (said Amilcar) that if all the wise men of Greece should rise again, I would make them all confess, that all their wisdom were not worth a straw, if there were no passions in the hearts of men, and that wisdom were a treasure which they knew not what to do with. I dare go further than so, (added Aronces) for I am perswaded that all the heroick acts which have been done in all ages, had never been done had there been no passions. I do agree unto what you say (replied Artemidorus) but yet you must confess with me also, that without the same passions few or none of all the great and abominable Crimes had been committed. I do confess that (replied Amilcar) but I must tell you withal, that as we do gather Roses though they have some sharp pricks, admire the Sea, though she causes many Shipwracks; love the light of the Sun though sometimes it burns, and love the earth though she produces dangerous as well as wholesome Plants; so I say the same of Passions and all the evils of them; that I should be sorry they were quite taken away from men for if they were, all pleasures and delights would be taken away with them, as Herminius well observed. But yet I would gladly know (added he and addressed himself to Zenocrates who had not spoke a word in this dispute) what opinion you are of? had I known what my self (replied he very pleasantly and smiled) I should ere this have told you, but to be sincere, I know not, for since I am very sensible of Love, I would gladly reserve that passion; but otherwise I am so naturally lazy, as I should not be sorry if there were no other passions in the World, because I fancy that if there were none, all would slumber in a continual languor of spirit, and a pleasing phantasm of idleness, which would be exceedingly charming. As for matter of idleness you are in the right (replied Amilcar) for if there were no passions, all brave men would have nothing to do; if there were no Ambition, millions of men would come and go in and out of the World without any thing they had to do in it: Take the passion of Love from a Lover, and he's but an idle creature; take from a brave man that which gets him honour, and he will never go to the Wars, Kings without Ambition might have subjects enough, valiant men not having the passion of getting glory would all sit still undistinguished from Cowards; I believe likewise, that the fields would all lye fallow, Cities and Houses would not be built, men would remain dispersed in the Fields, not seeking for any other lodgings than Grots, such as nature shall make them. And as for Ladies, if there were no passions in the World, I know not what they would do; for they being the weaker Sex, if their beauty did not cause Love in the hearts of men, and that beauty hold them in obedience in lieu of force, I had rather be a handsome Butterfly than a fair woman; for besides their being certainly Slaves, they would live in a most irksome idleness; since they would not know how to spend away that time which now they employ in dressing themselves; do but look upon a fair Woman in a place, and at a time when she thinks none will see her, nor she see any, that would be enough to make one think that if Ladies did know they could never cause Love, they would never take so much pains as to spend all the day in dressing themselves, to be undressed again at night. I once knew a Woman in Africa whom I never saw but twice, yet I saw her very different; for the first time I saw her, she was so well dresst and so handsom as she charmed me, though she was but of a mean Beauty. But a while after, this Lady being gone into the Country, in a place where she never thought to see any; and being alone with her Husband, I happened to come upon a sudden, and I found her so negligently dresst, so ill-favoured, and so different from what she seemed before, as I knew well she did not much care for pleasing her Husband, and that if all passions were taken out of the World, all handsomness, and all that makes women appear fair would be taken away also. So as though I went with intentions to offer incense unto her, and perhaps my heart; yet I was cooled and offered nothing, but brought away my heart and my incense again, of which I was very glad, for within a few days after, I knew not how to employ them better.

But to return unto passions, judge you if it would not be the greatest loss that is imaginable, if Passions were taken away; for if there were none then all Ladies would be less lovely and never loved; but as they would not be loved (replied Herminius) so they would not be hated; for it is only love that makes them hated, and commonly only ill treated Lovers, or jealous Husbands do hate them. 'Tis true (replied Amilcar) that they would not be hated, but yet if they be not loved their lives would be strangely tedious to them, and I am confident there is not one woman that is young and fair, but she had rather be hated by a hundred ill treated Lovers, and as many jealous Husbands. than not to be loved by one complete Gallant whom she affects, or to be in such a condition, as to be neither in love nor be loved by any. Let us not complain therefore against Passions, since they are the whole business and the greatest delights of men. Yet I must tell you (replied Artemidorus) it is a business of great difficulty to overcome them. 'Tis true (replied Amilcar in his usual freeness) but since it is so difficult do not strive against them, submit unto them, and in lieu of striving to overcome them, rather seek to satisfie them, and then you will not be so tormented. For my part, I do not wonder that Passions should so tyrannize over the hearts of all men, for every one can say, they must strive against them and subject them, the lesson is written both in Verse and Prose, the Philosophers teach it, the Sages command it, Fathers teach it their Sons, Husbands their Wives, and Mothers their Daughters; so as these poor Passions seeing so many enemies, do more couragiously strive not to be overcome, but to reign in the hearts of those who with so much injustice would drive them out. And indeed this is their original, they could not subsist otherwise, they afford infinite delights to those who seek to satisfie them, and seldom do any hurt, but unto such as would destroy them. For my part (replied Zenocrates) they never tormented me in that sort; for since I am perswaded that it is very difficult to overcome them, I had rather submit so as my reason and my Passions never jar, for when my Passions are stronger than my reason, my reason submits unto them; and when my reason is stronger than my Passions, it flatters but would not destroy them.

You know so little what great passions are (replied Herminius and smiled) that it appertains not unto you to speak of them; but if you were possessed with a very violent passion of Love, or if your own desires had caused you to endure a thousand torments, or hopes had raised in you a thousand inquietudes, then you should be permitted to speak of the force of Passions; for had you but experience of one, you might easily imagine what is the tyranny of the rest. 'Tis true (said Avances) that whosoever knows the force of Love may easily comprehend that of Ambition, and all the rest of the Passions. Yet I am perswaded (replied Herminius) that one cannot judge of the passion in others rightly, or ought to speak of any but his own; for though they are still passions all over the World, and love is love in Greece as well as in Italy, yet the hearts of men do differently resent it, and variety of tempers do produce several effects out of the same passion, for love in the heart of Tarquin makes him commit a thousand Crimes, and the same passion in the heart of Avances, makes him to perform a thousand Heroick actions. 'Tis true (replied Artemidorus) but still I must maintain that in what heart soever Passions do Reign, they cause abundance of trouble to him that will contest them; and I must maintain still (replied Amilcar) that without Passions we cannot be happy. This dispute had not ended so soon, if a great noise of horsemen had not interrupted them, and caused them to look who they were, but they were quickly satisfied; for they understood that they were Troops which were marching to be Posted about Ardes, on that side towards the sea, within a mile of the Town.

They understood likewise that Tarquin was to set out of Rome the next morning, and would go unto the Camp: Mean time since Herminius would not be known unto those who commanded those Troops of that Prince, he would not look upon them; only Avances, Artemidorus, Amilcar and Zenocrates, who since they could not be known, they saw them past by. But after they were past, Avances was extreamly impatient for the return of Celeres, and the Slave he went unto Ardes, because he feared that when Tarquin was come to the Camp, the Town would be so beset, that he could not get in if the interest of Clelia should require it. But to his happiness, his impatience did not last long; for Celeres who was the most diligent and zealous friend in the World, did return about midnight, and confirmed what he heard before concerning Tarquins departure; and told him further, that it was not believed Tarquins design was to force Ardes, but only to take it by famine, and therefore he might easily get into the place if he heard that Clelia was there. He added further; that the Prince Sextus, the Prince of Pometia, and the Prince Titus would follow the King unto this Siege, and that their Equipage of War would be so magnificent, that every one was so full of Curiosity to see them go out of Rome as if it were a Triumph. As for the Prince of Pometia, (replied Herminius) I shall not fear being his Prisoner, for he is much my friend, and I am sure he will not expose me to the cruelty of his father, but would release me; as for Tarquin I would as soon take poyson, as fall into his Power. After this Avances being pricked on by his love, he had a mind to be going towards Ardes, and not stay for the Slave; but Amilcar, Herminius and Celeres did so perswade him that the interest of Clelia required his stay until the Slaves return, that he resolved to stay until the next day towards night. But after that (said he unto them) I will not stay, for very probable the Slave is taken either in going or coming by the Troops of Tarquin, and so will not return.

This being probable, the friends of Avances did not contradict what he said, but gave themselves unto their rest that night. But Avances was waked with with joy, for when the Sun was an hour high, the trusty Slave whom he expected so impatiently did arrive; he knowing that his Master would take it well if he waked him, because his business did concern his love unto Clelia, he did awake him, but he awaked him by pronouncing the name of that admirable person, imagining that he could not interrupt his rest in a more agreeable manner. Sir, (said he unto him) I have seen Clelia in Ardes, and——— how (said Aronces and interrupted him, rubbing sleep from his eyes) hast thou seen Clelia in Ardes? yes, Sir (replied he) I saw her in the Temple, and I know the house wherein she lodgeth, but I could not speak unto her nor let her see me, do what I could; for Horatius being continually in her company, I durst not approach; for as you know he knows me, and I was in fear that had he seen me he would have Arrested me. However, I know that he carries himself with much respect towards Clelia, though he guards her very closely; for she goes no whither but unto the Temple, and then he follows her. She hath a Woman with her who waits upon her very carefully, as I understand by those who informed me. They say also, that Horatius is very earnest in perswading those of the Town to use all their endeavours for their own defence, which they seem resolved to do, that every day he proposeth some new fortification to be made, and he seems to be very angry with those of Ardes, for thinking that without all those, Tarquin can never take it; for besides his interest in Clelia, he is in great fear (as they say) to fall into the hands of Tarquin, who being an inveterate hater both of his Father and him, will infallibly put him to death. And Sir, since I was afraid that if I staid any longer inquiring after the designs of Horatius, I should not have liberty to get out, nor you to get into the Town, I returned as soon as possibly I could.

After this Aronces dressing himself with all haste, he began to consider with himself what he should do or not do; but at last, he resolved to entreat Amilcar (who had matters to negotiate in Italy concerning the interests of the Carthaginian Prince) that he would go unto Tarquin with those two Grecians, whilst he went unto Ardes with Herminius and Celeres, to the end, that if Tarquin did take that Town, he might oblige that Prince to protect Clelia not letting him know that she was the Daughter of Clelius; for he pre-supposed that if Amilcar would he might get the love of that Prince. And indeed this resolution being pitched upon after serious advice, they went about the execution of it. Herminius and Celeres did well see that it was an odd business for Aronces to go and shut himself up in a Town where his Rival also was; but they hoped that offering themselves to defend the besieged, they should be protected, and that since they had nothing to fear but Horatius; Horatius was also in as much danger as Aronces, since Aronces was no less valiant than he. So as then separating themselves, Amilcar, Artemidorus, and Zenocrates wended towards the Camp, where they pretended to meet Tarquin: Aronces, Herminius, and Celeres, took a blind way which their guide directed them, to the end they might sculk in the Woods which were not far from Ardes, until it began to be dark, conceiving it more easie to get in at that time then by day light; but the time being come, in which they hoped to get into Ardes, by a blind way, where the Troops of Tarquin were not Posted, they went out of the Wood, and went down a little Valley full of Osiers, which grew by the side of a little Brook, which turned and wended it self through a pleasant Meadow, they saw at a distance Armed Men a fighting, and they heard the Voices of Women mingled with the noise of Horses and Arms. Aronces thought he heard the voice of Clelia; so as riding on towards the place where they heard this voice, he saw two Coaches, and he saw Clelia under a Tree with four or five other handsome Ladies complaining in a very doleful manner; whilst ten Men, in the head of which was Horatius, were fighting against twenty. Aronces never studying what to do, went strait towards Clelia being followed by Herminius and Celeres. He was no sooner with her, but without any insisting upon ceremonies, whosoever these are that be fighting (said he unto her) I believe they are all against us; and therefore, Madam, let me carry you away whilst they are busied in vanquishing each other, or else let me have the honour to die in defending you. Clelia being extremely joyed to see Aronces whom she loved so tenderly, and also to see two friends whom she much esteemed, did not stick upon it; but abandoning her self to the Conduct of Aronces he set her upon one of his Horses; but for all this haste, she told those Ladies who were with her, that she wished them who fought for them victory, and having desired them to pardon her, if having enemies on both sides, she accepted of this relief which the gods did offer unto her: After which, being mounted on Horse-back, and Aronces also; a Woman who saw this and was given her by Horatius, began to cry out so loud that this valiant Roman hearing her, and looking about to see what the matter was; he saw Clelia on Horse-back riding first and conducted by a slave, and followed by three Men on Horse-back also, who by their Tires seemed to be Men of Quality, though he did not see their Faces; when he saw this, he prepared himself to follow Clelia: Aronces and Herminius turning their heads to see if they were pursued, there chanced the strangest accident in the World. For Horatius knowing his Rival did spur his Horse, to take away Clelia the second time, and cryed unto those of his party that they should follow him. In the mean time, a Man whose Name was Hellius, who was Commander in chief over those who fought against Horatius, and who was much in favour with Tarquin, he knowing Herminius, also knowing how the virtues of that excellent Man were odious unto the Tyrant, he believed that he should be a made Man for ever, if he could bring him alive or dead unto Tarquin; and therefore commanding his Men to follow after Herminius, at the same time when Horatius did go to relieve Clelia, so it was, as without any compact between them, they changed their designs of fighting to go and fall upon the Protectors of the admirable Clelia, who then found her self to be in a most pitiful condition; for when she saw both Tarquin's Men, and those of Horatius come thundring with all violent impetuosity upon Aronces, Herminius, and Celeres who turned head against them, though they could not pretend unto any other glory then to sell their lives dear, and to die with honour. So as the admirable Clelia seeing these three Men who were so dear unto her, in a condition to be assaulted by thirty, and imagining them already dead, she did an act which was worthy her great Soul, for turning her Horse upon her left hand, and lifting up her hood. O ye Cowards, said she unto them, are ye not ashamed being thirty to fall upon three Men, who have no other design but to set me at liberty? this great and generous action did so surprize Horatius, Aronces, and the Commander of Tarquin's Men, and wonder did so suspend their thoughts as they stopped, and staid a while before they could tell what to do. But at last, Aronces putting on his Horse, and followed by Herminius and Celeres, he advanced towards Clelia in the presence of all his enemies, telling them with a menacing action, that they must kill him, before they carried away the fair Person as a Captive. Horatius then finding himself separated from his own Men, and chance had mingled his with the Men of Tarquin, he did not think himself in a capacity to fall upon Aronces, and take Clelia from him, for he conceived that Hellius, who endeavoured to have her in the power of Tarquin, would take her from him again; and therefore he would have had Hellius begin the Combat, apprehending that Hellius aimed at Herminius as well as him, so as Hellius being moved at that great action of Clelia, and the resoluteness of Aronces, he began to speak, and advancing in the head of his Men, whosoever you are (said he unto Aronces) who thus resolutely hazards your Life upon the hazard of infallible ruine, I promise to treat you well, and this fair person also, upon condition I may secure my self of an enemy unto Tarquin, whom I see with you: Herminius hearing Hellius say so, began to speak before either Aronces or Clelia, and looking sternly upon Hellius; if thou desirest to carry my head unto the Tyrant thy Master, and not take me Prisoner (said he unto him) I am contented it should be the ransome of that fair one: But as for Aronces, I advise thee to take heed what thou dost; for didst thou know him, thou wouldest fall down upon thy knees and ask him forgiveness. Horatius hearing what Herminius said and fearing least he should make his Rival known, he fell furiously upon Aronces, who warding the blow without any leisure to return answer unto Hellius, he returned another blow, whose weight made Horatius to stagger. But whilst these two furious Rivals were fighting, Hellius gave command to make sure of Clelia, and that she should be guarded with the rest of the Ladies, which was an easie matter to do. For Herminius and Celeres, seeing some of Horatius his Men making towards Aronces, they went to him with their Swords drawn; so as Hellius then intending to compass about both Herminius and Horatius, there began such a confused fight as none could know friend from foe; for the Men of Horatius fought sometimes for Aronces and Herminius in fighting against Hellius. Aronces, Herminius and Celeres they fought also for Hellius in fighting against Horatius; and Hellius he fought for Horatius in fighting against Aronces, and the confusion was so much the greater, because night came on, and would not let them know one from another, so as there was the most terrible disorder that is imaginable. For the interest of those who fought were so different, as it seemed they could not every one drive on their own: indeed Aronces would if he could have delivered Clelia, both out of the hands of Hellius, and out of the hands of Horatius, because it was more dangerous to be under the power of Tarquin, if she were known then under the power of her Lover. Moreover, he had a mind to defend Herminius, and kill Horatius. As for Herminius, his wish was that Clelia was in the hands of Aronces, that the two Rivals were at Peace, and were united to fight against one of the Ministers of unjust Tarquin's cruelties. As for Horatius, he wished himself dead, he was so desperate to see he was like to lose his Mistress, and not able to kill his Rival; and also like to fall into the hands of Tarquin: As for Hellius, his aim was to take Herminius, to take Horatius, to secure Clelia, and the rest of the Ladies, and to know who Aronces was: However, night was the cause they could not do as they would. Things being thus, they all heard a great noise of horses coming as if from Ardes; so as Hellius fearing to lose all, in desiring to get all, he commanded that all the Ladies should go into their Coaches, and be driven towards Rome. Aronces hearing this, not being in a condition able to hinder it, nor to discern his Rival, he designed to dis-ingage himself and follow the Coaches, and to go and make himself known unto Tarquin, to protest Clelia, rather then suffer her to be a Slave. This design had many dangerous consequences in it, but the time and place would not let him examine them, so as being prompted to do only as his love invited him, he dis-ingaged himself and so happily that Herminius and Celeres knowing his voice, they joyned, and made good their retreat fighting until they got into a little Wood which secured them. They were not got a hundred paces within this Wood, but the bridle of Aronces being broken, he alighted to mend it: During which, Hellius understanding that those Troops which he thought did come from Ardes, did belong unto Tarquin, he went unto them; but finding neither Horatius, nor Aronces, nor Herminius, he was extremely sorry that he had lost so fine an opportunity, and was forced to be contented with the taking of Clelia, and those Ladies who came out of Ardes, because they would not stay in a Town which in all probability would be taken. Thus Hellius sent them to Rome, supposing that Tarquin would not set out before the next day. But in the mean time, the Moon rising, and beginning to shine, Celeres could the better help Aronces to mend his Bridle, yet it was not long before he could finish it, for commonly in such things, the most hast the worst speed; but during that time, Herminius asked Aronces what he intended to do? and he answered that since Clelia was under Tarquin's power, he could not chuse but go unto him, and meet with Artimedorus, Amilcar, and Zenocrates, to the end he might procure her liberty, not telling who she was, nor that he was the Son unto the King of Clusium, unless the interest of Clelia did force him to it. Not but that I consider (said he) it goes against the grain of my heart, to go and serve a Prince who hates Herminius, and who would have murthered the Father of Clelia; but yet since that admirable person was under his power, he was forced unto it. You have good reason for it, Sir (replied Herminius) and the worst is, in all the design, that I cannot wait upon you to Rome. And therefore, I conceive it my safest course to go into Ardes, and fight against him that seeks my Life, and is an enemy unto all virtuous Men. As soon as Herminius had said so, Celeres who helped Aronces to hold his horse did hear the voice of one who lamented; and all of them being the more attentive, they did plainly hear a Man making most most lamentable complaint. So as Aronces being got upon his Horse, he told Herminius and Celeres, that he would go towards the place from whence the sad sound did come; for said he, it is the duty of miserable people to help those who are in the like condition. The heart of Herminius being no less sensible of compassion then Aronces, he consented unto the motion, and Celeres did not contradict them, and so all three made softly towards the place, from whence they heard this doleful exclamation. But at last, when they were so near as to understand what this Complainant said, Aronces knew it to be the voice of Horatius. So as stopping his horse, and imparting his knowledge unto his friends, they all began to hearken, and plainly heard that indeed it was Horatius who lamented. Alas (said he unto a friend who was with him) into what a miserable condition am I reduced? I am wounded by Aronces and he knows not that he is revenged upon my ingratitude; for I knew him by his voice when he gave me such a blow, as made me stagger, and my horse being wounded fell down dead in this Wood, where I found you in a worse condition than I am; and yet I must deny what I said, for I have lost my Clelia and am in danger to fall into the power of Tarquin. Thus my Rival triumphs over me, my Mistress is escaped out of my hands, and I am like to fall into mine enemies, not being able to rid my self from all these miseries by a generous death, since my sword is broken, and you have lost yours. 'Tis true (replied his friend) you are in such a miserable condition, as I am perswaded that if Aronces saw you in it, he would have compassion upon your ill fortune. Oh my dear friend (replied Horatius) you are much mistaken; for as generous as Aronces is, I am confident he would carry my head to the unjust Tarquin, thereby to deliver Clelia. Thou art deceived (cryed out Aronces and went towards him) and to make it appear that my virtue is greater then thou thinkest, I will entreat thy old friend, to take thee up behind him, and carry thee into Ardes. Horatius who was leaning against a Tree and wounded in the hip, was so surprized to hear the voice of Aronces and to see him (for the Moon shined) and both Herminius and Celeres did so admire the virtue of Aronces, as they were a long while before they could speak. As for the friend of Horatius who lay upon the ground mortally wounded, he was so charmed at it, as striving to express himself; Oh Horatius! said he unto him) how happy are you in your misfortune in having such an enemy? No (replied Horatius) but on the contrary I am much more to be pitied; yes, Aronces (added he) I am so much ashamed by your generosity, as I should think my self more happy, if you would take your sword and run me through, rather then thus to loaden me with shame by your virtue. Were you in a condition to defend your self (replied Aronces) I should deal with you as with an enemy, who hath done the most unjust act in the World in ravishing away Clelia from me; but being as you are, I will not upbraid you with unprofitable reproaches, but will keep you from falling into the hands of an enemy, who would neither spare your life nor mine. But (replied Horatius) still I must say again, and again, that you do too much; for do what you will or can, I must still love Clelia, and shall love her until I die. As long as she is not in your power (replied Aronces) I care not if you do love her; but if ever fortune should give her you again, I would pursue you all the World over, though I owe you my life. Ah cruel Aronces (cryed out Horatius) cannot you remember what I have done for you, but you must also remember what you have done for me? No, no, you cannot but upbraid me with ingratitude. After this, Celeres telling them that it was equally dangerous unto them both, to be long in that place, they took his advice; and though Herminius did love Aronces infinitely above Horatius, yet he undertook to conduct his Rival into Ardes, and took side with the party opposite unto that which fortune had engaged Aronces to take against his inclination, and which both honour, revenge, and virtue did engage him to take. And as they were taking care for the help of him who lay upon the ground, they perceived that he was expired: So that after Celeres had set Horatius behind Herminius, Aronces and he conducted them until they came to a little blind path, by which Horatius said they might get into Ardes without danger, because there was a little River between them and the enemy. Thus the friendship of Aronces unto Herminius, together with his own generosity, moved him to be a Convoy unto his Rival. Afterwards, one taking the way towards Ardes, and the other towards Rome, they carried with them such tumultuous thoughts in their hearts, as the way seemed much longer then it was. They never thought of those dangers unto which they were exposed by the way; for they had interests which took up their souls and spirits more sensibly, then any dangers could.

The End of the Second Book of the First Part.

CLELIA.

BOOK III.

THe truth is, Herminius in carrying Horatius back to Ardes, went from-wards Rome with extreme repugnancy; for since Aronces was to be there, he could say that all the object of his friendship and love, was there also; for he had a most passionate affection to the place, he had a Mother there whom he most dearly loved, and he had a friend there in the person of Clelia, whom he esteemed infinite dearly. But for all that, his hatred of Tarquin was so great and well grounded, as it did surmount all the tenderness of his Soul. As for Horatius, the virtues of his Rival were his greatest torments, except the love of Clelia which was above all, and though he did hate Tarquin, yet his jealousie was such, that he had rather be a slave of that Tyrant, than to be delivered by his Rival. Again, Aronces as he drew near Rome his thoughts were confused,; for he would never have gone thither, but that by serving Tarquin during the Siege of Ardes, he might oblige him to release Clelia: So as the aversion which he had conceived against that Prince, ever since he would have murthered Clelius at Capua, and since Herminius had related the story of his Life, did cause in him a strange repugnancy to execute his design, if the interest of his love had not surmounted it. On the other side, when he thought that Clelia perhaps would be treated as a slave, and that if ever she were known to be the Daughter of Clelius, her self would be in great danger, then he was almost out of his wits, and gave himself wholly over unto sadness. Nor as a Cordial to himself durst he hope that Clelia had preserved her affection intire for him, or if he had any glimps of such hope, it was so weak, as he was nevertheless miserable. He feared also that he should be obliged to make himself and his quality known unto Tarquin, that he might thereby be the better able to serve Clelia; for he conceived that if he should make his love appear, and that it should be known unto the King his Father, who afterwards would know that Clelia was enemy unto the Daughter of Tarquin, with whom he had received such a solemn Alliance, that his Father would not approve of his love; but perhaps would make it known unto that Prince who she was, purposely to ruine her. Not but that he knew the King his Father to be a Man of much virtue, but yet his love making him to fear every thing, he feared lest the beauty of Clelia should add unto her miseries; for considering how Herminius had described the Eldest Son of Tarquin, he thought it impossible but he must fall in love with her, so as the miserable Aronces went to Rome with such unquiet thoughts, as Celeres had much ado to comfort him. The reason why he went to Rome rather then the Camp was, because he heard Hellius had commanded those who conducted the Ladies, to go unto that famous City. But that he might not be there without some acquaintance, Herminius at parting from Aronces, did give him such particular tokens to deliver unto the virtuous Sevilia his Mother, as he doubted not but she would be ready to do him any good Office. Since it was not above eighteen Miles betwixt Ardes and Rome, and the place where they parted being near Ardes, they had arriv'd at Rome before the Sun had been up, if they had not lost their way, and been stopped; but having no guide they went much about, and were forced to rest their Horses and themselves at least three hours. So as they arrived not at that Gate in Rome, which they then called the Gate Carmentale until the Evening. This Gate was not that, through which they use to go from Rome to Ardes, for that is close by the Capitol, quite contrary, but Aronces and Celeres having lost their way, they came in at this Gate, and went to lodge at a place where formerly they lodged, when they were at Rome only out of curiosity. They were no sooner alighted from their horses, but they went to enquire of Clelia, and to find out Artemidorus, Amilcar, and Zenocrates, whom they thought to be in Rome, because Tarquin was there, though it was told Celeres, that he would set out the morrow after he was there. So as imagining (knowing the humour of Amilcar) that they should find them about the Palace of Tarquin, Aronces went thither with Celeres: but in their way thither, he was much surprized to see two Coachfuls of Ladies, guarded by Soldiers, who entred into Rome at the Port of Janus, and going to the King's Palace. The cause of his wonder was, that he spyed Clelia in the first of them, it is true he saw her without her seeing him; for she being very melancholy no objects invited her looks, not imagining that Aronces should be in Rome, for considering the danger wherein she left him, she imagined more probability of his death or being a Prisoner, then to be in that place. However, notwithstandſtanding all her melancholy, her beauty was of ſuch a luſtre, as the people only followed the Coach to look upon her. As for Aronces he no ſooner eſpyed her, But he ſhewed her unto Celeres, and was joyed beyond all imagination. he was joyed to ſee her and to ſee her ſad, becauſe he thought he had ſome ſhare in her ſadneſs. But alſo he was infinitely ſad to ſee her a Captive, and a Captive unto the moſt mortal enemy of Clelius her father. As he was divided between his joys and his ſorrows, he ſaw two Veſtals, who walking with all the Ceremonies uſual when they go through the Town, they ſtayed and asked whither they carried thoſe Ladies? and being anſwered that they were Captives, and carried to be preſented unto Tarquin, the elder of the Veſtals whoſe name was Verenia, commanded the Officer who had the charge of them to ſtay the Coaches.

The Veſtals being held in great veneration at Rome, the Officer did as ſhe commanded, and ſpeaking very reverently unto Verenia, he asked what her pleaſure was? My pleaſure is (ſaid ſhe unto him) that according to thoſe priviledges which have been granted unto us from the firſt Kings of Rome, and which have been confirmed by all their Succeſſors, you ſet thoſe Ladies at liberty; for ſince there were any Veſtals they never met any priſoners, but they ſet them at liberty. I once ſaved the lives of ſome Criminal perſons, and may much better releaſe innocent Priſoners. I do believe (wiſe Verenia replied the Officer) that your priviledges are ſuch as you ſay, and that they extend unto Captives as well as unto Criminals; but ſince you know it is not in me to decide a buſineſs of this importance, I beſeech you come your ſelf and maintain your right before the King, and let me wait upon you thither, as well as upon theſe Ladies; for I aſſure you that if I could releaſe them into your hands without danger of my life, I ſhould do it with joy. Verenia finding the Officer to ſpeak reaſon, and having conſulted a little with her Companion, ſhe went towards the Palace which was not far off. But this conteſt laſting a little long, there flocked abundance of people about the Veſtals, and about theſe two Coaches; ſo as Aronces took hold of this opportunity, and preſſed ſo near, that at laſt the eyes of Clelia found him out, who was ſo overjoyed to ſee him, as ſhe could ſcarcely contain her ſelf, yet ſince ſhe knew not whether or no it was expedient to take notice of him, ſhe reſtrained her ſelf, and was contented with ſhewing him the thoughts of her Soul by her eyes, alſo ſhe looked upon Celeres in a moſt obliging manner. Yet this mute diſcourſe laſted not long, for Verenia going on, the Coaches followed her. And this being a matter of Novelty, all the Croud that was gathered together in that place, did follow alſo to ſee what Tarquin would do in the buſineſs; ſo as Aronces and Celeres crouding in amongſt the reſt, they followed alſo, and not to be altogether uſeleſs, they got as near the Veſtals as poſſibly they could; and as an encouragement unto them to inſiſt more ſtiffly upon their Priviledges, Aronces and Celeres did applaud unto the Heavens their deſign of delivering theſe Ladies. Mean time, Aronces remembring that Clelius told him he had a Siſter who was a Veſtal, he asked a Roman next him of what families theſe two Veſtals were? and the Roman anſwered, that the grand Veſtal was Siſter unto a baniſhed man whoſe name was Clelius, and that the other was of the houſe of Aquilines. So as Aronces now knowing that the grand Veſtal was Aunt unto Clelia, he conſulted with Celeres whether it were not expedient to make it known unto this Veſtal that Clelia was her Neece, before ſhe ſpoke unto Tarquin? and conceiving ſhe would be more zealous if ſhe knew it, they reſolved to truſt her with this important ſecret. To that end, when ſhe came near that great and ſtately Frontiſ-piece, before the Gates of Tarquins Palace, and deſcending from that Chariot wherein ſhe was carried, Aronces after he had asked leave of one that waited upon her, did addreſs himſelf with all reverence unth her, and told her in a low voice and few words, that there was among the Captives one who was the daughter of her Brother, and conjured her by the name of Clelius to protect her and be ſilent. Verenia knowing how her Neece was ſtoln away, ſhe did more eaſily believe what Aronces told her, and the beauty of Clelia having attracted her looks, ſhe did find in her the Air of her Family; ſo as promiſing to be ſecret, and to inſiſt importantly upon the Priviledge, ſhe ranked her ſelf in the Front of all thoſe Ladies, who came out of their Coaches, and being Uſhered in by that Officer who conducted them, ſhe asked to ſpeak with Tarquin, who being then in the Chamber of the cruel Tullia, commanded that the Veſtals and the Captives ſhould enter. But though the Curioſity was very great, all thoſe who followed could get no further than the Anti-Chamber, except ſome few whoſe minds were too high to be denied entrance into the Kings Chamber. So as Aronces being as handſome a perſon as any was in the world, he entred and Celeres alſo. But they were much amazed when they ſaw Amilcar, Artemidorus, and Zenocrates cloſe by the King; eſpecially to ſee the firſt of theſe in ſuch great familiarity with him, though there were many conſiderable Romans with him, and that though Collatine and the Prince Sextus were preſent, yet the King talked only with Amilcar, and that with as much familiarity as if he had known them all their lives, though it was but two days ſince they came unto him. But as Aronces and Celeres were aſtoniſhed to ſee Amilcar, Amilcar was much more at the ſight of Clelia, Aronces, and Celeres; alſo Artemidorus and Zenocrates wondred to ſee Celeres and Aronces, yet they concealed their ſeveral thoughts, and every one kept their places to ſee the buſineſs. And indeed the buſineſs was worthy of Curioſity; for Verenia was a perſon who had been admirably fair, and yet had a moſt comely mind, the Veſtal who accompanied her was not above five and twenty years of age, and one of the moſt pleaſing perſons in the World: So as theſe two Veſtals approaching the preſence of Tarquin, all the Captive Ladies ranked themſelves behind her, in expectation of their doom, whether Liberty or Fetters; ſo as this was a very delectable Object, for all the Ladies were fair and pleaſing; it is true the beauty of Clelia did ſo much dim the Luſtre of all the reſt, as only ſhe was looked upon. Things ſtanding thus, the grand Veſtal began to ſpeak with as much boldneſs as eloquence, and addreſſing her ſelf unto Tarquin, Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him) we addreſs our ſelves unto you with a Petition ſo juſt, as I need only to tell you what our pretenſions are, without ſeeking for any reaſons to uphold them; I ſhall not inſiſt Sir, upon telling you our original; for you who are knowing in all things cannot be ignorant that it is much more ancient than Rome. But I muſt take the liberty to tell you, that ſince Romulus brought us from Alba unto this day, no Kings that ever Reigned in this Town, did ever offer to infringe the leaſt of our Priviledges; and that we have ever been ſo conſidered by Kings and People, as both the one and the other have looked ſtill upon us as the neareſt cauſe of publick tranquillity. The firſt of the Tarquins did rather add unto our Priviledges than diminiſh them: We have received no cauſes of complaint ſince our firſt inſtitution neither from People, Senate, or Kings; and I am confident Sir, that you will give us none, but that you will grant liberty unto all theſe fair Captives, whom I met by chance; for you know Sir, the Law is, that if a Veſtal accidentally meets any who are carrying unto execution, ſhe ſaves his life and releaſeth him; provided ſhe will ſwear that ſhe did not ſeek to meet him: And Sir, I can ſafely ſwear that I never knew of theſe Ladies, until I accidentally met them. I know you may tell me Sir, that theſe Ladies are priſoners of War, and not Criminals; but ſince they are innocent they are more worthy of favour, and according to all Laws and reaſon, thoſe who can do the greater things can do the leſs; and therefore I conclude, that ſince we can ſave the lives of Criminals, we may ſave the innocent from impriſonment, and give them liberty. I know alſo, that the chance never yet was, when Veſtals met Priſoners of War, as divers times they have Criminals, but ſtill I ſay the Law ought to be expounded as I ſay, and the conjuncture is ſo favourable for us, as I cannot think you will loſe an occaſion of doing a thing of ſo great a glory; for I do not ask the liberty of any heroick Captain, or of any valiant Soldiers, but only for five or ſix ſilly miſerable Ladies, who never did any thing againſt you, nor knows not how if they would. Grant therefore Sir, what we ask, we conjure you unto it, by the ſacred fire which we ſo vigilantly preſerve, and by all that is moſt holy and venerable amongſt us. When Verenia had done ſpeaking, Tarquin who heard her with a mocking ſmile, anſwered her in theſe terms. As you are a Veſtal (ſaid he unto her) I have willingly hearkned unto you but as you are the Siſter of Clelius, all that you ſay is ſuſpected. It is very probable, that there is ſome craft in your Propoſition, for being ſure that I would deny you, you think that you may juſtly tell the People, I have infringed the priviledges of the Veſtals, that the ſacred fire will quickly go out, and that the Gods in revenge will ruine Rome, nor do I know whether out of a premeditated deſign, you have let it extinguiſh already. But however it be, I do declare that no Veſtal under my Reign ſhall ever deliver any Priſoners of War, and theſe Ladies whoſe Liberty you demand ſhall not obtain it. Get you gone, and look well to your ſacred fire, if you would not be under Guard your ſelf, and in lieu of treating you as a Veſtal, I treat you as Siſter unto my moſt mortal and ancient enemy. As I am a Veſtal Sir, (replied Verenia boldly) you ought to reſpect me; and as I am ſiſter unto Clelius, all the people of Rome ought to arm themſelves in my defence; eſpecially ſince you would have oppreſſed my Brother, by your unjuſt violence and power. Though the Laws (replied Tarquin in a fury) do not condemn Veſtals to be buried alive, but for one kind of Crime only; yet I ſhall make you try what puniſhment it is, for a Crime of another nature, if you continue inſolent a little longer. Get you gone I ſay once more, and look to the ſacred fire unto which you are appointed, and believe it that if Clelius or any that relates unto him, do ever fall into my power, and I ſend him or them unto execution, you ſhall not ſave him though you meet him with all your fellow Veſtals; Go, go, Verenia, for I find that if I ſee you any longer, the Purple Mantle which you wear, will not hinder me from ſeeing the Siſter of my enemy in the perſon of a Veſtal, nor can I be any longer Maſter of my own reſentments. Oh Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) your injuſtice goes too far; and after I have ſpoke unto you as a Veſtal, I muſt tell you as the Siſter of Clelius, that I think it a greater glory in being the Siſter of him who oppoſed you, than if I wore the Crown of thoſe Kings from whom I am deſcended. Tarquin ſeeing the reſoluteneſs of this Veſtal, and not daring to follow the impetuoſity of his reſentments, becauſe there was nothing in greater veneration amongſt the people than the Veſtals, he only commanded that the Captive Ladies ſhould be carried into a Chamber in the Palace, until he ſhould further diſpoſe of them. And without any more regard unto Verenia, he addreſſed his talk unto Tullia, Collatine, Artemidorus, Amilcar, and Zenocrates, and ſcoffing at the Veſtals, he made it appear, that though the ſacred fire did extinguiſh, yet he ſhould not be troubled at it.

So that Verenia was conſtrained to retire, and leave her Neece under the power of a Tyrant, who would infallibly put her to death if he knew who ſhe was, and yet there was no remedy. As for Aronces he was troubled beyond meaſure, and he admired the wonderful Conſtancy of Clelia; for though ſhe heard what Tarquin ſaid, yet did ſhe not change colour, but hearkned unto all he ſaid, as if ſhe had no intereſt at all in it: and her ſpirits were ſo free that as ſhe went out of the Chamber with the reſt of the Captives, ſhe did ſtrive to paſs handſomly by Aronces, to the end ſhe might the better teſtifie by a ſign with her head, that ſhe had much conſolation in ſeeing him. As for Aronces, he was ſo ſadly afflicted that he was not Maſter of his own Spirits; and he was ſo taken up with ſorrow, as he followed Clelia when ſhe went out; and if Celeres had not reſtrained him, he had followed her unto the Chamber where they carried her, and would have made himſelf known to be of her acquaintance. Mean while, the Prince Sextus who had a general inclination to all beauties, he looked upon Clelia as he was wont to look upon thoſe whom he could not look upon with eyes of indifferency, and his mind was ſo much upon her, as he went out preſently after her, to bid thoſe who had the conduct of thoſe Ladies to treat them very well, and he came to Clelia who walked laſt; whoſoever you are Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I do verily believe you give more heavy Fetters, then thoſe you wear. Be they as light as they can (replied Clelia) yet they do much trouble me, for I am not uſed to carry any, and if thoſe which you ſay I give, do trouble thoſe who wear them, perhaps they are miſerable without any merit of pity. Sextus had a mind to ſay ſomething elſe, but Clelia being entred with the reſt of the Ladies into the Chamber where they were to be, he durſt not follow them for fear of incenſing Tarquin who was jealous of his Authority, even in the moſt trivial things. Mean while, Aronces and Celeres did walk before the Kings Palace, expecting Artemidorus, Amilcar, and Zenocrates, imagining they would not ſtay long before they came out. But in expecting them how full of doleful expreſſions was the ſad Aronces? Good Celeres (ſaid he) confeſs by way of comfort to me, that I am the moſt miſerable miserable man in the World; do but consider how wilful is my wicked fortune, and in what danger Clelia is, were she less fair there was some hopes she would not be known; but being so glorious a star as she is, every one will be gazing and enquiring of her: Methinks also, that though she speak the Romans Language very well; yet one may know that she hath the accent of an African, though when we were at Capua I did not think so. I am afraid lest those Ladies who are with her, should tell that Horace was with her at Ardea; nor dare I trust unto her great spirit and prudence; for I fear that she will not disguise her name; but that the name of Clelia will make her known to be the daughter of Clelius: for doubtless the Tyrant is still inquiring of him, and would have murthered him at Capua, he knows that he hath a daughter, that she is fair, that her name is Clelia, and that Horace carried her away. Those that are so over Prudent (replied Celeres) are doubtless more miserable than any others, for in all probability Clelia will disguise her name: The Ladies with her perhaps knows not what it is, nor know who Horace is, and therefore the best way were to wait, till time tell you more.

As Celeres said so, Amilcar came out of the Palace, and came to them with Artemidorus, and Zenocrates, but he was as blith and jocund in countenance, as Aronces was melancholy in heart. But coming to them, Come, (said he unto him) come and fear nothing; I have already tam'd the Tyger which put you all into terror; it shall be long of your self, if you do not see what I say is true, and if you be not ere long in a condition to protect Clelia, if he would offer to hurt her, which I do not at all believe he will; for I am extremely mistaken if he do not think Clelia to be very fair, and if Tullia do not observe it as well as I. Hear her telling Tarquin that he did ill in treating the Vestals so ill; and that since it was only for the delivery of Women, he ought to have consented unto it. So as since I know that Tullia is not overscrupulous in matter of Religion, and observing that she sees as well as I, how Tarquin thinks Clelia to be the fairest of all the Captives. I must needs conclude, that Tullia will ere long get her released. Tullia is so unaccustomed to make use of any harmless remedies (replied Aronces) as I fear, that if she be jealous she will rather put Clelia to death, than set her at liberty. To cure you of any such apprehensions (replied Amilcar) I will get into favour with Tullia. That will not be much difficult (said Zenocrates) for you have already so great familiarity with her, as I believe if you will you may quickly be the Confident of all her Crimes. For my part (said Artemidorus) I do wonder how it is possible Amilcar should in so short a time as since we came hither, do so many things; for he hath shewed us all the Town, he is very much in favour both with Tarquin and Tullia, and much more with the Prince Sextus; the Prince of Pometia and Titus do court him, he knows the names of all the beauties in Rome: The Eldest of the Salians believe him to be a Salian, so well is he versed in all their Ceremonies; and if you had heard his discourse with an Augurer you would have been affrighted. It is not possible (said Celeres) that Amilcar could shew the one half of Rome unto Artemidorus and Zenocrates. To shew you that they tell me no lies (replied he) ask them if I have not shewed them the four Ports of Rome, the Carmental, the Roman, the Pandane or the Romulide, and the Janiculan? ask them if I did not bid them observe how that City was a Quadrangle? if I did not shew them the Capitol and the stately Temple which Tarquin built? if I did not shew them the place where the Vestal Tarpea was buried? and if I did not shew them the little Temple of the God Thermes, whom the people would needs adore, mangre all the Power of Tarquin? ask them still whether I have not shewed them the Mount Palatine and the Mount Quirinal where the Temple of Romulus was built? whether I have not shewed them the Mount Celius, the Mount Aventine, the Mount Viminal, and that of Janicula? ask them still whether I did not let them see the Ruminal Fig-tree, where Remus and Romulus were found? whether I did not let them see the Sublician Bridge? whether I did not exactly shew them all the magnificence of the Amphitheater and Cirque? whether I did not carry them unto that Grove which is consecrated unto the Muses? if I did not tell them in that place some things that were uttered by the Nymph Egeria, such as aspired Numa with those admirable things which he did? ask them on, if I did not go with them into the famous Temple of Janus, which is seldom or never open but in times of War? if I did not shew them that Temple which Romulus vowed unto Jupiter when he fought against the Sabines. Further, let them tell you if I did not shew them the first Prison which was ever built in Rome by Ancus Martius? if I did not shew them the sacred Street, the Street Cyprionna, where the Palace of King Numa is, and where Tullia went over the Corps of her Father? if I did not let them see the Bulwarks which Tarquin finished? several Temples of Vesta, of Jupiter, of Hercules, of Diana, and of many other Divinities? For my part (said Celeres) I do not so much wonder you have shewed them so many things in so short a time, as I do to see you in such familiarity with Tarquin and Tullia, and the Princes their Children; for they are almost all of different humours. That which did it (replyed Amilcar) was my remembrance how Herminius described them; so as going confidently unto Tarquin, in the Prince of Carthage's name, and presenting Artemidorus and Zenocrates to him as two of my friends, not telling their names or who they were, I was so happy as at my first conference to get into some credit with him; for he having a desire of being instructed in the present condition of Carthage, knowing well there was some difference of interest between Sicily and that Common-wealth, I recalled into my memory all the Policies and Intrigues of those who reigned the most absolutely, and all that I had learned upon this Subject in all my Travels and books. I did highly applaud Periander King of Corinth, who knew so well how to make himself obeyed by force; I preferred Semiramis above Cyrus, because she was more stern than that illustrious Conquerour, and mixing some ingredients of half prophanation with my politicks, in an hour I got to be high in the favour of Tarquin. As for Tullia, when I was alone with her, I let her understand how all the World said that Tarquin was a debtor unto her for the Crown, and that she merited a Million of Praises, for knowing so well how to set her self above her own Sex, by not dorring at such scruples as Ladies of low and common capacities use, who had not hearts so great as hers. As for the Prince Sextus, remembring his inclination unto all women, I talked unto him of nothing but our African Gallantry, and of the pleasingness in Grecian beauties. And knowing that he was not over Regular in his loves, I made a Satyrical invective unto him, against all such puling lovers who use to sigh a whole year, before they will tell they love, and who are so constant as to vow their services unto one Mistress. So as he believing these to be my thoughts, he was as open unto me as any voluptuous person who neither believed the Gods nor feared men, could be unto his dearest friend, when he would relate the manner of his life unto him. But he did open himself very pleasantly, for one could never meet with a more amiable Libertine than Sextus; and my greatest wonder was, considering his quality, that he was acquainted with all the handsome women in Rome, even from the Vestals to the very worst of Slaves. But after you had so well gotten the opinions of Tarquin, of Tullia, and of Sextus, (said Aronces) what did you to enter into the favour of the Prince of Pometia and Titus? these two Princes being of contrary humours to their Brother (replied Amilcar) they had no commerce together; so as seeing them asunder, I talked with them after another manner, and without any blaming of the Prince Sextus for his irregularity of life, I commended them so highly as they had a very good opinion of me; and falling into a discourse of gallantry and love, I quickly observed the heart of the Pometian Prince, was full of such great and tender thoughts, as did become a noble Passion: So as telling him all that I had gathered from others, and was sensible of my self, concerning any amorous matters, he was ready to open his very soul, and to tell me that he was in Love.

As for the Prince Titus, he being naturally of a cold and reserved temper, he did not so freely open his heart, and yet I perceiv'd that he had a great disposition to love me. Amilcar did one thing extraordinary more (replied Zenocrates) for there was one of the Kings Nephews, whose name was Brutus, who seemed to be a very Block-head, and in whom one should never find the least glimps of any wit; he being behind those Princes whilst Amilcar talked unto them, did hearken very attentively unto him, and Amilcar talking with a sprightly and agreeable Air, Brutus did laugh twice so pertinently, as it was observed a great wonder and a miracle of Amilcars wit. And a Cavalier did say unto another who stood by him, in a low voice, that Brutus was very happy in giving this sign of his understanding when Tarquin was not present. It is most true (answered the other Cavalier) for I am confident that if he had seen him laugh so opportunely and pertinently as he did, he would have put him to death as well as his Brother; for he lets him live only because he thinks him to have no wit nor spirit. I must tell you (said Amilcar then) that Brutus is not so senseless as is believed; for I having an universal curiosity to know all things; and sometimes taking as much delight in seeing the several follies of men, as their several wisdoms, I began to talk with him a quarter of an hour, and since every one had described him to be extremely stupid, I put a hundred foolish questions unto him, which I perceived did displease him, and unto which he would not answer. They say (replied Artemidorus) that he speaks so little, as that it cannot be taken for an effect of his reason, but for an effect of his stupidity; for I have heard of men many times, who could hide their treasures; but I never heard of any who could hide their spirits and wits. However it be (said Amilcar) he hath more wit than he is thought to have: I know not that (replied Amilcar) but I am sure that you have more than is possibly to be believed. Had you but heard him yesterday you would have wondred (added he and spoke unto Aronces) when he discoursed with an Augurer near the place where the Sibyls Books are kept; for he made the man believe that he was far more knowing in matters of Divinations, than himself; and they were so great in favour together, as he promised to talk concerning the sacred Chickens, and told him that he came from Negrepont, which is the place from whence they say, those come who are most able to presage the truth. But (said Aronces to him) since you are so cunning and happy in all things, I pray what can you do to help me unto a sight of Clelia? It is requisite (replied Amilcar) that to morrow I present you unto Tarquin, under the notion of a man whom I was acquainted with during my Travels, and as a man of courage who would be glad to serve him in the siege of Ardes; but we must endeavour to let Clelia know, that she must give it out and say she was born at Noles, and that Celeres is her Brother: And after this is hinted unto her, I will present Celeres unto Tarquin, who shall beg leave to see his Sister, and we will intercede for him, by this means she will not be thought the daughter of Clelius, but the principal difficulty is to speak unto Clelia. I know not (replied Artemidorus) how is it possible to find a way how to instruct her in all you desire she should know. Perhaps more possible than you imagine (replied Amilcar) and when I return at night from the Palace, I may chance find out an invention for it. When Aronces heard Amilcar say so, he conjured him very importunately, to use his best endeavours in doing him this good Office, and Amilcar taking the business upon him, Artemidorus, Zenocrates and Celeres went with Aronces to visit the virtuous Sevilia, who at the very name of Herminius, did bid them most heartily welcome; and Amilcar went to Tullia, where he found the Prince Sextus, with whom he tampered as if he would be the Confident of all his pleasures. And knowing that he should please his genius if he talked of Ladies, he fell into discourse concerning the fair prisoners, and extolling them to the skies, he asked Sextus if he would make a visit unto them at night? For Sir (said he unto him and laughed) in matter of love, it is good always to be the first man; and therefore if there be any of those Captives which pleaseth your fancy, make hast and tell her that she hath given you Chains more heavy than her own. It being an easie matter to perswade Sextus unto a business of this nature, he told Amilcar that he would go presently with him, and accordingly making use of Tullia's name to see them, those who guarded the Prisoners did let them enter; but they found them in several humours, for two of them did so extremely droop in their Captivity, as if they were almost dead; and another who being of a more blith composition, was a looking her self in a Glass, and mending something about her dress, as pleasantly as if she had been in her own Chamber; also there were other two, who were not very melancholy. But as for Clelia, without either the despair of the two first, or the insensibility of the other three, she was only serious, and gravely sad, and looked as if she were a most perfect Mistress of her self. All this while, Amilcar not desiring to be known, he saluted her after such a manner as at the first made her to understand that she was to take no notice of him. And Sextus at the first entrance talking talking to one of those Ladies who came from Ardes, and seemed the most considerable, he had time to make such signs unto her, as signified his intention. And he had so much time also as to ask her in a low voice whether there was any of those Captives whom she durst trust? And Clelia pointing unto one who was called Cesinia, he left her as soon as Sextus came towards her, and he went unto that Lady, to whom she pointed, unto whom he told all that was agreed upon with Aronces, to the end she might tell Clelia. Thus he let her understand that if any asked who she was, she should say that she was born at Nules, and that she had a Brother whose name was Celeres. But after Amilcar had said all that related unto Clelia, he began to cheer up all the Lady-Prisoners, and he was so pleasant in talking unto those who seemed so dejected at their Captivity, as he did suspend part of all their sorrows. Mean while, Sextus, unto whom the beauty of Clelia was infinitely pleasing, let her understand (following the counsel which Amilcar gave him) that he thought her fitter to give Fetters then to wear them. But she answered him in such a manner, as did something cool the impetuosity of his fiery temper. So as this Prince, who till now never loved without hope of obtaining them, and who knew not what either fears or respect did mean, did find his heart so stricken with a reverent and respectful fear, as restrained him from talking unto Clelia, as he used to do unto others; so as calling Amilcar to his aid, there began a discourse more general which was very pleasant; for as there could be no talk so far from any matters of Love, but Sextus would apply it that way, so after he had pitied the misfortunes of these fair Captives, and protested that he would protect them as much as ever he could, he began to say, he believed their Captivity did make many sad hearts both at Ardes and at Rome. Truth is, Sir (said Amilcar) since there is not one of these Captives, who is not fair enough to make Captives, I am confident there are many sad Lovers at Ardes, and e're long will be many ill treated ones in Rome.

The Romans have such a reputation of glory (replied that person who indured her Captivity so well, and whose name was Plotina) as it is not credible there is any one of them that will be a Slave to a Slave. Oh Sir, (said Amilcar after his natural and sprightly freedom) this is the finest opportunity in the World for a Roman that hath a mind to make any gallant declaration of Love, and were I one, I would not let it slip; for certainly there is nothing more difficult then to do it handsomely, and gallantly; at least I am sure that since I was first a Lover, I think I have made a hundred, and amongst them all there is but two which ever pleased me. It is true (said Sextus and laughed as well as Plotina) that for these regular Lovers who woe in print, it is difficult for them, to find out such a happy minute, wherein they can, with a good grace, say I love you. But as for my part, I never wooe so; for I am so perswaded that the very thing it self is pleasing, as I cannot believe it will make one angry be it told never so ill-favouredly; and therefore I use to out with it boldly, whensoever any occasion is offered. Were one a great Prince as you are (replied Amilcar) were one handsome and had wit at will, then I think indeed, that the difficulty would not be great, to tell you love, and to tell it well; but when one is no Prince, nor handsome, and but of a mean wit, and but indifferently in love, then I assure you it is a business more difficult then you imagine, to make declarations of Love; unless unto fair Prisoners, for in such a case I find no difficulty. For indeed (added he and smiled) these words, Slave, Captive, and Prisoner, do furnish one with a thousand gallant thoughts, and Fetters, Chains, and Torments, are so naturally applicative unto what one would say, as one shall find out a thousand several ways to express their minds. But when one is but cold in love, and hath no great Talent of Wit, (as I said before) then there is no greater difficulty, then to say I am ready to die for Love. But (replied the pleasant Captive) if one be neither in love, nor have any Wit, why should he ever torment himself with seeking of declarations of Love, and talk of that which he is not sensible off? Alas, fair Plotina (said he unto her) if one should never talk of love, but when the heart is full of it, one should never talk of it above once in all his life; for one cannot be twice violently in Love: And all his discourse would be very cold and languishing, since to tell you truly, when any one is long with a Woman, he must needs talk either of her love unto others, or her causing others to be in love with her; for I am most confident that the gravest and most demure Matrons of Rome, when they were young would be very weary of the best accomplished Men, if they should never talk unto them of any thing but Divinity, of the Vestal Ceremonies, of the Laws of the Land, of the order in their Families, or of the news of the Town: A fair and young Lady takes no delight in hearing one tell that such a one is dead, such a one hath made his will, such a one is married unto such a rich Man, this Man is gone into the Countrey, that Man hath a suit in Law, and this Woman hath a very rich Gown; and therefore it is the only way to be always talking of Love, be it either in earnest or in jest; for follies of this nature handsomely spoken amongst Ladies, do please them better then any moral or politick discourse whatsoever, or any news. I am so much of your opinion (replied Sextus) that even in visits of consolation after the death of Friends, I would find out some invention or other to speak of love; for be it unto a Woman who had lost her Husband, whom she most dearly loved; she must be pitied principally because she hath lost him she loved; or be it so that she did not love him, she must be comforted by giving her some hopes of having a Husband whom she shall love. Yet I believe (replied Clelia modestly) that they use to talk of Love less in Rome, then any where else; they use to speak of it more mysteriously (replied Sextus) but for all that it is spoken of in all parts of the World; and it will for ever be spoken of as long as there are such beauties as you are. It were enough to say (replied Amilcar) as long as there are any Men; for since there are very few beauties comparable unto her you speak unto, you leave over little room for discourse of Love. Whilst Sextus and Amilcar were talking thus, there was one of those melancholy Ladies, who of her own nature was very proud, and a little capricious, and who not being able to indure any discourse of this nature, she began to quarrel with Amilcar; but being very handsome, and seeming witty, he answered her very civilly, though in a very ingenious way of Rallery; on the other side, that jocund Lady whom Amilcar had much pleased, she opposed her friend and told her that she was much too blame in offering to make Amilcar as melancholy as her self, so as there grew a very pleasant contest, yet it lasted not long; for it growing late Sextus and Amilcar went away; but Amilcar having done the business he came for, as soon as he had waited upon Sextus to his Chamber, he returned unto Aronces. Yet before he went from that Prince, he observed that Clelia had taken his heart; and he made him confess that he thought her very fair; and that the only fault that he could find in her, was that she thought her too good and over-wise. However, the friendship which was between Aronces, Amilcar, and Celeres, would not suffer them to part Lodgings, but they all three lay together, as Artimedorus and Zenocrates did: Aronces was not looked upon as a King's Son, nor Artimedorus as a Prince, for the state of their fortunes would not permit them; but Amilcar knowing them both, he desired they should know what one another were; So as after he had told Aronces what he had done, and had filled his heart with joy and hopes, he obliged Aronces to discover himself unto Artimedorus, and Artimedorus to discover himself unto Aronces; who no sooner heard of his true Condition, but he knew him to be a Brother unto the Princess of the Leontines, unto whom he was so much obliged; so as imbracing him then with abundance of tenderness, he begged his friendship, and promised his most faithful service, not speaking a word of the Princess his Sister, until he knew what opinion he was of, and whether what he thought of the lovely Zenocrates was true or no.

However, it being very late, and having talked away most of the night without any sleep, they silently gave the rest, unto their rest: And in the morning, as it was resolved upon the day before, Amilcar went unto Tarquin, to present Aronces and Celeres unto him, as two friends of his whom he knew very well in his Travels; and as two Men who came to offer their service at the Siege of Ardes: Adding afterwards a most humble petition for the release of Clelia, whom he called by another name before Tarquin, then that she was called at Ardes, saying that she was carried thither by her Lover against her will; and that being born at Noles in Campania, and being Sister unto a Man who would die in his service, she deserved to be treated better then the rest of the Captives, who were Daughters Wives, and Sisters unto his enemies. At the first Tarquin received Aronces and Celeres very well, and hearkned unto the Petition which Amilcar made in behalf of the pretended Sister unto Celeres; but Clelia seeming in his eye to be very fair, and having a desire to keep her, he told Amilcar that indeed his petition was very just, and told Celeres that his Sister should not be a Prisoner; but withal told him, that he must desire a favour from him also, which was that she might remain as a Prisoner until after the Siege of Ardes: For (said he) it doth exceedingly concern me, that it should not be thought the Vestals have any right in releasing Prisoners of War, as they have of Criminals; for if this Priviledge should be granted them, there would be in every street a Vestal, when any considerable Prisoners of War were brought into Rome. But Sir (replied Aronces) since this Prisoner for whom we intercede, is no inhabitant of Ardes you may release her, without any thought that it is by virtue of the Vestal Priviledge if you do declare, that you release her only upon this account that she was not born among your enemies. What you say (replied Tarquin) is very judiciously spoken; but for all that the people will think her to be released by the Vestal authority, and therefore it is absolutely requisite, that this fair one stay where she is, until after the Siege of Ardes: But lest her Captivity should be troublesome unto her, or that she should pass under the notion of a slave, I will entreat Tullia to be civil towards her, as perhaps she may like being in Rome, as well as in Campania.

Celeres, Aronces, Amilcar, Artimedorus, and Zenocrates, did use many more arguments unto Tarquin, to make him change his mind, but he began to give them such sharp answers, as they fearing to incense him, and make him suspect something of the truth, they did not importune him any further; and Celeres carrying himself as Clelia's Brother, he gave Tarquin a thousand thanks for promising her to release her after the Siege of Ardes, and in the mean while to treat her well. And indeed Tarquin commanded that some of Tullia's Servants, should the very same hour go and wait upon her, and that they should let any see her who would: So as Aronces making use of that liberty, he went unto her that afternoon, but was carried thither by Celeres, who went to see her as his Sister, Artimedorus, Amilcar, and Zenocrates, went also with them, to the end this visit should not render her in the least suspected.

Clelia was that day in her negligent dress, but yet in the midst of negligence so handsome, as it was apparent that she was naturally so, and so when she had no company. There being then none with her but the Captive Ladies who loved her dearly, she had so much liberty as to receive Aronces as a Man whom she was glad to see; yet she had restrained her self by reason of Artimedorus and Zenocrates, had not Celeres in presenting them unto her, hinted that she needed not to stand in fear of them. So as this meeting, notwithstanding the pitiful condition wherein they were, was very comfortable unto them. And to the end they might have the more freedom of discourse, Amilcar who had seen all the Ladies but the day before, began to talk with them as familiarly as if he had been acquainted all his life, for being between the pleasant Plotina and the lovely Cesonia, who carried out their misfortunes with more constancy than the rest, it was an easie matter for him to turn discourse in a more merry mood. As for Artimedorus, he durst not talk over-much because he was no Roman: And as for Zenocrates, though when he pleased he could speak the Language very excellently well, yet it was never his custom to talk much upon the first acquaintance; yet he listned with such ingenious attention, as made it apparent that he knew what wit was, and that he was a Master of it himself. As for Celeres he addressed himself and his discourse unto those Ladies who were of the most melancholy mood; so as by this means Aronces talked with Clelia in private, with whom he had not had a minutes discourse never since that terrible Earth-quake, which separated them upon the Banks of the River Vulturnus; and he was so transported with joy at the opportunity, that it did appear in his eyes, in his actions, and in his voice. I beg your pardon, Madam, (said he unto to her) for that joy which perhaps you find in my face; for considering the condition wherein you are, I may seem much too blame to expres joys; yet I must needs tell you Madam, that at this time I am not a Master of my own thought; but am so over-joyed at the sight of you, to see you out of my Rivals power, and to find some sparks of goodnes towards me yet in your eyes, as I cannot chuse but abandon my heart and soul unto joys. But Madam, to plump up joys into a fuller strain, I beseech you tell me whether you are any thing joyed at the sight of me, and in seeing me fuller of love then I was, when I had the happy honour to be the most amorous person upon Earth. If the very sight of you did not please me (replied Clelia) truly Sir, I should think my self so unreasonable, as that I should be extremely ashamed at my self. Oh Madam, (said he and interrupted her) I beseech you do not Sir me so, for I am still the very same Aronces, whom the fair Clelia was once pleased to call her Brother, when she began to cast a favourable look upon him as her Lover; and be confident, Madam, that I shall most joyfully renounce the Quality of a King's Son, rather then you should take from me that glorious Title of your Slave. Treat me not therefore, I beseech you in a ceremonious manner; imagine your self to be upon the Throne, and me in Fetters at your Feet, and use no such offensive Sirs unto me; for my thoughts are so tender and so full of respects unto you, as if you do not call me as you were wont to do, my joys at the sight of you will lessen. Since you will have it so, my dear Aronces (said she unto him) I shall live with you as I was wont at Capua, and I can assure you that you are to me no more considerable, since I know you to be a King's Son, then you were before; for truly, fortune in giving you a Crown, hath not given you any thing which I can put in comparison with your virtue. Oh Madam (said he unto her) I beseech you commend me less, and tell me a little more plainly, that you do love me as you were wont to do; and without any telling me of my virtue, tell me only, that the tenderness and constancy of my love, hath moved your heart: That my Rivals hath made no impression in it, and that you would be glad to reign still in mine. In telling you, I am the same in Rome, I was in Capua (replied Clelia modestly) surely I shall tell you as much as you can desire: After this, Aronces used the most tender expressions in the World unto Clelia; and in the transports of his passion, he talked to her of compleating their Marriage, though she was a Prisoner, though Clelius could not come to Rome, nor think of carrying her unto Clusium. Also he himself perceived that his reason was not sound, and was glad that the prudent Clelia did set some limits unto such tumultuous desires, as made him think upon things both unreasonable and impossible.

After which, he gave a short account of all the passages which had happened: And she also did tell him all she knew; for she told him how Horatius went unto the place where the Earth-quake was, which gave him the occasion of his voyage, that was so variously talked of at Capua; she told him how strangely she was amazed when she saw her self without any relief in the hands of Horatius, who yet did treat her with very much respect; she told him afterwards, how when the Earth-quake was ceased, Horatius carried her into a house which was not shaken down, which belonged unto one of those that were with him, when he carried her away; that there he got a Coach, how he procured a Woman to wait upon her; and how after he had written unto Stenius after he was at Capua, he was forced to seek his fortune: She told him afterwards, how Horatius resolving upon Perusia for his retreat, he took that way. But Madam (said Aronces to her) when I saw you in a Bark upon the Lake of Thrasimenes, and when Horatius defended himself against the Prince of Numidia who assaulted him, then you were not in the way to Perusia. It is true (replied Clelia) but chance so ordered it, that in this voyage Horatius did meet with the Son of him who commanded, in one of the Isles of that Lake, which is beyond that, where they then kept the Queen your Mother; so as contracting friendship with him, and having trusted him with all his secrets, Horatius changed his intention, and resolved to carry me into that Isle, where the Man assured him to find a safe Sanctuary. And accordingly, he did put me into a Bark with him, his Men and with those of him he met, we were no sooner upon the Lake, but the Prince of Numidia appeared upon the Shore with Armed Men, and having found another Bark he and his Men went into it, and fell upon Horatius as you saw; and I am most confident, that if these two had not stood in fear of hurting me, the meeting had proved mortal to them both. But I beseech you Madam (replied Aronces) how came the Prince of Numidia so just in the nick with his Armed Men? I conjecture (answered she) that I was the cause of it; for you must know, that meeting accidentally with a Pencil and some paint, when I fell into the power of Horatius, I writ upon all places where I passed, on doors and walls, both my name and the place where they carried me. And understanding that Morning we should go unto this Isle, I writ these words in a Window.

If any Friend unto Clelius chance to pass this way, let him know, that they carry Clelia unto one of the Isles upon the Thrasimenian Lake.

So as supposing, and with reason, that the Prince of Numidia passing by chance that way, and finding this writing, he took these Men and followed me. However, after the Combat with Horatius, and this Prince who was wounded, we came unto this Isle where he presently recovered. But hearing of that express command which the Prince of Perusia had sent to seek me and Horatius in all his Dominions. He who promised unto Horatius a safe Sanctuary in this Isle, recalling his word did oblige him to depart; so as then seeking out for a place of shelter from the violence of Tarquin, and for a protection against all the World, he carried me to Ardes, which he knew was in no correspondency with the King of Rome. And indeed, he was there very well received; but as for my part, melancholy was much my disease: yet I was so happy as to find much comfort in the Company of Cesonia, whom you see there with Amilcar, and whom I found to be a most generous friend; for when Horatius saw that in all probability Tarquin would be prosperous in the Siege of Ardes, and resolved to get out, Cesonia at my request came out also, and perswaded all the rest of these

Ladies

Ladies to come with her. As ſoon as Clelia had ſaid ſo, the Prince Sextus entred, and cauſed the diſcourſe to alter; but Amilcar knowing that Clelia pleaſed the Prince very much, and having a deſire to take him off, he went unto him, and ſpeaking in a low voice, Sir (ſaid he) this fair Priſoner whom I ſee you look upon more then any of the reſt, is indeed the faireſt of them all; but let me tell you, that the pleaſant Plotina, whom you ſee on my right hand, is far the jocondeſt, and more eaſie to be wrought upon: It is true (replied Sextus) but her beauty is infinitely more charming then any of the reſt: I grant it (replied Amilcar) but the worſt is in gaining her, you muſt ſigh, and cry, and cringe, and pule, a long time for it; but in all likelihood the conqueſt of the other will be obtained with a laugh and a pleaſant jeſt.

After this, Sextus ſitting down, and finding what Amilcar had ſaid to be very pleaſant, he made it the ſubject of diſcourſe, but in ſuch a manner, as it was taken only for general diſcourſe, wherein none of the Company had any particular intereſt. After he had ſtated the Queſtion in hand, it is not (ſaid he) to know whether a fair and merry Miſtreſs, be more amiable than fair and melancholy, or a fair, proud, and capricious Miſtreſs, but the queſtion is, which of them is the moſt fit to cauſe Love? Oh Sir (replied Celeres, not knowing Amilcars deſign) a fair and merry Miſtreſs makes men in love with her, but will not be in love her ſelf, and I know nothing more intollerable than a ſprightly blith humour, who will oblige one with a thouſand civilities; concur with one in a hundred pleaſures, let you tell her what you will, and will her ſelf be very free; who the very firſt day you ſee her will laugh, ſing, dance, and play with one as freely, as if he were of Twenty years acquaintance, who will deſire you to come and ſee her, who will bid you extremely welcome, and who will give one the greateſt hopes in the world, and all to no purpoſe. And as ſoon as ever ones back is turned, ſhe will never think on what he ſaid, or what ſhe anſwered. For my part (replied Amilcar) I wonder why you ſhould complain ſo; for I conceive nothing more ſweet than to find ſome hopes growing with ones Love; to find ſome recompence as ſoon as he begins to profeſs affection, to meet with that pleaſure in the beginning of a Paſſion, which others never meet with but in the end; and all the while never to ſhed any tears but thoſe of joy: As to that which you ſay concerning the forgetfulneſs of a fair and merry Miſtreſs, I ſay, pay back oblivion for oblivion; and if ſhe will forget what you ſaid, do you forget what ſhe ſaid. Were I of Amilcars temper, (replied Celeres) I ſhould without difficulty do as he ſays; but I aſſure you (replied he) the matter is not ſo eaſie as you imagine, for I have ſeen all ſorts of Lovers; I have my ſelf loved perſons of a blith, jocund, and frolick temper; I have loved melancholy, proud, fickle, fantaſtical Miſtreſſes, I have loved the little, the great, the black, the brown, the fair, and all ſorts. Since ſo, ſaid the Prince Sextus, you are the moſt experimentally able to tell us, whether it be more ſweetneſs in loving a pleaſant, merry Miſtreſs, or a Melancholy or a fantaſtical. It is very true (replied Aronces) Amilcar is fitter to ſpeak unto the Queſtion than any other; yet he himſelf is of ſo pleaſant, equal, and merry a compoſition (ſaid Artemidorus) as I fear his partiality will make more againſt the melancholy, than againſt the proud and fantaſtical fair ones. To ſhew my freeneſs from partiality (replied he and laughed) chuſe which of theſe three you will maintain, and I will undertake to defend the other. Oh I beſeech you (ſaid the pleaſant Plotina) do not forſake the cauſe of the merry ones, and let him take part with the merry and fantaſtical; you will defend that ſide ſo well your ſelf, both by your beauty and agreeableneſs of humour (replied Amilcar) as you need none to take your part, yet I conſent to be the Protector of the fair and merry ones.

For my particular (ſaid the Prince Sextus) I will pretend to judge: As for my part (ſaid Aronces) I will not put that in any doubt which my heart hath been ſo long reſolved upon. And for my part (ſaid Zonocrates) ſince I am yet much unreſolved in matters of Love, I ſtill pretend unto no ſide, but only to be an Auditor. Since ſo (ſaid Celeres) I will make choice to defend the melancholy Ladies: And to undertake a task more hard than that (ſaid Artemidorus) I will maintain, provided you will pardon the defects of my Language, that there is more pleaſure in being loved by a fair, proud, and fantaſtical Miſtreſs than any other, though I muſt thus far agree that there is much more ſweetneſs in being loved by a melancholy beauty who is not fantaſtical. As for your Grecian accent (replied Amilcar) I will excuſe it, but I beſeech you give me leave to ſpeak firſt, for I cannot endure to take ſo much pains as to anſwer the reaſons of others. But conſider, I pray, (replied Amilcar) that others had rather reply upon your reaſons: Perhaps (replied Plotina) his reaſons will be found ſo good, as none will be ſo bold as to reply unto them, or ſhew their own. Since you are the only ſhe in all the company (replied Cleſimica) who can pretend unto this quality of mirth, perhaps others will alſo find their Protection as well as you. I aſſure you (replied Amilcar) it will not be an eaſie matter to find it; for to enter in the Argument, hath not love its riſe and life out of joys, out of pleaſures, and looked upon as the greateſt felicity in the World, the moſt amorous ſighers that are, never ſigh but for joy, all the ſobs and ſorrows of a Lover are cauſed by his hopes of being happy. Is it not much better then to meet with love in delights and joys, than to ſeek it by ſad ſighing and difficult ways, in ſuch as will never let one laugh but after they have cried? Had I been called unto Natures Council when ſhe invented all theſe ſeveral ſorts of Flowers which ſhe produced, I ſhould never have given any Prickles unto Roſes; ſuch a Lover am I of all delights as I would have them without any mixture of ſorrows; and I am ſuch a profeſſed enemy unto all gloomy and melancholy Lovers, who will always go the moſt painful ways unto love, and had rather ſigh with the Turtle, than ſing with the Nightingale, as I cannot chuſe but ſigh to think upon their follies. Oh Amilcar (cried out Plotina and laughed) you defend our cauſe methinks ſo faintly, as I fear you have a will to be baffled in it. Experience is ſo much above all reaſons (replied Amilcar) as we ſhall be able to defend our cauſe againſt all the protectors of the proud and melancholy Miſtreſſes; and if to give them a moſt ſenſible example, you will be pleaſed to let me love you, and you love me again this will be reaſon enough, to prove that it is better to be loved by a fair merry Miſtreſs, than either a melancholy or a fantaſtick. When you have ſhewed your reaſons (replied ſhe and ſmiled) we ſhall ſee whether we ſhall authorize them by our example. I must tell you then again (replied he) that I know nothing more vexatious than to Court a melancholy, or a proud fantastical Mistress, nor any thing so sweet as to be lov'd by a fair and pleasant merry Mistress: For first when one Courts a melancholy Deity, he must be full of all familiarity, he must pay all possible reverence, he must sigh and pule a long time, he must be extremely circumstantial in the declaration of his love, he must pay both great and small services, he must be full of applauds, of sweetness, of tenderness, of rapture, of assiduity, and amongst all these one ingredient of despair. And when all is done, you must either be loved or not loved, if you be not loved then there is abundance of time lost; and if you be loved, commonly it is but a little; for of a hundred melancholy Mistresses, there are not two to be found who are not both jealous and hard to be obtained, and who does not drive into despair by their continual complaints. So that often one is much more miserable in obtaining their affection then in being denyed it. As for the proud and fantastical (added he) they are yet worse, for one knows not where to find them. At first, they will hardly look upon those hearts which are offered to them, one would say that they wronged them in adoring them, or at least one is infinitely obliged unto them, for doing so much honour as to receive their offering; they will disdainfully turn away their head, because one shall not look them in the face, and will sometimes so behave themselves, as if you were to render them all humble thanks for that they have not killed you. I know very well that there are some good fantasticks, and that some days one shall oblige them, by telling them such things as angred them the day before: I know also, that at another time the same things will displease, which before did please, so as you can never be at any certainty with them in matter of love; nor be sure you can keep that love which you get the day before, how can one be ever at any quiet, or enjoy any delight in them? for my part I cannot endure to be smiled upon one day, and brow-beaten the next; I know these proud ones and fantastical ones, will sometimes go further then others will, but I know withal that they will repent it, and what is gotten with a great deal of pains, is kept but by chance, for one will never enjoy their affection with any tranquill delight. Therefore I do conceive it much better to court the love of a fair, jocund, frolick, and merry Mistress: For first, the Conquest is much more easie, one shall enjoy it in peace; if she should have any tang of jealousie or anger, she is pacified with a serenade, and all quarrels are but trifles which will be reconciled at the next treat, or diversion; I know very well that these merry Mistresses perhaps do not love so zealously; but withal, they do not expect one should love them so extremely; so as giving as much liberty as they take, both parties will be well agreed. They will require nothing from you but such things as are pleasant in themselves; for they will walk with you, they will laugh, they will rally, sing, and dance, and to do all these for the love of them, are no difficulties: and therefore is it not much better to serve such, then others who are so full of the morals and politicks of love, and who require if you will get their loves that you also do exactly know them, who rank sighs, sobs, and tears instead of pleasures.

I have divers more arguments to use (added Amilcar) but I shall not stand in need of all my force against such enemies, as I fear not, since their cause is so bad, and mine so good. Though I want your eloquence (replied Artemidorus) yet for all your Art, I hope Justice will carry it against your specious reasons which have no solidity in them. For the question is not whether hath most or least trouble in loving a merry Mistress, or a fantastical, or a melancholy; but the question is, which hath most sweets in it. And I do very confidently affirm, that of all the several tempers which a Mistress can be of, none is so fit to move great and sensible delights as she that is fair, proud, and a little fantastical. For it is most evident, that whosoever does take away resistance and all difficulties from Love does murther Love; or at the least doth take away all the sweet and pleasing transports which makes all Lovers happy. And I must also affirm, that to be compleatly happy in Love he must mix with his love, the glory to make it fervent, and must have an amorous kind of ambition, to redouble the violence of that passion; it is a most high delight after a Man hath been long a slave unto a Mistress, to be at last a Conquerour, and to deserve that glorious title he must have met with such resistance; he will imagine it most glorious to have vanquished that heart which seemed invincible, and he must be able to tell himself that he deserves to vanquish.

Moreover, though a resentment of glory were not necessary to render that passion the more ardent, yet it must be confessed that Love is either hot or cold: And it must be concluded as impossible, that those desires which a merry Mistress creates in the heart of a Lover, can ever be so sharp as those inspired by a proud beauty, which seem more delicate because they are more difficult to obtain. Not but that a well accomplished Man who is resolute in his Love may be assured to vanquish, if he doth but know how to manage all occasions, and to make use of several favourable and critical minutes which may be met with in the conversation of all proud and fantastical Mistresses; there are some hours when it may be said there is an interregnum in their hearts: I must also maintain that the most sensible favours, are more often obtained by humour, and fancy, then by tenderness and acknowledgements: and a proud fantastical Mistress wins more in an hour, then a merry Mistress can in a year. I grant it (replied Amilcar) but commonly all proud and fantastical Mistresses, do within an hour repent themselves of all the favours they have done; they will even hate themselves for loving you too well: and sometimes they will punish you for what they themselves did voluntarily grant: and their repentance for doing any thing over obligingly moves them unto a thousand more angry words. 'Tis true (replied Artemidorus) sometimes quarrels do arise when one loves a proud beauty; But oh, Amilcar, how sweet are the reconciliations? and what delight is it to see them repent and pay with usury those favours they suspended; and to confer fresh favours to repair the wrong? what pleasure is it I say, to see this lofty and noble pride to stoop and make excuses, and give many marks of submission? what high delight is it sometimes when they would favour you, to see them vex and fret at themselves, and their hearts out of obliging weakness, to pant so as they are forc'd to be favourable unto you? when one hath obtained any favour from a proud beauty, her her pride will be the sweetest thing in the World unto you: for her pride unto others will make you give hearty thanks, she is not so to you; whereas an equal tempered Mistress who is universally merry and affable unto all, she does rather vex then please one. Therefore I conclude, that there is more glory and delight in loving a proud fantastical and coy Mistress, then one that is pleasant, merry, and affable, and though perhaps one may be happy, in a melancholy and in a merry Mistress both; yet the conquest of a proud Mistress is more easie, then the conquest of one who gives hopes the very first day that one begins to love them.

If Celeres (replied Amilcar) do defend the cause of fair and melancholy Mistresses, as you have of the proud, I shall stand in need of the fair Plotina's help, to maintain the cause I undertake. Grecians being before all others in eloquence; replied Celeres, and Artemidorus having a most vast will; Perhaps my reasons will not sound so well as his; Not that his side and that which I am to defend are much opposite, for few proud and fantastical Woman who are very merry; and few also who have not some touch of melancholy; but it is a certain kind of sweet and charming melancholy which makes most violent and tender passions grow in the heart of a Lady. When I speak of a fair and melancholy Mistress (added he) you must not imagine I mean such as are of a gloomy, frowning, fretting and angry humour: for I make a great difference between Sadness and Melancholy. But I mean such a sweet and charming melancholy as is not an enemy unto all pleasures, and gallant diversions. I mean, I say, a melancholy which has a sweet languor and passion in its looks: which makes the heart great, generous, tender and sensible; and puts into it such a zealous disposition unto love, as those who know not what a melancholy heart is, do not know what love is; and I am confident that a Lover who is acquainted with all the delicacies of this passion, does find more delight in a certain kind of languishing and passionate lustre in the eyes of his Mistress, then he shall in all the mirth and jollitry in the World: He will not value those eternal laughers who think themselves worthy of pity if they do not laugh from morning to night: and certainly the most sensible delights of that passion, are not those delights which move laughter: And if after a thousand sighs and secret groans, a Mistress afford but one favourable word which gives any spark of hope, a Lover will not hearken unto it with more sensible delight, then unto all the ingenious rallery in the World: not but that he has his joys; but they are such joys as are rather languor then mirth; such joys as are peculiar only unto love, and melancholy is so particularly proper unto that passion, that his very pleasures have a tincture of melancholy. His studies and musings, which seem so dull and heavy, are infinitely pleasing unto him: and at his faintings of spirit are preferrable, before all diversions in the World; and though there appear no blithness in his eyes, nor ever laugh, yet he thinks himself very happy. I know very well that at the first acquaintance, a merry person is extremely pleasing: and that it is much easier to get acquaintance with such, then those more serious. For, as Amilcar said very well, one shall get familiarity with them the very first day of acquaintance; they will laugh, sing, dance, and tell a thousand merry stories: whereas on the contrary, one must go more slowly to work, with those whose temper, most take me; for commonly, upon the first acquaintance with them, one shall see but the out-side of their beauties and wit, nor will they shew all their ingenuity of a long time; and when you do know all, still you are to seek their hearts; so as discovering every day fresh graces, you have every day fresh delights; but it is otherwise with jocund and pleasant persons; for at the very first they shew you all their beauty, their hearts, and all their affections; and certainly if you love them not at the very first, you will never love them. And also, if she love not you at first, she will never love you, nor afford you any but common favours.

And the very truth is, they only who have passionate Souls, do know how to take every thing as a favour, who only can invent innocent delights, and can make hope last, after they have given you their affections. For my part, I must ingenuously confess that I do love the merry better then the melancholy, but I must withal tell you, that I would not spend all my life in mirth. I would have my friends of that temper, but not my Mistresses, for there is nothing more cruel then to love one who never minds nor observes any thing but pleasures: It is otherwise with a passionate melancholy Mistress; for if you give any obliging language she remembers it a hundred times, she repeats it unto her self in secret, and she will make you glad to see she remembers it, by hinting something or other handsomely which will let you know it. If you play a lesson on the Lute unto her, and there be any passionate Ayrs in it, which seems sutable unto your love of her, she will resent it with tenderness; she will make application unto her self, and answer you with such sweet and languishing looks, as shall most sensibly delight you: But on the contrary a merry Mistress never minds any passionate Ayr, but begins her self to sing some song or other which signifies nothing. If you send any passionate or amorous Epistles unto her, she runs over it in reading; or if she have any diversion in hand, perhaps she will put it in her pocket and not read it, till she be more at leisure; and when she hath read it, perhaps she will burn it, or may be throw it into her Cabinet, and never read it at all. But when a serious, passionate, and melancholy Mistress receives a Letter from her loved servant, her heart beats when she takes it: she opens it with a blush, and she reads it with care and secretie; she reads it over and over an hundred times, and seriously ponders upon every syllable, and though she remember every word, yet will she read it again and again. The truth is, there is nothing so sweet as when one is loved by such a melancholy virtuous person, to see how she will be troubled in denying any slight favour which you shall ask of her, and will deny it in such an obliging manner, as a merry Mistress would oblige you less in granting it, then she in denying. I do know very well, that such use to love very ardently, and desire also to be ardently loved, and therefore they use to complain very often, but what though? is there any thing in this World so sweet as to see a Mistress complain she is not loved enough? can she possibly give you a more apparent testimony of her Love? a merry Mistress indeed complains sometimes that you do not enough divert her, but she will never find fault that your passion is not strong enough; yet quite contrary trary with a melancholy Mistress, for she will complain she will grieve, and will even be sick for sorrow and anger, she will break off with you by all means though God knows she cannot, and when you have once appeased her, she will fil up your Soul with infinite joys, and you will find in her all the favours and ardency of a new affection, nothing is so sweet as these reconciliations in Love.

You shall also have this advantage by loving a Mistress of a serious and passionate temper, as never to hazard any thing as you shall often in loving a merry and fantastical humour, for if you find the last of these in a good mood, when she hath not power to deny her heart unto those who divert her, she will give her heart unto you, but yet she gives it rather by chance than choice: a proud and fantastical Lady will often do the like, and love you more out of an humour than out of any inclination. But a vertuous melancholy Mistress, who hath a tender Soul and a noble heart, she is long in denying you, and will not bestow her affection, but when she cannot chuse but give it, but yet when she doth give it she giveth it freely; and yet she gives it not all at once as the others do, she shews her heart by degrees; and when you do see the bottom of it, you shall be so happy as to see none but your self in it. Indeed a passionate and melancholy Mistress, hath love in her head as well as her heart; she can remember and repeat every passage, and whersoever she is, her mind is still with her Lover, she thinks upon all the places where she hath seen him, and would never be out of his sight, she hath continually a hundred thousand things to tell him, which yet she never does; and there is in this kind of Love such a sweet miscellany of joys and inquietudes, as she is continually in the one or the other. For not to be mistaken, I must affirm, that to know all the delights of Love, one must know all the bitters of it, and whosoever cannot make a great misery out of a trivial matter, shall never take any great delight in a great favour. But if one will be happy in love, he must pick out great pleasures from slight favours, and must have a heart so sensible, as the very sight of a place where once his Mistress hath been, must fill his heart full of joy, as such joys as must grieve him; his heart must be full of thoughts upon her, he must think upon nothing else; and he must think upon her, sometimes with delight, and sometimes with grief. But the fair and merry Mistress, and also the proud and fantastical never use to have any such tender thoughts, It is onely the charming melancholy which is able to inspire a zealous, lasting, and pleasing Passion; As for a merry Mistress, it may be said she rather lends you her heart than gives it; for she never gives it so absolutely, but she can recal it as often as she finds any one that can divert her more. As for a proud and capricious Mistress, it may he said that one can never get her heart without a ravishment, unless perchance she cast it upon you out of anger, rather than give it you of good will; and you can never be so sure in possession of it, but you may lose it again by the same capricious toy which gave it you. But as for a melancholy Mistress, when she gives her heart, she gives it wholly and absolutely, and gives it in such an engaging manner, as (when one knows all the delicacies of this kind of affection which so few do know) it is impossible there should ever be any change in love: And if it were lawful in Rome to use so sacred a comparison with a prophane, I would say, that melancholy is the Vestal which preserves the fire of Love in the heart of a Lover, since without it, a zealous and lasting Love cannot be.

Good Celeres (said Amilcar) say no more, for though I have undertook to be the defender of merry Mistresses, and mirth, yet I think if I were not near the lovely Plotina, you would convert me. The truth is (said Artemidorus) that Celeres and his expressions have tendered my heart. But the wonder is (said Aronces) that Celeres who hath so eloquently discoursed upon Love, yet never had any of those great and violent Passions, is able to instruct others so well. It is true (replied Celeres) and though I was never any more than a pidler in Love matters, yet I am very well acquainted with the Passion: And had I not thwarted my own temper, or had ever met with a lovely Melancholy Mistress who would have loved me, I should have been the deepest in Love of any man living. For my part (replied Amilcar) I can scarcely believe you; for since my first beginnings in matters of love, I have begun a hundred several loves, which have made me so knowing in that Passion, as I have been loved two or three several times with all imaginable violence. For ought I see (replied Sextus) if one should desire you to tell us the History of your life, they should desire more than one single History. True Sir (replied Amilcar and laughed) and to speak properly, you must desire me to relate the History of my Adventures. For my Part, said Plotina then, I have a great desire to know them: I think, added Cesonia, that this curiosity would be general if there were any hopes of being satisfied. For my particular, pursued Clelia, I cannot tell whether or no I am deceived, but I think Amilcar had rather relate the adventures of any other than of his own. It is very true Madam, answered he, there is nothing more unhandsome than to relate ones own worth; for if one be modest be will not enough commend himself, and if one be not he will commend himself too much.

But I perceive (said Plotina unto Sextus) That the dispute is ended, and no judgment is given, whether the merry or the melancholy, the proud or the fantastical, have the advantage. Though I took upon me to be Judge (replied Sextus) yet I should be very presumptuous if I should pronounce any sentence before so many beauties whom I know so little: perhaps there may be more of them merry than I imagine; and those who seem melancholy, are so out of some accidental Cause, and not out of temper; and therefore I think it much better to entreat Amilcar that he would be pleased to relate unto us, some of those beginnings in love which he spoke of. Oh Sir, replied he, I am not fit to be my own Historian: But if you desire to have a Relation of some such Adventure, I have had a hundred friends in my life who have had many gallant and extraordinary adventures; which I am acquainted with as well as my own; and you need only but to tell me what kind of Story you would have. Since it is fitting to divert Prisoners, (replied Sextus) I pray let us have no tragical stories: With all my heart, replied Amilcar: for I am the least acquainted with them; but still I would gladly know a little better of what nature you would have a History. I would if it be possible, replied Sextus, have one that should not end either with a death or a marriage: Oh Sir, replied Amilcar, I can fit you, for I have a friend who has run through adventures enow to afford a hundred Stories; which never ended

ſo. All the Company laughing at what Amilcar ſaid, and at his manner of ſaying it, they began to preſs Amilcar unto a Relation of one of theſe hundred Hiſtories which he ſpoke of; ſo as he thinking it to be good ſervice to Aronces if he kept Sextus from talking unto Clelia, he ſet himſelf to relate an Adventure, in which he was very perfect, and which for its ſingularity deſerved to be told unto ſo noble a company: and therefore with eyes full of jollitry, he began to ſpeak in as free an Air, and little troubled as if he had but three words to ſpeak: But as he was turning towards Sextus, with intentions to addreſs his ſpeech unto him, that Prince deſired him to make his addreſs unto all the Ladies in general: And Amilcar obeying him, began thus.

The Hiſtory of Artaxander.

SInce I was ever very ſincere; I muſt at the firſt tell you, that the names which I ſhall name in the Relation of this adventure, are names only ſuppos'd, That I ſhall alſo vary from the true places where the things were done, and that I my ſelf do not well know, whether he whom I ſhall name Artaxander, was big or little, black or fair. But yet I can aſſure you, it is not more true, that you are all of you the faireſt Priſoners in the world, than it is that all I ſhall now tell you did really happen in ſome place of the world or other, and that not long ſince: For I cannot endure old ſtories of three Ages ago; but what I am to tell you is an amorous adventure, a new adventure, a gallant adventure, and a moſt certainly true adventure. I muſt further tell you, that Artaxander who ere he be, being come to Crete, a Town which harboured the moſt fair and gallant women upon earth, and having quickly gotten the moſt accompliſh'd men and faireſt women for his friends, not then having any engagement of love upon his ſoul; he went out to walk with one of his friends in a Garden out of the Town, which is one of the moſt delectable places in the Iſle, and the Iſle you know is one of the beſt in all the Ægean Sea. And this Garden being from the Town two miles after the Italian meaſure, they went on horſeback. In coming thither they ſaw two Coaches before the gates; And Artaxander preſently enquiring whoſe they were, he underſtood that one of them belonged unto a Lady whom I will call Cephiſa; and the other unto a Lady who had a Neece which lived with her, whom I will call Paſithea, becauſe indeed ſhe reſembled one of thoſe Graces who owned that name. But he no ſooner heard this, then he was very glad of it: for he had heard much talk of Paſithea, though he had never ſeen her, for ſhe had been in the Country ever ſince he came to Crete: ſo as turning towards his friend, whoſe name ſhall be Philiomes: well friend (ſaid he unto him) I ſhall now ſee her whom I have heard ſo much of. Doubtleſs you will (replied he) and I am not the moſt miſtaken man alive, if ſhe be not as well pleaſed with the ſight of you, as you will be with the ſight of her. After this Artaxander whoſe action was all freeneſs he entred into the Garden; and no ſooner in but he ſpied five or ſix women about a Fountain, who talked very loud and with much joy. Among the reſt, Artaxander fixed his eyes upon one who was of a middle ſtature, and a moſt rare beauty: her Action was ſprightly, her Garb pleaſing, her eyes ſhining and merry, the ſmile in her Looks and the blithneſs of her behaviour, ſeemed as if ſhe did counterfeit ſome body as ſhe talked unto one of thoſe Ladies whoſe name was Cephiſa. And indeed, Artaxander and Philiomes ſtaying behind a Hedge and looking upon all this good Company, they perceived that Paſithea was counterfeiting a Lover of the old faſhion, who was then in Crete: and one who had a kind of forced ridiculous Air with him, which rendred him intollerable, though otherwiſe he had wit enough. Paſithea did counterfeit him ſo admirably well, as though Artaxander and Philiomes did not hear the name of him whom ſhe did imitate, yet by her tone, her walk, and her action, they knew very well whom ſhe did ſo perfectly perſonate. So as Artaxander, who was excellent good at the ſame faculty, and who was a particular friend unto all thoſe Ladies except Paſithea, he undertook a piece of Gallantry, which hit very happily: for knowing him very well whom Paſithea did counterfeit, he came from behind the hedge, walking as the man uſed, and putting himſelf into the ſame garb and poſture as he uſed, when he would be pleaſing: After he had ſaluted all the Company in general, he accoſted Paſithea in particular, in a language ſo like that which ſhe was imitating, as all the Company were very pleaſingly ſurpriſed. But as for Paſithea, ſhe was ſo aſtoniſhed and took ſuch delight in this kind of gallantry, that after ſhe had heartily laughed at this paſſage; I beſeech you Sir (ſaid ſhe unto Artaxander) let me enjoy your friendſhip and acquaintance; for having a great deſire to ſee my ſelf, and know how I behave my ſelf, and how I ſpeak, I will then entreat you to perſonate me as well as the man which you now did imitate: As for my friendſhip Madam (ſaid he in his own ordinary tone) I cannot well tell whether you can have it or no: for the truth is, you are too fair for friendſhip: Oh Sir, replied ſhe, I ſhall be very well contented with your friendſhip, and let love alone; and therefore to be my friend is no ſuch difficulty as you imagine: Whatever it be Madam, (ſaid he unto her) let us leave the future unto the will of Love and Fate, and give me leave to tell you thus much, that though I never had the honour to ſee you until this quarter of an hour, yet I have expected a ſight of you this fifteen days with much impatience: And let me tell you further, (added he and laughed) you are obliged unto me, for not giving away my heart unto one of theſe fair ones, until I had the honour to ſee you: leſt I ſhould have been forced to have recalled it when you came: 'Tis very true indeed (ſaid the amiable Cephiſa) Artaxander as great a Gallant as he is, has not yet made any addreſſes of Gallantry unto any of us: I muſt confeſs my ſelf much obliged unto him (replied Paſithea) and to return civility for civility, I can aſſure him that in all my voyage I did not accept of one heart which was offered unto me. And yet I muſt confeſs I was ſomewhat near it, when Cephiſa ſpoke to me in your behalf; for I make no doubt but that you are the ſame Artaxander, of whom ſhe hath ſpoken ſo nobly. Yes Madam (ſaid he unto her) I am the ſame Artaxander, but the difficulty is how I ſhould make good the commendations of Cephiſa, as Madam, you are able to make good thoſe praiſes which all the world gives you. But Madam, give me leave to tell you, that though I have profeſſed I would not have any to throw away their loves upon me, yet I think my ſelf obliged to give my heart to you in recompence pence of your not accepting any heart for my ſake. Though I ſhould not give it, yet you have power to take it away from me whether I would or no; and therefore to keep you from theft, I had better be liberal and give it. Did you know my good humour (replied ſhe and laughed) you would not ſpeak as you do: for my fooliſh fancy is to love that which is ſtoln better than that which is given me: If ſo Madam, replied he, I beſeech you give me my heart again to day, and ſteal it from me to morrow. After this all the reſt of the Ladies and Philiontes alſo mixing in the diſcourſe, it became extremely pleaſant: for Artaxander having a new deſign of pleaſing, and Paſithea the like, they did exceedingly divert themſelves and others alſo. For they did put into practice all that I had ſaid concerning mirth and merry people in the height; and if Artaxander had been acquainted with Paſithea all his life, he could not have been more familiar with her than he was: before they parted, Paſithea and he were whiſpering their conceits of all the company; he taught her one Song, ſhe him another; he compoſed a Copy of verſes ex tempore, upon a Poſie of Flowers which ſhe gathered and threw unto him; and ſhe again replied. Moreover ſhe gave him her hood and gloves to hold whilſt they were at a Collation in a green Arbour; ſhe gave him alſo ſome of thoſe fruits which were upon the Table; and letting a Ring accidentally fall, which was of no high price, and which he reached up ſhe let him wear it, yet asked it of him at firſt: but when he told her that he loved to keep that which he found, as well as ſhe did what ſhe ſtole, ſhe anſwered him that he ſhould not have it unleſs he ſtaked ſomething againſt it and won it; then if you pleaſe Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I will ſtake and lay my ſelf againſt this Ring, that you are the faireſt in the world; and becauſe we will not put it unto chance; Judges ſhall be choſen to divide the wager. So this pleaſant wager was laid, and the Ring was adjudged unto Artaxander. After this, they all went to ſee the houſe unto which the Garden belonged, there to reſt themſelves and where all this fair company did ſit down and enjoyed a pleaſant proſpect out of a Cloſet with an open Balcony. But Paſithea entring laſt becauſe ſhe ſtayed talking with Artaxander, all the places were taken up except two before the Balcony. I perceive (ſaid Paſithea and laughed) they know I am not like thoſe Ladies who will be always in the ſhade, ſince they ſeat me with the Sun in my face. Thoſe who have ſuch a complexion as yours (replied Artaxander) who are ſo young, ſo fair, and eyes ſo ſprightly cannot be ſeated better than you are: eſpecially (added Cephiſa and ſmiled) when they would ſhew themſelves. I muſt confeſs indeed (replied Paſithea) that I deſire both to ſee and be ſeen: but withal I muſt tell you I am not ſo affectedly fooliſh as ſome Ladies are, who will at any rate be always ſhewing all the beauty they have, and whoſe minds run wholly upon ſuch ſetting themſelves off as makes them ridiculous to all beholders. And it is very ordinary (ſaid Artaxander) for I never came in any place where I did not find ſome Ladies in placing themſelves in an advantageous light as any would be in placing of a picture. I know one Cretan, replied Philiontes, who is the moſt ambitious woman upon earth; ſo very extreme, as I think ſhe would not appear fairer than others, but only out of her ambition, and without the leaſt ſmack of Gallantry: This Lady was one day put to a pitiful perplexity, for be pleaſed to know, that this Lady who had a thouſand quarrels in her days about matter of place, and would contend for it with ſuch as were much above her quality, this Lady, I ſay, came one day to one of her friends, whoſe chamber was ſo contrived as the higheſt place in the Room was the worſt in the world for a beauty to be in: for the pureſt complexion there ſeemed to be yellow, by reaſon of reflection from a window oppoſite to a plot of yellow flowers, which cauſed that yellow reflection. Alſo the compoſure of this Ladies face was ſuch, as if ſhe were in an advantageous place, her eyes ſeemed hollow and ill-favoured, ſo as knowing this place was not favourable to her, ſhe was then much perplexed between the intereſt of her ambition, and the intereſt of her beauty; for ſhe knew well that if we took up that place, ſhe ſhould look pitifully upon it; and if ſhe did not ſeize upon it, then another Lady would ſit above her: ſo as not knowing upon a ſudden what to do, becauſe it was a thing ſhe could not foreſee, for the Chamber was new built, and ſhe had never been in it, ſhe fell into a miſerable perplexity. But I pray Sir (ſaid one of the company unto him) if ſhe had never been in that Chamber, how could ſhe know it had that ill quality? The Queſtion is ingeniouſly asked (replied Philiontes) and as eaſily anſwered. For you muſt know that when this ambitious Lady firſt entred, ſhe ſaw one ſtanding in this dangerous place; upon whoſe face ſhe ſaw what would reflect upon her own, if ſhe were in her room. So as not knowing whether ſhe ſhould take it or no, to gain a little more time of conſideration ſhe ſtepped back, and ſeemed as if ſhe had ſome private buſineſs with one behind her, ſhe carried her unto the other end of the Chamber to talk with her; but the beſt jeſt was ſhe knew not what ſecreſie to talk of, inſomuch as the other was as much amazed, to hear her talk of ſo many ſenſeleſs nothings, as that Lady was in finding out an expedient, how to avoid this diſadvantagious place. But at the laſt, after much talk to no purpoſe the other Lady did gueſs the cauſe; for ſne began to find fault with the Chamber, and ſay her own was far beyond it, ſhe ſaid this was ill ſcituated; ſhe could not find a convenient place to ſet a bed in it; ſhe would alter all the doors and windows; purpoſely to make better lights, ſuch as would make her ſeem fair, and and to ſatisfie her Ambition, ſhe would turn the very courſe of the Sun, ſhe would have the whole houſe pulled down, though it was a moſt ſtately Fabrick, rather than expoſe her ſelf unto a light which was diſadvantageous unto her beauty. I know a Lady in the place from whence I came (replied Paſithea) who would do as much, if the occaſion ſhould preſent it ſelf; but I know others at Crete who are as ridiculous; for there is a woman whom Cephiſa knows as well as I, who becauſe ſhe hath very white hands; is continually doing ſomething or other which may give her an occaſion of ſhewing them. For one while ſhe will be mending ſomewhat about her own dreſs, and another while ſhe will be ſo officious too, to be mending ſomething about her friends; ſometimes ſhe will purpoſely let fall her hood, that ſhe may take it up and ſo ſhew her hands; and when ſhe is at any gallant Collation, ſhe will always eat of that which is far off her, and not that which is near, becauſe ſhe would have a pretence to reach forth her hand and arm, and ſo ſhew their fairneſs. Fie, Paſithea, (replied Cephiſa) you have ſaid too much: No truly (replied ſhe) I have not ſaid enough yet; for there are ſome who think themſelves ſo fair, as that they do not on-

For my part (said Artaxander) I know a Lady who indeed hath admirable white teeth, who most certainly had never laughed, if her teeth had not been so; for all the composure of her face was serious and melancholy, yet knowing the whiteness of her teeth, she laughed in spight of natures teeth, and got an artificial smile which is the most rediculous thing in the World; for her mouth is alwaies opened with a laugh though there be no signs of any mirth in her eyes or face; and her lips are so used to shew her teeth, as I am confident that she sleeps open mouthed. All the company laughing at this pleasant description which Artaxander made of that Lady, it was confessed that such things were often to be found, and that it was a weakness which beauties ought to correct themselves for, since nothing is more ridiculous then affectation. And yet nothing is more ordinary (replied Cephisa) especially amongst young people; nothing is more fantastical than to rowl the eyes by Art, and yet many women consult with their Glasses, only to learn the trick of it, but the truth is, a woman should not use any arts to please, but only such as belongs to the handsome dressing themselves, and chusing such colours as best becomes them, but I cannot endure any should practise to make faces, nor to shew any parts of their beauty with so much affectation as if they had a design to sell them. The Tirian and Sidonian Merchants do not use more care in shewing their rich Dies and Tapestries, than many great Beauties in shewing theirs. For my part (said Pasithea) I am resolved none shall ever upbraid me with any fantastical affectation. I believe it (replied Cephisa) but yet you may be upbraided with that jocund humour which will not let you think upon any thing else; they wrong me who think my mind runs not much upon pleasures (replied she) for indeed I will always love that which pleaseth me, the way then to get your love (replied Artaxander) is always to please you, It is true (said she and laughed) and if you please me always as well as you have pleased me this day, we shall always agree very well. Oh! sweet Pasithea (replied he) I am much joyed to hear you say so; and that you may know me better, give me leave to tell you I am nothing like those men who cannot be Masters of their own minds; who are sometimes merry and sometimes sad, and cannot speak out of their humours: As for me, I have four or five several sorts of spirits, and I am able to chuse which of them I please at any time; therefore since that in which I am this day doth please you, you shall see me in it as long as I live.

And indeed after this, Artaxander and Pasithea grew as intimately familiar as any two in the world. Pasithea told him where she dwelt, Artaxander asked leave to come and see her, she granted, and when he went, he stayed always very long with her. They parted always with so many signs of friendship, that never any growing affection appeared more sensible than between these two. And since the first day of visit they were almost always together; for the humour of Artaxander much delighting Pasithea, and the humour of Pasithea much pleasing Artaxander, an interest of pleasure did unite them, and caused them to be continually together; so as in a few days Artaxander perceived that his heart was wounded with the sharpest darts of Love; it is true, his Passion met with no bitter rubs, but he might in reason and without vanity, have as much hope as love; for Pasithea was so sweet towards him, and he knew so well that he pleased her, as he was almost sure of being loved. And indeed within a few days Pasithea gave him as many signs of affection as she possibly could; she permitted him to talk of his love, and did not forbid him to hope; a while after she let him believe he was beloved: Indeed the hearts of these two were so accustomed unto pleasures, as perhaps they did not so sensibly as others, gust the happiness which they enjoyed; and it must be granted that when any do come out of a state of sorrows into a state of joys, they are the most sensible, but happy they both were, and if Artaxander contrary to his custom had not taken a fantastical conceit in his head, his love of Pasithea had lasted longer. But the better to make you understand the business, you must know, that when Artaxander was most pleased with Pasithea, and most confident of his being pleasing unto her, he fell in talk with Cephisa, who was no hater of him, and aggravating his good fortune, he opened his whole soul unto her; but conceiving this, Cephisa did lend but an hollow ear unto him, nor did think him so happy as he thought himself, he asked her the reason, wondring very much she did no more congratulate his good fortune. For truly, (said he unto her) Pasithea is wondrous fair, her humours are infinitely pleasing, I please my self in pleasing her, she esteems me beyond my merit; she loves me almost as well as I would desire, and we see one another continually. You do very well Sir, (said Cephisa) to mention this last thing, for without it all the rest would not make love subsist. For certainly, if Pasithea were but one month out of your sight, as pleasing as she is she would easily forget you.

Melancholy people (replied Artaxander) are so confidently perswaded that merry people will find Consolation in all conditions, as I can hardly believe what you say, unless you can give me an example of it. If that will convince you (replied Cephisa) I shall easily find one; but since you may perhaps think I disguise the truth, I pray ask Philontes who is your particular friend, what passed between Pasithea and a most handsome man who died about four months since, and for your further satisfaction desire Pasithea her self to relate the adventure of that illustrious dead man: to the end you may engage your heart no further than she engaged hers. Artaxander was very desirous that she would tell him further, but she kept firm to her resolution, and therefore as soon as he was parted from Cephisa, he went unto Philontes. As soon as they met, he asked him whether Pasithea had lost a friend or a Lover within this four months? As for a friend (replied Philontes and laughed) Pasithea can never lose him, for people of her humour can never have any; but as for a Lover, she did lose one whom she loved as well as she could love, and whom she ought to lament as long as she lives: But pray why did you never acquaint me with this Adventure (replied Artaxander) I perceived you so well pleased with Pasithea from the very first, (replied Philontes) as I thought it not fit to acquaint you with a passage which the knowledge of it could not be advantageous to you: And I should never have spoke of it had not you spoke first. But I pray (replied Artaxander) what was the name of him she loved, and what kind of man was he? he was so very handsome and of so noble a mind, (replied he) as my eye never yet saw a better? his Quality was much above Pasithea's

they began to love when they were Children playing together; this lovely Lover gave a thousand heroick Testimonies of his Love unto this Lady, he ventured his whole estate for her sake, he adventured his life for her several times; and it was impossible to express more love then he did to her. Pasithea also, in requital of his affection, answered him in all that virtue would allow; and I am confident that Philocrates, as long as he lived had no cause to complain; for he being continually in her eye, he did continually please her, yet did not know her heart to the bottom. How (replied Artaxander then) was it Philocrates, whom I saw about four months since? who died in the same place where I was? was it that same Philocrates who loved, and was loved of Pasithea? The very Philocrates (replied Philantes) the very same Philocrates, who though he was most dearly loved all his life, yet was soon forgotten after his death. Oh Philantes, (replied Artaxander) unless there were some great disgust between Pasithea and him at parting, it is impossible a Man of his merit should be so soon forgotten: you are so far in favour with Pasithea (replied Philantes) as you may easily make her tell you all passages between them; and therefore I will tell you no more, and indeed, do what Artaxander could, he could not get Philantes to tell him any more: so as curiosity augmenting, by the difficulty of finding satisfaction, the fancy took him in his head to go unto her, and know how it was possible she could comfort her self so soon, after the death of a lover who had so much merit. So going unto her, according to his custom; and finding her alone, he seemed at the first not to know any thing of Philocrates his love to her, but only named him as one who was his Friend. He had no sooner named him, but Pasithea began to speak, how (said she without any extraordinary distemper) did you know Philocrates? Yes, replied he, and he died in my Arms, for whom I much lament, for he was a Man of great parts. For my part, replied Pasithea, he has diverted me many a time: but as for you Artaxander, I believe you have no great reason to lament him: for had you seen him in Crete, I believe you would not have been good friends. I understand you very well Madam, replied Artaxander, and to speak truth you are in the right; for it is not usual for two Rivals to be friends. You know very much for a stranger (said she unto him) I cannot tell what I know as a stranger (replied he) but I conceive that I know not enough as a Man unto whom you have given your heart; and therefore I beseech you lovely Pasithea, tell me ingenuously all the passages betwixt you and Philocrates until he parted from Crete; and fear not that I shall be jealous, for you may imagine there is no danger of a dead Rival. At the first Pasithea was something shy in satisfying the curiosity of Artaxander; for, said she, I cannot endure to trouble my self with talking of past things unless they were serviceable to things present, or things to come. But at last, being overcome by the perswasion of Artaxander, she began to relate all the passages of Philocrates his love unto her, especially all the Diversions, Treats, Feasts, and Merriments, which he had given her; so as they being all pleasant passages, she laughed as heartily in relating all these things, as if the Man who gave them all unto her, were not dead, at least not dead so lately. But the wonder was, that in this relation, she confessed ingenuously that she did most tenderly love Philocrates; that he never gave her the least distaste, and that they parted as most dear friends, and that she was much obliged unto him after his death, because by his last Testament he had given her a great part of his Estate: Sure then Madam (said Artaxander to her) the memory of Philocrates must needs be very dear unto you; I assure you (said she) I do think upon him sometimes with much delight, for we have laughed together many a merry time; then remembring some things which she had not told before, she began to tell them with such freeness of spirit, as if she never had any interest in what she told: so that as long as this Relation lasted, Artaxander could not see the least grief or sorrow in her eyes, or face. But on the contrary, there was such extreme joy in her words, in her voice, and in her eyes, that as well pleased as he was to see his Rival's death, did not move the heart of his Mistress, yet he was very sad.

Thus Pasithea supposing that he would think she did too obligingly remember him whose adventures she had related, she affected to shew her insensibility, by shewing her jollitry. And to that end she began to talk of a hundred merry passages; and she related to Artaxander some things which her dead Lover had spoken unto her: He told me the day before his departure (said she unto him) that though death was alike to him in all places, yet he should grieve more to die far from Crete, then to die near me. Believe me (said I unto him) I do not understand your reason, since I profess unto you, that if you were very sick in danger of death, I would not see you: For what delight soever can be taken in the sighs of a dying Lover, I profess I would not be present at your last groan; and therefore I cannot see any reason you have to desire dying in Crete, more then the furthest part of Africa. Yes Madam (said he unto me) if I die in Crete I shall have a Tomb, and I should hope that the sight of my Urn would hinder you from engaging in a new affection. And therefore, Artaxander (added she and laughed) if you take any care for the burial of your Rival, you do not know that you do a thing against his intention, and a thing which hereafter will be serviceable unto you.

However, since it was his Fate to die, I am very glad it was in Africa; for I should have been troubled in passing by his Monument; and I cannot endure any sad objects; for I do not know any greater folly in the World then to grieve, when it is a thing cannot be helped by grief. Believe me, Madam, (replied Artaxander very discontentedly) in this you are the wisest Woman in the World: You speak in such a tone (said she) as if you took it ill I did not cry for the death of your Rival. I know not, Madam (replied he) whether I should take it well if you should cry; but I confess I think it strange you should so little grieve; and to be plain with you, I will do what I can to perswade my self, that it is my self who gives Consolation to you after his death. But Madam, it is impossible I should ever be so perswaded; for the first time, I had the honour to see you in the Garden, where you were so pleasantly personating that ridiculous Lover, whose gestures were all after the old mode, you had then more jolity and blithness in your eyes and mind, then ever I saw you since; yet it is so

ſhort a time ſince my Rival died, and as one can hardly imagine him to be dead. Thus I muſt conclude, with ſorrow to my ſelf, that it was not I who did comfort after your loſs, but that it is only your own natural temper, which is to love the diverſion, and not the divertor, unleſs it be for ſuch diverſions as proceed directly from his perſon; ſo as ſuch as think to be tenderly loved by you, will be much deceived, and miſerable; for ſince my Rival could not attain to any perfection of love from you, no Man elſe can ever pretend unto it; and to be plain with you, I think it wiſdom in my perſon to diſengage himſelf from ſuch a one as you, who is not capable of any violent paſſion.

Since you think that you have found out a new fantaſtical, and pleaſant way of complaint (replied ſhe) I wonder not you ſhould make your ſelf a little merry with it, and ſince I think my ſelf a little good at Rallery, as if I did believe you ſpoke your real thought. Seriouſly Madam (replied Artaxander) I am much afflicted to ſee you ſo much incapable of loving aright, and that you ſhould ſo little love the moſt lovely Man upon earth. I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe) that I loved him as well as ever I could, and that I do not love you better then I did him. I do believe it, Madam (anſwered he) and believe it eaſily; for my Rival was a Man incomparably above me in all things, he hath done you a million of ſervices; a million of ſervices more then ever I did, and I make no queſtion but that you loved him more than you do me. And therefore you need not think it ſtrange, I ſhould grieve at the ſmall affection which you had unto him. For Madam (I muſt tell you again) that I wiſh I had been the Man who had comforted you, and that I had ſeen you weep the firſt time I had the honour to ſee you, in lieu of ſeeing you laugh, I wiſh that I had wiped away your tears. But had you ſeen me crying (replied ſhe and laughed) you would not have loved me, and ſo far would you have been from courting, that you would have fled from me, and therefore I ſee no reaſon you have to complain. I complain, Madam (replied he) becauſe you did not well enough love my Rival; for being perſwaded that you did not love me ſo well as him. It much concerns the happineſs of my life, to think that you loved him very well; and therefore it is not ſo fantaſtical as you imagine, that I ſhould grieve that you grieve no more for his loſs. I do not tell you (replied ſhe) that I love you leſs then I loved him; but out of my plain ſincerity, I told you that I loved you no better then I loved him. I do believe you, Madam (replied he) indeed I do believe you, and I do too much believe you for my own tranquillity; for when I do conſider that an abſent Lover, and a dead Lover are both alike unto Women of your humour; and when I conſider, that as ſoon as I am out of your ſight, you will forget me as one whom you never ſaw, my vexation is more then I am able to expreſs. Moreover, my imagination is ſo weak and apprehenſive, as I cannot chuſe but think that if I were either dead or abſent, you would within one month contract affection with ſome other, and would relate unto him all our adventure as merrily, as you have related unto me, the adventure of my unfortunate Rival. And therefore to be downright plain with you, I am reſolved to the utmoſt of my endeavours to diſ-engage my heart; and conſidering your extreme inſenſibility, if I could revive my Rival I would do it, to the end he might upbraid you with your affection unto me. Oh Sir (ſaid ſhe and laughed) if you could work that wonder, you would put me to it indeed; for then I think I ſhould quit you both together, and perhaps make choice of a third, before either of you two. As Paſithea ſaid ſo, much company came in, ſo as the diſcourſe of neceſſity became general.

But as chance would have it, the diſcourſe did fall upon the very ſame ſubject; for Cephiſa, began to talk of a Lady, who after the Death of her Husband did ſtrange things to teſtifie the exceſs of her ſorrow, and who afterwards did ſo chear up ſelf, as if ſhe had quite forgotten him. For my part (ſaid Paſithea then) I think theſe things the greateſt follies in the World; for when any hath received a loſs of this nature, all a whole Town will run to comfort the party afflicted: If you chance to meet one of them, and ask whither he is going? they will anſwer, that they are going to comfort forſooth; ask another, and they will anſwer the ſame; and yet thoſe they go to comfort would not be comforted unleſs they came, as if the tears of others were the Pearls that muſt inrich them; but there is no greater folly in the World, then exceſſively to grieve when there is no remedy, and the greateſt wiſdom is to chear up preſently as ſoon as one can; and I aſſure you it is my maxim, that when I loſe any whom I love, I will do all I can to forget him.

Indeed I have heard ſay (replied Cephiſa craftily) that when Paſithea loſt a perſon whom ſhe loved dearly, and from whom ſhe had his Picture and ſeveral Letters, ſhe preſently burned all his Letters and threw away his Picture. I do confeſs it (replied Paſithea ſharply and bluſht) and ſo both I and all elſe ought; to what purpoſe is grief for the dead? And to what purpoſe is your affection unto a living perſon, replied Artaxander, ſince it is a thing impoſſible to be ſure of it? Do you think (ſaid ſhe) that the affection of theſe death-lamenters, is more ſure then mine? for I am moſt confident, they cry, and pule, and lament more out of temper than affection. I grant they do cry out of their tempers (replied Artaxander) but it muſt be granted alſo, that they do love zealouſly or coldly, by the ſame reaſon, and you are of a temper to love nothing but pleaſures and joys, you are incapable of any ſorrow or affection. I would gladly know (ſaid a Lady in the Company what preciſe limits are to be allowed unto ſorrow: If you will believe Artaxander at this time (ſaid Paſithea) he will tell you, that you ought to live ever upon the grave of the party loved, or at leaſt to cry Eternally, and make Fountains of your eyes. And if you will believe Paſithea (replied he) ſhe will tell you that you may dance upon the grave of your friends that ſorrow is a fond weakneſs, and that the loſs of a fair day to take the Air in, deſerves to be lamented more, then the loſs of the moſt perfect Lover or the moſt faithful friend in the World.

For my part (ſaid Cephiſa) I love not extreams in any thing: I think a middle way may be taken, and that without either deſpair or inſenſibility, we may grieve, and comfort our ſelves in a reaſonable manner. I would gladly know (ſaith Paſithea) how you mean it, that when one hath loſt a Lover, they may know whether they may make another; if when one hath loſt a Husband, ſhe may marry again; and if when one hath loſt a friend, one may get another in his Room. You aſk many things at once (replied Cephiſa.) And which is moſt ſtrange (added Artaxander) though you ſhould make the moſt juſt Laws in the World, yet ſhe would break them all. Since I cannot deny Paſithea (replied Cephiſa) I will indeavour to content her though I am as well as you perſwaded that ſhe deſires to know more then ſhe would learn, at leaſt put in practice. Though I ſhould break all your Laws (replied ſhe) yet I ſhould do no ſuch work of wonder, ſince the Laws of the greateſt Kings are broken every day: Speak then Cephiſa (ſaid ſhe and laughed) and teach me the art of crying handſomely. You know ſo well how to laugh handſomly (replied Artaxander) that I cannot beleeve you will ever learn to cry: if I had known how to laugh ſo well as you ſay, you would have taught it me ſince I firſt knew you (replied ſhe) but good Cephiſa, anſwer unto all my queſtions one after another; and to begin with the firſt, tel me whether when one hath loſt a Lover, one muſt bury themſelves with him, or make a vow againſt being fair, and uſe ones eyes in nothing but crying: for if it muſt be ſo, I promiſe you I will never permit any to love me, unleſs he can lay in good ſecurity that he is immortal, leſt I ſhould be put to die with him, or elſe lead a life ſo melancholy as is not worth the living.

To give you my opinion clearly (replied Cephiſa) one ſhould never be ingaged in any particular affection; but ſince an innocent love is allowed, and one hath the misfortune to ingage the heart to love one whom death takes away, one ought never to ingage again, without any exceſſive ſorrow; yet ſince it is ſo natural to be ſo comforted with time in the moſt ſenſible ſorrows, I will not abſolutely condemn one whoſe heart ſhall be moved the ſecond time unto a particular tenderneſs; but if any woman ſhall go beyond twice, I profeſs I ſhall hold her to be neither reaſonable nor virtuous. Then you allow one to have a ſecond Lover? replied Paſithea, after one hath loſt the firſt: It were much better never to have any or at leaſt no more but one (replied Cephiſa) but to ſuit my Laws with humane imbecillity, I will allow one to have two Lovers, provided there be a long interval between the death of the firſt, and the beginning of the ſecond love, alſo upon condition that the ſecond Lover be worthy to ſucceed the firſt; and that one ſhould defend ones heart againſt the ſecond more reſolutely, then againſt the firſt; that one ſhould be ſecretly aſhamed of any new ingagement; and that one ſhould not ingage until time and reaſon, have allowed ſome comforts: I would not have any new Lover baniſh the firſt out of the heart of a Lady: but I would have it to be time and reaſon which ſhould comfort her, and to put her into a Condition of loving the ſecond time: And I dare boldly ſay that any woman whoſoever which ſhall ingage her ſelf in any new affection, preſently after the death of the firſt Lover, as a moſt unfaithful perſon, more unhumane and more inſenſible then if ſhe were unfaithful to her living Lover. It is manifeſt (replied Paſithea, that all your Lovers are living and well; but if you were in fear they would dy before you, then perhaps you would not ſpeak as you do. Yet I am contented with this Article; and therefore tell me whether it is lawful to have two husbands, as well as two Lovers? Since Cuſtome hath allowed it (replied Cephiſa) I ſhall not contrary it; but if you would have me tell you ingeniouſly what I think, I muſt poſitively confeſs that I would more willingly pardon a woman who admits of two Lovers, then her that admits of two Huſbands; for it leſs wounds a delicate Genius, to beſtow the whole heart twice for a time, then to give it for all the life. And indeed, if ſome ſtrong reſentments of Love or Ambition will not excuſe a woman that marries twice, ſhe is inexcuſable: At leaſt I am ſure it is better to be a proud nice Miſtreſs then to be one of thoſe wives who as ſoon as ever they have buried one Husband are in bed with another, and never lament his loſs, but in hopes that their tears will prefer them unto another more agreeable to their fancy. Yet thoſe who are onely poſſeſſed with two innoceat paſſions, they have much more to ſay in excuſe of their imbecillity; for it cannot be denied but that there is ſome ſweetneſs to reign in the heart of a well accompliſhed man, and to be zealouſly loved; and the delight to have a faithful and obedient ſervant, may in ſome ſort excuſe her who after a long lamentation for the loſs of the firſt, does deſire to have ſuch another Captive; but I cannot conceive what delight a woman can take in taking a new Maſter: And I ſhould not beleeve it poſſible, if experience did not every day ſhew us examples of women, who without any Ambition or love or reaſon for it, do marry themſelves again onely to marry, without any other reaſons for their marriage. Nor will I ever truſt thoſe great mourners, who would ſhut themſelves up in the Tombs of their dead Husbands; for I have ſeen ſo many of them ſo ſoon comforted, as I like much better a ſorrow that is more wiſe and laſting, and will ſooner allow a woman two Lovers then two Husbands. As for that (ſaid Artaxander) I beleeve Paſithea will not contradict you: I do confeſs it (replied ſhe) and I will diſpenſe with her from the pains in telling whether ſhe may take new friends in lieu of others that are dead. I do believe, replyed Artaxander, that you have no mind to know it. I confeſs that alſo, ſaid ſhe; but it is becauſe all my friends are well, and I would not trouble my ſelf ſo far as to conſider upon any others. You ſhould have ſaid, replyed Cephiſa, that you know well enough already how to uſe them; for have you not loſt Philocrates? 'Tis true (ſaid ſhe without any bluſh, or ſhame) and I have taken Artaxander in his place: I know not Madam, replied he, whether I am in the place of Artaxander; but I think his place to ſeem better then mine, but it is much better to be at reſt in a grave, then to be in the heart of ſuch an humored woman as your ſelf.

But methinks (replied Paſithea and laughed) that Cephiſa hath not ranked Philocrates aright: For he was my Lover, and ſhe has ranked him amongſt my friends. After this the ſpirit of Artaxander was ſo incenſed againſt the inſenſibility of this hard hearted woman, as he returned her a hundred ſharp expreſſions: And then the company parting, Artexander carried Cephiſa to her lodging, who doubtleſs bore him ſo much good will, as was very likely to become love; and therefore ſhe was not ſorry to ſee him ſo incenſed againſt Paſithea: but rather on the contrary did blow the bellows to kindle a greater diſlike; for ſhe acquainted him with an hundred particularities of her former gallantry which Paſithea had not told him, becauſe ſhe did not remember them. And indeed Artaxander with all jollities, was much grieved that Paſithea ſhould ſo indiffeindifferently resent the death of his Rival: and he could not have grieved more if she had loved some other then he was, that she loved not him enough: For truely (said he unto Philiomtes) what security can I even have in the affection of Pasithea; since I have it from her own mouth, that she cannot love me better then she did Philocrates, whom she loved not at all since she can be so soon comforted. But you have not loved many others, replied Philiomtes. who loved you no better then she doth, and yet never torment your self. 'Tis true (said he) but I loved them no better then they loved me: but my affection unto Pasithea, for I intended towards her such a violent passion as might have been set for an example unto all Lovers: yet now I see, my best course is, not to love her at all; and methinks I owe so much respect unto my dead friend, that I ought not to contribute unto the pleasure of one who does so little lament him; Also I should serve Pasithea but right, if I did make her lament Philocrates. The way to know whether this jocund Lady do love you better then she did her first Lover (replied Philiomtes and laughed) is to let Artaxander die. Oh Philiomtes, (replied he) that remedy is too violent: when you understand me well, replied he, you will find it a better remedy then you imagine; For my meaning is, that Pasithea shall not find it in you for a certain time, that same Artaxander who loved her, and who had the art to please and divert her. Cease therefore if you will be ruled by me, from being so complaisant and sweet unto her; never see her unless it be to chide her; be reserved and melancholy; and make that pleasing Artaxander whom she loved to die, and see if she will love him after death, and use all her endeavours to revive him: And indeed Artaxander smothering all his joys, he seemed to be a very sullen and melancholy man, and behaved himself as one who cared not a rush for diverting her: he never saw her but with a sour face, he talked not as he was wont: he did not laugh at what she said, he moved no delight, but when he spoke he complained against her, so as Pasithea began to think it much better if he were dead, then to be present with her in such dumpish humours. And one day she told him her mind; for as he began to upbraid her with her cold affection: I pray Artaxander (said she unto him) either assume your good humours again, or else I shall be worse to you then to Philocrates: for I do but forget him, but I shall hate you most horridly. Oh Madam, said he unto her, I do defie you: for I am confident that you can neither love nor hate: and therefore I cannot hope to be loved, so I do not fear being hated. But Madam, if you will not have Artaxander to trouble you, you must not do more for him then you did for Philocrates. Truly, said she, I cannot; for I did as much for Philocrates as virtue would permit me, and neither will, nor ought do more. Then, Madam (replyed he) I must love no longer, since I cannot be contented with such an affection as you had unto Philocrates. Were I inspired onely with a bare piece of gallantry, a light Love, such as I have seen a hundred in my daies, you should not speak thus: But, to my misery, I was resolved to love you otherwise than so; and since there is no medium, you must either love me more than you did Philocrates, or else I must not love you at all. Artaxander (said she) as I cannot do as you would have me, so if you can do what you say you would I perceive Madam (said he unto her) that you think I cannot; but perhaps I shall shew you, that it is possible to break any chaines which you can give; and to try whether I am master of my self, I will deprive my self of the happiness in seeing you. And indeed Artaxander did presently rise up, and went away from Pasithea: Also to make it appear, that his design was to break off with her, he sent her back her Picture which she gave him, and went the next morning into the country with Philiomtes, at whose house he lay; for Philiomtes being the onely son, and a very well accomplished man, he was almost master at home, though he had a Father and Mother, and having a very noble and pleasant house in the Country, he carried Artaxander with him for a month who by the help of himself and the Muses doe cheer up himself after the loss of Pasithea, and all this voyage was as pleasant as any man alive. Thus this beginning of love did end, neither by death nor marriage, nor hatred, nor jealousie. But to pass from one into another, you must needs know what accident fell out that same night Artaxander and Philiomtes returned unto Crete. But first I must acquaint you, that since their departure there was come a Lady to the town, whom Artaxander never had seen, which Lady had a daughter who passed for the onely rare beauty in the world.

This Lady having formerly lodged in the house of Philiomtes Father, and had contracted a great league of friendship whith his Mother; they came thither very often in the absence of Artaxander and Philiomtes, their house being just over the way. But to come speedily into this other beginning of Love which I promised, and to acquaint you with that which absolutely chased Pasithea out of Artaxanders heart, you must know, that there being much company at supper with Philira (for so will I name the Mother of the great beauty whom I will name Cynesia) as ill luck was after all the company was gone, those servants who should have extingnished the lights, and made clean the room, were so negligent, as that within an hour after the house was on fire; and so violent at first, that Philira and Cynesia fearing their lives more than any thing else, went out and went unto the house of Philiomtes his Father which was over the way, and so far off the fire, as there was no fear of catching: but by the help of neighbours the fire was quickly quenched, yet Philira and Cynesia durst not go home, for all the houshold stuff was carried out in hast for fear of burning; and the Mother of Philiomtes desired Philira and Cynesia to take a lodging in her house: and she with more convenience offered this piece of civility because Artaxander and Philiomtes being out of town, their chambers were ready prepared to receive these Ladies. And so Philira was carried into the chamber of Philiomtes, and the fair Cynesia unto that of Artaxander. But as commonly in all such disorders, things are not done regulary, and as Cynesia had not her own woman to wait upon her, so the servants of the house did but half shut her door, and making hast to go into bed and regain the time of sleep which they had lost, they left a candle burning in the chamber of the fair Cynesia, who was not at all sorry for it, because being frighted with the accident of fire, she thought she should not sleep; but she was mistaken, for silence, rest and weariness, did lul her into a deep sleep as well as all the rest of the house. Mean time, you must know, that the weather being very hot and night's much better to travel in then daies, Philantes and Artaxander to avoyd the excessive heat, did take Boat at Sun-set to return unto Crete, giving order unto their men to come by land the next day; for the Moon shining all night, fancyed much pleasure in returning thus; for the night was clear, the sea serene, the boat covered over with Orange and Mirtle branches, which gave a most admirable odour; they had cushions to lean upon, if a desire of sleep came upon them, and the Rowers were excellent at the art, neither was the boat so little, but they might talk and not be hard by the Rowers; so as I have heard both Philantes and Artaxander say, that they never pulled a more lovely night then that; for two such such wits could not want discourse: sometimes they would sing, sometimes muse, sometimes make verses, sometimes rally with the Rowers; they admired the beauty of the Sea which the sparkling of the Stars did silver; they lent a pleasing ear unto the murmur of the waves in the silence of night, and at last hark'ning to the stroaks of the Oars, which are very apt to cause sleep, they slept; and when they waked they enjoyed the most pleasant prospect in the world at their approach to Crete: also they had slept so soundly, as they imagined they had slept as much as ordinary, and as much as they needed: At last they came to Crete, and the town having no other wals but the sea on that side, they might easily goe to their own house; and they went through all the City and met not a man in the streets, for it was very late, and about an hour after Philira and Cynesia were gon to bed: Mean time, as they could not imagine that their chambers were taken up, so they went directly home; and indeed they were much amazed to see some signs of burning in their neighbourhood. But at last knocking gently at the gate for fear of waking the Master and Mistress of the house, a slave who lay close by, heard the knock, so as imagining that perhaps it was some of Philiras servants who came to speak with their Mistress, he did rise up, and half awake, and half asleep, he went unto the door; at the which he no sooner was, but knowing the voice of his Masters son, and of Artaxander, he opened the door in all hast: As soon as they were entred, this slave would have called up some men to wait upon them and light a candle, but Philantes would not let him wake any, and the Moon shining as light as day he forbad him, but bade him go to bed again: The slave obeyed, and being one whose office was only to open the door, and beside, a dull fellow, he knew not that Philira and Cynesia had taken up the chambers of Philantes and Artaxander: He knew well that they were in the house, for he saw them come in, but his business not being above stairs, he never enquired where they lodged, so as Philantes and Artaxander parting, because their chambers were not both up the same stairs, they went each of them to their own. But Artaxander was strangly surprised, when coming to his chamber door he saw it open, and a light burning in it; but much more was his wonder, when he saw such night dresses as Ladies use, lying upon the Table; but again his admiration was incomparably great, when he saw one of the greatest beauties in the world lying in his bed, who did lye in the most advantageous posture to appear fair, and make Artaxander in love with her; For the weather being very hot, the Purple Curtains about her bed were all drawn open, and gave him the liberty to see and admire her beauty, which seemed the more wonderful, by reason of his surprise at such a fair object. Cynesia, who was of a notable tall stature, did ly upon her right side, and the cloths upon her being very thin, one might see the whole shape of her body; her head leaned upon one arm, and the other lay loose upon the pillow: also having undressed her self in a kind of tumultuous hast, a part of her dresses were untied, and her black locks lay curled upon her most admirable white neck: As for her left arm, it lay bare upon her Pillow, and shewed its delicacy. Artaxander found every part of her face most rarely excellent; and though her eyes were shut, yet he judged of them by the rest. She slept with a lovely smile; and though complexion does not use to shew it self much in sleeping, yet Cynesias was as fresh as any rose; her lips so red, and her curled hair so black, together with her pure complexion, was the most inviting object in the world. Artaxander being strangely surprised at this fair apparition, he knew not what to think; and his wonder was the greater because he knew not Cynesia: He judged her to be a person of quality both by her dress, and a Carkenet of Diamonds about her neck, which she had forgotten to put off, and also by a Case of Picture which was tyed about her left Arm with a black Ribband, though the Case was not a very rich one yet Artaxander knew that none wore any such but people of quality.

Artaxander being then in this Condition, he knew not what to do; for he had a good mind to waken this fair one, to see whether her eyes were as fair as he immagined them; but fearing to procure her hatred, if he should affright her when she waked, and found her with a man in that place, he durst not attempt, but bethought himself of a more respective and gallant a course. For having in his Pocket by chance the case of a Picture, much more rich and handsome then that which Cynesia had tied about her Arm, he went softly towards the fair one, and kneeling down, he untied the black Ribband about her arm extreamly nimble, and tying his own case in lieu of that which Cynesia wore, he never awaked Cynesia. But I forgot to tell you, that this Case which Artaxander tied upon Cynesias Arm, was made to put Parthenias Picture in; and ever since he had sent her back the Picture he wore the empty Case: So as having a Silver Pen and Ink about him, and having a quick fancy, he writ these four Verses within the Case, before he tyed it unto Cynesias Arm.

Such Mysteries to discover,
As you my Love know may
And yet not know the Lover.

He had no sooner written these four Lines in the Case and had tyed it unto her fair Arm, but he heard some coming up the stairs. So as fear lest he should wake this fair one he went haltily to the place where he heard the noise, and went so gently as he did not awake Cynesia. He was no sooner at the stairs top, but he met his friend, whose adventure was much different from his; for in lieu of finding a great beauty in his bed he had found the Mother of Cynesia, whom time and age had withred into extream uglines. Yet he knowing her, because the Moon shined as light as day in the Chamber, he made a gentle retreat without any disturbance to her rest, and came to his friend: So as meeting upon the stairs top, and relating to each other their several adventures, Artaxander whose sleeping beauty had weakened his spirits, he intreated his friend to go out again with him; they commanded the Porter to speak not a word of their returning, went to lye both together at a friends house. And Philiontes finding it a pleasant conceit, that Cynesia should not know how her Picture Case came to be exchanged, he consented unto his friends Proposition. And so all was done as Artaxander desired, for they went out of the house; they charmed the Port for speaking of their return out of the Country, and went to lye all night at the house of a Cousin unto Philiontes. But to the end, they should not go to their own house until night, they sent to meet their men who were to come by Land, commanding them not to come to Town till the latter end of the day, and charging them to keep it secret, that they came by Water; but on the contrary to say that they came by Land and with them.

But the most pleasant part of all the adventure was, that Artaxander having slept sufficiently in the Boat, and being very fresh and lively, he fell into discourse with Philiontes concerning his sleeping beauty, and to ask a hundred several Questions. For Heavens sake (said he unto him) do not hinder me from loving her; and you cannot do me a better Office any way in the World, then to contribute something which will make me in love: But to tell you truly, I would not have this fair one of Pasithea's humour but would have Pasithea with all her jollities so vexed to see me captivated by another, as she shall grieve more for it then for Philocrates. I assure you friend (replied Philiontes) you have found out any excellent expedient for it: For first all fair ones in generall cannot indure to lose their servants, and Pasithea in particular will be vexed no the Soul if you should love Cynesia. Moreover, be assured that this fair one is of a far different temper from the other; for her temper is melancholy, though she be very pleasant in Company, and hath a most merry Ayr with her: But withal, she is sometimes a little fantastical. Yet having a Passionate Soul and a tender heart, her capricious fancies never last long. Oh my friend (said Artaxander) this is enough; for Cynesia being fair, witty, pleasing, melancholy, and a little fantastical, I shall hope even out of variety onely, for a thousand delights in loving her; but you do not love her yet (said Philiontes and laughed) Truly friend (replied Artaxander) though I do not yet, yet I shall do ere long, and did I but once see her eyes open, I should not doubt but to be in love with her: However (added he) I am ingaged to be so, since I told her as much by the Verses which I writ in the Case that I exchanged with her; and therefore though I should not be in love with her, yet I must seem so a while. But if you be not in love with Cynesia said Philiontes) and she keeping your Picture Case, your gallantry will cost you somewhat dear: If she keep it (replied Artaxander) she will do me such a favour as will make me in love, for I must tell you that favours and beauty have a strong influence upon me. But how can she know (replied Philiontes) that it was you who made the exchange? she may easily guess it (replied he) for I intend this evening to wear the Case which I took from her in such a place as she cannot chuse but see it. In saying so, Artaxander took the Case out of his Pocket which yet he had not opened, because his mind was wholly taken up with this adventure. But he was astonished, when at the opening he saw the very same Picture of Pasithea which he had sent her back, when he quarrelled with her. At the first he believed that these two Ladies were friends, unknown to him; and that Pasithea had sent Cynesia her Picture whilst he was in the Country, but he was not long in this belief, for Philiontes told him that they were enemies; so as not knowing what to think upon the adventure, he was extreamly perplexed. For my part, (said Philiontes unto him) I am apt to believe that Pasithea being of no reserved humour, she hath giving this Picture unto some new Gallant that hath sacrificed it unto Cynesia. But if that be so (said Artaxander) it must be concluded that Cynesia hath some Lover whom she doth not hate; for those who take such pledges do ingage themselves as much as they think to ingage others. What you say (replied Philiontes) perhaps is but imagination, which I will think to be but upon an ill foundation; for since you are resolved to be in love, at what rate soever, I must take heed of telling you any thing which may hinder you. The truth is (replied Artaxander) love is an excellent Antidote against wearisomeness, in a place where one hath nothing to do; for there the sending of a common Message, or the receiving of one, doth pass for a whole daies work; if you be in love, you will have no sooner done one thing, but you will be thinking upon another; your own very musings will please you; and nothing doth so sweetly take up the spirits of a gallant love; as for great and violent passions, they possess them over much. For my part (said Philiontes) I conceive one should either not be in love at all, or else love in good earnest; for certainly the greatest Passions procure the greatest pleasures. It is true (said Artaxander) but withall, they bring with them the greatest sorrows: I must confess it (answered Philiontes) but I am of such an humour, as I would have all or none: I value not those slight affections, which require as much pains about them, as a high Passion; they will take you up as much time, but will not recompence the labour. For a thousand of these half loves will never be able to conquer a whole heart; and therefore if you will be ruled by me, either love not Cynesia at all, or else love her in the hight. So I am resolved (replied Artaxander) though it were onely to be revenged upon Pasithea for caring so little to lose me, and bestowing her Picture so quickly upon another, as it is very likely she hath. But whilst Artaxander and Philiontes were thus talking, the fair Cynesia slept soundly, and it may be well said, that by her sound sleeping, she prepared new Arms for the Conquest of Artaxander. For when she awaked, her complexion was more fresh, and her eyes more sprightly. But in awaking, she was all wonder to see a Case about her Arm all set with shining Diamonds in lieu of her own, and which was incomparably more rich; she no sooner saw this surprizing change but she blusht; and raysing her self upon her bed, she held her Arm out to the light, as if she had been mistaken; but the more she looked upon this Case, the more sure she was that some came into the Chamber whilst she was asleep, and did imagine it to be a man, thinking such a kind of gallantry could not proceed from any Woman. So as a resentment of of modesty, did for a while raise some inquietudes in her mind. Yet upon second thoughts of the adventure, she concluded, that he who made that advantagious exchange, had a noble heart, so as she hath since confessed, that she was then fuller of curiosity then care. Her greater wonder was that she knew there was not any Man in the house but only Philiontes Father, who being very old, could not be suspected of such a thing.

She knew very well that he had a Son, for she was acquainted with Philiontes. And she was not ignorant that Artaxander also had lodged in the house, for though she knew him not yet she had heard talk of him. But she could not dream of them, because she heard say, that they were in the Countrey, and no speech of their return. As she was in this amaze a particular Friend of hers whose name was Cleophila, came in to see her, and to rejoyce with her that the fire in her Mothers house had done no greater hurt. But as soon as she saw her, and saw her so fair: Oh Cynesia (said she unto her) it appears by your eyes that you have rested very well, for all the trouble of the night: But for my part, had I been in such a fright, I should have hid my self all the day after. For my complexion would have been so dull, my eyes so hollow, and my heart so faint, that I should have swounded with fear; yet I see that you had not the least fear of being burned. It is true (said Cynesia) I have slept as soundly this night, as if no accident had happened, or as if I had not changed my Bed. And to make it appear true, I will tell you of the strangest piece of gallantry, that ever you heard of: After this, Cynesia told Cleophila all the passage, and that she might better see the Case, she held out her Arm, entreating her friend to untie the Ribbond. Cleophila had no sooner untied it, but Cynesia opened it; but she was extreamly surprised at the sight of those Verses which Artaxander had written, and so much, as that she could not read them aloud, but first read them to her self, and then recited them unto Cleophila in this manner.

Such Mysteries to discover,
As you my Love know may,
And yet not know the Lover.

Afterwards, she looked upon Cleophila, who was not less surprised then she: And upon serious consideration, Cleophila concluded, that it must of necessity be Artaxander. Not that I can discover it by his stile in Verse (said she) for he useth to write much better; but since they were doubtless writ upon a sudden, they may very well be his; for I have known sometimes when ex tempore he hath writ no better; and therefore I will conclude that it was Artaxander who is the Authour: That it was he who saw you asleep, and that it is he who is in love with you. But Artaxander is in the Countrey (replied Cynesia) Artaxander then is in more places then one (replied Cleophila) for I tell you it can be none but he: And I must tell you that to conquer such a heart as his sleeping is no small glory to you. Alas (replied Cynesia) as for his heart I cannot pretend unto it, for hearts are never taken sleeping. I do assure you (replied Cleophila) that though you had fewer charms then you have, yet Artaxander loves you. For this beginning of acquaintance and adventure, is in such a pleasant way, as I make no question but he will answer it as pleasingly. It vexeth me exceedingly (said Cynesia then) that he who writ those Verses, hath left me such a Box as I will not keep; and the worst is, that the Picture of Pasithea is in it which he took from me. So as those who know not how the case stands, but are ignorant that she and I are enemies, will think that I have shewed it out of malice; for as the case is between us, they cannot imagine she would give me her Picture. How? (said Cleophila) had you Pasithea's Picture? and was it in the Case which is taken from you? Yes (replied she) and that is it which most troubles me, for I cannot endure to be suspected of being guilty of any malice: But I beseech you (replied she) how came you to that Picture? Ah Cleophila! (answered Cynesia) I shall blush to tell you; yet know it I must (replied she) if ever you will know any thing of me. Since you will know it (replied Cynesia) I will tell it in two words. So I know it (said Cleophila) I care not whether it be in two, or a thousand words; but lest we should be interrupted, I pray tell me quickly. You know (replied Cynesia) that Clidamis hath a long time born a little good will unto me; and you know also, that all the World has laid it in his dish, that he hath been an unfortunate Lover all his life long. 'Tis true, (answered Cleophila) for Clidamis had been in love with above a hundred Women, and not one of them ever loved him: and yet he is handsome, and has wit and spirit enough: yet I thought that his misfortune would have ended in you, and that you were no hater of him: for I know he has been often with you in the Country. 'Tis true, replied Cynesia, but it is as true also, that the more I saw him, the less I loved him: And in my opinion, the reason why Clidamis makes no better progress in his loves, is, because whosoever sees him one day shall see him eternally the very same: he is always equally handsome; always equally civil and respectful; he will never love you more nor less; nor never hath any spirit and wit more one day then another. So as I believe people are so accustomed to see him always the same, as their opinion of him is also always the same, and he shall be no better loved at the end of the thousand visits then he was at the first.

But be what he will be (added she) that's no matter, and to return from whence I digressed, know, that Clidamis one day being extreamly earnest with me to tell him why I did not love him, I answered again, that the reason was, because I knew that he was never loved by any. The truth is (Clidamis (said I unto him) though I would, yet I dare not love you: for after all your baffles in matter of love: I should be ashamed to be more indulgent then any other unto you: and I am so addicted to do as others do, that I never was the inventer of any fashion: you may imagine then, that I who will not so much as wear a Ribbond which others do not, will never give my heart to an unfortunate Lover, unto whom never any gave any heart unto: And therefore if ever you would have me love you, you must first make your self loved by some other; that having an example to follow, I may the more easily be perswaded to follow: But Madam (said he unto me) should I court another to love me, I should seem as if I did not love you. Seem what you will (said I unto him) but I assure you I shall never never love you unless some do first begin, and unless all the World do know it. I believe Madam, said he unto me, that all this is but ingenious rallery; for you being perswaded that I cannot love any but you, and that none will ever love me unless I love them, and therefore it will be very difficult for me to procure that example which you require; and though I should procure such an example, yet you would not follow it. Seriously Sir, said I unto him and laughed, I believe I should love you more then I do, if any else had loved you. We'le see that Madam (said he unto me) for I will go immediately unto Crete, with a full resolution to try whether I can make any beauty love me, upon condition you will not take it ill, if I do dissemble with her in seeming to love her. Since my aim was only to be rid of Clidamis, and believing that he would not be loved in the future more then in time past. I told him that I consented unto the condition. So he left me in the Countrey, and went to Crete, just as Artaxander broke off with Pasithea, because she did not lament the death of Philocrates. As chance would have it Clidamis heard of the difference between them, and hearing of Pasithea's humour, he applied himself to her; and he found her heart so inclinable to him, as either to be revenged of Artaxander, in letting him see she could as readily forget him living, as Philocrates dead, or for some other cause, she received him very well; she gave him her Picture, which he sent unto me yesterday, summoning me to keep my word, and assuring me that Pasithea loved him, and that he still loved me. As chance was, I tied this Picture to my Arm, intending to restore it unto Clidamis the next time I saw him, and so it chanced that it was taken from me in manner as I told you.

I profess, replied Cleophila, it is a most excellent adventure: for if Artaxander have this Picture, as I am confident he hath, it will amaze him to think how you should come by it: for it is not possible he should be ignorant of the enmity between you and Pasithea: Also the Adventure may be more pleasant yet: for if Pasithea be drawn with a garland of flowers upon her head, very likely it is the same Picture which she gave him, and which he restored back to her. At least I am sure, the Limner told me that he did draw Pasithea's Picture after the same manner.

I assure you (said Cynesia) the Picture is so drawn, so as if it be Artaxander who took it from me, he will wonder extreamly, to see a Picture which was once his in my hands. However it be (said Cleophila) I am confident you would not be sorry to see Artaxander your Captive. So as it would spite Pasithea (replied she) I must confess I should not be very sorry. Truly, replied Cleophila, though it should spite no body, you could not be sorry, for Artaxander is so brave a Man, as that to conquer such a heart must needs rejoyce one. But I beseech you (said Cynesia) let us talk no more of Artaxander, for perhaps it was not he who came into my Chamber: and though it were, yet perhaps my eyes when he sees them will blast the adventure. Your eyes are so lovely (replied Cleophila) as you may assure your self that though the heart of him who saw them sleeping, was not captivated, yet waking, he will be. However since it is very likely, that you will see him this day, who saw you in the night, I advise you to dress up your self as handsomely as you can.

As Cleophila spoke this smilingly, Cynesia smiled also: And as I have been told since, did dress her self with a little more design of being handsome, then if her aim had been only a general design to please every one. But being not at home, as soon as her Mother and she were ready, they returned thanks for their entertainment, and went to their own house. Yet Cynesia did not shew her Mother the Picture Case which Artaxander had left in lieu of her own, lest the adventure should become too publick. Cynesia was most perplexed to think what she should say unto Clidamis, who she imagined would come to see her; for she could not restore Pasithea's Picture unto him. Nor would she have him think that she kept it as a sign of her love. So as to gain time, upon a pretence of setting their house in order after that tumult of fire, she desired her Mother to pass away that afternoon at a friends house, and not to stay in her Chamber to receive all the visits which would be made after that accident. So as by this means Cynesia was not at home until night, and so Clidamis would lose his labour, if he came. Mean time, Artaxander and Philiontes being advertized that their Men were at the Gates of the Town, they went through a back lane to meet them and croslng over a great plain, it chanced that they passed just before the Gates of that Ladies house, where Cynesia, her Mother and Cleophila did pass away the day: So as these three Ladies came out, at the very same time when Artaxander and Philiontes passed by in their Countrey habits, as Men newly come to Town: Cleophila was much surprized at this; For all she spoke unto her Friend, was only her imagination, yet she shewed her Artaxander, who took no notice of these Ladies no more then Philiontes, because they were talking together very earnestly: So as they being on Horse-back, and the Ladies on Foot, they lost the sight of them: for since it was not far from home they were entred in, before they could come to the door. However, since Cleophila was full of curiosity to know the truth of this adventure, and since the arrival of Artaxander did much perplex her, she got Cynesia to entreat her Mother, to desire Cleophila, that she would lie that night at her house. And indeed so it was. These Ladies had no sooner supped, but Clidamis with other Ladies of the Neighbour-hood came to visit Cynesia and her Mother: And all were no sooner set, but Philiontes and Artaxander entred. The first of these presented his friend unto the Mother and the Daughter, as a stranger which their Town had gotten during their absence. Philiontes spoke so highly of Artaxander unto these two, that they received him very civilly. But Cynesia was strangely amazed, to see the Picture Case which was taken from her, tyed with a lively coloured Ribbond, and worn by Artaxander in such a place as was most obvious to the eye of Cynesia. But as she was amazed at the sight of it, so Clidamis was much more; for he could not imagine by what adventure, this Case which he had sent unto Cynesia, could come into the hands of Artaxander whom she never saw before, but was presented unto her as a Man absolutely unknown unto her. However Cynesia could not doubt but that it was Artaxander who came into her chamber when she was asleep, & therefore out of modesty could not chuse but blush; but to hide it, she began to talk with Cleophila in a low voice, who being very glad that she had guessed aright, begun to ask her a merry manner how she liked her new Lover? I am so perplexed at the perplexity of Clidamis (replied she) as I have not leisure to answer your foolish question. Why, said Cleophila, you need not perplex your self about Clidamis; for since he knows that you are a stranger unto Artaxander, he cannot think you to have any hand in this pleasant adventure. After this every one taking their places, Artaxander did so well order the matter, as that he sate next Cynesia, and talked with her, so as Clidamis could not hear what he said; for Philira the Mother of Cynesia having set her self to relate unto him the accident of fire which happened, and being extreme earnest in telling how frighted she was, he was almost all the night taken up with hearing, and could not put in a word to interrupt her; for she was an eternal talker, and would never give over her tale as long as she had any breath. But whilst poor Clidamis was hearkning to her much against his will, and whilst all the rest of the Ladies were hearkning also, Philiates talked with Cleophila, and Artaxander with Cynesia, whose intention being earnest to restore the rich Case unto Artaxander which he had left with her, and to get back that which he had, that she might restore it unto Clidamis, she was very glad of the opportunity of talking in private with him; hoping to find a fit occasion for compassing her ends; yet it was not so easie as she imagined; for Artaxander turning the talk another way she could not bring it about, and he according to his ordinary jollity, began to chide her for being so long in the Country, as familiarly as if he had been her most intimate and ancient friend, and he made the most pleasant and satyrical invective against a Countrey life that ever was heard. But (said Cynesia unto him) why should you complain against me? for you knew me not yesterday, and hardly know me to day. That's the reason, Madam, why I complain (replied he) for if I had had the honour to have known you sooner, I should never have had the shame of bearing any other chains but yours, and perhaps by this time, I should have had the glory of getting some place in your heart. But, Madam, that you may not think me one of those common flatterers, who use to talk, and often knows not to whom, I beseech you give me leave to tell you, that you are not so unknown to me as you imagine; and that within these eighteen hours I did admire you, and something more. But first (added he, and looked earnestly upon her) give me leave to rejoyce that I find your eyes more lovely than I did imagine them; though I must tell you, I did imagine them to be the fairest in the World; and certainly I had great reason for it; for it was nothing likely that the gods should bestow upon you so many several excellent beauties, and not give you fair eyes also. And I assure you, most charming Cynesia, as soon as ever my good fate brought me to the place where I saw the most lovely sleeper that ever eye beheld; I presently conceived you to have the most dangerous and captivating eyes in the World. Oh I beseech you Artaxander (said she and turned away her head) do not make me blush. Oh I beseech you Madam (replied he) think your self beholding to me for staying so long as eighteen hours before I would see your lovely eyes; and as great as my desire was to see them, for being so respective as not to waken you. The truth is (replied Cynesia, and blushed) your boldness made me more ashamed then ever I was in my life. Ah Madam (said Artaxander) I was happy then, but not bold; and if you will be so good as to pardon my boldness, in telling you that in all likelihood I shall be extreamly in love with you, I shall acquaint you with the whole adventure. Since I am of opinion (replied she) that there is not so much power in me as to make any in love, I cannot easily believe you have any inclination that way: but I will confess, I would forgive you any thing, upon condition you will ingenuously tell me what made you so liberal when you plaid the thief; yet I must declare unto you before-hand, that the Picture Case which you took from me was none of mine, and that which you left in lieu of it shall never be. I assure you, Madam (replied Artaxander) I know not any thing you have of mine but my heart, which I beseech you seriously not to restore; for I am confident it can never be in better, or more fair hands. However it be (said she) tell me by what enchantment this adventure came about? You phrase it right, Madam (replied he) in calling it an enchantment: for since the time that Cupid was in his Cradle, never any fell in love so until now. I pray (replied Cynesia) let Cupid alone with his Mother, and only acquaint me with the accident. So Artaxander began to make her a faithful relation of the whole passage, and so happily for himself, and pleasingly unto Cynesia, as she took some delight in it: yet she always interrupted him, when he told her how fair he thought her. It is enough Artaxander (said she) it is enough; for I desire to know no more then so much as will justifie you; and to make it appear that I am not unjust, I am contented to treat you as an innocent person, and will think my self obliged unto you. Though it would be most glorious unto me to be obliged unto you, Madam, (replied he) and more then for you to be obliged unto me; yet I must assure you that there is nothing in the World which I would not do for your service. If so, said she, then I pray restore unto me the Picture and the Case which you have, and I will restore that which I have unopened; for as I told you before, that which you have is none of mine, and that which I have of yours shall never be. As for the Picture which is in the Case I took from you, Madam (replied he) I shall without much difficulty restore, since it has not the honour to be yours, but upon this condition, that you will tell me whose it is; for I should be very glad to know unto whom Pasithea gave it. But Madam, as for the other Case which you have, since you say you did not open it, I beseech you do; and know that what is written within it, is more true now then when it was written. Did I not know Artaxander any other way (replied Cynesia) I should think him to be all Rallery; but since I do know his humour, I will make a better Interpretation of him; and to testifie it (added she) I will trust my self with you, and confess that the Picture of Pasithea, belongs unto Clidamis. How, Madam? replied Artaxander, is Clidamis my successor? thanks be to the Heavens he shall never be my Rival, unless he be in love with you. You speak with so little seriousness (replied Cynesia and smiled) as I hardly know whether I did well in trusting you with a confidence of this Nature. However, since divers reasons make me desirous to let Clidamis have his Picture again, and to keep him ignorant by what strange accident you come to have it, I entreat you if he talk with you, to tell him, that upon your return you found it upon the Table in your Chamber, where I had forgotten it I will tell him as much, Madam, replyed Artaxander, provided you will likewise tell me, why Clidamis did put this Picture into your fair hands; for he can't be ignorant that you and Pasithea hold no correspondencie of friendship, and so if he be in love with Pasithea, he is very unwise to trust you with her Picture. We have been so small a time acquainted (replyed she) that I were out of my wits if I should tell you all you ask. Then Madam (replyed he) you have driven me out of my wits; for though I have known you as little as you have me, yet I am ready to trust you with all the secrets of my heart and soul. But to return unto Clidamis (added he) I perceived that he looked upon me from time to time with much curiositie; and he look'd upon after such a manner, as moved to think that if he were my successor in the heart of Pasithea, he might perhaps also be my Rival in the heart of Cyneſia. As Artaxander said so, Cleophila, who had gotten Philiontes to tell her all the adventure of the night before she came unto them; and Philiontes joyning also, the discourse between these four persons was very pleasant. For my part (said Artaxander) I am more then ever perswaded of the infallibility of Destiny; for if Fate had ordered, that the fair Cyneſia had layn in Philiontes his Chamber, then perhaps it would have been he who should have faln in love with her, and not I. For heavens sake (said Cyneſia pleasantly, and interrupted him) do not think your self engaged to say you love me, because you have told it me in four verses; and least you should (added she, and offered him the case) I pray take it again. But, Madam (said he unto her) you said even now you did not open it. 'Tis true (said she) but as I am willing to pardon all the flattering untruths which you told me, in talking with you, so you may very well pardon me this. Oh Madam, replyed he, I will pardon you with all my heart; provided you will believe I cannot flatter when I speak of you. After this Cyneſia still demanding the Case which he took, and offering to restore his, he told her that he could not do that all in one day, but beseeches her to stay the restitution of that which he had from him, untill he had so far advanced himself into her favour, as to obtain her Picture: And indeed, do what Cyneſia could, she could not make him take it that day, but was contended with his restoring that which belonged unto Clidamis, who was so astonished to see such private discourse betwixt Artaxander and Cyneſia, that he knew not what to think upon it. But it bring late, the company parted; and Cyneſia being desirous that Clidamis should not be too much troubled at this adventure, she entreated him to wait upon Cleophila home; and that Lady undertook to restore the Picture and Case unto him, and to tell him (as it was contrived) that Artaxander found it by chance upon the Table in his Chamber; and that he need not trouble himself about it, because Cyneſia never told Artaxander that the Picture was his.

As for Artaxander, he found Cyneſia more charming awake then asleep, and returned home with his friend with a strong disposition to love her: And indeed he did easily apprehend this growing passion; for though it was never wont to break his rest, yet now he slept not a wink all that night; for when he fancied himself in the same Chamber where he had seen Cyneſia, and in the same bed where he saw that fair one asleep, his imagination did so perfectly represent her, as he could not possibly rest although he had some pleasing slumbers. On the other side, Cyneſia hearing that Artaxander was never hated by any, she thought him more amiable then Clidamis who was hated by all; and she was nothing sorry, that she had gotten this new acquaintance. But since she was resolved not to keep his case, she sent it unto him the next morning; and so handsomly that he could not chuse but receive it; for she caused it to be left with one of his servants for him, the servant not knowing what, or from whom it was: And Cyneſia being a person unto whom such presents were not to be presented: he durst not any further importune her to keep it. This his gallantry passed for a noble piece of Liberality, and cost him nothing; but to speak the truth it cost him something that was dearer to him then the Case; for had he never seen Cyneſia, he had not lost his heart and his liberty; yet at the first, he was not sensible of his misery, but on the contrary he thought himself so happy in this affection which was growing in his heart, as he could not hide the joyes which she had. Moreover his thoughts of revenge upon Pasithea, did kindle in him much satisfaction; for he had such a hatred unto the follies of that Lady, as made him consider that if Cyneſia did not make him quite forget her, it was not impossible but he might renew again with her. On the other side, Pasithea who never looked for any thing in love but what would divert her, and who thought that Clidamis did love her, she valued not the loss of Artaxander, though every hour in the day did allow her one minute of sorrow for it, because she could not meet with any who could divert her as well as he. As for Clidamis, he was in a most miserable condition; for he was not loved by her whom he did love, and was loved by one whom he did not love. Thus did he receive all the favours which love could confer upon a lover, and yet was not happy. Also he was sensible of all those sorrows which that passion could inflict upon a lover; for he was loved where he would not be, and not loved where he would: He was jealous, and knew not directly the cause: The new acquaintance of Artaxander did fret his heart; he was vexed that Pasithea's Picture had been in his hands: he knew not whether he should cease counterfeiting love, or whether he should seem to cease loving Cyneſia, and see whether she would recall him: And indeed his perplexity could not be greater. As for Cyneſia, she also had some secret disgust of heart, yet since those disgusts were not very disagreeable she was not much disquieted: But for Artaxander, he was so glad at his being in love, as not being able to hide his joyes, he shewed it unto Cyneſia within the space of five dayes, from his first acquaintance, And being alone with her he began to give most humble and hearty thanks, and that with such earnest expressings, as she did really believe that she had either said or done, something which had obliged him, though she could not remember it. And she began to rub up her memory, and find out the reason why he should so emphatically expresse his gratitude: Upon a recollection of all her thoughts, she could find nothing, unless it were that she having spoken much good of him unto some she had conversed withall, he might come to the knowledge of it. Yet not thinking this cause enough to oblige unto so many thanks, she asked him, what

ſhe had done for him to deſerve them? At the firſt he would not tell her; for truly, Madam (ſaid he unto her) I am afraid leſt you ſhould repent of your goodneſs unto me, and leſt that repentance ſhould leſſen my joyes, if I ſhould tell you. It is not my cuſtome (replied ſhe) to repent of any thing done that may pleaſe ſuch men as I eſteem; and I aſſure you, the principal reaſon why I am ſo deſirous to know what it is, is onely to the end, that I may do the ſame again.

Oh Madam (ſaid Artaxander) then I muſt tell you what it is you have done for me, not becauſe it will oblige you to do it again; for you cannot chuſe but do it whether you will or no, you will do it as long as you live, and the thing which you will do is abſolutely the moſt pleaſing thing in the World unto me. For Heavens ſake Artaxander (ſaid Cyneſia then) tell me what it is I have done which ſo much pleaſeth you, and which I cannot chuſe but do again? You have made me in love, Madam (replied he) and in ſo doing you have done me the greateſt pleaſure in the World, you have delivered me from a moſt drowſie idleneſs, and I thank you heartily for it, for otherwiſe I know not what I ſhould have done in Creet: Thus, Madam (added he, and would not give her time to anſwer) you have infinitely obliged me; for you have rouzed my ſpirits out of a dull ſluggiſhneſs of mind, which is the moſt unſupportable thing in the World. Though I ſhould grant, I have cauſed you to be in love (replied ſhe) yet I cannot confeſs that you ow me any thanks: For (added ſhe and ſmiled) unleſs you were ſure of a favourable reception, I cannot ſee you have any reaſon for your thanks, which I am ſure you cannot know, becauſe I know it not my ſelf. Oh Madam (replied he) it is a moſt high happineſs to love you; and love hath ſuch a ſecret and charming influence upon me, as I do prefer all its torments, before all other delights whatſoever; and therefore, though I know not whether you will be ſweet or ſharp unto me, yet I muſt thank you, for making me in love, as much as for the moſt obliging favour you could beſtow upon Artaxander. Though I know very well (replied Cyneſia very ſweetly) that it is not handſome for me to entertain any Lovers, yet I think my ſelf obliged to treat you leſs ſeverely then any other; for ſince you think that to be in love is ſufficient to make you happy: one need not to fear the being too much importuned with your Complaints. I did not ſay, Madam (replied Artaxander) that to be in love is the height of happineſs; but my meaning was, that I ſhould be moſt miſerable if I were not in Love; and that I ſhould be leſs miſerable by being in Love, then by not being ſo.

After this Cyneſia anſwered him with all the modeſty becoming her Sex, but yet without any bitterneſs or incivility; and though ſhe did forbid him any more talk of his Paſſion, yet it was in ſuch a manner, and made him not fear being hated, though he did not obey her. And Artaxander did continue his expreſſion of Love, and ſo often, and handſomely as he perſwaded her to hear him. Artaxander as pleaſant as his humour uſed to be, yet he could be of a very ſerious temper when he would; and he found in Cyneſia all qualities requiſite to pleaſe him: ſuch as expected mirth from her did always find it, they who looked for Melancholy found it in her alſo, for ſhe could ſuit her ſelf unto every humour; moreover, ſhe was exceedingly modeſt, but ſuch a modeſty, as did not muzzle up the ſpirits of men, but allowed the fancy ſo much civil Liberty, as made her Converſation very pleaſing; Sometimes ſhe would have ſome little and delicate fantaſtical quirks which did marvellouſly increaſe love; but theſe fantaſms never appeared unto any but her Lovers, and not at all in common Converſation. The worſt in Cyneſia was, ſhe was extream ſubject unto her own inclinations; and ſo very much, that if ſhe had not been very virtuous, her reaſon could not reſtrain her. However, it is without all queſtion, that Cyneſia was as amiable a perſon, as was in the World; and Artaxander loved her extreamly, who hoping to be loved again by degrees, and deſiring to ſpite Paſithea, did uſe all ſuch indeavours as are expedient to win upon Cyneſia, and to be revenged upon his firſt Miſtreſs. As for Clidamis, Cyneſia did treat him ſo courſely ſince her acquaintance with Artaxander, as he ſought for all occaſions to vex her, ſince he could find none to get her love: And for Paſithea, no malicious ſtratagem was un-invented, and un-ſought after, to ſpite both Artaxander and Cyneſia. But in lieu of ſpiting them ſhe did very much delight them; for Artaxander was very glad to find a greater ſhare in Paſithea's heart then he imagined; and Cyneſia alſo was glad that ſhe had gotten a Slave from that merry fair one. So as joyning all theſe petty circumſtances together, they began a moſt tender, gallant, and publick love between Artaxander and Cyneſia. For Clidamis and Paſithea did watch them ſo circumſpectly, as that they to vex them did publiſh every trivial thing that paſſed between them. They never walked together but it was divulged; they never held any long private diſcourſe but it was told; and Artaxander was generally as well known by the name of Cyneſia's Lover; as by his own, but ſo far from being vexed that he was very glad of it; for Cyneſia being known to be a moſt illuſtrious perſon, her honour was not in any danger; and indeed, ſhe was noble every way, her quality was high, ſhe was admirably fair; ſhe had a moſt ſublime wit, and thoſe who ſaid Artaxander was in love with her, then ſaid alſo that he was not hated.

Things being upon theſe terms, a chance happened which wrought a great change in the heart of Artaxander, who then certainly did love Cyneſia moſt tenderly: But before I directly tell you the cauſe of it, I muſt let you know; that there was a man in Creet whoſe name was Alphidemon, whoſe miſ-fortune was to be eſteemed of none; Yet he was not very unhandſome and to ſpeak truly of him he was not worſe then a thouſand others, of whom people uſe to ſpeak neither well nor ill. His quality was high enough, to excuſe his mediocrity of merit if he had been diſcreet. But however, he was ranked amongſt thoſe who were unpleaſing, even by thoſe who were unpleaſing themſelves, and was not at all eſteemed. Artaxander at his coming to Creet had ſeen him amongſt others, and had rallied with him a hundred times, never thinking he ſhould hereafter have any further intereſt in him. But Artaxander being upon ſuch terms as I told you with Cyneſia, he went to walk one evening in a Garden with Philemes, unto whom he talked concerning the joys he had in loving Cyneſia, and of his hopes of being loved, aggravating the great delight he took in having moved the heart of ſo noble a perſon. After a long time of walking they entred into a green

Arbour,

Arbour, intending to reſt themſelves; but as they entred they found Cephiſia and Paſithea there. At firſts they would have retired as if out of reſpect; but Paſithea being that evening in her merry and malicious humour both, ſhe called unto Artaxander. I pray, Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him) do not ſhun Cephiſia who is your friend, in expectation of your new Miſtreſs. Since I do not love to moleſt the pleaſures of others (replied he and laughed) I would have retired leſt you ſhould expect there my Succeſſor, unto whom I will yield in every thing. I aſſure you (replied ſhe ſharply) it is more honour for you that Clidamis ſhould be your Succeſſor, then for you to be the Succeſſor of Alphidemon: And to be plain with you, it is more advantageous to me, to be upbraid for not loving a brave man, then it is for Cyneſia for loving a man of ſo low a merit: And I think it a greater ſhame for you to ſucceed Alphidemon; then for you not to be loved more then Philocrates was. This diſcourſe did ſo ſurprize Artaxander that he knew not what anſwer to make; for he knew, that ſhe durſt not be ſo bold as to ſpeak thus in the preſence of Cephiſa and Philiontes, if there were not ſome ground of truth for her accuſation which ſhe made againſt Cyneſia. Yet he ſmothered his reſentments and did not appear any thing moved at what ſhe ſaid; Did you know (ſaid he unto her) what advantage I draw from all this you ſpeak againſt Cyneſia and me, you would never have told it; but you would rather give Clidamis a thouſand commendations, then to blame Cyneſia whoſe merit and virtue cannot be blemiſhed.

I ſpeak not concerning the merit of Cyneſia (replied ſhe ſubtilely) for I know it is much, and that's the reaſon I blame her, ſince ſhe loved a man of no merit. As Artaxander was going to anſwer, though he knew not well what to ſay (for I know all his thoughts as well as himſelf) A great company of Ladies with Alphidemon came into this Arbor. As ſoon as they were entred, Alphidemon bolted out ſuch poor expreſſions, as Artaxander was forced out, and went preſently to enquire, whether it was true that Cyneſia who was a perſon ſo full of wit could ever love ſuch a man. As ſoon as he came into a ſolitary walk which was not far off, he looked upon Philiontes who followed him: and beginnnig to ſpeak, I pray Philiontes (ſaid he unto him) deliver me out of this perplexity of mind; and tell me ingeniouſly, whether that which Paſithea ſaid concerning Cyneſia, have any ground of truth in it? For ſince I am but a ſtranger at Creet, I am ignorant in the Hiſtory of it; and therefore I conjure you by our friendſhip to tell me whether Cyneſia ever loved Alphidemon? All I can ſay (replied Philiontes) is, that all the town doth ſay it, and all the world believes it. But Philiontes, how comes it to paſs, replied he ſurlily, that you did not acquaint me with it when I began to be acquainted with Cyneſia? becauſe you did earneſtly entreat me (replied he and laughed) to ſay nothing unto you which might hinder you from loving her, and told, that I was a very bad friend if I did. And to tell you truly, I did not think it fit to acquaint you with a paſt adventure which was not advantagious unto Cyneſia, whom I eſteemed very much, and who is a Lady of infinite merit. And when all is done, though ſhe did love Alphidemon, yet ſhe loves him not now; and ſcandal it ſelf could never ſay there was any criminal affection between them two. Oh Philiontes (ſaid Artaxander) a woman of any wit could never be innocent, if ſhe could love ſuch a man as Alphidemon, though ſhe were as modeſt and chaſt as Diana: And I had much rather be ſucceſſor to a brave man who had obtained ſome conſiderable favours from the perſon I ſhould love, then to be the ſucceſſor of a fool: and truly there is ſomething in this adventure which doth ſo cruelly wound my imagination, as from this very minute, my heart which was ſuch a ſubject unto Cyneſia, begins to revolt. But what does it concern you (replied Philiontes) whom Cyneſia did love, ſo ſhe love you now? It concerns me ſo much (replied he) as I do not think I can love her, any longer, at leaſt I am ſure that having ſuch an opinion as I have of Alphidemon, and ſince Cyneſia hath loved him, and all the world knows it, it is impoſſible ſhe can confeſs any favour which can oblige me, or be honourable unto me: For when I remember all the fond groſſities and fooliſh abſurdities of Alphidemon, and all I have heard ſay of him, and all I have ſeen him do, I am ſo aſhamed to ſucceed him in the heart of Cyneſia, that as charming as ſhe is, ſhe ceaſeth to be ſo unto me, as ſoon as I conſider ſhe could love Alphidemon. Truth is, I ſhall value her heart as a prophane place, wherein I would not raign; nor ſhall I now think her eyes lovely, ſince ſhe has looked favourably upon him: And me thinks ſhe has done me a manifeſt injury in loving me after Alphidemon. I profeſs (replied Philiontes) this is a moſt pleaſant adventure, that after you have broke off with Paſithea, becauſe ſhe did not enough love a brave man, you ſhould break off with Cyneſia; becauſe ſhe did love a fool. Oh Philiontes, replied Artaxander, this laſt adventure is much worſe then the other, for it blaſts both honour and love. For to tell you truly, the hatred of Cyneſia would be more honourable to me then her love, ſince ſhe can beſtow her love where no merit is: and I think that I ſhould ſuffer leſs if Cyneſia had been perfidious to me by dividing her heart with ſome of my Rivals, who were a brave man, then I ſhould in her being faithful unto Alphidemon: And if I can but once cure my ſelf of this Paſſion which I have to her, I will make a vow never to engage my ſelf in love with any other before I am very well informed whom ſhe hath loved: For to be the ſucceſſor of a Fool in matter of affection is the worſt quality upon earth. I think it a leſs ſhame to have a Fool to ones Father then to ſucceed Alphidemon: for I cannot help the one; it is none of his fault; but in the other caſe the fault is all his own; he might have choſen whether or no he would offer his heart; or he might make a retreat after the offering, if he hear that he cannot be loved unleſs he be the Succeſſor of a Fool. But ſince many things are ſpoken which are not true, I will know from the mouth of Cyneſia whether it be ſo; as I did from Paſithea alſo the paſſages betwixt Philocrates and her. So the next morning Artaxander ſought for an opportunity of finding Cyneſia alone; but as ill luck for her was, he could not find it, for ſhe was not within: ſo as Artaxander, going to viſit ſome other of the neighbour-hood in expectation of her return, he heard nothing but ſpeeches very diſadvantagious concerning Alphidemon. One ſaid he was ill-favour'd; others that he was dull; ſome ſaid his wit was but ſhallow; others that he was too rough; other that he was a clown; and every one had ſuch a terrible cry upon him, as made Artaxander extreamly ſorry: For though commonly monly men love to hear faults found in their Rivals, and to hear them ill ſpoken of, yet Artaxander had other reſentments, for he thought that all which was ſpoken in diſadvantage of Alphidemon, did reflect upon him; and that every ill quality which was attributed unto Alphidemon, was ſhameful unto himſelf: ſo as his mind being extreamly incenſed, he went the ſecond time to Cyneſia, and found her alone; for Philira was gone another way and not returned; ſhe received Artaxander with all thoſe joys which ſhe uſed at her firſt ſeeing him: but as for him, he had ſuch anger in his eyes, and a kind of ſullenneſs in his humour as quickly moved Cyneſia to ask the cauſe. So as without pumping for any ſet ſpeech to ſatisfie her deſire, he began to ſpeak: Madam, ſaid he unto her, I do conjure you to be ſincere, and promiſe to anſwer directly and truly to what I ſhall ask. I do promiſe it (replied ſhe and bluſht) for I am confident you will ask me nothing, unto which I may not anſwer. Nay, nay, Madam, ſaid he, do not deceive your ſelf; for the thing which I ſhall ask is of ſuch a nature as it will never be told unleſs you be engaged by oath; and therefore before I ask the Queſtion, I will have you ſwear to tell me truely. If you do well conſider, replied ſhe, the ſtrange manner of your importunity, you may well think that I will not engage my ſelf by oath, for you tell me that you would have me promiſe to tell a thing which I ought not to tell unleſs I be engaged by oath; how can you think then that I ſhould promiſe to tell you that which reaſon forbids me to tell? Think better with your ſelf, and without any oaths or obligations upon me to promiſe any thing, tell me what you would know; and afterwards I will ſee if I can ſatisfie your curioſity or no. Oh Madam, (cryed he out) if you were clearly ingenious, I would promiſe what I deſire: but in telling me nothing, you have told me all, and I have no more to ask you. Artaxander ſpoke all this in ſuch a ſurly and angry manner, that Cyneſia being troubled at it, and knowing that ſhe had done nothing ſince ſhe was acquainted with Artaxander which could anger him, ſhe promiſed to tell him truely whatſoever he ſhould ask her. Then I conjure you Madam (ſaid he unto her to tell me ingenuouſly whether you ever loved Alphidemon? Alphidemon (replied ſhe and bluſht) was of my acquaintance ſo young, as it may well be ſaid, we began to ſee light, and be acquainted both together. The matter is not, replied he, when you began your acquaintance; but to know whether you loved him or no: what cauſed you to love him; how it came to paſs you loved him no longer? and what reaſons did induce you to change your mind? you ask me theſe Queſtions with ſuch an arrogant tone, replied ſhe, and they are ſo troubleſome to be anſwered, as if I were not exceedingly indulgent towards you, I ſhould not anſwer them at all: but ſince perhaps you may think I conceal'd ſome crimes if I do not ſatisfie your curioſitie, therefore I will ingenioully anſwer to your demands, and tell you that as ſoon as ever I began to open my eyes, I began to be acquainted with Alphidemon; and I will confeſs that from the very firſt dawning of my days, I had a ſtrong inclination towards him and permitted him to love me. And that you may ſee my great confidence in your diſcretion, I will confeſs farther, that the continuance and aſſiduity of his courtſhips, joyned with my own inclination, brought me at laſt to love him; and ſhould have ſtill loved him, had he not been guilty of ſuch a lightneſs as damped my ſpirit, and obliged me to break off with him. And the truth is, though I well enough knew Alphidemon to be a man of no great reputation in the world; yet ſhould I have continued faithful unto him, had he been ſo to me. For I muſt in my own juſtification tell you, that the world doth much wrong Alphidemon; and that he is much more amiable, then is beleeved, to one he loves; being certainly very ſweet, and complacential. Oh Madam (ſaid Artaxander) Alphidemon is leſs amiable towards thoſe he loves then towards thoſe he loves not, becauſe he ſees them oſteneſt; but certainly he is not leſs amiable towards thoſe of whom he is loved; and that's the reaſon you find him not ſo diſagreeable as all the world doth. As I have already confeſſed, that I bore affection to him (replied ſhe) ſo I muſt with the ſame ingenuity tell you, that I do not love him. I would willingly believe it, Madam (replied he) but that you did love him, is enough to make me the moſt miſerable of all men: And ſuch is my mind, as I ſhould think my ſelf much leſs miſerable, if you had loved one who was worthyer of you then I am, to know that you loved the worſt, and moſt unworthy of all the lovers you ever had. I muſt confeſs, Madam, I wonder how it was poſſible I ſhould win any thing upon your heart, ſince Alphidemon did; for I am nothing like him, my making is not like his; I do nothing that he does, I ſpeak not like him, nor are my thoughts the ſame with his; and indeed I know no two greater contraries then Alphidemon and Artaxander. How was it poſſible he ſhould pleaſe you and I too? How could you love him and me likewiſe? I wonder that the man whom of all the world I moſt deſpiſe, ſhould be the man whom you the moſt of all eſteem. As for that, I ſhall give you ſatisfaction (ſaid ſhe) by explaning the affection which I had unto Alphidemon, and the affection I bear unto you; for I loved him by inclination only and you by inclination and knowledge. Oh Madam (ſaid he unto her) blot out your inclination to me, for I will have nothing in common with Alphidemon.

I will blot you out of my heart alſo (replyed Cyneſia ſharply, being angry at Artaxanders ſurly tone) for men may render themſelves unworthy as well by phantaſticalneſs, as by want of merit. When I began to love you Madam (replyed Artaxander) I gave you moſt hearty thanks for making me in love, as for a very great favour: But ſince I underſtand you have loved Alphidemon I muſt confeſs Madam, that if you ſhould take me out of love again, I ſhould thank you much more; for I know nothing more cruel then to be ſucceſſor unto Alphidemon. Since certainly Madam, this happy Alphidemon could never have won upon your heart but by telling you a thouſand ſimple and ridiculous fooleries, and as many impertinencies, and by doing the ſame things before you, which have made all the Town deſpiſe him. Judge Madam, I beſeech you, what honour it will be unto me to make the ſame conqueſt he did? Cyneſia being much offended at Artaxander, though ſhe could not give one good reaſon to excuſe her affection unto Alphidemon, yet they quarrelled untill the return of Philira who turned the diſcourſe. At his going from thence he went unto Cephiſa, who as I told you, bore ſuch good will unto Artaxander as was likely to grow over tender, if ſhe had not ſtriven againſt that growing inclination: So as when Artaxander, who loved her very well, did relate unto her the ſquabbles 'twixt him and his Miſtreſs: But firſt, ſince ſhe had not ſeen Artaxander, ſince Paſithea in her preſence had vexed him by calling him the ſucceſſor of Alphidemon, ſhe no ſooner ſaw him come into her Chamber where ſhe was alone, but beginning to ſmile, Artaxander (ſaid ſhe) you are very much obliged to me; for though that which Paſithea ſaid unto you before me, was enough to make any one laugh, yet I did not laugh at all; but on the contrary, I did chide her for what ſhe had ſaid, and almoſt fell out with her in your behalf. I do confeſs my ſelf obliged unto you (replied Artaxander) and ſhould be much more, if you could make me out of love with Cyneſia. Oh Artaxander, replied Cephiſa, you do not conſider what you ſay. I conſider but too much (anſwered he) for the more I conſider, the more I find it a ſhame to be the ſucceſſor of Alphidemon: And I am ſo weary of my two laſt adventures, as I am almoſt reſolved to alter my courſe of life. Indeed (purſued he) if you will give me leave to love you with ſuch a tender amity as ſhall be a medium between love and common amity, and will endure I ſhould turn weather cock, and relate unto you all my follies, I will abſolutely renounce all thoſe high paſſions which they ſay do only afford great delights: For my part (ſaid Cephiſa) I am willing to accept of your offer, but to tell you truly I do not think you are able to do as you ſay. I am not indeed (replied he) but in all likelyhood I ſhall be ere long; for I aſſure you I cannot find either pleaſure or honour in Paſithea's love, ſince ſhe could not love a man of much merit long enough. Neither can I endure Cyneſia's love, ſince ſhe could love a man unworthy of her affection; and to tell you truly, the affection of a woman to a fool cannot be innocent: It is men of wit, ingenuity, and gallantry, who can only deviſe a thouſand innocent delights to entertain their Miſtreſs, between the time of their firſt being in love and the time of conſummation. As for a fool lover, as ſoon as ever he has groſly told his Miſtreſs that he loves her, he tels brutiſhly that he preſently expects a recompence of his love, and if he find it not preſently, two to one but he caſts off his Miſtreſs. Truly Artaxander (ſaid Cephiſa) me thinks you go a little too far; for Cyneſia is virtuous. I think ſhe is, when I think well upon it (replied Artaxander) but when I do not, I ſometimes doubt it; for what can a man of ingenuity ſay unto ſuch a man as Alphidemon? and what innocent delights can you imagine from a lover that hath no ſmack of gallantry in him? Never ask what delights one can find in love (replied Cephiſa) for love brings its delights with it: and as ſoon as a heart is poſſeſt with this paſſion, the mind is alſo prepoſſeſſed: it cannot ſee things as they are, but ſees them only as love will have them: So Cyneſia, being very young, and having a ſtrong inclination to Alphidemon, love will not let her reaſon ſee his faults; not but that I do condemn her; for I cannot indure one ſhould love that which is not amiable. 'Tis true (replied Artaxander) and if one will love, let them love where they may have reſt, and not as I did; though I can ſay to my comfort, that any other then my ſelf might have been catched; but how could I gueſs, that thoſe things which do afflict me, ſhould have done ſo: My fears alſo at the beginning of my love to Cyneſia, were wrong placed; for I feared her wit would have been too delicate and high, that ſhe would have thought me a Man not ſufficiently accompliſhed; that my Gallantry would have ſeemed to her of too merry a ſtrain, and that ſhe would be inſenſible of my paſſion; but the truth is, I feared thoſe things which I needed not to fear; and I did not fear that thing which only I ought to fear; 'tis true there was no ſhadow of any cauſe to fear it; for how could I poſſibly imagine that Cyneſia, who ſtood upon her wit and glory, ſhould ever love Alphidemon, whom all the World deſpiſed, and who indeed deſerved no eſteem? The truth is (ſaid Cephiſa) this could not be divined or believed, unleſs there had been a hundred ſuch circumſtances as would have put it out of all doubt. For my part (ſaid Artaxander) I am better informed then any elſe; for Cyneſia hath confeſſed to me that ſhe loved Alphidemon, even with the ſame breath that ſhe ſpoke kindly unto me; unto me, I ſay, who does not a jot reſemble nor never will, nor will ever have to do with any thing that ever was his.

After this, Artaxander began to walk about the Chamber and muſe, as if he had been alone, though Cephiſa was with him, naming ſometimes Alphidemon, and ſometimes Cyneſia, as they came into his mind; and he was above a quarter of an hour in this dump; Cephiſa would not diſturb him, becauſe ſhe thought it good ſport, and indeed becauſe ſhe was not ſorry that Artaxander's heart was diſ-engaged from the love of Cyneſia. But at laſt, perceiving himſelf, he rouzed out of his ſtudy, and had many pleaſant conceits upon his being Alphidemon's ſucceſſor. After which, he returned to his Lodging, and in his way he met Alphidemon, whoſe very ſight did much incenſe him; for he was very unhandſome and ſlovenly, he ſaluted clowniſhly, as if he were a Man of poor quality; and when he came to the houſe of Philicnes his Father, he there heard a hundred ſimple paſſages of Alphidemon. So Artaxander being more and more exaſperated, and conceiving that it was not fit he ſhould any longer love a perſon who could love Alphidemon, he reſolved to break off with Cyneſia. For (ſaid he unto Philiantes, who would have diſſwaded him) I ſhall have this ſatisfaction that thoſe who will ſay, ſhe would have made me Alphidemon's ſucceſſor, will ſay alſo, I refuſed it, and renounced the ſucceſſion. If you quit Cyneſia (replied Philiantes) you will ſo rejoice Paſithea, as if you be of any vindicative temper, you will not leave her. I am fuller of revenge then you imagine (replied he) but I will not be revenged upon my ſelf; and if I ſhould continue loving Cyneſia, only becauſe I will not joy Paſithea, I ſhould be extreamly aſhamed of being Alphidemon's ſucceſſor. But (ſaid Philiantes) can Men love when they liſt, and ceaſe when they will? I know not that (replied he) but I will try. And indeed Artaxander went no more unto Cyneſia, but went every day unto Cephiſa, chearing up himſelf with his Amity for the loſs of his love. Mean time Clidamis, who quickly heard how ſquare went between Artaxander and Cyneſia, he returned to her and quitted Paſithea; but Cyneſia not liking him ſo well as ſhe did Artaxander, ſhe gave him but cold entertainment; imagining that Artaxander would would take it well. On the other ſide Paſithea was vexed to the ſoul to ſee Clidamis forſake her, and that it pleaſed Artaxander whom ſhe would gladly re-call.

As for Cyneſia ſhe could not imagine what courſe to take to cure Artaxander: It was in vain for her to ſay that ſhe never loved Alphideman, becauſe ſhe had confeſſed it: nor would ſhe make Alphideman more eſteemable or eſteemed than he was. So as ſhe had no other way, ſince ſhe ſtood much upon her honour, then to ſeem as if ſhe cared not for Artaxander's ſlighting her. Mean time Artaxander being quite out with all manner of gallantry, the friendſhip of Cephiſa was a real Cordial to him; for beginning the rules of friendſhip with her, he found himſelf in a very good condition, and did not alter as long as he was at Crete: He gave Cephiſa an account of all his follies, and took more delight in telling, then he ever did in the acting them; for Cephiſa being of an excellent and pleaſing ſpirit, having alſo much good Will unto Artaxander, and he likewiſe to her, their Converſation was with ſuch a friendly liberty as made it very agreeable: And when Artaxander left Crete, he was more ſorry to part from his friend, then from all his Miſtreſſes; and I am confident he lived in more content with Cephiſa, then ever he did with Paſithea and Cyneſia with whom he had thoſe beginnings of love which you deſired to know, and which I have told you with ſo little Art, as I have reaſon to fear that all theſe illuſtrious perſons who have heard me, will repent of their curioſity.

For my particular (ſaid Clelia, ſeeing Amilcar had no more to ſay) I am far from repenting, for I do think theſe two beginnings of love worth a whole Hiſtory. For my part (ſaid the Prince Sextus) I am very affectionate unto Artaxander, becauſe methinks he reſembles Amilcar. Truth is (replied Aronces) Artaxander is ſet out in an excellent Character: I concur with you (ſaid the merry Plotina) but yet methinks if Amilcar had been in Artaxander's place, he would either not have quitted Paſithea ſo ſlightly, or elſe he would have returned to her, after he had quitted Cyneſia; for I do not think him ſo fit for a friend, as for a Miſtreſs. I have yet been ſo little known unto you, Madam (replied Amilcar) that methinks you judge too rathly. However (ſaid Coſonia) I much deſire to know what this Artaxander is? my deſire is the ſame (ſaid Artimedorus) for my particular (ſaid Zenocrates) I would gladly know both Paſithea and Cyneſia; my curioſity is for Cephiſa (added Clelia) for methinks a friend that gives more comfort then two Miſtreſſes, muſt needs be of much merit. I profeſs (ſaid Plotina) I would give any thing to know the true names of all theſe perſons: Truly all your Curioſities are to no purpoſe (ſaid Amilcar) for if you did know the Names you do not know the perſons. If you will (ſaid Celeres in a low voice unto Plotina) I will give you the Key unto this Hiſtory, upon Condition you will ſeem as if you had it by Inchantment. Plotina having a pleaſant and merry wit, ſhe thought it would make good ſport, if Celeres would be as good as his word; ſo as preſſing him very obligingly unto it, he told her the true Names of all thoſe whom Artaxander had introduced in the adventure which he had related; and then retired handſomely from Plotina, of whom Amilcar took no notice when ſhe whiſpered with Celeres; for his deſign being to keep Sextus from talking with Clelia, he applied himſelf in talk wholly unto that Prince: So when Celeres was gone from Plotina, ſhe began again to entreat Amilcar he would be pleaſed to tell them the true Names of Artaxander, of Paſithea, of Cyneſia, of Cephiſa, and all the reſt of whom he had ſpoken; and he ſtill perſiſting in his denial, ſhe told him that ſhe requeſted a thing from him which ſhe could tell, as well as himſelf. And to teſtifie that I ſought only to be obliged unto you, if you will promiſe me to confeſs the truth, I will engage my ſelf to write ſuch a Key as all the Company ſhall know the true names of every one they deſire: Ah lovely Plotina (replied Amilcar) if you can make that good, I will not only engage my ſelf to tell you whether your Key be true, but I will engage to be in love with you as long as I live, though you ſhould too little love another Philocrates, or too much love another Alphideman. I deſire no more (replied ſhe) ſo taking Pen, Ink, and Paper out of her Pocket, ſhe went unto the Window to write the Names which Celeres had told her. And after ſhe had written them, ſhe gave the Paper unto Zenocrates to read: So as all the Company flocking about him, he began to read what Plotina had written, which was in theſe terms.

Cyneſia.	Lindamira.
Cephiſa.	Liriana.
Clidamis.	Alberites.
Crete.	Sydon.

Zenocrates had no ſooner done reading, but every one was earneſt to tell Amilcar that they knew him to be Artaxander. Well (ſaid Amilcar) I will be Artaxander if you will have me; for I am as merry a Man and Complaiſant as lives: But I would gladly know, by what Inchantment Plotina did find it out. After this, Amilcar muſed a while, and then looking upon Celeres who could not chuſe but ſmile: Ah Celeres (ſaid he) it is you who have betrayed me, for I have heretofore made you the Confident of my Follies. Yet I would gladly know (ſaid Clelia) why you took ſo much pains in changing all the Names of all theſe perſons and your own? for we know neither Beliſa nor Paſithea. It is true (replied he) but you do know Amilcar better then you do Artaxander, and it was for his ſake only that I put a guiſe upon the reſt.

But the wonder is, that in my haſt of changing names I have committed a merry errour and none takes any notice of it; for I have given a Grecian name unto an Affrican. For my part (ſaid Sextus) I ſee no reaſon more than the reſt of our Company, why you ſhould conceal your having intereſt in the Company, why you ſhould conceal your having intereſt in having what you have related. I told you already, Sir (replied he) before I began to relate the ſtory, that I did not love to be my own Hiſtorian, and I muſt tell you again, that I never will, and that thoſe who will write ſuch Books as that famous blind man did, whoſe works all Greece adores, muſt always introduce ſome perſons to tell the adventures of others. For then the Relator commends or condemns thoſe of whom he ſpeaks according to their merit. They will impartially deſcribe the perſons whom they do introduce, they will deſcant upon things, and mingle their own thoughts with theirs; but when any are their own Hiſtorians, all that they ſhall ſay in their own advantage is ſuſpected; and it is ſo difficult to do, that if it be a woman who tels her own tale, ſhe cannot handſomely ſay, I made him in love with me; and if it be a man, he cannot well ſay, that he was loved, or that he was valiant; and therefore it is a thouſand times better to have the Story told in the third perſon then in the firſt. There is reaſon in all you ſay (replied Aronces) yet ſome men would think it ſtrange that a third perſon ſhould know ſo many particulars of things, wherein he himſelf hath no intereſt. I am perſwaded of what you ſay (replied Amilcar) but yet it may be an ill grounded perſwaſion; for ſome men do better know all the advantages of others then of their own, becauſe they may come to the knowledge of them from the mouths of perſons unintereſted, yet true it is, that thoſe who read, ought to enter into the very thoughts of the Writer, and ſo the relator of the perſon whoſe ſtory is related; but upon the whole matter, I cannot indure to hear a Woman tell of all her Conqueſts, or a man of his exploits; ſometimes when they are forced upon it, I will allow them to do as well as they can: and to put in practice what I ſpeak of others, I make a promiſe unto my ſelf, never to relate any thing that hath happened unto me, unleſs to one perſon only at once, and as ſeldome as poſſibly I can. I am very glad of this reſolution (ſaid Plotina and laughed) for ſince it is very likely that we ſhall have ſome adventures together, I ſhall be ſafe, and need not fear that you will ever tell what paſſeth between us; unleſs it be under ſuch diſguiſed names as will keep me ſafe from my dangerous interpretations. I do believe (ſaid Ceſonia) that you would not be glad to have your adventure told in that manner: but am perſwaded that if it were, you your ſelf would find out a key for it as you have done unto the Hiſtory of Artaxander. For my part, (ſaid one of thoſe melancholly Ladies, who fretted at her captivity) I wonder much at the exceſſive curioſity which I have obſerved in all the company to know the true names of the perſons whom Amilcar brought into his Story: for ſince it changeth nothing, neither in the adventure nor in the thoughts, what matter is it whether the perſons were Grecians or Africans? And why ſhould ſo much ado be about that which cannot afford any real diverſion; for my part if Amilcar had ſaid at the beginning of his relation, that he was going to relate an adventure which he had invented, I ſhould have hearkened with as much delight as I did, and ſhould have more admired the ingenuity of him who could ſo handſomely invent an adventure. Whatſoever you are pleaſed to ſay (replied Plotina) certainly there is more pleaſure to be taken in hearing a thing which is known to be a truth, then in hearing a known falſhood. There are ſome truths (replied Clelia) which are ſo unpleaſing, and ſo far from probability, and there are ſome inventions ſo full of delight and likely, as it may be ſaid, that ſometimes a lye is more pleaſing then a truth, and reſembles truth, more then truth it ſelf doth. Since every one ſpeaks after the rate of their own beauty, I will not diſpute by reaſon, to uphold that which concurs with his own inclination.

You ſpeak very well (replied Sextus) and therefore pleaſures are not to be condemned in any whoſoever, and my humour is ſuch as I will never condemn them in others; but I cannot endure that others ſhould condemn them in me. For my part (ſaid Zenocrates) that ſometimes I ſee many things which do not pleaſe me; but the natural irkſomeneſs which I have to all things which do not delight me, cannot make me condemn them, but paſs by, and ſay nothing. For my particular (ſaid Amilcar) I always condemn thoſe who condemn others. Certainly (ſaid Aronces) one ought to be very reſerved in giving his opinion upon the pleaſures of others. And yet it is ſo little uſed (replied Celeres) that nothing is more ſubject to cenſures then pleaſures. Tis true, replied Artimedorus, but it muſt be confeſſed withal, that nothing does better diſcover the bottoms of mens hearts; and therefore it is not without cauſe that ſome ſhould ſo accuſtome themſelves to obſerve them: for in ſolid and ſerious affairs, the mind is cloſe, and cannot be known; but in matter of pleaſures, ones hearts and ſpirits lie open; they are diſcovered to the bottom: And by them beſt are mens manners and inclinations known. Tis ordinarily ſeen (ſaid Clelia) that by little things great ones comes to be known. For my part, ſaid Amilcar, men may be much deceived in judging of me, by my pleaſures: For I take them ſo many ſeveral wayes; when fortune brings me to a place, where I cannot have them, I make pleaſures of my buſineſs, rather then want them: The truth is, one cannot live without pleaſures; and thoſe who ſeem never to enjoy any, but are naturally ſober and grave, muſt certainly they find delight even in their own Melancholy. After this, Sextus finding by the ſilence which Clelia and the reſt of the Ladies obſerved, that they thought it time to end diſcourſe, he did riſe up; and went away with Aronces, Artimedorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates, and Celeres: Who after they had waited upon Sextus to his lodging, they went every one to their own: But the ſweeteſt part of that night unto Aronces was, that when Sextus did riſe up, and Amilcar had cunningly engaged him in talk with Plotina, Aronces found an opportunity of a little talk with Clelia, when none could hear but her ſelf: So as this pretious opportunity made him paſs away the night in much delight. Mean while ſince the ſiege of Ardes drew on, and ſince the preſence of Tarquin was neceſſary he muſt prepare himſelf for a departure. Yet he had found Clelia ſo fair, that he could willingly have deferred it ſome days, if his ambition had not been ſo prevalent with his heart: For though Tarquin had never any violent inclinations to love, yet he found ſomething ſo extraordinary in this fair priſoner, that for her he muſt in the Morning; giving orders that ſhe ſhould be waited upon very diligently; and conferring many favours upon others for her ſake. Mean while, the proud and cruel Tullia, knowing it, ſhe was very importunate in behalf of the Veſtals, with Tarquin to releaſe them; ſhe cauſed Verenia to come the ſecond time unto that Prince: But he was more moved moved against her this second visit, then the first: For he told her, that to recompence her endeavours of raising a Rebellion in Rome, he would send to seek her brother all the World over, that he might send him and all his Family into another World. After which preparing for his departure, he did depart the next morning: Followed by the Prince Sextus, the Prince of Pometia, the Prince Collatin, the young Sons of Brutus, two other young men of quality of the Aquiline Family; all the bravery of Rome, Aronces, Artimedorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates, Celeres and many others. This departure was so sudden that Sextus could not see the prisoners: But Celeres, passing for the Brother of Clelia, he went to her, and carried Aronces with him, who had the happiness to bid her adieu; But this adue was so sad, as it may be said they did onely communicate sorrows, and make an exchange of grief. For when Clelia considered, that she was under the power of Tarquin who did most horridly hate her Father; when she thought that this proud Tyrant did too favourably look upon her; that the Prince Sextus did the same: That the cruel Tullia had shewed no civilities unto her: That Aronces was going to the Wars where he might die: The Celeres who passed for her Brother, might perish also as well as Amilcar; and that she was to be left without any help in the hands of most wicked people, it was impossible but she should be extreamly grieved. On the other side Aronces who more sadly resented the miseries of her he loved, then his own, never considering what might be said of him in the King his Fathers Court, he thought upon nothing but the pitiful condition of Clelia. Yet since Tarquin had promised to deliver her, when the siege of Ardes was ended, this hope did something moderate his sorrows. But the truth is, his fears of her being known to be the daughter of Clelius did take away the greatest sweetness of his hopes. Also the very grief of being from her, and leaving her under the power of that Tiger Tullia, did so extreamly afflict him, as it may be said, this onely was enough to make him worthy of compassion. Also they expressed themselves unto each other, the most sadly that can be imagined, whilst Celeres and Amilcar who was with them this visit did take their leaves of the other Ladies, But the adieu of Plotina and Amilcar was as merry as the other was Melancholly, and at parting were as full of their pleasant frollicks as ever. Yet Amilcar set a more serious face upon the matter, when he took his leave of Clelia: For maugre all his mirth, he did most obligingly resent the misfortunes of this fair one. But after they had left her, Aronces, Celeres, and he, durst not go and see Verenia, lest if it were known, Tarquin should suspect them: But they went secretly unto the virtuous Sevilia, purposely to oblige her to let Verenia know, that her illustrious Neece had in their persons, some defenders against the Tyrant. After which they went unto that Prince, as well as Artimedorus and Zenocrates. Mean time, there might be seen go out of Rome that day; the most magnificent equipage of War, that ever was seen since the first Foundation of that proud Town; for under their former Kings the Romans either out of poverty or moderation, never used any superfluities. Moreover Amilcar being equally agreeable unto Tarquin, unto Sextus, unto the Prince of Pometia, and unto Titus, he shared himself amongst them during this march; for he was sometimes with one, sometimes with another, and though their humours were all different, yet he pleased them all. As for Aronces, he was so full of sorrow, that he entertained only himself. Artimedorus he talked with Zenocrates, for they two had enough to talk on in matters wherein none else had any interest; and for Celeres he entertained Collatin in discourse of the siege. However Tarquins Quarter being betwixt Rome and Ardes, the Camp was so near that Famous City: as one might goe and come betwixt them in a day, but reason did forbid Aronces from doing so, lest he should render himself suspected: So as it might be said, that he was as miserable as if he had been further off from Clelia, since he durst not go and see her. But Tarquin was no sooner come to the Camp then he gave out orders concerning the siege; he went to view all the several Posts, and would have the strangers with him to the end they might see that the way of Roman War had great congruity with the Grecian and African way. As for Aronces he accompanyed Tarquin, he reasoned so rightly, and gave such good advice unto this Prince, he began from that day to look upon him not as an ordinary man: But as Tarquin and this brave Troop were upon a hill which Aronces said was requisite to be made good, they of Ardes made a salley: And so advantagiously for themselves at first, as by the favour of another hill upon the left hand Tarquin was set about before he was aware. So as then he was very happy in having so many brave men about him: For maugre the vigorous assault of his enemies, who doubled them in number, they repulsed them, and did such prodigious things that day, as made all who saw him admire: For knowing that Horace was in Ardes, he bore a secret hatred unto those who defended him; yet when he considered that Ardes was the harbour of his noble friend whom Tarquin hated only for his virtue, his heroique heat, which made him do such great exploits did began to slack; But for all that when he considered that at the end of the siege Clelia was to be delivered, he thought upon nothing, but what might conduce to the taking of this Town; so as bestirring himself that day to defend him who besieged it, he did defend him as if he had infinitely esteemed him, as if he had most dearly loved him, and as if he had been incomparably tender of him, though at the bottom of his heart he had a most horrible aversion against this proud Tyrant. So as desiring to signal him self upon this occasion; he did as I told you before, such marvellous things as made both his friends and enemies admire him. Also all they who followed Tarquin did acts worthy of eternal memory; and one would have said, that the Romans, the Grecians and the Africans did vie valours with each other in vanquishing those who assaulted them. So as all these brave men fighting together, they beat the other as brave and as strong as they were, and did drive them to their very gates, after they had killed many, and took more prisoners than they themselves.

But amongst those who Aronces took with his own hands; hee found two who told him things very different; for after some of Tarquins Troops were come up to relieve them, and that they could retreat without fear of any sallies, he asked these prisoners concerning the state of the town, and the number of men to defend it? Sir, said one of the souldiers, there are men enough to find you work; and if the valiant Horace doe escape his wounds, as it is hoped, he and Herminius, joyning together, will make you pay dear for your victory. How? (said Tarquin, and blusht for anger) is Horace and Herminius both in Ardes? Yes, Sir, replied the courageous souldier; and had they been in the head of those troops you have beaten, perhaps you had found a sharper business of it. Tarquin being incensed at the boldness of this prisoner, commanded him to be put to death; but since it was Aronces that took him; oh Sir (said he to Tarquin with extream generosity) since this prisoner belongs to me, I beseech your Majesty not to be so cruel unto him, for I think my self obliged to defend his life; and I assure you he did so stoutly defend it, that he merits better usage. I will give him to your valour (replied Tarquin in a rought one) though his insolency deserves death; for how durst he in my presence commend two of my most mortal enemies and enemies whom I hate as much as Clelius, and Horace and Herminius deserve it.

After this, Tarquin casting his eye upon the other captive, whom Aronces took, he began to ask him who he was? for he seemed to have the ayr of a stranger. Sir (said he in very broken Roman language) though I am taken amongst your enemies, yet I am not so; for I belong unto the Prince of Numidia, who sent me into Ardes to know whether a daughter of his who was stoln away was there. He had no sooner said so, but Aronces, Amilcar, and Celeres did know the man, and that he did belong unto the Prince of Numidia, therefore their hearts began to beat extreamly, fearing he would tell something which might give Tarquin some cause to think that Clelia was the daughter of Clelius; but as good luck was, the man had heretofore been servant to Amilcar, who turning his eyes towards him; he made such signs to hold his peace, and in such a menacing manner, as the poor fellow not knowing what to say, or not to say, he said just nothing. Tarquin seeing him to be a stranger and ignorant in in what he desired to know, he let him go amongst the rest of the prisoners, at which Aronces was very glad; but desiring to know a little more concerning the Prince of Numidia, when Tarquin was gone to his quarters, he went unto him who kept the prisoners to speak with this African who might satisfie his curiosity; and he went with Amilcar, who made the man to tell, that the Prince of Numidia desiring to get into that party which was opposite unto that which Horace took, he had a desire to know whether he was in Ardes, as it was reported he was; so as Aronces was likely to see his Rival arrive in the Camp of Tarquin, and to arrive in such a manner as to be known who he was: However he must dissemble his resentments, and for Clelia's sake comply with all the pleasures of the Prince Sextus, because it was he above all the rest, from whom he was to hope for Clelia's protection, if Tarquin should hear by any ill fortune that she was Daughter unto Clelius; for Sextus being not capable of that politique hatred which the King his father was, it was to be hoped that Clelia being very fair, and pleased him, he would defend her in case Tarquin should offer either to hurt her or love her too much: for Aronces saw she was in danger of these two extreams; so as though he was very melancholy at the heart, yet he was forced to seem merry in the face, and though he was free from any licencious Debauchery, yet he lived as if he were the greatest Libertine of all men upon earth. And since Tarquins design was not to take Ardes by force, but by hunger, the time was likely to be long, and Sextus brought into the Camp a way of life more voluptuous then in Rome, for they did nothing but feast continually from Tent to Tent, and from Quarter to Quarter: However there was a necessity of complying with his humour, though against the hair of ones own; and sometimes is is wisdom not to seem wise. Thus Aronces being both amorous and prudent, did comply with the times, and was at all these tumultuous feasts of which Sextus was the Ring-leader, also he treated this Martial and merry crew, in his own Tent, and treated them in a manner so magnificent as did amaze the Romans, and in such a neat fashion as made all the Grecians admire. Artimedorus, Amilcar, and also Zenocrates did treat them in their turns, as men that knew how to goe through any thing they undertook. But Sextus mixing matters of love in all things, the discourse in all these feasts was commonly either upon Beauty, or the humours of women, either in commending or blaming of them. So as all this merry company was at Supper one night with the Prince Sextus; he began to chide Collatine, because his wife could never be seen, though she had the reputation of the fairest woman in all Rome. For indeed (said he unto Aronces, Artimedorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates, and Celeres though) Collatine be Nephew unto the King my father, and by consequence Lucrecia of quality to be known by all in Rome, yet she is known by none, but her Reputation which seems to be upheld by Enchantment; for since she will not see the Queen, because she was once ill treated by her, she will not be seen in any place where her beauty may be judged of; if she do pass through the streets unto the Temple, her Head is always pulled down, and she never frequents any other place. If she do walk, it is in places so solitary as none ever use to come at them; and the truth is, Lucrecia is never seen but by five or six people, whom none ever sees: And yet for all this, she hath the reputation of being the fairest Woman that ever was seen in Rome. But to tell you truly, I do not believe it (added he and laughed) for if she were so fair as reported, I am confident she would shew her beauty, mauger all the Roman austerity, in spite of all the vigilancy of Parents, mauger Collatine himself and all his jealousie; for I must certainly conclude, that if she be fair, he must needs be jealous, since none ever sees his Wife. Oh Sir (said Collatine) you are extreamly unjust in accusing me of any jealousie; and I were the most unreasonable Man living were I jealous of Lucrecia. I must tell you (replied Amilcar) that a beauty solitary, and a solitude voluntary, is one of the rarest things in the World; and therefore though you be not jealous, yet the Prince Sextus is very excusable in suspecting you to be so. For my part (said the Prince of Pometia) I know Lucrecia a little better than you do, and I am sure that the cause of her retiredness proceeds not from any jealousie in Collatine, but only from her own modesty and from a fancy she hath, that there ought to be a great difference between a fair Mistress and a fair Wife. For my particular (said Sextus) I am not of her fancy, for I think it fit a Wife should be the Mistress of her Husband, and that a Mistress never ought to be the Wife of her her Lover. The truth is (said Artimedorus) a Wife ought not to give over her gallantry towards her Husband, as soon as she is married; and a Mistress should be so familiar with her Lover as to become his Wife, by her little care she takes to please him. And yet it often happens so (replied Aronces.) I would have a Lady rule her Lover (said Amilcar) for if the Husband do cease loving as soon as she is married, I would have the Wife cease being his Mistress, and I would not have any such difference made betwixt Gallantry and Love as usually is. I do confess it (said the Prince Titus) for I cannot endure that Men when they see any Ladies, should say, I could like such a Lady for my Mistress, but not for my Wife; and on the contrary, I could affect such a one for my Wife, but would not chuse her for my Mistress; for I conceive what becomes a Wife, becomes a Mistress; and what becomes a Mistress renders her to be a charming Wife; and I would have my Wife as charming as my Mistress; and I would not have my Mistress more Cocket then I would have my Wife. Then you would have her as austere as the Sibyls (replied Sextus) and that she be as solitary, salvage, imperious, critical, censuring others, thinking ill upon the least conjectures, and melancholy; that she deprive her self of all pleasures, to have this only, that she hath the reputation of a good Woman and when she will can give over the World. Oh Sir (replied the Prince of Pometia) Lucretia is none of those; for she is excellent society though solitary, she is severe and rigid onely to her self; she alwayes thinks well of others, and she maintains it neither good nor modest for any Women to suspect those of their sex in general, of any great weakness; she never condemns pleasures in others, she puts a good construction upon every thing, she is not lumpish nor Melancholy; and if she were not solitary she would be adored by all the World. You love her Sister in law so well (replied the Prince Sextus) that you are not to be believed in all you speak to the advantage of Lucretia. If a Husband may be allowed to commend his own Wife (replied Collatine) I would say, that the Prince of Pometia doth not flatter Lucretia; and that the affection he bears unto my Sister, doth not move him to speak against truth. For my part (said Sextus) I do not insist upon such critical formalities; and therefore Collatine, without any consideration of being Husband unto Lucretia, I pray you tell me ingenuously, and impartially whether her beauty be comparable to the beauty of that fair Prisoner which you saw when the Vestals demanded her liberty? For my part I must profess unto you, that I never in my life saw any so fair.

The truth is, she is very fair (replied Collatine) yet I know not whether it be because I affect black beauties, better then the fair: But I profess unto you, that I think Lucretia as fair for a black beauty, as that prisoner is for a fair beauty: And of the two I would leave the fair and take the black. For my part (said Aronces) I should not do so; upon this the Prince Sextus having an extream desire to see Lucretia, did becken unto all the young Gallants to second his design, so as every one began to affirm that Lucretia was not so fair as reported. If she be so as she is represented (said Zenocrates then) I am sure she is not so fair as one I have seen in Sicily. For my part (said Artimedorus) I know one that will not yield unto her. For my particular (said Amilcar) I have met with many Lucretia's, but I know onely one fair prisoner in all the World. Aronces had a good mind to say so also, but he durst not for fear of suspition; so as he let all the rest speak, who all confessed, that though they had Mistresses of their own, yet the fair Prisoner, was the fairest that ever was seen. As for the Prince of Pometia, he did not say any thing against her great beauty, but only said that Lucretia and his own Mistress could not be compared together, because they were so opposite as two contraries could not be more, the one having fair hair, and grey eyes; and the other black hair and black eyes. Mean time, This feast which Sextus made, having raised the spirits of Collatine to a jolly height, he was that time full of rallary; so as the Prince Sextus, beginning again to chide him for his pretended jealousie, though he knew well enough that he was not jealous, Collatine did rise up upon a suddain, and looking upon all the company. To make it appear I am not jealous (said he unto them) And to let you know that Lucretia does merit all the reputation of beauty which she hath, I freely offer to take horse immediately, and carry you all unto my house. Collatine had no sooner said so, but Sextus ravished with joy, did take it at his word: So as though it was late, they all took horse, and went to Rome: so came to Collatine where Lucretia was, who not expecting so great a company was working with her Woman, an excellent piece of work she made the business of her solitude. However being alwayes naturally handsome, though she did not think of seeing any that day, yet she was not in such a negligent dress, as did any thing take from her beauty; but on the contrary, her dress was very advantagious. So as all this Company making a great noise at their coming, and hearing that her Husband brought them, she prepared her self to receive them very well. So Lucretia leaving her work, she went to meet them, and not knowing that her beauty was the cause of this journey, she shewed it in its full lustre: for she had four slaves who walked before her with lights, which made it at first appear unto all that came, she merited all the reputation of beauty which she had: and that there was none but Clelia who could dispute with her for being the greatest beauty in the whole World.

The Prince Sextus was so blasted, that he stood dumb as he was the first time he saw Clelia; so as Amilcar observing him, he jogged Aronces, who was very glad to see it, in hopes that perhaps his inclination to Clelia would lessen, by his liking Lucretia. So as Amilcar (after he had asked Aronces pardon for the injustice, I was going to do his Mistress) he began to cry aloud that the fair prisoner was vanquished; that Lucretia had got the victory, and that Collatine was the happiest man upon Earth. Zenocrates also did highly applaud the beauty of Lucretia. Artimedorus did the same. The young Sons of Brutus as much. The two young Aquilians no less. The Prince of Pometia asked every one what they thought; the Prince Titus said as others did; and Collatine himself in saying nothing, did yet imply that Lucretia was never fairer then she was that night. All the while, this Wise and Modest Lady was so surprized at their expressions, and at their tumultuous commendations which they gave her, as she knew not what to think. Yet being of an admirable spirit, and not having forgot the mode of the World in her solitude, she did handsomely retire tire. But the Prince Sextus being charmed with the beauty of Lucretia as much as with Clelia, he was ſomething deaf to the motion, and with Amilcar began to make a long invective againſt ſolitude: For truly ſaid Amilcar unto Lucretia, whilſt Collatine was talking unto ſome others whom he had brought thither) you are infinitely to blame for thus hiding as you do, the greateſt beauty upon earth; for take in which way you will, ſolitude is good for nothing. Yes Sir, replied Lucretia, it is good to ſatisfie thoſe who ſeek it and love it. But Madam, anſwered Sextus, thoſe who do love it and ſeek, if they were as you are they ought not to love or ſeek it. 'Tis true (added Amilcar) for ſolitude will not let either beauty or virtue ſhew it ſelf; and is good for nothing, but to give the World occaſion to ſay that when the Wife is fair and ſolitary, her Husband is jealous. Though I do not expoſe my ſelf unto the World, replied Lucretia, yet I do not think that any will ſay that Collatine is jealous. If they do not ſay ſo, replied Sextus, it is in your preſence, when they can ſay nothing elſe but that you are the faireſt perſon that ever was ſeen. But yet, ſaid Amilcar, I would gladly know, what delights can ſolitude afford? Though no other, but to be ſure they will trouble none (replied Lucretia) nor be troubled by any, yet this is a great pleaſure; for theſe are two things which often happen unto ſuch as expoſe themſelves unto the World. Did I ſee in all your Chambers (ſaid Amilcar) abundance of great and ſtately Mirrours, which would let you ſee your ſelf every way, I ſhould not then wonder what pleaſure you could take in your ſolitude, for I am confident you would be infinitely pleaſed with looking upon your ſelf: but that you ſhould paſs away your life poring upon works, and that a piece of ſeveral coloured Tiſſue ſhould take up your eyes and mind, this is a thing above my underſtanding. I know (added he) that a perſon who has ſome ſecret affection gnawing upon her heart which makes her apt to muſe and ſtudy, ſhe indeed may eaſily paſs away whole daies in working upon ſome excellent piece, becauſe that would be a handſome pretence for her entertaining her ſelf, and talking unto none; but that a Woman of Spirit ſhould find any delight in paſſing away her life with drooping eyes and hands buſied in Worke like Bees in their Hives; this is a thing which I cannot comprehend. Therefore I muſt conclude that thoſe who paſs away their whole lives ſo, have either very ſhallow Spirits; or elſe have ſome ſecret cauſe of reſervedneſs which doth buſie and divert them. For my part (replied Lucretia and blu...'d) ſince I have no ſecret confederacy with any; it muſt be then concluded that I delight in my works, becauſe my Spirit is very ſhallow. Oh no Madam; ſaid Sextus, I can never believe that: But perhaps you have a fancy by this way to make all the World believe you have as much virtue as beauty: But Madam, let me tell you, after a long accuſtomacy unto this kind of life, you will not know how to enter into ſociety again and commonly all your ſage beauties, do make themſelves the moſt miſerable people in the World, by beginning a form of life too ſevere. But Madam, if you will follow my advice, you ſhall add nothing to the Roman auſterity: Be not more ſevere then the Veſtals; Quit Collatia, and return to Rome, and do not anticipate old age, by a living death: For ſo I muſt phraſe ſolitude. For my part, replied Lucretia, I think the life ſo infinitely ſweet, as I cannot give it ſo terrible a name: And to tell you truly (added ſhe and laughed) I think the life ſo pleaſant, as I aſſure you, I think this is the worſt night I paſſed away ever ſince I became ſolitary at Collatia. Lucretia ſpoke this with ſuch a ſprightly Air, as that it was as much as told the Prince Sextus it was late, and time to retire; ſo he left Lucretia with ſo much eſteem of her, as all the company (except Collatine who took no notice of it) did plainly ſee ſhe had pierced his heart.

The truth is, it was a thing not difficult to do; for the love of Sextus was only of ſenſual love, wherein the mind was not much conſiderable. But at laſt all the company after they had left Lucretia, in her Chamber they reſted themſelves an hour, and ſuch repaſt as haſt would permit, they returned to the Camp: But in their return, Artimedorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates and Celeres, who had a deſire to advance Lucretia in the heart of Sextus, and ſo chaſe out Clelia, they did nothing elſe but commend the beauty of Lucretia, and envy the happineſs of Collatine. Alſo they told Sextus in a low voice, that certainly Lucretia with all her virtue was of a very paſſionate temper, that her eyes did ſpeak as much; and that ſhe was not ſo hard to be overcome as Clelia, who was of a more cold temper: So as Sextus, whoſe nature was impetuous, abandoning his heart to the beauty of Lucretia, and not quite chaſing out Clelia, he returned to the Camp, not knowing directly whether he was more taken with the black or the fair beauty. Truth is, ſince he had ſeen Lucretia laſt it ſeemed ſhe had the advantage of the other. Alſo hearing ſo many cry up the beauty of Lucretia his heart was the deeper wounded; for nothing does more blow the fire of a growing love then applauds of her who is the cauſe of it. As for Arruns, though he wiſhed heartily that Sextus would love Lucretia rather then Clelia, yet he could get no further expreſſions from him then that Clelia was leſs fair than Lucretia. So he returned to the Camp without almoſt ſpeaking one word; and when they came near the Camp, he rid ſome twenty paces behind the reſt, becauſe he loved more to muſe then mix with ſuch tumultuous diſcourſe, and he obſerved that all the company ſtayed; ſo as coming up to them, he ſaw one of the King of Romes Officers, who told the Prince Sextus, that there was come into the Camp an Envoy from the King of Cluſium, who came from the King his Maſter, to advertiſe Tarquin, that the Prince his Son, who ſtole out of his Court was unknown in his Camp, and beſeeched him that if it was ſo, he would ſecure him, leſt he ſhould marry the daughter of a man who was his enemy, with whom he was in love; adding, that the Ladies name was Clelia, that ſhe was the daughter of Celius, that ſhe was taken away from Horatius, and that ſhe was lately come out. This (ſaid the Envoy) was no ſooner told unto Tarquin, but he imagined that the daughter of Celius muſt needs be one of thoſe Ladies captives which were in Rome, and therefore I was ſent in all haſt with orders that they might be more ſtrictly looked unto; for Tarquin remembring how earneſt the grand Veſtal was for the liberty of thoſe captives he did not doubt but Clelia was one of them; and he ſeemed ſo incenſed againſt her, though he knew not which was ſhe, that he ſwore he would put her to death; though for no other reaſon then to hinder the King of Clusium's Son from marrying her. But (said the Prince Sextus) does the King believe, that the King of Clusium's Son is in his Army? Yes, Sir (replied he, and whispered) for he told that Envoy there was many strangers with you, whose mind might well become the Sons of Kings; so as this man does very impatiently wait for your return at your Tent door, to spy if any of those who are with you be Son to the King of Clusium. Though Tarquins Officer spake this in a low voice, yet Aronces heard it, and heard it with unimaginable grief, yet he conceived that it was extreamly expedient for him not to discover his thoughts, and therefore set the best face he could upon the matter: when the Officer had left the Prince, and was gone away, he observed that Sextus looked sometimes upon Amilcar, sometimes upon Celeres, and sometimes upon him; for he could not imagine Arsimedorus or Zemecrates, two Sons unto the King of Clusium, because their Accent was purely Greek, and he knew very well that the King of Clusium's Son was not brought up in Greece. But desiring to talk of this with the Princes his Brothers though they seldome used to talk and converse together, he severed those from the rest, and rid some twenty paces before, not taking any notice of those who followed; for he did not think that the last thing which the King his Fathers Officer had told him, had been heard; so as Aronces, closing with this occasion, he beckned unto Celeres, and staying some places behind, they rid softly, so as they were a hundred paces behind the rest when they entred into a thick and dark Wood. So as Aronces desiring so much liberty alone as to think what he should do, he took a little blind path way with Celeres, which after a hundred turnings and windings did bring them into a little solitary Valley, where there was four or five poor Shepherds cottages upon the side of a little Rivulet; no sooner were they there, but they stayed, and imagining that Sextus would send to seek them, Aronces looked upon his friend with eyes so full of sadness, as was enough to melt a heart into sorrow. Now Celeres (said he unto him) what say you now to the cruelty of my destiny? Fortune indeed is very cruel unto you (replied Celeres unto whom Aronces had told all he heard) for I must confess I know not what course you ought or can take. I can dye Celeres (replied he) and that's the most reasonable course I can take. Consider but my condition well and you will find that I have reason to do so; for as I gathered from the speech of the Officer, Tarquin does almost certainly know that the Daughter of Clelius, is in his Power, and he will be glad to know that Clelia is she that is the Daughter of his Enemy. Moreover if I do return to the Camp, I am sure to be a Prisoner, for I shall be known: If I do not return they will follow me, and which is most considerable, I shall do an ill Office unto Clelia, since I cannot return unto Rome: both you and I, and Amilcar also shall pass for cheats and impostors; for we have told Tarquin that you are Clelia's Brother. And yet in not going I see more danger towards her; for perhaps by talking unto Tarquin I shall stay his fury against that admirable Lady. Your greatest comfort is (replied Celeres) that since Tarquin hath some inclination towards Clelia, certainly he will not treat her so cruelly. Oh Celeres (cryed out Aronces) what comfort can it be to see a Tyrant in love with ones Mistress? Yet I must confess that now I am angry that the beauty of Lucretia pleaseth Sextus, more then the beauty of Clelia; for I know none fitter then he, to stand between her, and his Fathers fury. But alas unto what a pittiful condition am I brought, who for the safety of Clelia, must wish well unto my most insolent Rivals? As they were thus talking, they heard a great noise which made them look about; and they were no sooner turned, but they espyed coming out of a corner in this Valley, the Prince of Numidia and Horacius who were fighting, and Herminius parting them, though they were both Rivals unto his friend, and though by their death he had been rid of two redoubtful enemies.

This sight did so surprize Aronces that as the state of his mind then stood, he knew not whether what he saw was true or no; for he could not imagine that Horacius should be so soon recovered. It is true that it well appeared, those two stout Rivals had not all their strength; for though they fought with abundance of animosity and courage, yet one might plainly perceive, that both of them were weak, especially Horacius; as for the Prince of Numidia it was long since he was well recovered of his Wounds, and therefore had time enough to gather strength, if his melancholy had been no hinderance. But Aronces and Celeres seeing this Combate, and seeing Herminius very busie in parting them, Aronces was in sufficient perplexity. However men of great Souls when they see others fighting, have but two wayes to chuse, either to part them, or to take side. Aronces not being able to take the latter of these wayes; because it was hard for him to chuse between two Rivals, and because he scorned advantages, he went straight towards them with Celeres, whom he acquainted with his intention. But though they went as men whose intentions were to help Herminius in parting them, yet they did not at the first take it so, but recoyling back some paces, they turned both against Aronces, as against him that was most to be feared, and asked him, which of them two he would have to fight with him: But Aronces not hearkening to what they said, cryed out that it was not a time to fight and kill one another, when there might be some use of each other to deliver Clelia; but it was better to suspend their Animosities, as he would his, until she were free. He had no sooner said so, but he saw the Prince Sextus appear at the end of the Valley with all his Troops; for he seeing that Aronces did not follow him, he believed therefore that it was he who was Son to the King of Clusium; so as turning back, he fortuned to light just upon the place where these three Rivals were together.

Mean time, as things stood, since neither the interests of Aronces nor Horacius was not to fall into the hands of Tarquin, they both of them took a way through the thick of the Wood, and Herminius followed them. But when Aronces saw that the Prince of Numidia stayed behind them, he hastily bid Adieu unto his friend and his Rival, and turned back, not being able to leave such a terrible enemy as the Prince of Numidia about Tarquin, lest though that Prince should not be so cruel as to put Clelia to death, yet he might be so unjust as to marry her unto that Prince. So as finding it more safety for her, to return to Tarquin, since his Rival was to be there: He went to Sextus. And when that Prince asked him who those were which rushed through the Wood, out of his friendſhip to Herminius and generoſity to Horatius, he ſaid that they were men he knew not, and that as he met them he parted them, imagining that Sextus could not diſcern them, becauſe their faces were turned the other way.

After this, Aronces preſented outo him the Prince of Numidia though his Rival. After which, Sextus taking Aronces apart, he asked him whether it was true, that he was Son to the King of Clusium? I have asked Amilcar, Artimedorus, and Zenocrates (ſaid he unto him) who are all your friends, but they will tell me nothing; yet ſince I love you, I ſhall be glad to know it, that I might the better ſerve you. Aronces was now hard put to it; for conſidering the inclination which Sextus ſeemed to have to Clelia, he thought it no prudence to tell him who he was, ſince it was likely that e're long he would know Clelia was the Daughter of Clelius, whom they would not have him to love. Yet the new inclination of Sextus unto Lucrecia, did take off that objection: and judging alſo that he could not long hide himſelf, he confeſſed that he was Porſenna's Son. He had no ſooner confeſſed this, but Sextus bluſht; and looking upon Aronces, tell me truly (ſaid he) is this pretended Siſter of Celeres, the Daughter of Clelius? I know ſhe is, and therefore will not ſeek for the reaſon, why you would not ſay that Lucrecia ſeemed fairer in your eye then ſhe. However, (added he, and would not give Aronces time to Anſwer) I will not adviſe you to put your ſelf into the hands of the King my Father, unleſs you will hazard the life of Clelia, but I will promiſe you to protect her as far as I am able, and alſo to ſteal her away if Tarquin ſhould come to the laſt extremities againſt her. And therefore when I begin to march ſteal you away from me the ſecond time, and I will promiſe none ſhall follow you. Since what Sextus ſaid, ſeemed to be very obliging, Aronces thanked him, and without telling him preciſely whether he would follow his Counſel, or not, they began to march; but in marching Amilcar being come to Aronces, he gave him an account of all paſſages: Afterwards marching a little aſunder from the reſt, he began to examine the pitiful condition wherein they were, and their ir-reſolution what courſe to take. For truly, ſaid ſhe, he who adviſes me to keep out of the hands of a violent Prince, he himſelf knows not what Juſtice or Generoſity is; he ſeems to be in love with Clelia; he can love as many beauties as he can ſee, and conſequently may love Clelia and Lucrecia both at once; he tells me of ſtealing away the Perſon whom I love, to ſave her life, and doubtleſs if he ſhould ſteal her away, he would not give her unto me.

But on the other ſide, if I ſhould put my ſelf into the hands of Tarquin, I ſhould be a Priſoner both to him and to the King my Father: I ſhall perhaps be only an unhelping Spectator of all thoſe puniſhments, which the Tyrant will inflict upon Clelia, and ſhall not have ſo much liberty as to die with her. But alas, if I ſhould flie or hide my ſelf, what can I do that way either for Clelia, or for my ſelf? I durſt not go to Rome and endeavour to deliver Clelia, I cannot go into the Camp and kill Tarquin if he intend to put her to death; and which way ſoever I look, I ſee nothing but inevitable miſery. As Aronces ſaid ſo, and as Amilcar was going to reply, they came to a place in the Wood, where ſeveral ways croſſed: So as Sextus turning aſide his head, he made a ſign unto Aronces, as who ſhould ſay, this is the place where he ſhould ſeparate from him; but that which ſeemed to prompt him to a reſolution, was it which made him more un-reſolved, not being able to imagine that Sextus could have ſo much generoſity, as to have no ſelf end in the counſel which he had given him: So as ſtaying in that place with Amilcar not knowing himſelf which way to wend, his Soul was tumultuouſly agitated with thoſe various thoughts which Love did raiſe, as he could not ſtir a ſtep either backward or forward.

The End of the Firſt Part.

MADAM,

IF to comply with your Modeſty were not to ſin unpardonably againſt your other Vertues, whoſe infinite merit enforceth all perſons to diſobey you, by a profeſſed admiration and acknowledgement of them, I ſhould fear to own this Duty. CLELIA.

The Second Part.

BOOK I.

O Ye gods, cry'd out Aronces, with a doleful accent, viewing the ſeveral ways, whereof it was now in his power to take his choice, into what a ſtrange confuſion am I reduced! Why do you not either either enlighten my mind, or force my Will? Or why muſt I be ignorant of what I ought, or might, or would do? It is indeed high time, replied Amilcar, to reſolve on ſomething; for when all is done, you muſt either for the Camp or for Rome. It is reſolv'd, replied immediately Aronces; it is reſolv'd, and what ever may be the event, I muſt go thither where Clelia is, and there expect how Fortune ſhall diſpoſe of us. The Sage Sivelia will haply favour me with a retirement, ſhe well knows the tender affection of her Son Herminius towards me, ſhe hates the Tyrant, and loves Vertue, which is motive enough to oblige her to do me any good office. If I repair to the Camp, continued he, I ſhall be diſcovered to be the Son of Porſenna, ſecured, and ſent to Cluſium, without being able to do any thing for Clelia. In the mean time it is eaſily conceived ſhe will want aſſiſtance, whether Tarquin conſider her as the Daughter of his Enemy; or look on her as a Servant; or that Prince Sextus forgetting the beauty of Lucrecia, be abſolutely ſubdued by hers. Therefore my dear Amilcar do you repair to the Camp, and there employ that noble Talent which the gods have beſtowed on you, cunningly to divert Tarquin from cauſing any ſearch to be made for me at Rome; nay acquaint not even Sextus himſelf with my reſolution thither; be both the Protector of Clelia's fortune and mine; engage our friends to contribute their ſervices; and to be ſhort omit nothing which your generoſity, friendſhip, or courage ſhall ſuggeſt unto you, as fit to be done.

This ſaid, Aronces and Amilcar reſolved on a certain place, where they ſhould hear from each other, and ſo parted, the former making towards Rome, the other to the Camp. Amilcar made ſuch ſpeed, that recovering the time which he had ſpent with his friend, he overtook Prince Sextus before he had reach'd the Camp, which he did purpoſely, that he might be an eye-witneſs of the firſt tranſports of Tarquin, when he ſhould underſtand that Aronces was not in his power. But having joyned with this Prince, and thoſe which accompanied him, Collatine asked him where Aronces was; whereto Amilcar anſwering, that he had loſt ſight of him in the Wood, and believ'd he would ſoon overtake them: Sextus, who was ſatisfied, he would not return, and had his imagination filled with the beauty of Lucrecia, began to play upon Collatine, and told him that Aronces was fallen in love with his Wife, and haply was returned to Collatia. Be it ſo my Lord, replied Collatine ſmiling, you may lament the misfortune of your Friend; for as to the humour of Lucrecia, if I were not her Husband, I would never be her Servant, were I not reſolved to be the moſt wretched of all Men. Hah Collatine (replied Amilcar, who made it his buſineſs to divert the company from thinking on Aronces) what a happy Man are you to be Husband to one of the greateſt Beauties in the World, and yet be guilty of no Jealouſie? It is indeed, ſays the Prince of Pometia, a very rare thing. I am of your mind, replied Sextus ſmartly, but when all is done it is not ſo ſtrange that Collatine ſhould not be jealous of a Woman that never ſees any body, one that views not her own beauty, and one ſo jealous of her ſelf, that ſhe will not be ſeen by any. What Sextus ſays, replied Artimedorus, is queſtionleſs conſiderable, yet the felicity of Collatine, is not to be eſteemed the leſs, who is married to one who only loves him and ſolitude. For my part, ſaid the pleaſant Zenocrates, I ſhould rather wiſh to be a while jealous, then to have my wife given ſo to ſolitude. But I, replied Collatine, am very well pleaſed with mine, not that if ſhe were of an humour to be as gallant as they ſay your Grecian and African Ladies are, I ſhould be ever the more jealous. You would indeed do very well in that, replied Amilcar, for to ſpeak truly, jealouſie in a Husband many times haſtens the misfortune by fears, ſince that his jealouſies rendring him hateful to his wife, ſhe moſt commonly beſtows all the love ſhe abates him, upon ſome other.

Such was the diſcourſe this merry company entertained themſelves with, when they came to the Camp: but they had ſcarcely reached Sextus's Tent, but he ſees a Man conducted by an Officer of Tarquin's who very earneſtly viewed all thoſe which followed him, whence he inferred, that it muſt be that Envoy of the King of Cluſium, who came to seek Aronces. So that approaching Amilcar, he communicated this observation to him, and asked him softly, where his friend was. My Lord, replyed he, I left him so distracted, as to resolution, that as I dare not assure you whether we may not see him here to morrow morning (though it be contrary to my advice) so am I utterly ignorant where he is, as having onely a promise that I shall know. In the mean time I conjure you to serve him what lyes in your power, as also to protect Clelia; and this continued he, I conjure you to do by the beauty of Lucrecia. It is but a day since, replied Sextus, that if you had made any request to me, I was onely exorable by the fair eyes of Clelia: but now, added he laughing, those of Lucrecia carry it. Ah, my Lord (replied Amilcar laughing with him) you do well to prefer the Brown Beauty before that which is Flaxen hair'd, for the latter is often guilty of coldness and indifference, and seldome discovers any picquancy or passion.

Upon this the Prince enters his Tent, taking no notice that he had seen the Envoy of the King of Clusium, who having viewed the Prince of Pometia, Prince Titus, Artemidorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates, Celeres, Collatine, and the rest of the company, told Tarquin's officer, who conducted him, that he whom he sought was not there, and so made towards this Prince, to acquaint him, that he had not found his Masters Son. But he was hardly in his presence, ere Sextus accompany'd onely by Amilcar, and Zenocrates, came into him. In the mean time, Tarquin being in a great distraction of mind, asked somewhat hastily, whether he had heard that Ardea should be reliev'd by Collatia, for to be short, continu'd he, I cannot conceive, but that you leaving the Camp, while I was engaged in so important a siege, you had some other design in it than your diversion. Sextus not us'd to brook such reproaches, was incens'd into a blush, and answer'd him as roundly. But Amilcar knowing how much it concern'd Aronces, there should be no mis-intelligence betwixt these Princes, he engaged himself into their contest with that pleasant confidence, which is so natural to him, and which gained him the oportunity to speak what he would, without offence taken. So that Tarquin recovering his tenderness towards his son, by the mediation of Amilcar, at length came to ask where Aronces was. My Lord, while we all came somewhat disorderly, every one according to his impatience, to be at the Camp, I am to learn whether Aronces be come before us, or be yet behind, and all I can say of him is, that I have not seen him since we came into a wood, that is not far hence. He had scarce said this, but Tarquin commanded he should be sought in his Tent, and all places he used to frequent; but it being fruitless to look after him, word was brought to Tarquin he was not returned. This gave him occasion to suspect he might be son to the King of Clusium, since that he appeared not. But to be more fully satisfied, he obliged the envoy of Porsenna, to describe him whom he sought, which he did so naturally, that it was no longer doubted, but that Aronces was the very Prince. Tarquin knowing that Celeres was his intimate friend, he sent him to seek him, and in the mean, inquired of Amilcar and Zenocrates, what they knew of the condition of Aronces. The latter answered, that his acquaintance with him was onely that he casually met him upon a journey, but for his birth and quality he knew nothing. And for my part, sayes Amilcar, though I know no more of him than Zenocrates, yet I am perswaded he deserves your Majestyes protection. Ah Amilcar, cryes out Tarquin, I would not wish Porsenna's son in my power, but onely to hinder him from doing a thing which would cause me to hate him, and which one day would raise a war between Rome and Etruria. For, to be short, if Clelius's daughter were once Queen of Clusium, I know nothing should divert me from entring into a war, should dethrone her, which I should be farther incouraged to, for that it were to satisfie the desires of Porsenna, who pretends an aversion she should ever reign over his Subjects. After some other discourse, Celeres returns, but though he answered what ever Tarquin demanded, with much prudence and circumspection, yet was this Prince further satisfied, that Aronces was the son of Porsenna; which thought Celeres did not acknowledge, yet was it easily discovered, that, not answering positively; neither as to the place of his birth, nor quality, there must be some secret reason that hindred him. But to be absolutely resolved; this Envoy of the King of Clusium having mentioned a mole which he that he sought had on his hand, Tarquin had observed it one day, that Aronces presenting him with two Prisoners he had taken, he stretched forth his hand to shew them unto him, so that the business being by this discovery put out of all doubt, Tarquin commanded he should be diligently sought out. He even sent to Rome to take him, if he were returned thither, and he spake with that violence, which easily discovered his mind disturbed by more then one passion. But my Lord, sayes Amilcar to him, may I presume to ask you what crime hath this pretended son of the King of Clusium committed? He loves the daughter of a man I hate, replied he furiously, and the King his father desires me to secure him, lest his passion engage him into something unworthy his quality, and the greatness of his courage. But my Lord, replyes Amilcar, do you know where the daughter of your enemy is, whom Aronces is in love with? In all likelihood, says he, she is among the Captives, which were taken at the sally out of Ardea; but this difficulty is to know which of them is the daughter of Clelius, for they are all very amiable; in the mean time, it is my greatest concernment to be satisfied. If you please, my Lord, replyes cunningly Amilcar, I will be your spie, for (added he slily) since there is no more to doe, then to cross Aronces's Marriage, I shall easily wave the interests of his love to engage my self into those of his ambition. What you say is very pertinent, or very generous, replyes Tarquin, but all things considered, I am resolved to be my own spie, for I would not be deceived in this design.

Sextus hearing his Father speaking thus, was troubled at it, as inferring thence, that he must needs love Clelia; which consideration had almost reflected him to the inclination he once had to that Beauty, and taken away much of that which he now had to Lucrecia. But at length Tarquin being resolved to act alone, Sextus shifting place, changed with all his sentiments, and not considering Clelia otherwise than as his friends Mistress, he directed all his thoughts to Lucrecia, and imagining what a great satisfaction it is to conquer a heart wich was never conquered, he could think of nothing else; for Amilcar, he advised with Artemidorus, Zenocrates, and and Oeleres, concerning the interests of their Friend, insomuch, as conceiving it requisite he should be acquainted with the state of his affairs, they sent to him a trusty Slave, directed to the vertuous Sivelia's house, so to be brought to Aronces. But for Tarquin, he was in a strange disturbance, as not being able to remain long in that uncertainty; so that the siege of Ardea being in a good condition, he resolved to pass away a day or two at Rome, as well to discover by his own industry, which of the Captives was the daughter of Clelius, as to cause a strict search to be made after Aronces,

The next day therefore, without any further delay, he departed, and came to Rome the same night, where he was no sooner arived, but the cruel Tullia, who had perceived that Clelia had smitten the heart of the King her Husband, came and acquainted (though she knew nothing of it) that the Captive whom he preferred before all the rest, was certainly the Daughter of Clelius, and Mistress of Aronces, which she augmented with a hundred other things of her own invention, to induce him to believe it. But he not being thereby convinced, and that the secret passion of his soul, flattered him into a Wish, that that person might not be the daughter of his Enemy, he gave the less credit to Tullia's relation. I know very well, answered he that by many arguments, Clelius's daughter is among the Captives; for, to be short, they were taken escaping out of Ardea, whence the Envoy of the King of Clusium affirmes, that that daughter of my Enemy was departed not long before the siege. Beside, the Grand Vestal, Sister to Clelius, pleaded for their Liberty, with an earnestness by which I easily perceived, that there was an interest of family, which she was more tender of, than any Vestal Privileges. But all this does not absolutely satisfie me, that this fair Captive, of whom you spake, is the daughter of Clelius. If you were not prepossessed, replied the fierce Tullia, you would believe as I doe; for as she is more beautiful then the rest, so is she the more likely to kindle a violent passion. Nay she is withall more given to melancholly, she hath much the aire of a Roman Lady, she will not positively tell who she is; and I have observed, that twice or thrice she hath not answered to the name which she now hath, whence I infer, it is not her own, and that she is not yet sufficiently accustomed to the name which her companions have given her. But I beseech you, replyes hastily Tarquin whence are you so resolved, that this beautiful Captive must be the Daughter of Clelius? When you have told me (replied she as fiercely) the reason, why you would not have her to be your Enemyes Daughter, I will tell you why I would have her to be so: Did you not know it, replyed he, I would tel you, but since it is so easie for you to imagine it, I shall spare my self the pains. However it be, replied she, know that I think it unworthy, that he who hath brought Rome it self under subjection, should submit himself to a Captive, and haply the Daughter of his Enemy; and assure your self further, that Tullia, who hath violated all right to put the Scepter into your hand, can easily hinder that person from coming above her, who ought not to look on me, but kneeling.

Having thus said, this fierce Princess departed, and Tarquin being in a strange confusion of thoughts, was onely certain of this, that he had a greater affection to Clelia, than he had ever had for any. But indeed ambition had so taken up his whole life before, that it may be said, he had not the leisure to Love; but as things stand now, Ambition lay in a manner dormant in his heart, since he saw no further object to engage his wishes. And since there is a certain relation between Love and Ambition (since that certainly it is as great an ambition to reign in the heart of a beautiful person, as in a State) Tarquin was insensibly captivated by the beauty of Clelia. But as the cruel Tyrant knew as yet better how to hate then to love, he was strangely tormented in mind, fearing to find the same person the object of his hatred and his love. Is it possible, said he within himself, that I should be so infortunate, as to love the daughter of Clelius? No, no, added he, it is an absolute impossibility, for my Heart without the assistance of my Reason, would have soon discovered the Daughter of my Enemy, and would not have been guilty of so great a baseness as to have loved her. It must be so, continued he, there is such an Antipathy between Clelius and me, and I have so inveterate a hatred for him, that if he were certainly the father of this beautiful person, I should be naturally obliged to hate her. But in fine (continued he after he had paused a while) in case my heart have betrayed me, if I am really deceived, and that this fair and inchanting Captive be effectually the Daughter of my Enemy, what course should I take? At these words Tarquin stopt a while, but suddenly recovering himself, Ah! base spirit that I am, cryed he, do I deliberate how I should deal with the daughter of Clelius? No, no, continued he, I defie all further deliberation, I must renounce her love, I must burthen her with my hatred and chains, and put her to death, to be revenged of her Father. But am I certain I should do what I say (said he again to himself) I have certainly in my life done things so extraordinary, that such an action as this might be lookt on as an ordinary consequence of the greatness of my courage; but when all is done, I never did any thing that seemed so heard to do as this: I have sacrificed a Wife to my Ambition, tis true; but I had no great love for her. I dethroned Servius Tullius, I acknowledge it; but I had ever hated him; and I never yet met with a necessity should force me to destroy that which I loved because I have loved nothing but my own greatness, and therefore I must confess I am yet to resolve what I should do: if this fair prisoner proved my Enemyes daughter. Here Tarquin was silent, and having paused a while, he repaired to the lodgings of the Captives, with intention to try all means to discover which of them was the true daughter of Clelius.

But when he was employed in this visit, Aronces struggled with incredible afflictions. For as according to his expectation, he had found the sage and generous Sivelia fervent to serve him, so he was hid in her house, and by her means held correspondence with all the secret friends of Clelius and Herminius, as also with the Grand Vestal. Thus he knew all that passed in the Camp, and at Rome, for the Slave which Amilcar had sent, was come to him, and by Sivelia he knew all that happened in the City. But that was it that rendred him the more unhappy, for as the state of affairs stood then, he could not rationally hope to apply any remedy thereto, Tarquin's power seemed to be so strongly establisht, that nothing could shake it. He was indeed generally hated, but withall he was generally feared, in as much as had he been beloved, he could not have been better obeyed than he was; and to be short he was become so dreadful, that men durst hardly think ought against him. There was not one true Roman who wished not it were in his power to destroy him, but there was not one who had courage enough to undertake it: so that it might be said that Rome had alwayes an infinite number of men fit to be conspirators, before there ever was any conspiracy; so dreadful were the proud Tarquin and cruel Tullia grown. Thus all that Aronces could do, was to bemoan himself, and endeavour to find out some means to send to Clelia, to see if there were any possibility to carry her away. But that was a thing seemed not so easie to be done, he being obliged either to continue this retirement, or run the hazard of being taken. Sivelia was of such a high spirit, that she never went to Tullias; nor was the Grand Vestall's absence thence without suspition: it was not fit many were acquainted with Aronces's retirement in Rome; all which augmented his misery as much as could be. Tarquin's arrival was no small affliction to him, nay he escaped not the misery of being acquainted with his visit to the Captives, and that the design of it was onely to discover which of the prisoners was the daughter of Clelius, so that his sufferings were such as will hardly admit a perfect imagination of them: For he considered himself every moment ready to be discovered and secured, and that Clelia would be found out by her fathers inveterate enemy, and the cruellest enemy that ever was. Alas (said he to himself, during the visit) what a deplorable condition am I in? for if Tarquin discovered Clelia, and that the hatred he beares her father exceeds the love, it is said, he bears her, he will destroy her, nay, will invent new torments to do it; but if his love to her shall outvie his hatred to Clelius, to what persecution is she, to what misfortunes am I exposed? But cruel and proud Tarquin, continued he, though thou were loved as much by the People as thou art hated, and that all my subjects were thy Guard, nothing should discourage me from attempting to deliver Rome, that so I may deliver Clelia, if so be thou art so unjust as to evil intreat her.

But while the unfortunate Aronces thus sadly entertained himself, Tarquin was in the lodgings of the Captives, from whom he had received the greatest civility which he could expect from persons, whose liberty could not be obtained without his consent. The end therefore of his coming thither that day, being to discover Clelia, he entertained them all secretly one after another, as soon as the first civilities were over. He was desirous Clelia might be the last he spoke with, because it was she he wisht might not prove the daughter of Clelia; so that not doubting but to find her among the Captives, he talkt with the sage Cesonia, the merry Plotina, and her companions before he spoke to Clelia. But though he sifted them very craftily, yet he could not make any great discovery; for being all excellently witty, and withall, bearing a great affection to Clelia, they told him nothing whereby he might be informed which was the daughter of Clelius.

But at length, taking Clelia aside, and viewing her sometimes with the looks of a Lover, sometimes with those of an Enemy (such a distraction was in his soul) I beseech you, Madam, says he to her, deliver me out of the greatest disquiet I ever was in, and, if it be possible, restore me into a condition, wherein I may both make you happy, and entertain some hope of being so my self. There is such a distance between your fortune and mine, replyes modestly Clelia, that I cannot easily imagine how the same thing can make us both happy: and, my Lord, continued she, can there be any thing wanting to your felicity? There is Madam, sayes he to her, and to acquaint you wherein my happiness is deficient, you are to know, there are in my soul two passions, both which I would fain satisfie, that is, Revenge and Love; for, for my part, I have every where placed Revenge among the most violent passions, since there is not any thing from whence proceeds greater violence as to Desire, nor greater sense as to pleasure. I therefore conjure your assistances to appease these two passions which excercise such a Tyranny over my soul. As concerning Love, pursued the Tyrant, I shall need onely to tell you, that you were no sooner in my chains, but I was in yours, I need say no more to engage an answer from you which shall make me happy. But for Revenge you must tell me which of the Captives is the daughter of Clelius, for as for your part, I am confident you cannot be the daughter of a man indeprecably hateful to me, and one whom I will destroy sometime or other, what part soever of the earth affords him a retreat. Clelia hearing Tarquin in such a fury, could not but blush, which he observing, and interpreting to signifie as much as that he might thence conceive she was the daughter of Clelius, he was surprised into the most horrid agitation of spirit could be imagined. However Love prevailing in this first sally, Ah Madam (cryed he taking her by the hand) be not the daughter of my Enemy, I conjure you, for I perceive that all your beauty could hardly fasten love so in my heart, but that hatred would forcibly displease it, If therefore you are not Clelius's daughter, shew me her whom I must sacrifice to my vengeance; but if you are she, deceive me if you can, and name some other to me who shall suffer all those punishments which the daughters of Clelius (the daughter of my most mortal Enemy) deserves. I shall presently believe you Madam, continued he, and I shall not afterwards trouble my self to be undeceived, so you but satisfie the love I bear you.

What you tell me, my Lord (replyed Clelia, with an admirable expression of a great courage) is so sudden and so strange, that I hardly know what to answer to it: But now I am provided, and shall do it so exactly, that you shall not need any further to persecute either my companions or me. Know therefore my Lord, that I do not conceive my self any wayes obliged to tell you whether I am Clelius's daughter, or not, and so I shall tell you nothing which may give you any light in that you so much desire to know, yet shall not stick to tell you what I truly conceive of your demand, whether I am she or not. For if I am not she, but some one of my companions be daughter to that unfortunate Exile, I will dye ere I discover her, having heard what I have said. But if on the contrary, I am she, whom yet you would not know, but that you might hate and destroy, I declare unto you, that if the mettal of my heart be right, I shall with rather your hatred, than your love, and shall never submit to flatter the passion of a man would take away my father's life. Therefore, my Lord set your mind at rest for this matter, matter, for as my Companions will not betray me, in case I were Clelius's Daughter, so neither shall I discover whether the Daughter of Clelius be among them: And to puzzle your enquiry the more, I will not positively tell you, whether I am or I am not Daughter to that noble Roman. I would not believe that you are his Daughter (replyed he abruptly) but you discover somewhat the fire of his heart; and if the mildness of your looks did not abate the sharpness of your words, I should immediately treat you as the Daughter of Clelius. As I am perswaded (replyes Clelia) that I have said nothing to you, which I ought not to have said, so I cannot admit of any repentance for it. But my Lord, continued she, whether some one of my companions be Clelius's Daughter, or that I am she, is it possible you should not see, that your mind cannot be guilty of these cruel sentiments of detestation, without a greater injustice than any you now stand accused of? All the violence you have committed since you came into the World, were done in order to your mounting the Throne; but what would it advance you to sacrifice a wretched Captive? To be revenged, replyed he insolently, in the Daughter of all the mischiefs the Father hath, or hath endeavoured to do me. For I am certain, continued he, that in what place soever Clelius is, he is perpetually plotting my ruine, and when he shall not imagine any possibility to accomplish his design, he will persecute me with his wishes, and it will be his affliction that he cannot do it.

But to be short (Madam) there is no mean in this case, you must either name me a daughter of Clelius, whom I may as highly hate, as I love you. I have told you already how gladly I would be deceived; but my Vengeance requires a Victim, for in that transportation I now am in, if you do not what I desire, I shall deal with all your companions, as daughters of Clelius, that so I might not be deceived as to that point: And so while you receive from me a thousand and a thousand expressions of affection, they shall as many of my detestation, and preteaded cruelty. Ah my Lord, cryed out the generous Clelia, though I were at my own disposal, though Tullia were not your Wife, and though you offered to raise me into the Throne, I should abhor the love of a Prince so unjust as you are. How now Coyness, sayes he to her, do you slight the passion of a man, who never loved any thing but Glory and You? Who hath brought all that have resisted him under subjection, who hath subdued a heart as great, and as high flown as yours, and yet makes you that offer which never was made to any? In the mean time, continued he, do not imagine that what I say is an airy threat, for I go presently, and begin the punishment of your Companions, by separating them from you. To be short, Tarquin commanded the Captain of his Guards to be called, but Clelia staying him, no my Lord (sayes she to him, with an undisturbed generosity) it shall never be said, that I have altogether escaped the injustice of Tarquin; and my life, in the condition I am, is not so precious, as that it should be preserved by any treacherous act. Know then, unjust Prince, that I am the daughter of the noble Clelius, and that my true name is Clelia. Ah Madam! replied he, why do you tell me what I desire not to know? I tell it you (replied she with a wonderful constancy) that you may see I am not unworthy my Fathers virtue, and that though I had not my birth in Rome, yet I have a heart truly Roman.

Clelia uttered these words with a confidence so allayed with modesty and composure, that Tarquin was amazed at it. Ah Madam, cryes he, you must questionless have a greater sence of the love I bare you, than I imagined, since you discover such a secret to me. But I know not (continued he sighing) what reason you have to trust me, for the agitation of mind I am in, makes me uncertain whether I yet love you, or begin to hate you. Hate me, hate me, my Lord, replied she, for it will be much easier for you to satisfie your love. I have at this instant so great a desire to hate you, replied he, and have so much reason to justifie it, that I despair not to subdue that other cruel passion which is in my soul. But to do it the more easily, I must forbid my self your sight, for though I am incensed by your confidence, yet the sweetness of your looks dis-ingages my cruelty and dis-arms my fury. And I wish it the pleasure of the Gods, my Lord, replyed she, I were so powerful as to re-instate Reason in your Soul, and banish thence that injustice which makes you hate my Father, and so fills your government with violence, that you can never expect Love where you find Obedience. Ah, excessive Charm! (cryed he, relenting on a sudden) how little would I have the hatred of all the World, so I had but your love! You are yet, continued he, at liberty, to retract what you told me. Tell me, I conjure you, that your affirming your self to be Clelius's Daughter, was onely out of design to save your Champions, hoping the Love I bear you would exempt you from punishment: I promise you belief, and though all the World should tell me that you were my Enemies Daughter, and that he himself should confirm it, I would not credit it, if you did not tell me so your self. To be short, have you not observed, that I have not done what I might for your discovery, and on the contrary, have only said that by which I might not discover you? For I might more easily have screwed out this secret, by giving you hopes of all things, and promising to pardon the Father for the Daughters sake, which you might, with justice expect from a man so deeply in Love as I am. Tell me then, I once more conjure you, that you are not Clelius's Daughter; deceive me, since it is for your advantage I would be deceived: But to deceive me right, abjure the interests of my Enemy, and if the sacrificing of Tullia can translate you into her place, I can easily consent to it. No, no, my Lord, replied Clelia, without seeming to be moved, I shall never recant; and since I have confessed my birth to you, my discourse and resentments shall be proportionate to it. I will not promise so much for my part, replied he, for if you will obstinately persist to be his Daughter, who hath so often endeavoured to dethrone me, I shall soon deal with you, as such a mans Daughter deserves. When I told you my name was Clelia, replyed she, I prepared my self to suffer all your outrages, and that like a Daughter of Clelius, that is to say, with an unalterable constancy. Hah, 'tis too much, cryes out the unjust Prince, so boldly to name my Enemy, and make it a glory to be the Daughter of a man who hates me beyond the measure of all hatred that ever was.

This fury having seized Tarquin's mind, it exhaled such black and ominous vapors into his imagination, that though Clelia were the same she was wont to be, that is, one of the most beautiful persons in the World, yet he looking on her with eyes troubled and eclipsed by the several passions which were stirring in him, thought her not now, what he thought her a quarter of an hour before. Being therefore as unlikely to treat her with the same respect, he commanded her to be carried to a lodging apart, that she should be carefully watched, and should not be admitted to speak with any whatever. All her friends and companions, who were on the other side of the Chamber, hearing this unjust command, cast themselves at Tarquin's feet, to beseech him not to separate them from Clelia. If there be any one among you, replyed he insolently, that will be Clelius's Daughter instead of her, I will be content, if she be. For my part, sayes the generous Cesonia, there's not any thing I will not say or do, to keep such a vertuous person from being ill intreated. What you say is great and noble, replyed Clelia; but if you think me worthy of so high a testimony of friendship, I must intreat you not to envy me the Glory to be Daughter to the most vertuous Roman, that ever Rome was Mother of: Take not that from me, I conjure you, since it is almost the only comfort I have left me. At these words, Tarquin being at a loss of all patience, caused the order he had given for the separation of Clelia and her companions, to be put in execution, he remaining immalleable amidst the Tears of so many eminent Beauties; which done, he departed to his Apartment.

But he was no sooner arrived there, but one of those he employed to discover what passed in the houses of those unfortunate Nobles he had banished Rome, acquaints him, that there was a man lay very secret at the vertuous Sivelia's house; adding, that it was in all likelyhood, Herminius, who was come away disguised from Ardea, and come to Rome to raise some tumult while he were ingaged in that Siege. Tarquin being then extreamly disturbed in his mind, did not at the first consider the probability, or improbability of this report; but being alwayes ready to do violence, he commanded a strong party to go and search Sivelia's house, in case she should make any resistance against those should come and demand Herminius. But he had scarcely given this order, but another relation arrives and confirms the former, and assures him that Aronces lurked somewhere about Rome; so that concluding that he who was said to be at Sivelia's, might very well be the King of Clusium's Son, he called back him he had commanded to the Mothers of the generous Herminius; for considering that the business now concerned the taking of a servant of Clelia's, and one of so great quality, he made some distinction between an Enemy and a Rival, and added some new Orders to the former, that, in case they should find at Sivelia's neither Aronces nor Herminius, they should bring to him the vertuous Roman Lady, to see if he could sift any thing, he desired to know, out of her.

He who was ordered to Sivelia's house, could not be there so soon, but, by her intelligence at Court, she had understood, that Tarquin had separated Clelia from the other Captives, that she was narrowly watched, and that there was a rendezvous of those whom this Tyrant used to employ, when some violence was to be committed in any of the houses of those illustrous Citizens, whom he hated only for their virtue. So that she, as famous for her Prudence as her Generosity, conceived that order might concern her, and that haply Tarquin had been acquainted with Aronces's retreat at her house; for Amilcar had once sent thither, and it was not impossible, but that a Slave might reveal a secret of so great importance; So that to go prudently to work, she thought fit Aronces were accquainted with the state of Affairs, and considered what were to be done for his safety, if they came to search the house for him: For having a high esteem for him, and looking on him as a friend of her sons, and, though unfortunate, yet guilty of a great Vertue, she was resolved to do as much for Aronces, as she would for Herminius, for whom she would have done any thing. Engaged in this consideration, she went to Aronces, who had just made an end of writing to Amilcar, and acquainting him how things stood, she proposed how much it concerned him suddenly to change his lodging. But I beseech you, sayes she, conceive not I make this Proposition to you, out of any suggestion of fear for my own concernments, for it is long since I am prepared for any violence the Tyrant shall be guilty of. But it so much concerns you, that you be not taken, besides the satisfaction my Son receives in my serving you, that I shall neglect nothing. The safest way therefore is, that you depart my house, and that very suddenly, and lodge your self in some one less suspected. When you are gone, continued she, fear not, I shall discover where you are, though Tarquin put me to the greatest torments, imaginable. I should be very unhappy, replyed Aronces, if I should expose one of the most vertuous Ladies in the World, to so great misery, and I would rather return into the power of Tarquin, than lay you open to his cruelty. To be short, if the admirable and unfortunate Clelia wanted not my assistance, I would spare you even that trouble of finding me a refuge. But (generous Sivelia) it is you have acquainted me with her condition; and if the contrivances of Amilcar, seconded by your endeavours, with those of your friends, and Clelius's, put me not into a condition to carry her away, when Tarquin shall be returned to the Camp, I fear I shall be the most unfortunate man in the World, since that otherwise the earth shall not own a more unhappy person than Clelia.

This done, Sivelia conceiving the departure of Aronces was not to be delayed considering the intelligence she had received, told him, that for to make his retreat good, he should be let out at a back-door into a blind street, abutting on the Cyprian street, and that there was a Garden-gate, which should be opened to him, as soon as she had acquainted herewith a certain friend of hers, who was Aunt to Brutus. But that you may be the more confident of her fidelity sayes she to him, know that this illustrious Roman Lady is a friend of Clelia's that she abominates the Tyrant, and that if her life might deliver Rome, she would be glad to sacrifice it. She is very ancient, yet guilty of a great vigour of body and mind; a lover of Glory and Honesty, a Kinswoman of my Husbands, and one that hath a great affection for me.

Here Aronces staying her, told her, there needed so much precaution, and that he wholly resigned himself up to her disposal; so that to lose no longer time, Sivelia sent one of her servants to this Aunt of Brutus, whom she before had prepared for the business, having indeed alwaies foreseen what she now feared would happen; so that it being near night, all was accomplished with ease. Thus Aronces having taken leave of Sivelia, who promised to acquaint him with what she should learn, and to send him what ever came from Amilcar, went from the house of this vertuous woman to that of Brutus's Aunt, who not knowing him as yet to be the son of Porsenna, entertained him onely as a friend of Clelius and Herminius, and an enemy of Tarquin.

But he was hardly out of Sivelia's, but he who was ordered to come to her house, was at the door followed by those that were able to force obedience. They soon were masters of the gates: but Sivelia knowing they could not find what they came for, she her self gave order all the lodgings of the house should be opened to them, Which done, the Tyrants officer in this business telling her, that he was commanded by Tarquin to bring her to the Palace; she told him, that heretofore she had more willingly obeyed him, when she was commanded to depart Rome, than she could now, that she was to go to a place where she had not set her foot since the death of the generous Tanaquil, and the Princess of Ameriola; but that howsoever she was ready to go along with him. To be short, followed by many of her Slaves, she is conducted to Tarquin, who no sooner cast his eye on her, but he asked her, whether it were Herminius or Aronces who had lain concealed in her house. My Lord (replies she without the least disturbance) if you truly knew what I am going to tell you, that is, that I shall tell you nothing which shall give you the least discovery of what you desire to know. For if neither Aronces nor my Son had been at my house, I should be obliged to say, I had not seen them; and if either of the two have really been there, I should so much the more earnestly assure you that your intelligence hath been false. for there are some emergencies wherein truth it self is criminal. If you might therefore, with less trouble to your self, have spared your pains of sending for the widow of a man of a great vertue, whom you did not love, and mother of another, whom you hate, though all the world assure me he hath all those qualities which can render a person of Honour worthy to be loved. The question is not, whether I have, or have not reason to hate Herminius, replies the rude Tyrant, for I never much examined that in all my life, because I suppose those that are in soveraign power do right, when they do what they will. But the business now is, to tell positively in what place he now is, who lay secret in your house, and whom you now have disposed elsewhere. No, no, my Lord, I shall never be forced to tell what I know not, or what I have no mind to reveal; therefore all I have to do, is to assure you that you get nothing out of me which may be prejudicial either to Aronces or Herminius, and that this resolution is such as no rewards, nor menaces, can make me change. Tarquin seeing this constancy of Sivelia, was extreamly exasperated, and spoke all he conceived would shake her resolution, but it proved fruitless, and she behaved her self with so much cunning and indifference, that he was somewhat doubtful whether he had been truly informed. So that to gain leisure to examine his own apprehensions, he sent Sivelia back to her house, and commanded all out of his presence.

But this solitude lasted not long, for the cruel Tullia, who had learnt how things stood, came to tell him that he was not so diligent as he should be, to satisfie the King of Clusium, that in the mean time he might want the assistance of his armes, seeing the obstinancy of those of Ardea, and that for this reason he should have searched for Aronces in all the houses in Rome. It is true (continued she, out of a hideous design of wickedness) there is a short and a surer way to satisfie Porsenna; for since, as they say, the daughter of Clelius is among the Captives, the onely way is suddenly to dispatch her, for that done, where ever Aronces be, he will soon resolve to return to Clusium, there being, questionless, no more approved remedy against Love, than the death of the person loved. I think the advice very good (replyes Tarquin somewhat sullenly) but presently holding his peace, he studied a while, as if he would have examined whether that which Tullia said, or he said himself, was well or ill spoken. So that in this secret discourse, perceiving that Tullia passionately wished the death of Clelia, rather out of a suggestion of jealousie, than any reason of state, he became the protector of her, to whom he had carryed himself as a Tyrant and a Persecutor, and not acquainting Tullia that he really knew the daughter of Clelius, when you have advised me to put to death all these Captives; said he to her, you consider not, but that onely one can be my Enemyes daughter, that the rest are persons of quality of Ardea; that, if we should happen to treat with that City, which defends it self so obstinately, these Ladies will be demanded, and that it might prove of ill consequence to have recourse to so violent a remedy in the present conjuncture. Those of Ardea will be the more hardly reduced, and the secret enemies I have in Rome will make it the pretence of an insurrection, when I am returned to the Camp. Of a hasty man you are a very prudent man, replies smartly Tullia, but I am but too well satisfied, that your Prudence is more obliged to your Love, than to Policy. In the mean time I am to tell you, that though Ardea should prove irreducible by the destruction of these Captives, and that Rome it self should thence rebell, I shall find the means to destroy the daughter of Clelius, that it may never be said, that a Princess who lifted you up into the Throne, be so slighted by you, as to be thought less considerable than a Captive. Fortune, Madam, replied fiercely Tarquin, hath placed you where you are, and me where I am; therefore let us continue as we are, and assure your self I shall ever do what I ought, to make the best use of that authority, which you say is derived from you.

As Tullia was going to make some mischievous reply, Amilcar (who had prevailed with Prince Sextus to send him to Rome, both to visit Aronces, and endeavour to make Tarquin return to the Camp, so to divert him from seeing Clelia) had sent in a message to the King for audience. Tarquin, who was well pleased, his conference with Tullia was thus interrupted, gave command he should be admitted, which caused this fierce Princess, who at that time regarded not what news came from the siege of Ardea, to retire grumbling, But Amilcar was scarce come in sight, but Tarquin having received him as well as the present disorder of his mind would would permit, asked him the reason of his coming, My Lord, said he to him, Prince Sextus knowing what zeal I have for your service, hath been pleased I should come and represent unto you, how necessary your sudden return to the Camp is, for since the enemy had understood by certain spies, that you were not there, they are strangely encouraged, insomuch that they have ever since excercised us with perpetual sallies. There is also a certain report scattered in the Army, which hath generally disheartned your Souldiery, for it is said you intend to raise the Siege, and will not return any more to the Camp: Therefore am I come in the behalf of all your Captains, to conjure you to return as soon as you can possibly. Prince Sextus himself (added he very cunningly) acknowledges that his humour, inclined to pleasures and diversion; is not so proper to retain soldiers in a regular discipline. Thus my Lord, if you credit me, you will soon disburthen your self of those affaires which detain you at Rome, and repair to the Army. For, to be free with you, I do not conceive you should be so earnest to satisfie the King of Clusium, that you should be wanting to a design so important as the siege of Ardea.

Tarquin thanked him for his advice, and told him he would follow it, but that he must continue yet a day or two at Rome. Amilcar having by this means insensibly dispersed part of the heavines, which clouded this Princes heart, husbanded so discreetly his humour, that this fierce Tyrant entred into discourse with him, about Aronces and Clelia, as if he would play the mediator between Porsenna and them and that he had changed his sentiments of Clelius, though indeed it was onely to lure Amilcar, reciprocally to tell what he knew of them. But he being faithful to his friend and withal, reserved as Tarquin thought himself, told him nothing that could prejudice either Aronces or Clelia, though it were the hardest task in the world, for he must neither have over-flattered Tarquin's love, nor yet too much awaken hatred and there was a certain moderation to be observed, which onely Amilcar was able to find out. But at length, after a long conference, which amounted to nothing, Amilcar retired. However, he could not that night have any account of Aronces, because it was too late; and not coming to know what had happened at Sivelia's till the next morning, he durst not go thither in the day-time. But as soon as it was night he visited that vertuous Lady, from whom he received all the civilities, which a friend of Aronces and Herminius could expect: so that as soon as the first salutations were over, and some little discourse about the present posture of affaires, she told him she would bring him to the place where Aronces was. But generous Sivelia (said Amilcar to her, when he knew where Aronces lodged) doth not Brutus live with his Aunt? He does, replies the discreet Lady, but trouble not your self for that. I am satisfied, replied Amilcar, he is a man will not dive very deep into your designes; but if I am confident of his stupidity on the one side, I am fearful on the other. To be short continued he, who told you that this man, who seems to have so little judgement and whom the world looks on almost as an Ideot, may not have wit enough to discover that Aronces lyes concealed at his Aunts? Not but that I am perswaded he hath more understanding than is believed, for I have seen him smile twice or thrice more opportunely, than if there were no reason for it. However it be, sayes the sage Sivelia, fear not Brutus, and be assured I would not have exposed your noble friend to any danger. I crave your pardon, Madam, replyes pleasantly Amilcar, and that for no light crime, since it is one of the greatest, that I had not absolutely cast my self on your prudence, but presume to dispute any thing which the sage Sivelia had done. But I assure you I shall not, while I live, be guilty of such a miscarriage, and that I had not now slipt into it, if the friendship I bear Aronces had not made me fear what I needed not, since he is under your conduct. Friendship with me, replies the generous Sivelia, signifies a thing so sacred, that if it had engaged you into some speeches I must needs have distasted, I should not have been displeased. But it is not come to that, for what you said proceeded from caution, and were it not that I am better acquainted than you, with the whole family of Brutus, I should have been to blame to have done what I have.

This said, Sivelia, according to her first intention, caused Amilcar to be brought to Brutus's Aunt, where Aronces lay hid; but he had no sooner seen her, but he thought her worthy to be a friend of Sivelia's and that the affections of these two illustrious persons were cemented with Vertue and Generosity; for she discoursed with him with so much judgement, and so great goodness, that he might justly conceive, that Aronces would not have trusted himself to a greater Sanctuary. But at length this illustrious Romane, who was called Racilia, perceiving he was in some impatience to see Aronces, led him to his chamber, where none had so much a sight of him, save two Slaves, of whose faith his Lady was confident, not fearing to be deceived in them, as having in matters of great importance, when her whole house was concerned, made trial of their discretion.

As soon as Aronces perceived Amilcar, his patience quickly reacht him, to express the joy he had to see him, and to know what occasions brought him to Rome, and what, since his arrival, he had learned of Clelia. He had such an art to make his thoughts so easily intelligible, that though at first he uttered but four or five words Amilcar, by the paraphrase of his looks and actions, understood all he would say. To spare him therefore the pains of asking, he told him in few words the occasion of his coming, and what he had done at Rome since his arrival, assuring him, for his greater comfort, he doubted not but to take away Tarquin to the Camp, and consequently remove him, both from Clelia and him; adding, that he was really much obliged to Prince Sextus, who seemed concerned in his safety, and that of his Mistress. Alas my dear Amilcar, said he to him, I am afraid he is but too much concerned in Clelia. No, no, replyes this pleasant friend, you have now nothing to fear on that side, for Horatius the amiable Zonerates and my self have done nothing since your departure but railed at flaxen haired Beauties, and celebrate the brown, and presently Lucrecia runs so in his mind, that he can talk of nothing else, unless it be when Collatine is present, nor can he well abstain then, and some dayes since transported with his amorous imaginations, he had almost discovered to him the passion he had for his wife. Ha, Amilcar, how am I obliged to you sayes Aronces, to have removed moved from me so terrible a Rival? and how much would you add to that obligation, if you could hinder Tarquin from being one? But if he were not, replyed Amilcar, he would be an enemy to Clelia, and she should be equally a mark of his hatred, or his love. Good God! cryes out Aronces, that which I think in this occurrance, is absolutely criminal; for if I should believe my first apprehensions, I could wish Tarquin were rather an Enemy to Clelia, than a lover; but after a consideration, resumed he, since that as an Enemy he might take away her life, that as a Lover he may preserve it, and that his love is the necessary obstacle, which staves off the lamentable effects of his hatred; let us, if we can, wish that he may continue his love to Clelia, but let it be withall, our prayer, that we could dispose of her in such a place as where she may fear neither his Hate nor his Love. To this end, replyed Amilcar, I shall make it my indeavour to continue in Rome, when I have obliged Tarquin to depart, to see if there may not be some means to corrupt the Guards of Clelia, to carry her away, or even to perswade the cruel Tullia to dismiss a Captive, who possesse the heart of Tarquin. Aronces, who could think of nothing but Clelia, swallowed all Amilcar said, as if things were really arrived to that pass, and as those whose souls are governed by a violent passion, he discoursed of occurrences which in probability would never come to pass. He made a hundred frivolous objections, proposed for expedients, things almost impossible, though he knew them to be such, and he kept Amilcar so long that the sage Rasilia was fain to send them word that it was time he retired lest that returning late to his lodging, he were suspected engaged in some Plot at Rome, and that it should be discovered it were so indeed; so that these two friends were forced to separate. My dear Amilcar, sayes Aronces, embracing him, how happy are you, that you are not acquainted with Love! and how wretched am I, who have not the power even to wish I know it not, though all the unhappiness of my life proceed from this passion. Truly, replyes Amilcar smiling, if you knew how idle he is that loves nothing, you would not think me so happy as you do, for many times I know not how to dispose of my leisure, nor of my reason, no not of my thoughts: and were it not that my own frolick humour gave me some diversion in the Camp, where there are no Ladies, I know not what would become of me; nay, so far am I from being able to elude Love, real or feigned, more or less, that many times I create to my self an imaginary love, which plaies with me the Lieutenant of a real one. This created passion, when I have none real, exercises my imaginations without disturbing my mind; and this amorous disposition, causing neither great grief, nor great joy, does yet gently entertain the fondness of my fancy. In this condition I can more easily make Love-verses, than when the soul is hurried away with some violent passion; and in this humour I can be almost as trivially pleasant in talk, as if I proposed to my self all those indulgences, which feed the hopes of the happiest lovers. Ah, my dear Amilcar, cryed Aronces, you rather affect Love in general, than direct it to your particular Mistress, and could I be but of your humour, I should be much less miserable than I am.

Being at this point, they heard a certain noyse upon the stairs, which enquiring what it was, they were told that Brutus was come into the house, so that Amilcar, to give him way to repair to his lodging, stayed a little longer with Aronces, yet not without a little reflection on Brutus's late staying out, for that he could not imagine, that one of no greater designs than he, could be guilty either of humour or business to detain him so long. But he made no longer discant on it, and so parted with his friend, after he had once more promised him the utmost of his power for Clelia, and to engage Tarquin to a sudden return to the Camp, that he might endeavour in his absence to carry away this beautiful person, and that so, as Aronces and she might return to Clelius at Capua, to avoid at once the cruelty of Tarquin, and the violence of Porsenna. But for Amilcar, his intent was to pass into Sicily, and thence return to the Prince of Carthage his Master, knowing well, that by reason of the interests which were to be reconciled between the Republique and that Island, Tarquin was not to be thought over considerable, Rome being not at that time able to wage a Sea-war.

But as humane prudence cannot with certainty foresee whatever shall come to pass, though one be ever so expert in the art of disputing by conjectures, Fortune disposed otherwise of things. At first sight it seemed likely things would have happened as Amilcar had imagined, for he acted his part with so much subtilty, that within two dayes he got Tarquin to return to the Camp. It is true, the former of these two daies proved infinitely crosse to Clelia, for Tarquin came once more to visit her, and talkt to her things so contradictory, that it was easie to perceive that Hatred and Love caused a strange disorder in the heart of that Prince. But as his soul, through the whole course of his life, was rather accustomed to hate than to love, so he insisted more on things harsh and cruel, than those which speak sweetness and passion; and he much more easily found out words fit to express his hatred than his love: so that he omitted no menace he thought would oblige her to deny her self to be the daughter of Clelius, and to resolve to satisfie his passion. But she being fortified with a rocky constancy, a vertue that hath no parallel, and an extraordinary faith to Aronces, answered him with a confidence might convince him, she would not retract what she had said. Whereupon having shook hands, with all hope of making her change her resolutions, and his love coming to act the last part, he remained a certain time silent, not so much as looking on Clelia, as if he were afraid her beauty might soften the hardness of his heart. He therefore leaned on a window which opened towards Mount Palatine, and musing on the present posture of his soul, Love became predominant, and flattered himself with a perswasion, that if he could subdue the hatred he bore to Clelius, he might conquer Clelia.

But he had hardly entertained the imagination, that to gain Clelia, he must send for Clelius, and recant his own former apprehensions, but Love gave place in his turn, and Hatred as being the stronger, entred on the government of his Soul. So that being resolved to depart the Chamber where Clelia was, disorderedly he lifted himself from the window, and began to go towards the door. But not being able to do it without looking on the beautiful person, and meeting with her eyes pregnant with a new birth of tears, he once more ſuffered a change in his imaginations, and not taking the leaſt time to conſult. Well cruel perſon ſaid he to her, what muſt be done to make you flexible? muſt I ſtifle the hatred I bear Clelius? Muſt I love you as the Daughter of my Enemy? Muſt his baniſhment be revoked? Muſt he be preferred before all other Romans? Speak Cruelty, ſpeak, and ſet a price on your heart that I may purchaſe it; for to be ſhort, I will ſacrifice the hatred I bear Clelius, and the love I profeſs to Clelia; but that heart, as obſtinate as it is, ſhall one day come into my poſſeſſion. I am perſwaded, replyes the generous Virgin, that if you ſhould ſend for my Father to come to Rome, he would not conſent, and that it were as hard for him to forget the injuſtice you have exerciſed towards him, as for you to forget your own cruelty. Therefore I have nothing to anſwer you, but what I have already, for I am not only againſt you, becauſe you hate my Father, but alſo becauſe he hates your tyranny, and that I hate it my ſelf. Not but that if you could repent you of all your violences, the hatred might diſſolve from my heart, but, my Lord, that love ſhould take its place, it doth not follow, that which you deſire of me being ſo abſolutely impoſſible to be granted, that it is not worth your beſtowing a thought on't. Ah, 'tis more than enough (cryes out the Prince exaſperated by the conſtancy of Clelia) and I cannot ſuffer this obſtinate aſſurance, wherein you ſo much glory. How, continued he, bluſhing for anger, I ſhall be thought weak for my deſire; to love you as the Daughter of Clelius, for endeavouring to ſubdue my hatred, and offering a horrible violence to all my inclinations; and I ſhall be aſhamed to have been guilty of this baſeneſs to no purpoſe. If it be ſo, continued he with a certain threatning action, you ſhall rather repent your obſtinacy. As I have never deſired any thing but what reaſon and vertue ſuggeſts, replyed Clelia, ſo, my Lord, do I never repent, nor can all your power ever oblige me to entertain a thought of that nature. We ſhall ſee that, ſayes he arrogantly to her, when I ſhall once be able to hate you, which I hope I ſhall, if you learn not that I am well Verſed in the art of Revenge, and that it is eaſier for Clelius to undergo baniſhment, than for you to ſuffer the torments I ſhall aſſign you. When you once begin to hate me, replyed Clelia, without the leaſt agitation of ſpirit, you deliver me from one of my greateſt torments, by diſburdening me of your love. If I were of your opinion, replyed he, I would ſtruggle with my paſſion, and love you while I live. If you take it ſo, anſwered Clelia, I muſt certainly be the more wretched, but you will be never the happier: Therefore, my Lord if you will truſt me, hate me, ſince that thence only you muſt derive your quiet. My life is at your diſpoſal, and there is no puniſhment which you may not inflict on me; but for my will, my Lord, it is not in your power to regulate it according to your humour, and my Father is the only man in the World, whoſe empire extends to that. Since you will have it ſo (replyed he with a Barbariſm, which carried ſomething terrible along with it) I will hate you, and that moſt horribly. But what do I ſay? continued he, I hate you already, and if I were not reſolved to make you ſuffer a tedious puniſhment, you ſhould not long hug your ſelf in the vain glory you derive from oppoſing one whom never any oppoſed but to his repentance.

Hereupon Tarquin left Clelia, but withal commanded ſhe might be carefully looked after, and that none whatſoever ſhould ſpeak with that fair and vertuous perſon, no not even Tullia her ſelf. As he went out he met Amilcar, who deſirous to diſcover ſomewhat of his ſentiments, ſaid to him ſmiling that he was come to beg the favour of him, that he might viſit the Captives; for, my Lord continued he, I ſuppoſe you trouble not your ſelf much to ſuffer thoſe to be ſeen whom you do not believe the daughters of Clelius. You are in the right, replyed, Tarquin, and on the contrary, I ſhould be well pleaſed you ſaw them, conditionally you will inform me what they ſhall tell of Clelia. I told you, my Lord, once before, replyed cunningly Amilcar, that I was a friend to Aronces, but that I do not conceive my ſelf obliged blindly to humour his paſſion, if ſo be he be guilty of any, and it is not impoſſible but that I may be very ſerviceable to you in your deſigns. But my Lord, added he, it is neceſſary I ſee Clelia her ſelf, for from her companions I ſhould get nothing, ſince they are not together, and it were much the ſhorter way, that I ſhould ſee her the firſt, whether your deſire be I ſhould ſcrue ſomething out of her which you would be glad to know, or that I muſt endeavour to make her change her reſolution. Beſides, my Lord, continued he, I muſt needs tell you, and that with an ingenuouſneſs which cannot proceed but from the earneſt deſire I have of your quiet, that great Perſons, ſuch as you are, cannot condeſcend to a hundred trifles which yet muſt be known to make one able well to Husband the inclinations of Women. You have ſpent your whole life, either to learn the art of Government, or to put in practiſe ſome noble kingly Science, which conſiſts only in things high and ſoveraign; but on the contrary, to diſcover the Secrets of Women, and take in the Garriſons of their ſpirits, a man need aſcend no higher than a certain Art, called the Trifling Art, if I may ſo expreſs it, which I have ſtudied all my life, and am admirably perfect in. In the mean time, my Lord, you are not to conceive, that this Art is eaſily learned, for, take it from me, there is as much required to know all the ſeveral wayes of Application, wherein a man muſt addreſs himſelf to the Reſerved, the Jocund, the Fair, the Deformed, the Gentle, the Fierce, the Weak, and the Obſtinate, as skilfully to govern ſeveral nations of ſeveral inclinations: For whereas ordinarily every Nation is actuated and informed by a certain general inclination, almoſt all Women are ſo wedded to their particular humour, which muſt neceſſarily be found out by him whoſe buſineſs it is to over-maſter it. There are ſome a man muſt be as ſubmiſſive to as a Slave; there are others which you muſt in a manner ſlight, before you have their love. There are ſome cannot be brought acquainted with Vice, but by continually preaching of Vertue to them; others on the contrary, though pleaſantly free in diſcourſe, yet of a conſtant Vertue. There are ſome, into whoſe greateſt ſecrets you skrue not your ſelf, but by entertaining them with trivial ſtories; there are others only reducible by Preſents; others whom you engage when you give them occaſion to preſent you with any thing; there are, to be ſhort, ſo many ſeveral ſorts, that, without any extraordinary correſpondence with Woman-kind, a man may be eaſily deceived. But for my part, my Lord, I dare brag I cannot be, and if you would pump out any ſecret secret, I am the fittest handle in the World for such a business. I am convinced, replyes Tarquin, but the question is, whether a friend of Aronces be fit to make representations of Clelia. At these words Amilcar was a little to seek, for that a certain punctilio of Vertue made him a little shie, and hardly induced even to deceive Tarquin, though a Tyrant; but considering there was no other way for him to serve his friend, he answered him in such ambiguous terms, that Tarquin might expound them well, even according to his intention. So that really believing that Amilcar thought it more advantagious for Aronces, to suffer himself to be cured of the love of Clelia, than to persist in the disease of it, he was inclined to burthen him with part of his secrets. Whereupon, taking him along with him to his chamber, he entertained with a Panegyrick upon Aronces, telling him how earnest he was for his quiet and his glory, and to rid him of his love, he was, if possible, to be perswaded that Clelia loved him not, and to perform this the better, it was to be certainly discovered whether she did love him truly. It is true, continued Tarquin, correcting himself, that Aronces is a person so amiable, that it is not to be doubted but that he is beloved where he loves. Ah my Lord, replyes Amilcar, smiling with that freedome he took, when he endeavoured to please, it is apparent that your soul hath been guided by Ambition, rather than Love, since you conceive there is any regard of equity in the choyce of a Lover. Besides that to speak truly, a King can never be well acquainted with things of this nature, for the respect which men bear to persons of your quality, causes them not to appear to you without disguise; and so you are to learn, that there is nothing so humorous as the choyce which Love makes. For sometimes you see men of excellent parts love persons of ordinary merit; and very often it's observed that Women despise very handsome men, and adore others, who can boast of almost nothing recommendable. For which reason I have ever relyed more on the fantastick humours of those I have loved, than on my own Addresses and Services, nay than on a certain Drollery I am guilty of, which they say, is sometimes requisite to entertain Ladies. Therefore, my Lord, though Aronces be indeed, a graceful person, it follows not he is beloved, and if you will grant me the liberty to entertain Clelia, I promise you a faithful account of her heart. I am content, replyes Tarquin, conditionally you truly inform me, whether she love Aronces or not. But my Lord, (replyes Amilcar very cautiously) I do not engage my self to discover the whole secret of her Soul at the first visit, and you must give me leave to see her more than once; nay it were not amiss if you suffered Plotina to be with her, for she being a merry conceited Lass, and one that pretends some friendship to me, I may make use of that affection to make her reveal what you desire to know.

This Amilcar uttered, in a manner seem'd so natural, that Tarquin, notwithstanding his distrustful humour, was surprized by it: So that by this means Amilcar got one of Clelia's friends to be with her, and had the liberty to see her, which was no small comfort to that beautiful Captive, and the unfortunate Aronces, whom Amilcar acquainted with all this the same day. But to continue this intelligence, he related divers things to Tarquin concerning the consent of these two persons, whence he concluded, that he really was an engine very fit to discover what he was impatient to know.

In the mean time, the news that came from the Camp, pressing Tarquin's return thither, he left Rome, not being fully resolved whether he should love or hate Clelia, none being able to guess whether of these two passions should have the disposal of his mind. For, in some strict charges that he gave, he provided that the cruel Tullia should not, in his absence, meddle with the Captives; and in others he seemed to be the absolute disposer of Clelia's destiny. He set over her as a guard, one he had employed in his most horrid cruelties, for it was the same who was accused of having poysoned Brutus's Father and Brother, by the command of this cruel Tyrant, who had never furnished him but with such tragical Commissions. Nevertheless he commanded him to admit Amilcar into Clelia's Chamber, until he should receive order to the contrary, allowing this friendly African eight dayes to find out the true apprehensions of Clelia, which expired, he was to render him an account. He also charged all those Spies, whom he had alwayes kept at his own charge, to use all means possible to discover if Aronces were not at Rome, and to learn precisely who that man was, who (he had been informed) lay hid at the vertuous Sivelia's. He spake more insolently than ever he had done to the cruel Tullia, who certainly wanted not an earnest desire of being able to destroy him whom she had elevated into the Throne, could she have hoped to be countenanced either by the Senate or People.

But her cruelties had so allarmed the general hatred against her, that she could not hope the least assistance, though she should undertake to destroy Tarquin, for that none would have trusted her.

Amilcar, in the mean time, acquainting Aronces with every dayes adventures, they sent to the Camp, and writ to Artimedorus, Zenocrates, and Celeres, that they might take notice of what passed; as also that they should oblige Prince Sextus to do what lay in his power for Aronces, and keep Tarquin from returning to Rome, at least till the siege of Ardea was over: On the other side Sivelia, going almost every day to Racilia's, visited Aronces, where was resolved what was to be done. These two vertuous Ladies went also sometimes to see the grand Vestal, but secretly, and advised with her about the means to relieve Clelia. But though Aronces, by the advice he gave, was as active for Clelia as any other, and was as it were the intelligence of all those designs which were moving for her Liberty, yet he was overwhelmed with incredible misfortunes, but chiefly for that he was forced to confine himself for certain dayes, not daring to stir abroad for fear of being taken, and that he durst not act by himself.

In the mean time, Amilcar knowing whatever news was stirring in Rome, as well as if he had lived there all his life, found there was a knot of young men, persons of quality, who were very desirous to shake off the Yoke of Tyranny; and when they were sure they were not heard, expressed their hatred of the Tyrant with much freedome, though till that time none durst so much as speak of him, ever since he was established in his power. But being very raw, as if it were the first Year of their acquaintance with this World, their courage much exceeded their prudence, so that Amilcar looking on those young men as fit for the execution of any dangerous enterprise, if there were need, thought fit to court their correspondence; for though they were of the Army, yet they often came to Rome, the distance between it and the Camp being not great. Besides that, upon Tarquin's return thither, a cessation of all hostility for eight dayes was agreed on; during which time there were some offertures made of an Accommodation.

In the interim, two Nephews of Publius Valerius, a Kinsman of Horatius, and an Uncle of Lucretia came to Rome, into whose company Amilcar shuffled himself so handsomely, that they distrusted him not; and he so flattered their humours by the sport he had made them, that he soon commanded their hearts: so that he concluded, that if there were any occasion for them, he might command them, especially if they were to be imployed against Tarquin; for they were no longer scrupulous even in his presence, to discharge whole vollies of derisions and imprecations at the Tyrant. There was one thing which particularly made them glory in their Resentments, which was, that there was another combination of young men which they called, by way of abuse, the Slaves of favour; for indeed the young Vitellians, the Aquillians, and Brutus's two Sons, who were yet of the youngest, were much at the devotion of Prince Sextus and the two Princes his Brothers, so that not being able to comprehend how those, whose fathers and most of their friends, had been destroyed through the cruelty of Tarquin, could be faithful to the Prince, they cast at them, among themselves, all the injuries imaginable, whence Amilcar presumed he should find them ready to execute any adventurous action when occasion should serve.

But during the cessation of the siege of Ardea, it seemed to be the pleasure of Fortune, there should be a kind of a general truce in the hearts of so many illustrious afflicted persons. For Aronces had the opportunity to write to Clelia, by Amilcar, and by the same hand received her answer. Clelia consequently had the happiness to receive fresh expressions of her Lovers faith, and to give reciprocally the like of hers. Plotina had the felicity to see Amilcar, who was so precious in her esteem; Amilcar had the satisfaction to entertain her, and the glory of being so effectually serviceable to his friend. And the vertuous Sivelia was felicifyed in the company of her illustrious Son, who taking the advantage of the Truce, came disguised to Rome, not onely out of a consideration of love, but also to see his noble Mother, and visit Aronces, whom he was not a little glad to acquaint with what he knew of Horatius, as also to endeavour to do him some good office: for he had received by the Spies which those of Ardea had in Tarquin's Camp, that Aronces was not there, and was conceived to lurk in Rome. So that not doubting but that Sivelia could give some account of him, his resolution was to be fully satisfied. Horatius for his part, in his excessive affliction, had some benefit by the Truce, for that it afforded him the leisure to perfect the cure of his wounds, and to consider what he should do to outvie the generosity of his Rival, yet without violating the interest of his love. Nay, even Tarquin himself was at some ease, for that he received from Amilcar, what gave him some shadow of hope.

As for Prince Sextus, he had the least share in this happiness, for the love of Lucretia exercised such a tyranny over his soul, that he had not the least command of it himself.

As for Prince Titus, and the Prince of Pometia, they also having some secret interest to manage at Rome, found their convenience of the Truce as well as others: Nay, even the cruel Tullia put on a little more cheerfulness, and became less furious than she was wont, as being in some hopes to corrupt him who kept Clelia, who not conceiving himself sufficiently rewarded for the late murthers he had committed by the orders of Tarquin, seemed enclined to swallow the promises of this cruel Princess.

Things being in this posture, the noble Herminius came one evening to Sivelia's, Amilcar being in the house, who was extreamly glad to see him, for he had a natural affection for him, and infinitely esteemed him for his parts and vertue. Herminius also, who had as great experiment of the merit of Amilcar as any living, was overjoyed to find him at his vertuous Mothers, from whom he had received a thousand expressions of tenderness, which he had requited with as many obliging testimonies of gratitude and true friendship.

But Sivelia's enjoyment was somewhat obscured by a certain fear she had, lest her Sons return might be discovered; but Tarquin not being at Rome, and Amilcar advising, that Herminius should for more safety, lodge with Aronces, she was received and with more quiet enjoyed the presence of a Son, in whom all the vertues made a glorious constellation, and in whom his greatest enemies found not the least declination to any evil habit. For indeed Herminius was in his inclinations noble, in heart free, passionate, compassionate, and generous; in humour he was mild, civil, obliging, complaisant, having a mind fit for all things, and fortunate in finding out many pleasant and innocent circumventions to divert his friends of both sexes. Moreover, though he was a very discreet person, and sufficiently reserved among those who had not much of his company, yet, when he pleased, he screwed up his humour to a certain bravery and sprightliness; but to those he loved not this was mystical, and his frolickness might confidently be taken for an expression of his esteem and his affection. He was excellent good at writing of Billets of all sorts, and had such a happy and easie vein of Verses, that it was Amilcar's judgement, Greece afforded not a more generall, a nobler, and a more nimble wit, than that of Herminius, insomuch, that sometimes he would wish he might change wits with this illustrious Roman saying, that Phocilides the Milesian, who was then alive, had never made better Verses then he, nor Sappho more amorous. Amilcar therefore having an infinite esteem for Herminius, made a thousand obliging expressions to him at his coming to Sivelia's, but at last left this dear Son with his excellent Mother. But after promise he should go to Aronces his lodging, whither he was going himself, and where, according to his custome, he used to pass away the Evening. Sivelia therefore having acquainted Herminius how all things stood which concerned his fortune, sent notice to Racilia of her sons arrival, and begged the same favour for him as she had done for Aronces. To which that generous Matron having made such answer as was fit she should, Herminius went to her house, where he was received received as a kinſman of her husbands, and as a friend for whom he had a great tenderneſs. He had alſo the happineſs to ſee a Neece of hers, whoſe name was Hermilia, a Virgin, if any in the world, had extraordinary excellences both of body and mind; but he was much ſurpriſed to find that neither Aronces nor Amilcar had ſo much as ſeen her. Not that Racilia was confident of the diſcretion of this Beauty; but the reaſon ſhe gave Herminius, was, that ſhe found Aronces ſo afflicted, and Amilcar ſo frolick, that ſhe thought the melancholy of the one would not admit diverſion, and the frolick humour of the other was enough for his friend and himſelf. But Herminius aſſuring the intereſt of a Kinſman of the fair Hermilia, told her Aunt, that his friends muſt needs ſee her; Racilia then, without delay, accompanied with her daughter, conducted Herminius to Aronces's chamber, where they found Amilcar, who had that day brought a Letter from Clelia to that illuſtrious Lover, which conſequently affording him as great ſatisfaction, as the unhappy ſtate of his affairs would permit him to receive, he entertained Herminius with a many expreſſions of gladneſs, having firſt asked Racilia leave to embrace his friend. But theſe firſt ceremonies of friendſhip being over, Herminius preſented Hermilia to him, acquainted him who ſhe was. How, cryes out Amilcar, hath this fair Virgin been in the houſe ever ſince I came hither? She has, replyed Herminius ſmiling, and had it not been for me, this Treaſure had been yet hidden from you. Ha Madam, ſayes Amilcar to Racilia, your generoſity is very great in regard of your compaſſion, not to conſider that the ſight of this beautiful perſon is an excellent medicine for unfortunate perſons. It may be, replyed obligingly Aronces, ſhe is as likely to make, as to cure ſuch. But if you'l believe me, ſayes Racilia, there is no great danger of her doing either, for ſhe ever ſayes that a man is not to ſeek his comfort any where but in himſelf, and that in her own nature ſhe is ſo harmleſs, ſhe can do no hurt, which her compaſſion ſhall not allay, if it cannot cure. As I have never been ſo unhappy as to do any, replied the modeſt Hermilia, ſo I am not certain whether I ſhould be ſo good as I am believed, and ſo I ſhould have as great a pitty for thoſe ills I were guilty of, as for thoſe I were not.

This paſt, Aronces being Maſter o'th' Ceremonies in his own chamber, though it were in Racilia's houſe cauſed theſe Ladies and his two friends to ſit down. It is true, that while Amilcar ſpoke to this vertuous Roman and her Neece, Aronces liſtned to Herminius, who acquainted him with all he knew of Horatius. As I am true to you, ſayes he in a low voyce, I muſt needs confeſs that I have diſcovered in your Rivall, the moſt generous reſentments in the world; for it is conſtantly believed, that in ſome intervals, he wiſhes he could love you, and that he could give over loving Clelia. But in others he hath an extream indignation to be obliged to you for his life, and cannot but wiſh himſelf the poſſeſſion of her whom you love, or at leaſt deſires you might not poſſeſs her. So that Generoſity and Love being at continual variance in his heart, Reaſon, inſtead of deciding ſo great a difference, ſometimes is of one ſide, ſometimes of the other, and rather foments than qualifies this civil war. But I pray, ſayes Aronces to him, how long may Ardea hold out? for it concerns me the Siege continue, that it may be the longer ere Tarquin return to Rome. As for Horatius and my ſelf, replies Herminius, we ſhall maintain it ſo well with the general aſſiſtance of the inhabitants (who are ſo reſolute, that they will not yield till after all extremities) that in caſe the Treaty come to no effect; as I verily believe it will, Tarquin ſhall find he hath more work to do then he conceives; for his Army is daily weakned, and the People of Ardea becomes more warlike by Diſcipline, ſo that it is probable our Forces will be the greater at the end of the Siege, than they were at the beginning, though we have no forraign ſupplyes.

But while Aronces and Herminius were thus ingaged, Amilcar entertained Racilia and her charming Neece; and having an admirable inſinuation, to ſift out any thing he had a mind to know, and yet do it by way of diverſion, he pleaſantly asked Racilia why the women at Rome were reſerved, and more given to ſolitude, than in Greece or Africk, or indeed in any other parts of Italy. Is it that the men are here more terrible? or is it that the women are guilty of too eaſie a reſentment of (not to ſay) a greater diſpoſition to love? or is it that they are threatned more like priſoners? If you had known Rome, as I have known it, replied Racilia, you had much more reaſon to ſpeak as you do; for when I was young, all the women were as reſerved as ſo many Veſtalls, they were not ſeen but in the Temples, and upon Feſtival dayes, Marriages were contracted rather upon conſideration of the intereſts of Families, than any acquaintance of the perſons, and mens hearts are ſo inflamed by a love of Fame, that they thought not of any thing elſe.

But ſince the death of the vertuous Tanaquil, and the dethronement of Servius Tullus, the greateſt part of the Roman Ladies are not indeed Romans, and women live a manner here as they do in other places. But a little farther, ſayes Amilcar, I would fain know why they are alſo more auſtere here than in other cities, and why they have been yet more then now they are? For my part, replyed Racilia, when ſhe had well conſidered it; I think, it proceeds from this, that Rome was built by men that had no wives, and who came not by them, but by forcing them from their neighbours. For being at the firſt afraid, leſt they ſhould again forſake them they kept them very ſtrictly, and uſed them to a ſolitarie kind of life, which after became cuſtomary and decent. Certainly, replyed Amilcar, this decency is very unjuſt and very rigorous. Beſides, continued he, if the women at Rome, were not handſomer then elſewhere, I ſhould be contented they were mewed up, but they are ſo handſome, that it is an affront to the Gods who govern the world, to hide the greateſt ornament of it, and I am confident, he who ſhould take the fair Hermilia's opinion in this caſe, would find that her thoughts and mind were at no great diſtance. As I am not handſome enough replied ſhe ſmiling, to oblige you to conceive that I am troubled for the ſight of the world, ſo am I to learn what makes you believe there is ſuch an affinity between our thoughts. If I durſt tell you before the ſage Racilia, what your Glaſs tells you as often as you conſult it, replies Amilcar, you would acknowledge I had reaſon to ſay what I do, and withall perſwade your ſelf, that there is no Beauty in Rome hath ſo much cauſe to quarrel with the retirement of Women, nor ſo much reason to rejoyce that it begins to diminish I know not (interrupted Racilia, smiling with a certain Majesty) whether Hermilia can answer what you say, but had it been to my self at her age, I should not have been much troubled at it. I am so desirous, replied pleasantly Hermilia, not to do you any dishonour, that if I should answer, I might haply answer to purpose, but being not assured of it, I had rather return nothing to such webs of flattery; and he that weaves them, knows well enough that I am not to be caught with them, and haply conceives I should, could I not blush at his commendations. You answer so nobly, in not answering, replied Amilcar, that certainly I am not the first that told you that you were one of the greatest Beauties in the world. But to return into our way (said he, directing his speech to Racilia) I would gladly ask you, Madam, who are Vertue it self, whether you believe these extraordinary retirements are the only pales of Modesty, which is so natural to the Sex, and whether, on the contrary, an honourable liberty may not contribute a great lustre to their vertue. For what commendation can that woman deserve, who sees not any either pleasures her, or she can affect, to have all her lifetime a new heart, which she knows not on whom to bestow, had she a desire, and which none desires of her? However, replyed Racilia, there are at Rome, as well as other places, women that bestow their hearts. If it be so, returned Amilcar, I believe they bestow them unhandsomely and out of time, for there being not here so great a freedom of Conversation as there is in Africk, they must needs bestow them, not knowing on whom, and must measure men onely by the outward sight, which is the most deceitful thing in the world. To be short I know a man in Greece who is well-set, handsome, of a good stature, a good face, free in his action, in his carriage noble enough, and at the first sight, one that seems a man of business and quality; for he acquits himself very well of his first complements, comes confidently into company, departs the same, is not discountenanced at any thing, and till you ascend higher than the questions, of what weather it is, or some such piece of intelligence, comes off pretty well. He laughs with a good grace, so it be with others, but the mischief is, that when he laughs alone, he laughs in a wrong time, and then are discoverd a low reptile spirit, that creeps not up neer a Mediocrity, and a soul purely materiall, Judge now, if some great Beauty who had seen this man, onely in the Temples, or on some Festival-dayes, and should bestow her heart on him, would not be finely trapanned. Your exaggeration is so pleasant, replied Racilia, that if all men had such excellent parts as you have, I should not quarrel, that there is a free toleration of Conversation in Rome since Tarquin's government, and Tanaquil's death. But to be plain with you, I think it a very extravagant thing to have a house open to all manner of persons, and to entertain a sort of trifling Amorists, to tell trivial stories unhandsomely, and to no purpose; and in what countrey soever I had been born, I should never had loved company without choice. Nor are there many true Romans that do so, and those who are any thing careful to preserve the customes of their countrey, comply with the times with a certain moderation, which makes a distinction between their Houses and an Exchange, so far as to banish solitude. In few words there is here a noble personage, who is called Publius Valerius, who hath a daughter of excellent endowments. To all persons of Honour his house is open, and he freely suffers his friends to see both his wife and daughter Valeria.

At these words Herminius, who was talking with Aronces, and who confusedly heard the name of Valeria, made a stop, and harkned to what was said of her, which made Racilia, who knew that Lady had a great interest in the heart of Herminius, smile a little, however going to continue her story, Amilcar staying her, Ah Madam, said he to her, I beseech you tell me whether this Valeria be of my acquaintance or not, or am I the most abused man in the world, if I have not once seen her with the Queen, She goes not often thither, replied Hermilia; but certainly it must be the same that I mean, replied Amilcar, for, being extreamly taken with her, I asked whether she came not often to Tullia, and I was told, very seldome. But to be further assured whether it be the same, I can onely tell you, that she, whom I saw with the Queen, and whom I was infinitely taken with, is a Lady of a mean stature, and hath not such great staring eyes, as are sometimes the emblems of a natural stupidity, but such as being neither great nor little, cast a ray full of mildness, passion and spirit, which pleases and charmes, and which at once argues ingenuity, vertue, goodness and love. Moreover, she hath a sweet, sprightly, and a serious look, which is infinitely pleasing. Her mouth is narrow, her lips carnationed, something a pale complexion, her hair ashie coloured, and the air of her countenance so free and so noble, that a man cannot but come near her as soon as he sees her. And, to be short, I prevailed so much, that I stood two hours near this inchanting Beauty. Could you as exactly describe her mind as you have her person, replied Herminius, you would make an excellent piece of it. I am of your mind, sayes Hermilia smiling, that indeed Amilcar had admirably drawn Valeria; but he shall give me leave to tell him, that, for her mind it is you onely are concerned to commend it, though it deserve the commendation of all the world. I confess (sayes Amilcar, not giving Herminius leisure to answer) that I had not time to discover the whole mind of Valeria, but if I have not known it, I have guessed at it, and I am confident she hath at once, a great, noble, lofty, pleasing and modest mind; and to advance a little higher in my discovery, I also affirm, she hath a heart full of passion and tenderness, and that if she be not in love, she is fit to be, and that most passionately. Ah Amilcar, cryed out Herminius smiling, you know more of her than I, for I can tell you no news of Valeria's heart. Without being curious to dive too deep into your secrets, replied Racilia, I must needs agree in the same vote with Amilcar; for I believe Valeria fuel for the greatest affection. However, I have not a whit the less esteem of her, continued she, because I am satisfied, she will never be guilty of an irregular affection, and whereas she is guilty of tenderness, she is so much the more worthy praise; since it is not to be doubted, that she ever loved what was not worthy to be loved, and constantly endeavours that her esteem and her friendship may be the reward of Vertue. Herminius hearkned to this discourse of Racilia, with an extraordinary ordinary content, and it was easily perceivable, that, if he durst, he would have said much more of her than she: insomuch as Aronces observing it, whispered to him as much as signified, that he was convinced that Valeria governed his heart. But perceiving, as he spoke to him, that he was unwilling to make a publick profession of it, he diverted the discourse, and thought to make an end of it where it began, pleasantly concluding, that though the Roman Severity were guilty of no other inconveniences, but depriving us of the acquaintance and conversation of Valeria, it ought to be condemned.

But I assure you, replied Amilcar, it is guilty of many more, for, to speak truly, there are two things which are in a manner equal in the hearts of all people, in what place soever they are born; the desire of Liberty, and a certain natural inclination to Love; and I am confident there is not a woman in Rome, but could love some one or other, if she would be guilty by her inclination, and would be glad to be at liberty. In the mean time, according to that manner of life which they are forced into, they are reduced to an impossibility both of being loved, or loving innocently, and locked up as Captives. Whence it will happen, that those whom nature hath endued with a passionate inclination, and a violent desire of liberty, will hate their Fathers, Mothers, the custome of their Countrey, and their own Vertue, which forbids them a thousand and a thousand indifferent things. So, to come nearer what I aim at, walking, conversation, noble entertainments, whereas they are in themselves harmless pleasures which bring no dishonour to those who make use of them, are transformed to crimes to almost all the women of Rome, through the impatient desire they have to them, and the continual quarrelling they have with those who forbid them the use thereof. For in fine, it is not so far from hence to Capua, but they can hear that such a severity is not exercised there as here. It is true, said Aronces, that to speak rationally, the vertue of women is checked very much by an excessive restraint, and a denial of those pleasures, which bring with them nothing of scandal. Ha, generous Aronces, cryed out Racilia, that which to you seems so harmless, is not of so little consequence as you conceive.

As I have lived a many years, and have been banished Rome long enough to know how they live in other places, so I can assure you, that those things whereof you make so slight account, are those which cause the greatest disorders that happen among women. I am so well opinioned of my own sex, that if my judgement be taken, there is no woman can at first sight prove faulty, nor can be guilty of any premeditated design to engage her self into a dangerous affection. But commonly, familiarity, opportunity, a desire to please, the pleasure of their conversation, whom we see often, the enjoyment they mutually receive from us, the desire to be preferred before others, and friendship it self, do all contribute to the generation of Love, who would never be born in Solitude, nor would ever appear, if men would onely be contented to look on women at publique Festivals, and not speak to them. For we must not say that Love is the child of that Beauty which passeth to the heart through the eyes onely; since it is an error condemned by experience, that this passion is not lasting, when it is bred and nourished by the onely desire of Beauty.

But to return where I left, I knew a woman at Tarentum (during the time I followed my banished Husband) who had been brought up by her Mother according to the Roman severity, insomuch, that though she were very beautiful, yet did she live in a great restraint, though in a City where there is liberty enough. She however bore it patiently, was satisfied with her manner of life, she was pleasing, jocund, and seemed to be so indifferent, that it was said in the house, that Madam Indifference did what she pleased. For my part, it was ever my opinion, that the moderation of her humour was her onely felicity. However it be, being of this condition, her mother having some business in the Country, left her with an Aunt of hers, who was not so much addicted to solitude as she; but she had not left her behind, had not some little indisposition of body disabled her for the journey. To be short, she kept her chamber four or five dayes, during which time being not very sick, her Aunt, for her diversion sake, admitted to her all those that came to visit her. The first day she being utterly unacquainted with this fashion of the world, was very troublesom to her; the second proved little better; the third she did not think very tedious; the fourth she thought very divertive; and the fifth, she was the first took occasion to inveigh against her former solitude, and did it so gracefully, that she infinitely pleased an honest man who was there that day. The man hereupon making it his business to return her the content he had received from her, came at last to please her effectually; yet could he not assure himself an interest in her heart. For as Indifference is the temperament of pratling Cocknies, so she had not much more affection for this Lover than for another, but had such a huge ambition to be courted, that she became the veriest Gossip that ever was; and all the endeavours of her Mother, when she returned out of the Country, could never cure the infection she had contracted from this worlds conversation. You had spoke more truly, if you said that of solitude, replied Amilcar, for in my opinion, all the disorder of her mind proceeded from the solitude she had lived in before, which made all things seem new, all things pleasant to her, her mind and senses being equally surprised by that which was strange to them. The great secret therefore is to accustome young people to all harmless pleasures, lest they should one day prove dangerous to them. For certainly it is with pleasures, as it is with perfumes, which a man smells not when he hath alwaies about him. Therefore added he pleasantly, if ever I have a daughter, she shall dance as soon as she can goe; the first word shall be taught her, shall be Gallant, she shall know Love's name before her own: and after all this, she is more likely to prove a Vestal, than a Gossip. Racilia smiled at this humour of Amilcar's as well as Hermilia, and Herminius; but for Aronces, melancholy had so stiffened his complexion, that his face would not admit the lightest appearance of joy, so that the vertuous Matron perceiving how little he seemed concerned in the company, retired, taking Hermilia with her, and leaving with him Herminius. Amilcar, who was not afraid to be seen, thought it his duty to conduct her to her lodgings; which done, he returned to Aronces's chamber, where he staied as long as he could. But at length he left him, and repaired to his lodging, lest in case he did not come in, it might be ſuſpected he had a hand in ſome plot in the City. Soon after Herminius alſo left Aronces, and went into another Chamber joyning to his, where Racilia had deſigned him a lodging.

Now is our illuſtrious Lover left alone to comment on his afflictions paſt and preſent. But at laſt he fell aſleep, overwhelmed with his diſcontents, and flattered with a ſmall hope of the poſſibility of delivering Clelia. It is true, he ſlept not long, for the Sun had no ſooner appeared, but he heard people talking with Herminius, ſuch whoſe voyce he had no great acquaintance with, ſo that knowing it was of equal concernment to that generous Roman, not to be diſcovered, as to himſelf, he was deſirous to know whether they who ſpoke were his friends or his enemies. Hearkning therefore very attentively, towards the place whence he heard the voyces, one whereof he thought he ſhould remember, he was fully perſwaded that it was the voyce of Brutus, Racilia's Nephew. But ſoon after he was of the contrary opinion, for that calling to mind his ſtupidity, he diſtruſted what a minute before he abſolutely believed. For though he heard not diſtinctly what he ſaid, becauſe he ſpoke not very loud, yet he concluded him a very underſtanding man, for that when he had given over ſpeaking, he, to whom he had directed his diſcourſe (who was the ſame Publius Valerius who was afterward called Publicola, and whoſe daughter had been ſo much commended the night before) ſpeaking a little louder, told him, all he had ſaid had been excellently well ſpoken. But, ſaid he, when all is done, my hope tyres, and I expect no more of Fortune. I know, replyed he, to whom he ſpoke, that whatever Herminius hath propoſed, is ſo ſtrong, that there ſeems nothing to be oppoſed againſt it; and that in all appearance, Tarquins power is ſo ſtrongly eſtabliſhed, that nothing can overturn it. For, the People is accuſtomed to the yoke of his Tyranny, the Senate is full of his own creatures, or, to ſay better, his Slaves; the Army is at his devotion, and there ſeems not even in Rome to be one true Roman. So that to judge of things according to outward appearance, Rome is for ever enſlaved, and we quietly expect to ſee Vice triumph eternally over Vertue, and to ſee Sextus one day ſeated in the Throne, for, as to the Princes his Brothers, they are better endowed, than to think they ſhall ever poſſeſs their Fathers place. But, in fine, notwithſtanding all theſe reaſons which ſeem ſo invincible, I ſhall ſtill retain a hope of Liberty, though I do not yet apprehend the ways whereby Rome may be delivered. For when I call to mind how Tarquin came to uſurp the Supream power; when I reflect on the vertue of the late lawful King, whom this Tyrant cauſed to be maſſacred; when I conſider the great number of innocent perſons, whom he hath either baniſhed or put to death; when I review all the wickedneſs of Tullia, and ſtirring them in my memory with thoſe of Tarquin, I ſee a confuſion of Parricides, Poyſonings, Murthers, and all Impieties imaginable, and cannot believe but all the Romans remember it as well as I, and thence infer, that, though we know it not, there are thouſands and thouſands of Romans that abhor Tarquin, that earneſtly deſire his deſtruction, and only expect a favourable occaſion to manifeſt the deteſtation they have for him. I therefore hope, that as Fortune hath dandled him a long time, he may at laſt meet with a Check in his Game, and that by a happy frolique of the ſame unconſtant Fortune, we ſhall meet with a conjuncture of time fortunate for the deliverance of our Country. It may indeed happen, anſwers to that Herminius, that the Siege of Ardea, may prove ominous to the Tyrant, and that from our ſo well defending the City, that he cannot take it; it may be, I ſay, this is a fit conjuncture to make a riſing at Rome. For if the ſiege laſt yet a while, his Army will be weakned, he will not loſe a Soldier, who leaves not in the family whereof he was a ground of complaint, nay he will loſe his power in the Senate, ſince as you know, when ſome propoſed the difficulty of taking Ardea, he ſlighted the advice was given him, and treated the Authors of it, as ignorant perſons both in war and policy. Moreover, the people whom he hath employed ſo long time about the building of Jupiter's Temple, and the Scaffolds of the Circus, is certainly weary of ſuch an endleſs work, beſides that, having expended vaſt ſums, the Treaſure he had got together out of other mens Fortunes to that end, are almoſt exhauſted. So that if it happen, that this Prince ſhould not take Ardea, it is not unlikely but that the vertue of the Romans might be ſo far recovered, as to be ſtrong enough to make the Tyrant flie. But how can the taking of Ardea be obſtructed, replyed Publius Valerius? For when the Army he now hath ſhall be mouldred away by the obſtinacy of the beſieged, and that the people weary of the War ſhall not take up Arms; Porſennas, who waits his aſſiſtance to bring his Son into his power, and hinder him to marry the Daughter of the generous Clelius, who, they ſay, is in Tarquin's power, will furniſh him with Troops. To do what I propoſe, replyed Herminius, it muſt be endeavoured that Tarquin may not be ſupplyed by the King of Cluſium, and that Ardea may be relieved by the King of Cere; for in this conjuncture, it is the concernment of Rome's Liberty, that her Tyrant may not encreaſe his power by any additional conqueſt. You ſpeak very well (replyed he who made the third man in the Dialogue) but ſince I muſt ſay all I have in my mind, it is your part to do what you ſay is neceſſary for the ſafety of Rome, for it is you muſt maintain Ardea, it is you muſt perſwade the King of Cluſium's Son, that by the correſpondency he holds in his Fathers Court, he may hinder Tarquin from having any ſupplyes, if he deſire it; and it is you alſo, that muſt perſwade him to make uſe of the intelligence, which I conceive he hath in the King of Cere's Court, to obtain relief for Ardea, while in the mean time Valerius and our ſecret Friends ſhall ſo diſpoſe things at Rome, as that advantage may be taken of the firſt favourable opportunity which Fortune ſhall afford. But who hath told you, replyed Herminius, that I am acquainted with the King of Cluſium's Son? Aronces himſelf (replyed he who ſpoke) yet he thinks not that he told me ſo much, continued he, for he was deceived as well as others, and believing me the moſt ſtupid of mankind, he heeded me not, when one day he talked with Celeres concerning his Fortune; ſo that I have from his own mouth, all that is to be known concerning his Birth, to confirm what I have ſaid. Moreover, you know that Racilia, as well as your noble Mother, is a true Roman, and conſidering how much it concerns all true Romans to have

Aronces their friend, ſhe hath told me all ſhe knew, either from Sivelia, or the grand Veſtal who is alſo of our correſpondence. For in point of Inſurrection, we muſt be ſure to make thoſe who are Ring-leaders for Religion of our party. Therefore Valerius courts as much as may be, the friendſhip of the Salii, who you know challenge a great Veneration in Rome as well as the Veſtals. Since you are ſo learned, replyed Herminius, I conceive it is fitting as well for Aronces, as your ſelf, that you two be better acquainted; and if you will give me leave, I will go into this Hero's Chamber, to diſpoſe him to know you as you are, and to oblige you and Valerius to unite your intereſts for the deſtruction of Tarquin.

While theſe three excellent men were in this diſcourſe, Aronces, who heard all, was ſo ſurpriſ'd, that he was at a loſs, whether he ſhould believe what he had heard; for he was ſatisfied, that he was not miſtaken in the voyce, and that he who was with Valerius and Herminius could be no other than the ſame Brutus who ſeemed to be ſo ſtupid. Yet he remembred he had heard Amilcar ſay, that he had ſeen him ſmile very opportunely twice or thrice, and that he had more underſtanding than was believed. But after all conſideration, he could not apprehend, during the preſent tumult of his thoughts, upon what rational account ſo wiſe a man was reſolved to go for an abſolute Ideot, nor how he could ſo naturally ſeem ſo having ſo great a reach; as he found in him by the things he had heard. Hence his aſtoniſhment increaſing every moment, he could not hear that Valerius and Brutus conſented to what Herminius had propoſed. But preſently he hearing rapping at his Chamber door, which he having cauſed to be opened by a Slave that waited on him, ſees Herminius enter, who not giving him the leiſure to ſpeak, My Lord, ſayes he to him, I come to offer you the friendſhip of the two moſt noble Romans that ever Rome nurſed, and to beg yours for them. For mine, replyed Aronces, you ſhall diſpoſe of it as you pleaſe between your two friends; and I am glad to receive theirs. But Herminius, tell me preſently, whether my ears have deceived me, is it not Brutus, whoſe voyce I have heard? Am I not deceived? No my Lord, replyed Herminius, and this Brutus, to whom that name was given for the eternal memory of his apparent ſtupidity, is the greateſt and nobleſt ſoul you ever knew; he is a man capable of things of greater, and things of leſſer conſequence; he is both ſolid and pleaſant, and whoſe obſcure life it ſo ſtrange, that nothing can be more. But I beſeech you ſayes Aronces, diſguiſe him not any further to me, and ſo ſtarting out of bed, while Herminius went to fetch in his two illuſtrious friends, he was at the Chamber door ready to receive them.

Brutus, who was at his own houſe, in that it was his Aunts, made Valerius and Herminius go in before him; but as it was not fitting ſuch an interview ſhould have any witneſſes, Aronces bid the Slave, who attended him, though he nothing doubted of his fidelity, to depart the room. Which done, looking on Brutus with admiration he ſeem'd not to him the ſame man he had been, for though he was not very handſome, yet now he ſeem'd indifferently well-favoured. His Phyſiognomy was ſprightly, and giving his mind liberty without affecting that ſimplicity, whereby he uſed to conceal it, Aronces preſently knew, that he whom he ſaw, was the ſame whom he had heard ſpeak. But he was further confirmed by what this illuſtrious Roman ſaid to him; for after that Herminius had by a pertinent complement opened the interview, that Valerius had complemented in particular, and that Aronces had ſpoken to all three according to his excellent wit, and pleaſing way, which is ordinary with him; it coming to Brutus's turn, you ſee, illuſtrious Prince, ſaid he, how far the Tyranny of the wicked Tarquin extends, ſince that to preſerve my Life, I was forced to loſe my Reaſon, or at leaſt to conceal it, ſo as he might have no knowledge of it. But I beſeech you, continued he, conceive not that my only deſign in it was by ſuch a humerous carriage, to avoid death; for if my feigned ſtupidity proceeded not from a nobler cauſe, I ſhould not think my ſelf worthy your notice. In the mean time, as I cannot now particulariſe my Fortune to you, be pleaſed to give me leave to conjure you not to judge of me before you underſtand me perfectly, either from my ſelf or Herminius, who knows the myſterie of my life, and whoſe apprehenſions I acknowledge as my own. What I have heard from you not a quarter of an hour ſince, replyed Aronces, what I received from Herminius juſt now, and what you tell me your ſelf, give me ſo much caution, to interpret all things to your advantage, that without knowing any thing of your adventures, I yet believe that your feigned extravagance is an effect of a great wiſdome, and a great generoſity. You are in the right, my Lord, ſayes Valerius, in what you ſay; for I can aſſure you, that ſince there have been any generous men, there have not been any that could ever arrive to ſuch a conſtancy, or, to ſay better, obſtinacy of generoſity, as that of the illuſtrious Brutus.

Upon this, Herminius, who had not brought them together to commend one another, changed the diſcourſe; and, as it is certain, that in great men there is a certain ſecret Sympathy, which unites their hearts ſooner than thoſe of others; ſo in one half hour, theſe conceived themſelves of a long and ſtanding acquaintance, and the ſprightly Herminius knew ſo well how to humour his friends, that he was in a manner the cement of their Society. By no other aſſurance than that of his honeſty, which was equally known to all, he raiſed ſuch a confidence between them, that upon his ſingle word they mutually truſted to one another that which was of greateſt importance in their fortunes. But when they had ſo diſcovered themſelves one to another, they found that their intereſts, though different, required the ſame remedies. For Brutus and Valerius wiſhing onely Rome delivered from the Tyranny of Tarquin, looked no further than how to take away from him the power he had uſurped. Herminius was ingaged in the ſame intereſt, and in divers others; and Aronces deſirous to deliver Clelia, and to avoid falling into the hands of Tarquin, could no other way accompliſh his deſign, better than by deſtroying him who kept his Miſtreſs Captive. Upon which Herminius telling him, that if he hoped to bring about ſo great an interpriſe, he muſt, by the means of the friends he had in his Fathers Court, hinder him to ſupply Tarquin, and oblige the King of Ceres, to relieve Ardea, or at leaſt to make a deverſion; Aronces having conſidered of it, told Herminius, that he muſt oblige Zenocrates to go to Cuſi-

um, for that he was well known, and much esteemed by the Princess of the Leontines, a Woman of great authority, and much subtilty; that he must take with him a Letter to her, and another to Queen Galerita his Mother, and that Celeres should be sent to the King of Ceres, with whom he had been long enough when he was young, to expect credit, when he spoke on the behalf of Aronces. For though his Court had sometime been a Sanctuary to Porsennas, yet, as he was nothing interessed in the siege of Ardea, so was it not impossible to perswade him, that it concerned him that Rome became not so powerful, as to be able to oppress all its neighbours. To make this more feasible, Herminius engaged himself, that those of Ardea should also send to that King. For though their City was besieged, yet was it not so narrowly, but that some every day came in, and went out of it. But Aronces not knowing how to acquaint Zenocrates, nor Celeres, but by the means of Amilcar, he desired permission of Brutus and Valerius, to communicate their designs to him, promising he would be answerable for his fidelity; you may also ingage him to contribute his subtilty to the business, replied Herminius. It is not necessary, replyed Brutus, for I know by experience, that one African is more subtil than all the Romans. I have been also told, that he hath suspected that I had more understanding then my words betrayed, and if I had not been very cautious indeed to avoid his survaying, I am confident, he had pryed into my heart. If he had, replyed Aronces, you would have fared never the worse for it, for Amilcar loves not to hurt those who hurt not him.

While Brutus and Aronces were in this discourse, Herminius was fallen into so deep a musing, that Valerius who awoke him out of it, asked him the reason thereof. He at first seemed a little suspitious to tell him, but Valerius having aloud expressed his curiosity to know it, Aronces and Brutus joyned with him to press him to declare what he thought. At last resolving to comply with their desires, Conceive not, said he to them, that the denial I made you, proceeds from any humour I have, my thoughts should be a secret to you; but I wish you had given me leave to decide within my self, whether a certain scruple of Vertue be well or ill grounded. But since, in the mean time, you will know it, it is fitter you should be Judges of my thoughts, than that I should judge of them without you. Know then that I was considering with my self, whether it were not to be feared, that the different interests which equally oblige us all to destroy the power of Tarquin, may not flatter us so, as not to see any difficulty in a design to change the whole face of Government. For if you will have my true apprehensions, I shall tell you, that if Tarquin had been legally chosen, I should never endeavour to force him from Rome, though even he had banished me, though he had destroyed my house, and were the most unjust Prince in the World, I believe we ought to reverence the Gods in the persons of those who have a legal power, and should undergo their violent domination, with the same patience as we endure Earthquakes and Deluges. I know well enough that the business now in hand is not of this nature. For Tarquin is a Tyrant, and his cruelty is such, that we may innocently endeavour to destroy his power; but I beseech and conjure you, consider well whether we may not expose Rome to a greater Tyranny; and whether while we hope to make her fetters lighter, we may not make them heavier. For, in fine, a change of this nature cannot be effected without a general alteration of the body of the State; and what is more to be feared is, that, if the design fail, Tarquin may strengthen his authority by the destruction of so many thousand of Innocents and the ruine of many illustrious Families. So it may come to pass, that instead of being the Deliverers of our Country, we shall be the Destroyers of it, and we may be accused of having preferred the desire to be revenged for our private injuries before the publique Tranquility.

If Tarquin could be more wicked then he is, replyed Brutus, there were, questionless, some consideration to be had of what you say, which certainly is worthy of your Vertue. But can Rome be more miserably dealt with than she is? Is there any one house of honest people, which Tarquin persecutes not? or can there be one found under his government who suffers not? The Rich he impoverishes; the Vertuous he either banishes, or puts to death; nay sometimes he torments the Innocent, only to satisfie his humour, though it conduce nothing to the confirming his authority. Let us not therefore raise any more doubts, generous Herminius, about a thing of such importance, and so much glory continued he, and let us expect the success of our designs from the Gods. Since I am no Roman, replyed, discreetly, Aronces, I conceive I ought not to speak upon this occasion; and as I am, continued Valerius, I will presume to say, that Rome is so oppressed with the weight of its chains, that there can be no change but must be advantageous to her. Since it is so, I have no more to say, replyed Herminius, for it is possible my reason should have a stronger light than both yours.

Hereupon Brutus and Valerius departed, and Herminius stayed with Aronces. It is true, he was not there long alone, ere Amilcar came in, who was strangely surprised at what he heard from these two friends; for though he had some light jealousies that Brutus had more understanding than was conceived, yet he could not believe what he heard of him; and if Aronces and Herminius had not promised he should see him in the Evening with all his reason, and all the excellences of his mind about him, he would still have doubted their words. In the mean time, not to lose time, Amilcar having understood about what Aronces had a meeting with Brutus, Valerius, and their noble friend Herminius, sent immediately a Slave to the Camp, to bring Zenocrates and Celeres to Rome, to receive instructions what they were to do. For Herminius, he returned to his Chamber to write to that inchanting Beauty, from whom proceeded all the Enjoyment, and all the Torment of his life; for he was never sensible of any pleasure, but when he thought on her; nor did he feel the hardship of Exile, but onely in this consideration, that being not in Rome, he was far from Valeria. But Friendship had a strong influence over his soul, and that which he had for his illustrious Mother, and for the admirable Clelia, caused him both pleasures and afflictions. But at last, Love became Mistress of all the Passions, and he had a greater tenderness for such of his friends as were in love, than others, so penetrable was his heart to this Passion, Aronces in like manner, for his part, part set himself to write to Clelia, whom Amilcar visited every day, and his intention was to give his friend his Letter in the Evening, to be delivered the next day to that incomparable Virgin, who led a very melancholy life.

The merry disposition of Plotina was some comfort to her, and the visits of Amilcar, allayed her affliction much, not only by the hope of Liberty, but also those testimonies of Love, which she received by him from her dear Aronces. That which was heavyest in her affliction, was, that she heard no news from Clelius, nor Salpicia; but having a great and resolute heart, she underwent her misfortune with a great constancy. Her former misfortunes were now a kind of comfort to her, for when she called to mind that terrible Earth-quake which had separated her from Aronces, and put her into the power of Horatius, when she reflected on what passed in the lake of Thrasimene, where the Prince of Numidia fought with this fierce Rival, who had carried her away, and that to recover her from him; when she was near Ardea, and was an ocular witness of that cruel combat, wherein the illustrious Aronces, after he had delivered her, was like to perish, had not his great Valour, and his good Fortune rescued him; when she considered the condition she was in when she was brought before the cruel Tarquin, and when the grand Vestal interceded for her liberty, and afterwards when she remembred Tarquin's fury after she had acknowledged her self the daughter of Clelius, she considered that in all these adventures she could not hope to have Plotina with her, to see Amilcar, to have the means to write to Aronces, and to receive from him. Conceiving hence some weak hope of a better fortune, during this cessation of Tarquin's tyranny, she spent her time somewhat comfortably with that merry-conceited Virgin, whose humor was so near of kin to mirth, that she made a pleasure of that which would have been an affliction to another.

In the mean time Amilcar to continue the opportunity of visiting Aronces's Mistress, and to knit longer delays, writ every day to Tarquin, and fed him with hopes, that in time he should discover Clelia's most secret apprehensions; and that she might be brought over to prefer the interest of his Family, before that of Aronces. He also visited the cruel Tullia, and was not unwelcome to her; for as it concern'd him for his friend's sake to keep in her favour, so he knew excellently well how to manage her humour. When he was in her presence, and that it was opportune, he took occasion to set Ambition in the front of all the passions, and represented Love as a Satyr, and all the pleasures that attend it: Cruel actions he called Confident actions, when they conduc'd to their advantage who did them; and (in fine) he had gained such an influence on her, as he doubted not to make use of her in opposition to the tyrant, if there were need. This cruel Princess knowing that he had the permission to visit Clelia, was glad to hold a correspondence with him, that by that means she might take away that Captive from Tarquin, when she should think it fitting. Tarquin, for his part, wanted not employment, for the siege of Ardea found him work enough. Love and hatred Dichotomized his heart and was a greater torment to him than his cruelty had caused to others.

As for Sextus, his mind was full of Lucretia, whose beauty had made such an impression in his heart, that he could think of nothing but the means how to satisfie his passion. The Prince of Pometia, and Prince Titus, were not without their secret Loves; Artemidorus and Zenocrates had each of them their Secrets and their Afflictions; and only Celeres was at liberty, though he had a soul naturally very passionate. But yet in the condition he was in, his tender affection and wit was spent in bemoaning his unfortunate Friends, and in finding out ways how to serve them, and therefore he was over-joy'd that he could imagine the means.

But whilst these several persons had their different resentments, there was no mention of the Prince of Numidia, who had been expected in the Camp; nor could Aronces imagine what resolution he should have taken, for there was no likelyhood he should have cast himself into Ardea, besides, that Herminius knowing him, he was confident he was not there. But, in fine, night drawing on, Amilcar return'd to Aronces's chamber, where he found Herminius, Brutus being not yet come, so that while they expected him, Amilcar related to Aronces all he had done, and afterwards renued the desire he had to be informed of that mans life, who had so cunningly concealed his Reason; for I cannot believe, said he, there was ever any man so unhappy, or at such a distance from all kinds of pleasures. I cannot well apprehend what he could have done; they say he married very young, he hath children, and he seems not to have an estate proportionable to his birth. How then could he conceal his reason from his wife, while she lived? How could he subsist, carrying himself so, as if he had not the discretion to govern his estate? And how could he live without Love, without society, without friends, without pleasure, and without any comfort? How could he endure to be treated like a stock, and a mad man? And how could he abjure all acquaintance with Fame? How could he be perswaded to renounce both to love any thing, or be beloved, and could brook the contempt of all the World? It is indeed true, replyed Aronces, that this seems incomprehensible; but a greater miracle than all this, is, that though Brutus hath constantly acted the Sot, he yet hath preserved that great and admirable understanding, which you shall by and by find in him. When you shall understand it of your self, replyed Herminius, you will be much more amazed; for, as I have told you already, Brutus hath not only a good understanding, comprehension, judgment, and an acquaintance with great things, but he hath withal, a lively, nimble, delicate, and an admirably versatile wit. Besides he understands so exactly all the contrivances of Love, and knows as well how to make use of all those ingenious circumventions, which sometimes do sooner conquer the heart of a great Beauty, than the most signal services, that neither Greece nor Africk afford a Gallant that knows better than he, the art of reducing of an illustrious soul. But you consider not, says Amilcar laughing, that while you would describe Brutus, you really draw your self, for I can easily see your picture in it. You know Brutus then so much the better by it, reply'd he, and here he comes in good time to confirm what I have told you. And indeed Brutus was coming in while Herminius was speaking of him, but it was after such a maner as Amilcar was surprised at it. For knowing there was none in the chamber, but Aronces, Herminius, and he; he did not shadow his reason as he was wont to doe, but entered with a certain freedome, which Amilcar had never observed in him. But he was no sooner come in, but going straight on to that witty African, since that when I deceived the distrustful Tarquin, and the suspicious Tullia, said he to him, I could not over-reach the subtile Amilcar; I were as good shew him what I truly am, that being obliged to me for my confidence, he may help me to keep a secret, wherein haply the safety of Rome is equally embarqued with my own. What, the Brutus whom I now see, replied Amilcar, is he the same as I have formerly seen! Spare your exclamations, replies Herminius, till you have seen him better than you now doe, for you have yet but a glimpse of him. Ah Herminius, replied Amilcar, I will see him throughly, and I confidently promise there shall be nothing I dare not do, might I but obtain from Brutus the History of his Thoughts, for according to the manner of his life, I believe he can hardly afford us any thing else.

If I had nothing else to tell you, replied he, your demand were easily granted; but my life may afford things of greater consequence than you conceive. If there wants onely fidelity to become worthy the knowledge of your adventures, sayes Aronces, I will be responsible to you for Amilcar's and my own; and if you will think your self requited with twenty Histories for one, added Amilcar, you shall have all mine for yours; for if you believe me, I was never so much oppressed with curiosity. Since I am obliged in point of honour, to satisfie it, replied Brutus, I promise you an account of my whole life; but if you have it not from my self, you must take it from Herminius, who knowes all my adventures and all my thoughts, or from one of his Kinswomen, who hath known much of the secret of my soul. But it shall be conditionally, that I be not present at the relation, for I do not find my Spirit strong enough to hear the recital of my past happiness, at a time when I pretend to no other pleasure, then that of revenge. and the deliverance of my Country, from the slavery wherein it is. Aronces and Amilcar thinking the request reasonable, it was resolved, that on the morrow Herminius should relate unto them the life of Brutus. But he could not do it so soon as these his two Friends could have wished, for that some occasions of his found him writing all the morning, and in the afternoon, he had the happiness to see the inchanting person whom he loved, in Hermilia's Chamber, who to further his satisfaction had feigned her self sick, so to oblige Valeria to give her a visit. It was therefore after night, ere he related to Aronces and Amilcar what they were so impatient to know. It is true, that Brutus being employed otherwise, they had as much leisure as they could wish, yet were they so importunate, as if they feared they should never have enough of it. For as soon as Amilcar was come, and had given Aronces an account of what concerned Clelia, they pressed Herminius to a performance of his promise.

Accordingly, this noble Roman, who needed not study long about what he had to say to them, but only to observe some order, began in these terms, directing his speech to Aronces, being first assured, he was not over-heard by any, but those who were to be acquainted with a secret so hidden and so important as that which he was going to reveal unto them.

The History of Lucius Junius Brutus.

YOu are not to expect, my Lord, in the History I am to relate to you, to meet with those extraordinary accidents which of themselves suffice to make a relation pleasant, since my particular business is to discover unto you a life absolutely obscure. I shall make you acquainted with a man, of whose worth Rome it self is ignorant; one thought equally a stranger both to understanding and courage, yet one, notwithstanding his seeming stupidity, never guilty of dishonour in his actions, nor extravagance in his speech, though he have strangely accomplished so great a design as to keep one of the greatest hearts, and noblest minds that ever was, undiscovered from the fiercest Tyrant upon earth. Look not therefore to find him gaining of Victories, besieging of Cities, and doing those illustrious actions, which ordinarily fill up the life of a Heroe, yet I must bespeak for him the highest of your esteem, and the greatest of your praises, which I am confident you cannot deny him, when I shall fully have represented him to you.

But in the mean time, do but reflect on your thoughts of Brutus, but two dayes since, consider him wrapt in those cloudy distracted looks, which promised neither goodness nor discretion; call to mind that affected stupidity, which when he spoke since, seemed to disguise it into non-sense, that so when you shall conceive your self obliged to acknowledge that this very man whom in this relation I shall call no otherwise than Brutus (though it be not his true name) is the most generous, the most pleasant, the most amiable person in the world, and one as capable to undertake affaires of the greatest, as well as the least consequence, you may be pleasantly surprised into a greater admiration of him. But that you may not make his vertue so much the object of your astonishment, you are to know, that he is of as noble a Family, as any Rome affords, for he is descended from one of those gallant Trojans, who having to extremity defended their City, followed Æneas to seek out another countrey, under the conduct of those Gods, who direct them to Italy. The Family of Brutus Fortune seemed to be particularly prodigal to: as to Riches; for Marcus Junius, his Father, was one of the wealthiest Citizens of Rome. For which reason Tarquin: before he made himself King, had brought about a Marriage between him and his only Sister, Tarquinia, out of intention, if occasion served, by the strength of his Brother-in-lawes wealth, to bring to effect his own secret designs. For, though he knew Marcus Junius to be a man of a great vertue, and that Tarquinia enclined more to the peaceable humour of the Prince of Ameriola (who was then living) than to his, yet could he not be perswaded: but that the interest of alliance would easily engage Junius into any interest of his. But this conjecture deceived him, for this generous Roman could not be taxed with the least concurrence with the crimes of Tarquin, and the the vertuous Tarquinia ſpilt as many harmleſs tears, as her brother had ſhed, of innocent blood, ſince his aſſuming the Soveraignty.

Thus may Brutus be ſaid to be the Offspring of Afflictions, and I have it from Sivelia, that Tarquinia never had merry day from the death of Marcus Junius, till her own. For beſides that ſhe abhorred the impieties of the proud Tarquin, and cruel Tullia, and ſympathized with all thoſe unfortunate Innocents whom they ruined, ſhe her ſelf lay open to the violence and tyranny of her own brother.

But that you may be the better informed what juſtice Brutus had to hate Tarquin; I muſt in few words tell you whence proceeded the hatred of Tarquin to Brutus's Father. You are then to know, that as ſoon as Tarquin had by thoſe ſtrange wayes, known to all, made himſelf King, he initiated his reign, with all the injuſtice imaginable, it being his deſign, by the ruin of all honeſt men, to eſtabliſh himſelf in the Throne he had uſurped. He did not preſently engage his Brother-in-law in this deſign, out of a hope, that being gradually diſciplined into theſe violences, he would in time be even prevailed with to be the executioner of his cruelties, as you ſhall ſoon underſtand.

Being ambitious to over-maſter his Neighbours, as well as the Romans, he was no ſooner ſeated in the Throne, but he plotted the ſubjection of the Latines. But that proved a harder task than he conceived: for there was one Turnus Herdonius, a man of great authority among them, oppoſed him, becauſe he refuſed him his Daughter, whom yet he was willing to beſtow on another of that Nation. Tarquin looking on this man as one that would prove a rub to all his undertakings, if he were not deſtroyed, and conſidering withall, that to attempt it openly, would be dangerous: reſolved to do it by treachery. Knowing therefore that the whole Senate was ſatisfied with the integrity of Junius, he told him, that he was certain, that Herdonius was in Conſpiracy againſt him, and all the Senators, in order to bring the Romans under ſubjection to the Latines, and to make himſelf Maſter of both Nations: but having no teſtimony to prove this againſt Herdonius, it was neceſſary a perſon of Authority, ſuch as he was, ſhould by his credit maintain the accuſation when it were once advanced.

He had ſcarce made an end of his propoſal, but this vertuous Roman, after denial ſharply reprehended him, and told him, that if Vertue did not diſſwade him from diſcovering the crimes of a Brother-in-law, he would ſoon acquaint Herdonius with it, and I know not certainly, whether he did not threaten to do it, ſo to divert him from ſo pernicious a deſigne; for knowing well enough what a Kidney Tarquin was of, he eaſily perceived that he would falſely charge Herdonius with this pretended conſpiracy. Not but that Herdonius was both miſchievous and ambitious enough, but it is alſo as certain, he never was guilty of any attempt againſt the Tyrants life, much leſs againſt any of the Senate, and that his main deſign was to make himſelf as ſtrong as he could to oblige Tarquin to preſer him before his Rival, and conſequently beſtow on him the Princeſs his daughter.

But in the mean time, Tarquin being as ſubtile as wicked, ſeemed to reſt ſatisfyed with the reaſons of Junius, and thereupon promiſed he would do no violence to Herdonius but by juſt and honourable wayes. However, he made a ſhift to diſpatch him otherwiſe, for corrupting a Slave belonging to Herdonius, who, while his Maſter, was out of doors, ſuffered a number of ſwords and other arms, to be brought into his Maſter's houſe, the cruel Tarquin confidently dreſſed up an accuſation againſt him, inſinuating that it was fit enquiry ſhould be made into the buſineſs; and ſo engaging all thoſe to whom he ſpoke of it, by the apprehenſion of their own danger, he perſwaded them they ſhould be fully enlightned, as to what he ſaid to them, by ſearching Herdonius his houſe. This was done, and there were found the Arms which Tarquin had ſecretly conveyed thither, and ſuch other circumſtances as amounted to make him thought guilty; upon which thoſe whom Tarquin had purpoſely brought along with him, ſeized diſorderly every one on a ſword of thoſe which were found, and without any other ceremony threaten him with death. He is taken, bound, and by Tarquin's order caſt into the Spring-head of the Ferentine fountains, where he no ſooner was in, but overwhelmed with ſtones, he was preſently drowned. The buſineſs was done ſo of a ſudden, that Junius knew it not ere it was too late to prevent it, though as ſoon as he had notice that ſome Souldiers were commanded to Herdonius's, he went to divert Tarquin from ſo ſtrange a violence. But he could not make ſuch haſt, but that Herdonius was dead, and all he could do was to acquaint Tarquin that he was not ignorant of his crime in it.

This buſineſs broke off all correſpondence between him and Tarquin, inſomuch that he went not to Court, but when honor oblig'd him; he gave order, Tarquinia ſhould go very ſeldom to the Queen; ſo that both of them made it afterwards their whole buſineſs to ſee well educated two ſons which they then had, whereof Brutus is one. It is true, he was then but a child, but his brother, who was ſix or ſeven years elder than he, made ſome advantage of the inſtructions they gave him.

Another thing which extreamly exaſperated Tarquin againſt Junius, was to ſee what uſe he made of that exceſſive wealth which he was maſter of; for when Tarquin had confiſcated the eſtate of any vertuous Family, Junius and Tarquinia ſecretly reliev'd all thoſe whom he had ruin'd; which they did after ſuch a manner, as if they conceiv'd themſelves obliged to enrich thoſe whom the Prince impoveriſh'd, and that it was their part to reſtore what he took away from all vertuous people. Tarquin therefore thought, that their liberality did as it were, diſ-arm his Tyranny by making him uncapable to make men miſerable, and that Junius, having married his Siſter, robb'd the Crown of all he was ſo prodigal of. Nay, he conceived that this mans Vertue ſecretly reproved his Vices, ſo indeed that at laſt he was no longer able to endure it. Being therefore reſolved to rid Junius out of the way, and tempted withall with the advantage of being Guardian to his Children, and conſequently diſpoſing of all the great Wealth of that houſe, he cauſed him to be poyſon'd. But as it is hard to meet with poyſons that leave no marks of their malignity, the vertuous Tarquinia knew (but too much to her grief) that her noble Husband was taken away by the cruelty of her Brother. But that which was moſt remarkable in his death, was, that Junius, who had an infinite affection for Tarquinia, and doubted not but that he was poiſoned at a Banquet, where he was forced to afford the tyrant his company, yet had the generosity not to tell her of her Brothers cruelty, nor ever mind her of revenging his death. But if he shewed himself so reserv'd to her, he was more open to his eldest Son, who was arrived to years of discretion. For he sent for Licinius, an ancient friend of his, whose faith he trusted with all his secrets, and speaking to his Son in his presence, he enjoyned him to be as dutiful to that vertuous friend, as to himself, to prefer Vertue before all things, never to forget that his Father lost his life through the injustice of an Usurper; never to miss any occasion might conduce to the deliverance of Rome, and to instil these resentments into his younger Brother, as soon as he should be capable to receive them; which done, he died in an admirable assuredness of mind.

But Tarquinia's constancy was at the first onset over-mastered by her grief, and it was impossible she should not betray some light supicion she had, about the death of Junius, even while the fierce Tarquin, and the cruel Tullia, were comforting her for the loss which they caused her; for this inhumane Princess had a hand in this, as in all the rest of her husbands enormities. But Tarquin catching at so visible a pretence, soon began to ill-intreat his Sister, and possessing himself of all the wealth of the Family, reduc'd Tarquinia to a very sad condition; for he left her not any thing to dispose of, nor was she suffer'd to have her eldest Son with her, which added infinitely to the affliction of this generous Roman Lady, who in that very circumstance underwent the greatest persecution which could fall upon her after the loss she had received. For Tarquin observing in his Sisters eldest Son, certain great and vertuous inclinations, and that he had withal a great understanding and courage, caused him barbarously to be murthered, and that so confidently, that he troubled not himself whether he were accused for it or not, or studied any pretence for it, as if there were not any other account of his loss to be given, than that he feared, that that illustrious unfortunate man should revenge his Fathers death, and recover that prodigious wealth, which he had possessed himself of.

Tarquinia, who had yet hardly dried up her tears for the death of her husband, was so transported with that of her Sons, that to save what was left, she resolved to steal out of Rome with this child, and she did it so much the sooner, insomuch as she was advertised by Licinius, that Tarquin would within a few days, snatch him out of her Arms. So that this wise Matron, assisted by the counsel of this faithful friend of Marcus Junius, absolutely determined to forsake that place where her own Brother reigned with so much injustice. It is true, she had the happiness of Licinius's company thence; for being hated by Tarquin, he thought it conduced to his safety to leave his country as well as she. So that Licinius, Tarquinia, and the young Brutus, who then had no other name than Lucius Junius, departed Rome disguised, and pitcht upon Metapont for the place of their retreat.

That which obliged Licinius to advise Tarquinia to that place, was making it his business to bestow the best education upon his Friend's Son, who had so much enjoyned it at his death, he thought there was no City in all Italy where it could be better done than at Metapont. And in effect, he was not deceived, for it being not long since that famous Samian Philosopher, whose renown hath so filled the World, died; most of his Disciples were there still, nor was it a small number, since there were neer six hundred, who particularly professed that they had learned of him, to honour Learning, and practise Vertue. Nay, Pythagoras had left behind him a Daughter, capable of the highest Disciplines, who had withal so great a Vertue, that her example was no less effectual in reforming the loosenes of the Women of that place, then the reprehensions of her Father. There were constantly with her Archytas of Tarentum, Alcmaon of Crotona, and Hipasus of Metapont, nay even the dreadful Milo every where famous for his prodigious strength, was forced to submit to the powerfulnes of her charms, and do honour to the memory of Pythagoras, who had lodged at his Fathers, while he sojourned in Crotonia. Licinius therefore believing Metapont, to be such a School, as were fit for the education of young Brutus, continued there with Tarquinia.

But my Lord, I had forgot to tell you, that Marcus Junius had enjoyned his wife at his death to marry that illustrious Roman, that so his children may have a vertuous Father, and that his Friend might have that wealth which he said he deserved better than himself, and whereto he had much right; for it was certain, that Licinius had been in love with Tarquinia, nor was she altogether void of love for him; so that though the second marriages are not very frequent at Rome, and that Tarquinia at first made some difficulty to obey her Husband, yet she was overcome, when she saw her self forced to it; considering with her self, it were much more to her reputation, to follow a banished Husband, than a banished Friend, how vertuous soever he might be, as also that Licinius would have a greater care of her Son, and would be inseparably engaged in her Fortune. Thus the vertuous Tarquinia, who was yet very handsome, though past that youthfulness which commonly illustrates a great Beauty, married the vertuous Licinius, but it was done privately, and there's not one in all Rome yet knows that he is Tarquinia's Husband, and therefore cannot consequently imagine that the fair Hermilia is Brutus's Sister.

How, interrupted Aronces, this beautiful Virgin whom Amilcar yesterday entertained with such gallant Courtship, is Brutus's Sister? She is, replyed Herminius, for Tarquinia had this Daughter at Metapont, in the time of her banishment. But how, sayes Amilcar, is she said to be Racilia's Neece? Supposing she were not Tarquinia's Daughter.

The sequel of my discourse shall acquaint you, replyed Herminius; but to hasten to that which relates to Brutus, I am first to tell you, that in a short time, Licinius and Tarquinia were mightily esteemed at Metapont; however, they thought not fit to discover what they were, but rather to conceal their Quality, though they could not their Vertue, for which the wise and learned Daughter of Pythagoras, whose name was Dame, had so great a friendship for them, that she was particularly tender of the Education of young Brutus. She recommended him to the most famous of her Fathers Disciples, as soon as he had arrived an age capable to receive their instructions, and she her self gave him that advice, which hath not been finally finally advantageous to him in the ſequel of his life.

For, my Lord, I muſt ſo far divert to the commendation of this learned Virgin, as to ſay, that no man in the world would think it a diſhonor to have a heart of the ſame metal with hers, inſomuch that Licinius and Tarquinia having experienced her prudence, goodneſs, and her vertue, depoſited with her the whole ſecret of their fortune, which reviving in this generous Virgin, the manner how her illuſtrious Father had ſometimes avoyded the tyranny of Polycrates, ſhe had a particular tenderneſs towards thoſe who forſook Rome to eſcape the tyranny of Tarquin. This conſideration occaſioned a ſtrict League between theſe three perſons, which was no ſmall advantage to Licinius and Tarquinia. For though Dame was not very rich her ſelf, yet ſhe is more eſteemed at Metapont, than thoſe who can brag moſt of the favours of fortune; and beſides that there is a great veneration for the memory of her Father, inſomuch that the people have made a Temple of the houſe where he lived, and that her Mother, named Theano, was alſo famous there for her Learning and Vertue, her own rare and excellent endowments purchaſe her the admiration of all the world. To be ſhort, ſhe made one expreſſion of Vertue which was very glorious, and ſuch as I cannot but acquaint you with, that you may the better know her, who hath inſtilled the firſt ſentiments of it into the illuſtrious Brutus.

You are then to note, that Pythagoras dying, left to his Daughter all he had written while he lived; not but that he had a Son, a knowing and vertuous perſon, but that he had a greater eſteem for this Daughter than for him; and believed that ſhe would the more exactly obey him in that command of his, that his writings ſhould never be carried out of houſe. This generous Virgin, though ſhe were not rich, yet obſtinately refuſed the infinite riches which were proffered her, if ſhe would but deliver up what her illuſtrious Father had entruſted her with; chuſing rather to live poorly, than diſobey the laſt deſires of him to whom ſhe ought more than her life, as being indebted to him for a part of her Vertue. This being an action very remarkable, proved ſo glorious to this excellent Virgin, that it gained her the general veneration of all Metapont. Hence came it that her friendſhip proved ſo advantageous to Licinius and Tarquinia. She was alſo the cauſe that Brutus was not brought up as other children, and that he was never taught any thing but what was manifeſted to him by Reaſon, not content with the ſimple performance of memory, as is the manner of moſt Maſters to deal with thoſe are committed to their charge. Beſides, though ſhe were daughter to a Philoſopher, who profeſſed auſterity, and one who had prevailed with the women of Metapont, voluntarily to beſtow part of thoſe things which ſerved them only for ornament, towards the building of a Temple for Juno, yet ſhe was of opinion, that thoſe who but began to live in this world, ſhould be allowed a certain honeſt liberty, and that Vertue ſhould have a kind of Adoleſcence, as I may ſo ſay, during which Feſtivals, Recreations, and innocent pleaſures ſhould be permitted, leſt the ſoul ſhould at the firſt aſſault be diſcouraged by the difficulties of ſtudy, and ſhould be over-whelmed by that which ſhould make her bear ſail againſt all adverſe fortune whatſoever. I ſhall entreat you (ſaid ſhe one day to Tarquinia, as I have learned ſince) if your reſolution be to bring up your ſon to great things, begin betimes to inſtil into him the love of Glory, and endeavour he may prefer it before all things. But how can I, replyed Tarquinia, conſidering my Son's age, inſpire him with deſires of Glory, ſince he is hardly maſter of his Reaſon? On the contrary, replyed this wiſe perſon, it is in this age, eaſieſt to weed out evil inclinations, and to cultivate the good, if the diſpoſition of thoſe they would correct, be but well underſtood. But commonly thoſe who have children, are more troubled to beſtow Wit on them, than Vertue. They are deſirous to teach them the Art of Writing, and ſpeaking well, not caring whether they are taught to do well; whereas if you follow my advice, you will think the Manners of your Son of equal concernment with his Mind. That which troubles me concerning Junius, replyed Tarquinia, is, that he is Vehement in any thing he deſires, that he is ſometimes as violently carried away with the conſideration of things of little importance, as thoſe of the greateſt, and that whatſoever his heart is ſenſible of, he obſtinately loves: And if he be ſo unhappy, as one day not to arrive to that faculty of diſcerning that there may be an obſtinacy without danger, he would be ſubject to very ſtrange things. I grant, replyed the vertuous daughter of Pythagoras, that what you ſay may come to paſs; but when all is done, the temperament of great minds ought to be ſuch as you repreſent that of your Son's, for there is nothing at ſo great a diſtance from true and heroick Vertue, as that ſoft indifference which obliges ſome perſons to be pleaſed with all things, or nothing; whence it comes to paſs, that they neither entertain great deſires of Glory, nor great fear of Infamy; that they neither love nor hate; that they follow cuſtome blindfold; that they are onely ſenſible of the afflictions of the body; their minds being in a manner inſenſible; and laſtly, that they are guilty of a certain indolence of mind, if one may ſo expreſs it, which renders them unworthy of life. In like manner, I ſhould be more prone to conceive greater hope of a man that ſhould in the beginning of his life, be ſtrongly hurried away by ſome evil habit, then one that faſtens on nothing; for to one that can love or hate irreconcileably, there needs no more to make him a vertuous man, but to repreſent unto him a rational object; but, with him, who is uncapable of any violent attraction, and whoſe heart lies legar to a general indifference, a man can never do any good; and Philoſophy it ſelf, who boaſts it hath remedies for all the indiſpoſitions of the ſoul, never had any could cure an indifferent mind. Nay, I am perſwaded, continued ſhe, that indifference is commonly an inſeparable companion of lowneſs of ſpirit; for it is ſo natural to man, to be carried towards that which he believes to be good, that if indifferent people were able to judge of things, they would faſten on ſomething. But certain it is, that this lukewarmneſs of temperament, which ſends forth but feeble deſires, ſheds but feeble lights, inſomuch as thoſe who are guilty of it, not knowing any thing certainly, cannot faſten on any thing with perſeverance.

I crave your pardon, my Lord, that I have been ſo

so particular in their circumstances, which seem not to be absolutely necessary to my relation; yet I hope you will not think them altogether unprofitable, since they serve to let you know what kind of education that man hath had, who hath so fortunately concealed the greatest mind in the world, and can as opportunely discover it when he pleases.

But not to abuse your patience, I shall enlarge no further upon this subject, and onely tell you, that Brutus had the learned Damo for the Tutoress of his youth, and the chiefest Disciples of Pythagoras were his Masters. I have heard him acknowledge, that the ingenious Commendations, and gentle and seasonable Repehensions of that knowing Virgin, were more advantageous to him than all his Books. She sometimes gave him very considerable advice, though she seemed onely simply to entrust him with the secret resentments of her heart: For Brutus having passed that age, wherein there is little danger of speaking any thing unseasonably, in company he seemed to have arrived to such a consistence of reason, that even those rational persons, with whom he conversed, admitted him five or six years older than he was. So that though he were yet very young, Damo numbred him among her friends, and those the chiefest. And certainly it was not without reason, for Brutus even at that time had a many excellent and winning endowments: He traveled into Greece, wherein though he spent but a year, yet it sufficed to polish his mind, and the Love he had for Sappho's Verses, was so great, that the same passion taught him to make some himself, and those so good, as might be preferred before those of that famous Lesbian. Moreover he was couragious, meek, obliging, complaisant, and amiable, and born under such an Ascendent of love, that never was there any Lover guilty of a greater tenderness than he. Yet was not his affection fixed on any thing at Metapont, though he lived there after such a high rate, as raised him the love of all the Ladies there. Tis indeed true, that the friendship he professed to Damo, was a kind of Antidote against that Tyrannical passion, which hath been since, and still is, his mercileſs tormentor.

But since Licinius and Tarquinia could not think on Rome without regret; Brutus as soon as he was come to age, began to think of his return, and imagined it more glorious for him to die, than not to revenge his Fathers death. However he said nothing to Tarquinia of this intention of his, because she was sister to the Tyrant, who had ruined his house; but in fine, though he had an extraordinary tenderness for her, yet had he as great a hatred for Tarquin. But he did not yet perceive how he could hope to hurt him, yet he did what he could to avoid all assaults of love at Metapont, as being resolved to die at Rome. Nevertheless he had acknowledged to me, that once or twice he had received some impressions of Love, but that Ambition and Friendship had soon stifled them. So that though Brutus's conversation at that time, was much like that of a Gallant and an Amorist, yet the Ladies had named him among themselves, the Loveless Gallant. That name indeed exposed him to a dangerous adventure; for you are to know, that the famous Milo, celebrated for his strength at the Olympick Games, yet one between whose body and mind there was no proportion would needs one day jeer him, and call him as others did, the Loveless Gallant. But he did it so bitterly, that Brutus, who certainly carries indignation enough in his heart, though, when he pleases he can put on as great a moderation, told him, with a malicious smile, that he was ready to acknowledge himself the Loveless Gallant, if conditionally he should confess himself to be the Lover without Gallantry. The dreadful Milo, whose force nothing could resist, presuming on the advantage which Nature had bestowed on him, returned Brutus a very sharp answer, who as confident of his courage, as the other of his strength, answered this famous wrestler with such a noble boldness, that the other conceiving himself affronted, blushed with madness, and, were it any glory for Milo to overcome thee, said he to him: I should soon teach thee, that some presumptions are unfortunate, by punishing thee for that thou art now guilty of, by provoking one who can, when he pleases, crush thee to pieces. I know very well, replied as roundly Brutus, that Milo hath been accustomed from his infancy to play with a young Bull, and that he carried one on his back at the Olympick Games: but I have never heard (continued he, with a smile full of contempt) that he knew as well how to fight with young Lions. Saying thus, Brutus layes hands on two swords which a Slave carried along who accidently passed by the place where Milo and he were walking. But he had no sooner taken them from the Slave, but casting one of them to Milo, Take that sword, said he to him, and, if thou wouldst preserve thy glory thou hast acquired, despise not an enemy who thinks he hath as great a heart as thy self, though he acknowledges thee to be the stronger. Milo entertained these words with a fierce look, while he took up the sword, which this illustrious Roman had cast him, and retreating two or three paces, and viewing with a threatning action, Young Confidence, said he to him, force me not to destroy thee, by casting thy self upon my arms, for I care not to overcome where there is no glory. But Milo had no sooner uttered these words, but he was convinced there was work for his strength to overcome the enemy he so much slighted. For Brutus making a pass at him with an incredible nimbleness, had run him through the body, had he not as readily warded the thrust with a back-blow, which made both their swords strike fire, which argued the strength of the arm which gave it. In the mean time Milo knowing that his advantage was to close with him, forgot not himself. He was greater than the ordinary size of men, his age double that of Brutus; he had all his lifetime practised wrestling, and all other exercises of the body, which requireth either sleight or strength; he was accounted the best wrestler in the world, and he was so excessively strong, that, it being beyond vulgar belief, that nature alone could make him such, people said, he derived it from a certain Stone, whose vertue was to bestow more than natural strength upon those that carried it. But though Milo had done things which might be justly attributed to a Gyant, Brutus found him more work than he expected, for he fought with so much judgement, that it was impossible Milo should close with him, though he made it his onely business to get him down. For Milo had no sooner thought of what he was to do, but Brutus shifting place, caused Milo to change his purpose, such a sleight had Bru- tus in making his passes, and presently recovering himself out of the reach of that mercilesse enemy, who endeavouring onely to fasten on him, did onely ward his blowes, knowing that if he could but once get him under him, the victory were certain. Nor indeed had Brutus any great hopes to escape this bout, for having cut Milo over the left arm, he was so exasperated to see his adversaryes sword died with his blood, that he furiously ran upon Brutus, whom he got by the shoulder, but hapning to lay hold on him with his left hand, the wound in his arm pained him so, that he was forced to let go his hold, so that Brutus presently getting off, played upon him more furiously then before. The fierce Milo seeing himself in this condition, would cast himself a second time upon Brutus; but he having by his activity avoyded the blow, Milo was so inraged that he would offer at him by a black-blow over the head, which certainly, had it been effectual, had laid him along. But Milo having missed his blow, it happened the same strength should have gained him the victory, contributed to his being overcome; for he being desirous to direct his second blow on Brutus, his sword, missing his adversary, met with a tree, into which it sunk so deep, that striving to draw it out, he could not without breaking it. But what was admirable in Brutus, was that seeing his adversaries sword so engaged, he stood still and took no advantage of it, it being in his power, in this unfortunate Interval, to have killed Milo. But in this posture were they surprized by the Slave from whom Brutus had taken the swords, who being gone for people to part them, returned sufficiently accompanyed to put an end to the Duel. In the mean time Milo was so horribly enraged at the disgrace he received, that he knew not in a manner what he did, insomuch that in his madness taking hold of the Tree wherein was the piece of his sword, he shook it so violently that he took it up by the roots, and thought to have brushed those with it who were coming to them. This expression of a prodigious strength augmented Brutus's glory, for there could be nothing so unexpected, as to see one of his age and strength over-master the terrible Milo, who had not met in all Greece with him that durst oppose him. But if the prudent Damo had not used all the interest she had in Milo, to perswade him to stifle the shame of being worsted, he would have broke forth into some violent course against Brutus. But she so well knew how to temper the bitternesse of his humour, that she forced him to embrace him whom he would with all his heart have smothered, were not the fiercenesse of his disposition restrained by the respect he bore her.

Thus, my Lord, have you had an account of Brutus's infancy, who after this furious combat, was in greater esteem among the Ladies than ever. For though Worth be not the vertue of Women, yet is it certain that they love it, and that for its sake they prejudice other good Qualities, by preferring those who it may be are onely Hectors, before others, who instead of that one, have a many other rich Vertues.

Hereupon, Brutus seeing himself commended, and courted more than ordinary, was more inclined to fall in love with a very handsome Lady with whom the particular manner he came to be acquainted, is worth the relating to you. Besides that, though it be not she that gave such a violent assault to Brutus's love, yet it is at least her acquaintance that hath been the cause of his coming to Rome, and that he lived here after the manner you have seen him.

You are then to know, that at Crotona there was a maid of an excellent wit, called Bellanira, who held correspondence by Letters with Damo; insomuch that writing to one another, as two persons who had no matters of state, but onely certain secrets of friendship to communicate, they gave one another an account of their pleasures, and principally of the new friends of either Sex, which they made. So that Damo receiving one day a Letter from Bellanira, shewed it to Brutus, and told him, she needed his assistance very much to answer it. Brutus conceiving it was some great affair that Damo should desire his advice in, opens this Letter, and found in it, if I mistake not, these words, at least I am certain it was to this effect.

Bellanira to the wise Damo.

I Once thought I should never have loved any thing but you, but now I am to tell you, that I have found a new Friend so worthy to be loved, that though I have your promise not to contract any new friendships, you would certainly come short of your word, if you knew her as well as I do. She is a Virgin, whose person endued with thousands of charms, wit, goodness, her inclinations absolutely noble, and her conversation infinitely pleasant; she is neither humorous, nor proud, but dearly loves her Friends, and is perpetually speaking to me of you, though she knew you no otherwise than by fame, and of whose friendship I have a thousand tender expressions. I desire to know whether I can, without ingratitude, refuse her affection, or without being unfaithful to you, divide mine with her, for since my heart is at your disposal, I cannot receive into it this new and charming Friend, without your permission, though I know not well how to keep her out.

When Brutus (who went at Metapont under a wrong name, which I cannot at the present call to mind) had read this Letter, he told Damo that it was handsomly writ, but saw not any necessity she had to answer it. You shall see that when I have done it, replyed she smiling; but when you have answered it, replyed he, I can do you no service in it. When you read it, answered she, you shall give me your opinion. Whereupon Damo taking writing-tables, writ to Bellanira, which when she had done, shewing it to Brutus, he therein read the Letter I am going to repeat to you.

Damo to Bellanira.

THat you may assure your self I am a person of as much sincerity as any in the World, I do ingenuously confess, that I am not a little glad that you have furnished me with a pretence to break the promise I made you, not to entertain any new Friendships. For if you have found out a Woman-friend you like so well, I can boast I have met with man I am so much taken with, that I think him worthy ſo particular in their circumſtances, which ſeem not to be abſolutely neceſſary to my relation; yet I hope you will not think them altogether unprofitable, ſince they ſerve to let you know what kind of education that man hath had, who hath ſo fortunately concealed the greateſt mind in the world, and can as opportunely diſcover it when he pleaſes.

But not to abuſe your patience, I ſhall enlarge no further upon this ſubject, and onely tell you, that Brutus had the learned Damo for the Tutoreſs of his youth, and the chiefeſt Diſciples of Pythagoras were his Maſters. I have heard him acknowledge, that the ingenious Commendations, and gentle and ſeaſonable Repehenſions of that knowing Virgin, were more advantageous to him than all his Books. She ſometimes gave him very conſiderable advice, though ſhe ſeemed onely ſimply to entruſt him with the ſecret reſentments of her heart: For Brutus having paſſed that age, wherein there is little danger of ſpeaking any thing unſeaſonably, in company he ſeemed to have arrived to ſuch a conſiſtence of reaſon, that even thoſe rational perſons, with whom he converſed, admitted him five or ſix years older than he was. So that though he were yet very young, Damo numbred him among her friends, and thoſe the chiefeſt. And certainly it was not without reaſon, for Brutus even at that time had a many excellent and winning endowments: He traveled into Greece, wherein though he ſpent but a year, yet it ſufficed to poliſh his mind, and the Love he had for Sappho's Verſes, was ſo great, that the ſame paſſion taught him to make ſome himſelf, and thoſe ſo good, as might be preferred before thoſe of that famous Leſbian. Moreover he was couragious, meek, obliging, complaiſant, and amiable, and born under ſuch an Aſcendent of love, that never was there any Lover guilty of a greater tenderneſs than he. Yet was not his affection fixed on any thing at Metapont, though he lived there after ſuch a high rate, as raiſed him the love of all the Ladies there. Tis indeed true, that the friendſhip he profeſſed to Damo, was a kind of Antidote againſt that Tyrannical paſſion, which hath been ſince, and ſtill is, his mercileſs tormentor.

But ſince Licinius and Tarquinia could not think on Rome without regret; Brutus as ſoon as he was come to age, began to think of his return, and imagined it more glorious for him to die, than not to revenge his Fathers death. However he ſaid nothing to Tarquinia of this intention of his, becauſe ſhe was ſiſter to the Tyrant, who had ruined his houſe; but in fine, though he had an extraordinary tenderneſs for her, yet had he as great a hatred for Tarquin. But he did not yet perceive how he could hope to hurt him, yet he did what he could to avoid all aſſaults of love at Metapont, as being reſolved to die at Rome. Nevertheleſs he had acknowledged to me, that once or twice he had received ſome impreſſions of Love, but that Ambition and Friendſhip had ſoon ſtifled them. So that though Brutus's converſation at that time, was much like that of a Gallant and an Amoriſt, yet the Ladies had named him among themſelves, the Loveleſs Gallant. That name indeed expoſed him to a dangerous adventure; for you are to know, that the famous Milo, celebrated for his ſtrength at the Olympick Games, yet one between whoſe body and mind there was no proportion would needs one day jeer him, and call him as others did, the Loveleſs Gallant. But he did it ſo bitterly, that Brutus, who certainly carries indignation enough in his heart, though, when he pleaſes he can put on as great a moderation, told him, with a malicious ſmile, that he was ready to acknowledge himſelf the Loveleſs Gallant, if conditionally he ſhould confeſs himſelf to be the Lover without Gallantry. The dreadful Milo, whoſe force nothing could reſiſt, preſuming on the advantage which Nature had beſtowed on him, returned Brutus a very ſharp anſwer, who as confident of his courage, as the other of his ſtrength, anſwered this famous wreſtler with ſuch a noble boldneſs, that the other conceiving himſelf affronted, bluſhed with madneſs, and, were it any glory for Milo to overcome thee, ſaid he to him: I ſhould ſoon teach thee, that ſome preſumptions are unfortunate, by puniſhing thee for that thou art now guilty of, by provoking one who can, when he pleaſes, cruſh thee to pieces. I know very well, replied as roundly Brutus, that Milo hath been accuſtomed from his infancy to play with a young Bull, and that he carried one on his back at the Olympick Games: but I have never heard (continued he, with a ſmile full of contempt) that he knew as well how to fight with young Lions. Saying thus, Brutus layes hands on two ſwords which a Slave carried along who accidently paſſed by the place where Milo and he were walking. But he had no ſooner taken them from the Slave, but caſting one of them to Milo, Take that ſword, ſaid he to him, and, if thou wouldſt preſerve thy glory thou haſt acquired, deſpiſe not an enemy who thinks he hath as great a heart as thy ſelf, though he acknowledges thee to be the ſtronger. Milo entertained theſe words with a fierce look, while he took up the ſword, which this illuſtrious Roman had caſt him, and retreating two or three paces, and viewing with a threatning action, Young Confidence, ſaid he to him, forces me not to deſtroy thee, by caſting thy ſelf upon my arms, for I care not to overcome where there is no glory. But Milo had no ſooner uttered theſe words, but he was convinced there was work for his ſtrength to overcome the enemy he ſo much ſlighted. For Brutus making a paſs at him with an incredible nimbleneſs, had run him through the body, had he not as readily warded the thruſt with a back-blow, which made both their ſwords ſtrike fire, which argued the ſtrength of the arm which gave it. In the mean time Milo knowing that his advantage was to cloſe with him, forgot not himſelf. He was greater than the ordinary ſize of men, his age double that of Brutus; he had all his lifetime practiſed wreſtling, and all other exerciſes of the body, which requireth either ſleight or ſtrength; he was accounted the beſt wreſtler in the world, and he was ſo exceſſively ſtrong, that, it being beyond vulgar belief, that nature alone could make him ſuch, people ſaid, he derived it from a certain Stone, whoſe vertue was to beſtow more than natural ſtrength upon thoſe that carried it. But though Milo had done things which might be juſtly attributed to a Gyant, Brutus found him more work than he expected, for he fought with ſo much judgement, that it was impoſſible Milo ſhould cloſe with him, though he made it his onely buſineſs to get him down. For Milo had no ſooner thought of what he was to do, but Brutus ſhifting place, cauſed Milo to change his purpoſe, ſuch a ſleight had Bru-

Bellanira to the wise Damo.

I Once thought I should never have loved any thing but you, but now I am to tell you, that I have found a new Friend so worthy to be loved, that though I have your promise not to contract any new friendships, you would certainly come short of your word, if you knew her as well as I do. You shall see that when I have done it, replyed she smiling; but when you have answered it, replyed he, I can do you no service in it. When you read it, answered she, you shall give me your opinion. Whereupon Damo taking writing-tables, writ to Bellanira, which when she had done, shewing it to Brutus, he therein read the Letter I am going to repeat to you.

Damo to Bellanira.

THat you may assure your self I am a person of as much sincerity as any in the World, I do ingenuously confess, that I am not a little glad that you have furnished me with a pretence to break the promise I made you, not to entertain any new Friendships. For if you have found out a Woman-friend you like so well, I can boast I have met with man I am so much taken with, that I think him worthy worthy to be a Servant to that Beauty you have so drawn to the life; for there issue greater charms from his mind, than can from her eyes, as being one, whose soul speaks greater excellencies than you have met with in all the men you have known. So that to deal sincerely with you, I should have been as much troubled to refuse admittance to this new friend, as you would be, should I oblige you, to break off with yours. I am willing therefore, that we be mutually guilty of Infidelity, and (the better to confirm our joynt-conquest) that we engage these two persons, who both love us, to love one another; lest that, if your friend should have a Servant that were not my friend, she might prevail with you to forsake me, and that mine having a Mistress which were not your friend, he would endeavor to lessen my friendship towards you. Propose therefore what I tell you to that amiable person, who robs me of part of your soul, and I shall make the same proposition to him who must keep you company in mine.

But for ought I see, interrupted Amilcar, the Sciences have not spoiled the wit of this daughter of Pythagoras, since she writes so excellently; and her Philosophy is not too austere, since she allows Love to be of the University of her Friends.

On the contrary, replyed Herminius, she holds that to be truly vertuous, requires a temperament full of passion, and that there cannot be a fervent affection for Vertue, where there is not withal a passionate tenderness. But to speak truly, did the Painters draw Love as she imagines it, they would disburthen him of his Fillet, his Bow and Arrows, and leave him only his Torch; for this wise Virgin says, she cannot endure the Love that is blind, and that it is enough a heart should be set a-fire, without being shot thorough with darts. In fine, she so purifies this passion, that she cleanses it from whatever is dangerous, and yet takes away nothing from it that is pleasant.

But to return to Brutus, after that Damo had shewn him the Letter she writ to Bellamira, he made as if he understood not himself to be that so well-liked person, she so mentioned to her friend, but purposely, that he might be the more fully satisfied of a thing which pleased him; but at length she reduced him to a necessity of rendering her a thousand thanks. Yet he told her, that he should never have confidence enough to see Bellamira, having seen what she writ to her of him; but she answered, it should not be long ere he saw her, for that she was resolved on a journey to Crotona, that she had engaged Tarquinia for the same place, and that she would oblige him to conduct her, and indeed within fifteen days all came to pass accordingly. But in the mean time, Bellamira and Damo writ to one another, with as much bravery as friendship; so that when they saw one another, Brutus found himself confirmed in the mind of Bellamira, who joyfully received him, and sincerely confessed to Damo, that she were to blame if she should refuse his friendship.

But this new friend of hers being not yet come to Crotona, as being expected within four days, these two loving persons resolved to put some trick upon the inchanting Chrysis, for so was that Beauty called. To this end Damo, who knew that Brutus could as easily disguise his mind, as discover it, when the humor took him, told Bellamira, that, the more to surprise her friend, 'twere fit Brutus should put on his stupidity the first time he should see Chrysis, to see how she would receive a Lover, of whom she had formed so great an Idea. Bellamira approving the proposition, and Brutus saying that it was easie for him, and not unseasonable at the first sight, to disguise his humor, rather than to be too forward to disclose it, promised so far to over-reach the fair Chrysis, that she should go near to despise him. And I promise you, replyed Bellamira, that as soon as she comes to know you, she will esteem you infinitely. It shall be therefore for your sake, replyed he. Nay, it shall be rather for her own sake, replyed the pleasant Damo, since she must be much to blame, if she know you and did not esteem you. For, to deal plainly with you, you will not be able to conceal your self. Not but that when you are among those that force you to it, you differ much from what you are among those you like, yet you also listen like one who has the discretion to be weary of hearing things of no entertainment. However it be, replyed he, I warrant you, I make Chrysis believe I have no common sence, and force her to some visible expressions of her contempt. For my part, replyed Bellamira, I am somewhat afraid, as well as Damo, that you will not be able to deceive Chrysis; whereas there is nothing more unhandsome than to undertake a pleasant circumvention, and not go through with it. I should find you in a greater fear, replyed Brutus, if I were obliged to gain Chrysis's esteem at the first sight, to entertain her with great and noble things, and screw up her admiration, instead of purchasing her contempt: for truly, I think nothing harder than to act a part of wit, nor any thing easier than not to shew that wit one hath. You have too much for to hide it so easily, replyed Damo; but, put the case I have as you say, replyed he smiling, it will not be hard for me to do what I think. We shall see replyed Bellamira, but I am afraid you your self will be deceived, and that you cannot deceive Chrysis. That which makes for Brutus, replyed Damo, is, that whether he deceive her, or not, it will still be much to his reputation; for if he cannot conceal his wit, it will be said he is very happy, that he hath so much that he cannot hinder it from appearing; and if he do conceal it, he will be much commended for his subtilty, that he can conceal the greatest wit, from one of the sprightliest wenches in the world. Brutus returned this complement with another; and their discourse that day was so pleasant and divertive, that Bellamira could not conceive how Brutus could carry himself and not discover his worth.

But in fine, three days after Chrysis comes to Crotona, but so late at night, that she could not meet with any could direct her, either to Brutus or to Damo. In the mean time, Bellamira, whose imagination was tickled with the pleasure of her friends surprisal, sent her back word by a slave which Chrysis had sent to her, that she was very sorry she could not wait on her, as being somewhat indisposed. but that if she were as obliging as fair, she would give her a visit in the afternoon; which Chrysis, who had for Bellamira the greatest ardency of a new friendship, failed not to do, and came presently after dinner. But she was no sooner come in, than Bellamira, after the first ceremonies of complement, told her that this new friend of Da- me's, who was to be her servant, was in Cretona, and was that day to be at her lodging, together with that excellent maid, who had honoured her with his acquaintance. But I beseech you, said she to her laughing, make me not ashamed, shew this day your greatest wit; and consult with my glass about your dressing, that your beauty may shine in its full lustre. Ah Bellamira, replied she, who grasps at wit, loses it, and I never miss it, so much as when I most think on it. But I pray you, continued she, what do you think of this friend of Damo's? I take him, replied Bellamira, to be the greatest wit in the world, and that if you can conquer his heart, it will be a conquest worthy of you. But, continued she, to spare both you and him the troublesomness of your first complements, I shall not exactly represent him to you, but shall leave that alone till discourse start out an occasion to do it.

Chrysis satisfied with what her friend said, fell into discourse about Damo, who soon after comes in; but he had hardly appeared, ere Bellamira, presenting Chrysis to her, said to her, See I pray, whether my infidelity be excusable, or if I could, without injustice, deny my friendship, to a person whom I think worthy of yours, which is much more precious than mine. Damo answered this Bravery very obligingly, both as to Bellamira and Chrysis, who talked with so much discretion, that she both justified Bellamira, and ravished Damo.

In the mean time comes in Brutus, but though Bellamira knew he was to disguise himself to deceive Chrysis, she herself was surprised at the manner of his carriage; for, as he came in, he changed the very air of his countenance, stupidity entred into his physiognomy, his civilities were so ungraceful, and uncertain, that Chrysis was extreamly disturbed, especially hearing Bellamira naming him by the name of that friend of Pythagoras's daughter. But if she was surprized at his arrival, she was amazed at his discourse for, for two hours together she could not observe in him a look or a smile, which might raise a suspition that he had but a common sense, so far was he from seeming to have any extraordinary parts. Not that he had betrayed himself by any extravagant talk, but there was such a natural dulness in all his discourse, that it was not to be imagined, that he, who spake so, did counterfeit; insomuch that Chrysis had not the least jealousie of it, but was absolutely perswaded, that he, whom she saw, was not the same she had heard of. So that coming to Bellamira, For Heavens sake, said she to her, what pleasure do you take to do me a discourtesie? Nay it is true, that you your self buy the delight you take in abusing me, at too dear a rate, when you purchase it with the conversation of the most stupid of mankind, and that for so long time. Bellamira, who was very much pleased at what Chrysis said, as being an evident token that she was deceived, burst forth into such a loud laughter, that Chrysis was confirmed in what she thought, that her friend had put a trick upon her; but that which was most admirable, was, that though she was satisfied she was deceived, yet could she not comprehend after what manner. So that the more she spoke of it, the more sport she found Damo and Bellamira, for she insinuated by what she said, that she did not believe Brutus to be Brutus, and was so far from thinking him able to understand what she said, that she did not stick to tell him so much.

But the man who seemed so stupid, upon a sign from Damo and Bellamira, ceased to be so, and surprised Chrysis after such a manner, that having heard him talk a quarter of an hour, she could not hold from breaking forth into a cry of astonishment. She would be angry with Bellamira, and to punish her for this advice, she told her she would honour her friends the more for it, and prefer this new one before her. Alas Madam, replied Brutus, do not break any of the Articles which are agreed upon between our two friends, for any concernment of mine, and remember that I am to be your Servant, not your Friend. Though I should do a less displeasure to Bellamira, replied she, in receiving you favorably as a Lover, than if I receive you as a Friend, yet you will give me leave not to inslave my self to the humours of two persons, who take up all their sport upon my account. Ah Madam, cryed out Brutus, if you will do Bellamira so great a spight; and deprive her of all your friendship, you must needs be guilty of some love; for do you conceive that any thing else can lessen the affection you have for that amiable person? Believe me, continued she, friendship is never destroyed by friendship, there must be something stronger than it self, that should force it out of a heart which it is once possessed of, and it is onely Love which can do what you pretend. For when all is done, a man may make many new friends, without injury done to the old; a man's mind is eatily divided into many friendships.

There are some friends, whose secrets a man is contented to know, and yet thinks not fit to trust them with his; there are others, to whom a man communicates things of importance, whom he would not entertain with trifles; and on the contrary, there are some, whom a man would acquaint with many inconsiderable secrets, to whom yet he would not commit matters of concernment. So that a man raises some kind of pleasure out of all, and though it be in a different manner, yet a man still takes some delight in all those for whom he hath never so little friendship. But Madam it is otherwise with Love, for when one is possessed with never so little of it, it presently causes a remission in the enjoyments of friendship; and when the heart is once wholly enflamed by it, there is no pleasure in the friends of either sex; what was divertive before, ceases to be so; the conversation of those we most esteem proves tedious; and pleasure it self is not pleasure, if it be not divided with the person beloved; for in fine, Love knows so well how to distrelish all the enjoyments of friendship, that if you would take a ful revenge of Bellamira, you must resolve to entertain a little love. If it be as you say (replied Chrysis laughing) I should be much obliged to you, if you can engage Bellamira to love some body, that so my friendship may prove unconsiderable to her. Ah, charming Chrysis, replied the lively Brutus, that is the way to be revenged on your self; for you would thereby deprive your self of the greatest pleasures in the world, and bestow it on Bellamira, who would little regard the delights of friendship, when she hath once tasted those of Love. But I pray tell me, says Damo, who hath taught you to talk so learnedly of a passion, which was never yet absolute Mistress of your heart? I am born under such a Love-star, Madam, replyed he, that even when I do not love any thing, yet from the simple imagination that I may love, I derive a sensible delight.

Upon this, Chryſis enclining to be pacified, there happenned very pleaſant diſcourſe between theſe three perſons: but it was ſoon interrupted by the enterance of a Lady who carryed ſeverity in her countenance, all whoſe actions were as it were ſet in tune, and whoſe very looks ſeemed to commend all that is called Pleaſure. Inſomuch that Bellanira, Damo, and Chryſis, who knew her, preſently ſtifled this diſcourſe, whereat Brutus much wondered; for he perceived they were quite other people than they were a minute before.

As ſoon therefore as this party was gone, he haſtily asked who that auſtere Lady was, who had diſturbed their diſcourſe. This Lady, replied the pleaſant Chryſis is one, whom a certain Diſciple of Damo's illuſtrious Father, hath inſtructed to part with humanity and reaſon; but the worſt is, that ſhe is not the onely woman in Crotona, who hath vowed to obſerve this cruel Auſterity, which indeed is as pernicious as Calumny it ſelf; for they are a knot of women of the ſame humour, whom I cannot by any means away with. But I would know further, replied Brutus, how they have been induced to love Vertue, when ſhe is repreſented to them ſo deformed. To give you a true account of their ſeverity, replied ſhe, you muſt lay this down as an immovable principle, that the temperament is not to be changed.

The doctrine of the wiſe Pythagoras, though it be in it ſelf but one, yet hath it been diverſly interpreted, according to the ſeveral opinions of thoſe who have received it. So that there being a perſon of ſome quality, though of no great parts, among the Diſciples of Pythagoras, a man of a ſevere nature, he for the moſt part miſunderſtood his precepts, and miſinterpreted them to his own humour; inſomuch, that at laſt he hath hewn out a certain ſcrupulous moral Philoſophy, which frightens a mind rightly principled.

As for that, ſayes Bellanira, we are onely to conſider, after what manner the Ladies, who are under his tuition, ſpeak and behave themſelves; and we ſhall find them ſo chimerically ſcrupulous, that it is not eaſily imagined how diſcreet and knowing women could be cajolled into things ſo fantaſtick. And that which is yet ſtranger, added Damo, is, that theſe ſcrupulous Ladies, whoſe ſtomachs would turn to ſee Love but in picture, rail at all women, lightly condemning the moſt innocent actions; cannot endure thoſe pleaſures they themſelves take not, ſpare not the reputation of the deareſt to them of their own ſex, find fault with every thing they do not themſelves, and turn to the worſt what ever is done behind their backs, and whatever they underſtand not. Mereover, they are ſtrangely prying into all things, they would know what ever is done in other conventicles, that they may have ſomewhat to rail at in their own; they even have an indignation to thoſe delights, which they will not take themſelves, and they are ſo conceited on their pretended Vertue, that they treat all other Ladies as prophane perſons, unworthy their Society. But for my part, I ſhall never account theſe vertuous, who take occaſion from their Vertue, to augment their pride, and to contemn whatever is not of their way. But that which is further remarkable, added Bellanira, is, that none of theſe ſcrupulous Dames, who are ſo rigid in cenſuring the actions of others, reform any one evill habit in themſelves, for I know one the moſt cholerick perſon in the world, who endeavours not once in her life to reſtrain the firſt agitations of her mind, but is perpetually ranting and chiding thoſe that live under her. I know another ſo ſlouthful and careleſs, that I think, ſome dayes, ſhe would not go one ſtep forward to meet a good fortune that were coming to her. I know one ſo penurious, that ſhe will not allow her ſelf thoſe ordinary things which advance her beauty, though ſhe be a great cheriſher of it; and there are four or five of them, who, far from living upon wild fruits, as Pythagoras did, are ſo great lovers of good cheer, that they ſpend the greateſt part of their life in eating or in ſtudying what they ſhould eat. In the mean time, theſe Dames, becauſe they ſet an extraordinary value upon themſelves, deſpiſe all others, and imagine that people ought to build Temples, and erect Altars to them.

But to countervail this replied Damo, there is another of my Fathers Diſciples, who hath expounded his doctrine after another manner, for there are a ſort of women, into whom he hath inſtilled his opinions, ſcruple at nothing, but out of a deſire they have, that their actions might be well taken, make the beſt of thoſe of others, how faulty ſoever they may be. They hold, that it is the Intention onely that can make an action evill, ſo that with the beſt Intentions they many times commit the greateſt Follies.

There is among theſe women ſo profeſſed a Libertiniſm, that it may be ſaid they place their honour in not having any: For they trouble not themſelves about any thing but what pleaſes them, and what diverts them; and to juſtifie this humour, they quote that act of compaſſion which my Father did in Egypt, when he prevailed with the Fiſhermen to ſell him all the Fiſh they had taken, that he might reſtore them their lives. Whence they infer that it is not likely that a man, who thought he performed an act of Vertue in giving liberty to a ſort of Fiſhes, would have all the paſſions chained up, and ſo render humane life comfortleſs and penſive, ſo that ſquaring Philoſophy to their own humour, they lead ſuch lives, as if they were come into the world onely to ſtudy their pleaſures, and to ſatisfie all their deſires without any abatement.

I ſhould prefer theſe however before the other, replyed Brutus, for they hurt no body, and ſpend not their time ill; but on the contrary, thoſe auſtere Dames, are damnably troubleſome, and diſturb all the enjoyments of Society. Truly, replyed Damo, they all deſerve to be condemned; and there is a third way may be taken, which certainly is the ſureſt, the moſt rational, and the moſt convenient, if the mind be but rightly diſciplined.

But, my Lord, I conſider not that I ſpend too much time in relating to you what paſſed between theſe perſons; for ſince that the counterfeit ſtupidity of Brutus at that time, partly occaſioned his continuance of it, for his ſafe abode in Rome, I might have paſſed by the account of all that converſation. But to make amends for this digreſſion, into which I am ſenſibly fallen; I muſt withal omit a many gallantries Brutus did in that place, while he ſtayed there, yet not forgetting to tell you that Tarquin and Damo returning to Metapont, prevailed with Bellanira to accompany them, and brought alſo Chryſis along with them. Brutus then having the opportunity to see them daily, began to entertain a love for Chrysis, nor could he say he wanted any from Bellanira; so that now he was not out of employment as being a servant of Chrysis, though Bellanira had the greater affection for him, as believing him not too far engaged with her friend: Besides that he had infinite friendship for Damo.

Now was it that he led a pleasant life, for his greatest business was to find out new recreations. Love and Friendship were the subjects of his Poetry, and those of his Epistles, Complement and Courtship; nor did he find others less pleasure than he did himself. But indeed this bravery was interrupted by the grief which the death of Tarquinia brought him, who died in Child-bed of Hermilia; but as time doth insensibly cure all afflictions of this nature, so Brutus, within a few dayes, yeilded to his former inclination, whereof the freqent journeys he made to Cretona, whither Chrysis was returned, were such visible expressions that Licinius could easily perceive the progress of that passion through the mask of the trouble he was in for the death of Tarquinia. Whence taking occasion to perform his promise to Marcus Junius, he told Brutus that his friends at Rome had wrought his reconciliation with Tarquin, and that he understood there was some little inclination to a Revolt; that therefore he was obliged to return thither, and consequently should not engage himself at Cretona. I have stood so long upon my guard as to that point, replyed Brutus, that if you find me not some employment, I shall not long be master of my self. For the hatred I bear Tarquin will be unprofitable, as long as I remain in a place where I cannot hurt him. Therefore if you would stifle the love which I feel growing within me, let me know whether I may hope to revenge my Father and my Brother's death; deliver Rome from slavery, and assume the glorious title of the Restorer of my Country.

You demand much in a breath, replyed Licinius, but all I can tell you, is, that while you are at Metapont, you will do nothing of all you intend. Let us then to Rome, replyed Brutus, and that suddenly. You must certainly go, replyed Licinius, but you must withal do it securely, and suffer your self to be guided by those who are acquainted with Tarquin's humour, and who hope to over reach him, and elude all his distrust. Brutus attentively hearkning to Licinius, promised an implicite obedience to his advice, and that he would submit himself to him as he would have done to his Father.

This done, it was resolved they should communicate their design to the wise Damo; nor failed they the same day to acquaint her with the whole state of their affaires; but when they had well examined the business, they were mightily troubled to find out some expedient for the safety of Brutus's life. For his part, it was the least of his troubles, but Licinius, and Damo seemed not so littly concerned in it. At length, after many thoughts of it, this prudent Virgin said, she thought she had found out a way how Brutus might be in Rome without danger. For, in fine, said she, directing her speech to Licinius, I never heard that Tarquin doth ordinarily commit any crimes which are no advantage to him. When he poysoned his Wife and his Brother, it much concerned him they should be out of the World. When he caused Servilius Tullus to be murthered, 'twas to get into the Throne himself. When he dispatched the Widdow of that vertuous and unfortunate King, it was out of a fear lest her tears and her vertue might move compassion in the people. When he gave a violent purge to the Senate, it was his design to remove thence all vertuous persons, who might oppose his injustice. When he banished or put to death so many illustrious Citizens, 'twas because they were men of conduct and courage, likely to undertake any thing against him. And to come neer home, when he put to death the Father and Brother of him, whose life you would preserve, it was because they were powerful, forward, and rich. Hence I conclude, that for Brutus to be safe at Rome until the Gods shall think fit to change the Government, Tarquin must be perswaded that Brutus can never hurt him.

Now this will come to pass, if he will but resolve to do that for his own, and haply for the safety of Rome, which he so pleasantly did some few days since for the diversion of his Mistress, when by an ingenious trick to deceive the fair Chrysis, he counterfeited Simplicity so naturally, that he deceived one the least easily deceived of any I know. How, replyed fiercely Brutus, must I act the Fool and the Sot all my life? You must certainly do it, replyed she, for by that means Tarquin, not jealous of you, would rest secure, and would haply be glad to let you live, so to give an example of moderation, when it is not prejudicial to him. Ah, generous Damo, cryed he, how harsh is this expedient! For though it be a hard task to betray a great understanding, it is a harder to personate distraction; and since, to be free with you, I must tell you, that my only business at Rome is to destroy Tarquin and be revenged on him; I beseech you consider what mischief that man can doe him, whose conversation all the World would avoid, and who would be thought not to have common sense. For my part, replyed she, my reason dissents from yours, for I conceive nothing more considerable in a dangerous conspiracy, than to have a great understanding, and a great courage, invisible to the World. In fine, if at Rome there be no inclination to a revolt, added Licinius, you may be safe and quiet; and if there be some secret risings in the City conducing to your design, you may discover your self to those who shall be able and desirous to act for the publique good. Yet once more, cryed out Brutus, this expedient is harsh and indigestible. And yet, replyed Licinius, there is no mean, you must either resolve this way, or be for ever banished Rome, and not expect to revenge your Father's death, or ever hope to recover what the unjust Tarquin hath taken from you; and to ascend a little higher, you must either accept it, or ever renounce Glory. If it come to that, replyed Brutus, I would rather renounce Reason, and submit my self to whatever you shall order.

Having thus resolved, Licinius, not willing to give Brutus leisure to repent, set all things in order for his departure, and four dayes after, the resolution taken was put in execution. He thought not fit Brutus should come to Rome till he had seen how he would be received, so that he onely brought with him the little Hermilia, who was hardly out of her Nurse's armes, and delivered her to be brought up to the sage Racilia, giving out that he was married at Metapont, but that his Wife was dead, not discovering whom he had married, for fear of exposing Hermilia to the cruelty of the tyrant, should he know she were daughter to Tarquinia, for whom he had an inveterate hatred, especially since she had left Rome. But he was no sooner admitted into Tarquin's presence, but he asked what was become of Marcus Junius's Sons? whereto he answered, that though he were alive, he might well be numbred among the dead. This doubtful answer encreasing Tarquin's curiosity, he was very importunate with Licinius to resolve this Riddle; who acting his part very subtilely, made as if he were loath to satisfie his curiosity. But at length yielding by degrees, he told him he was much troubled to tell him that a man who had the honor to be so near of kin to him, was so senseless as Junius seemed to be in all his words and actions. This he had scarcely said, but Tarquin, instead of being troubled at it, could not but betray his gladness; not but that he said it troubled him, but his eyes, more faithful than his mouth, discovered the secret of his heart, and argu'd, he had rather have a senseless, than an understanding man to his Nephew. Nevertheless, being afraid of being deceived, he bid Licinius bring him to him, which he pressed so much, that Licinius easily perceived that if he did not obey the tyrant, his life was in danger. So that promising what he desired, she sent an express to Brutus, whom he had secretly brought to an old friends house within six miles of Rome, and acquainted how things stood. Brutus was now past all deliberation, as to what he was to do; for considering with himself, that if he went not to Rome, Licinius might be ill intreated, and that withal his own life, as well as that of his Father-in-law's was in danger, if he appeard not there in his feigned stupidity, he resolv'd to do it, and was accordingly brought to Tarquin. But as he went, what did he not think on, and what apprehensions of anguish seized him? He left Metapont, where he had led an infinitely pleasant life, as a banished person. He there left a gallant friend, whom he infinitely loved, he smothered a growing love, which filled his heart with hope and joy, he lost the good company of a many honest people; he renounced all pleasure, save the hope of Revenge, and he forsook, as I may so say, his own reason. But, all considered, Licinius's life being at the stake, the revenging of his friends death, and the deliverance of his Country, being to be effected, he overcame the aversion he had to make use of so fantastick a pretence for his stay in Rome; and resolved to live there after a much different manner than he had done at Metapont. In effect when Licinius presented him to Tarquin, he acted the part of a dul and fooliſh person so well, that the fierce Tyrant was deceived in him, so that instead of being troubled to see him in that condition, he was very glad of it, for it was an affliction to him to think that Marcus Junius should have a Son alive in any place in the world, who might haply one day endeavour to revenge his fathers death. But considering him in his present condition, he was not afraid of him, nor was he sorry he could give one example of humanity without danger. He therefore seemed to have a care of him, and to be the more assured of him, he thought fit he should be married, for he was not so sottish but he betrayed the inclination he had to women. But being to marry, he must take the daughter of a man engaged in his interests, lest he should dispose of himself, and haply ally himself with some family too well affected to the publique good, and so the name of Junius, venerable in Rome, should revive. Nay to dis-accustome a People from a Name had been dear to them ever since the foundation of the famous City, the young Gallants of the Court began, by way of abuse, to call him Brutus, and left off calling him Junius; for as to the other name he went under at Metapont, and which I have forgotten, it was never known at Rome. But that which was most remarkable, was, that he whom they called by that name, which was not proper for him, though it seemed so, accustomed himself to answer to it, the more to express his stupidity, so that insensibly all came to call him Brutus, and Licinius himself hath called him so.

You now know, my Lord, in what manner this noble Roman returned to Rome, was married, and lived there, not so much as taking notice that Tarquin had usurped all the wealth of his house, and gave him onely so much as was barely necessary for his subsistance. Nor indeed did Brutus trouble himself about it, but his wives father, who was nothing afflicted at the misfortune of his son-in law, for that the Tyrant enriched him upon his account. But Brutus who was not come to Rome but to deliver it from the tyranny of Tarquin, was infinitely perplexed, for he understood by Licinius Valerius, and his vertuous Aunt Racilia, who were all intrusted with the secret of his life, whatever passed in the particular faction that were in Rome, the City, and that a Plot was sooner laid, and a Party engaged, but Tarquin quashed it by the death or banishment of the Plotters, and that consequently there was no likelihood of destroying the Tyrant, or delivering Rome, or ever appearing there with his reason about him, though he were resolved to forget all the violences, and all the enormities of Tarquin, for he was absolutely convinced that if the tyrant should once discover he had any understanding, he would soon take away his life. He also heard how that the cruel Tullia insolently answered a woman, who said, It was great pity, that Brutus was so stupid; that if he were not, it should cost him something more than his reason. So that not conceiving any probability of doing what he hoped, he led a most sad and melancholy life, having no other comfort but what he received by the Letters of the wise daughter of Pythagoras; for as for his rising love, it vanished presently after his return to Rome. While he was in this perplexity, his wife dies, leaving him two sons, which she brought him soon after their marriage; which accident somewhat encreased his pensiveness, for that she was a handsome woman and good natured. Not but that he lived with her in a strange awe and caution, for though he had a great friendship for her, because she was so well conditioned, as not to despise him, and that she believed him as simple as he made himself, yet he never durst discover himself to her, as knowing ever since he married her, that it was an impossibility with her not to tell a thing she knew, and that there never was woman less able to hold her peace than she. So that he was forced to an insupportable reservedness, even in those hours wherein all others have the greatest freedom. Yet could he not but grieve for her death, as one in whom he had met with both vertue and mildness. But as he had not any great affection ction for her, and what he had might be rather called acquaintance than friendſhip, ſo, had he known no other affliction, Time would have overcome it. But he ſaw Tarquin's power encreaſe every day; he ſaw the greateſt part of any worth, baniſhed or put to death; all the young men ſlaves to the tyrant's fortune; and ſo little likelyhood of any advantageous change for Rome, that he could hardly entertain any hope ever to ſee his Countrey or his Reaſon at liberty. This brought an unſpeakable melancholy, which cauſed him to avoid company as much as he could, nay in a manner made him deſirous to avoid himſelf.

But Licinius, who was yet alive, and who had diſcovered this ſecret to Publius Valerius, as being his intimate friend, and withal a hearty enemy of Tarquin's, perceived well that Brutus became more and more penſive. So that he therefore ſpoke to Racilia, with whom was the little Hermilia, who knew not yet that ſhe was Brutus's Siſter, to think of ſome means to comfort him, for he knew that Brutus repoſed a great confidence in her. He adviſed her to take him into a pleaſant ſeat ſhe had upon the Tiber's ſide, four miles from Rome. To be ſhort, ſhe propoſed to him the paſſing of three or four days there; to which propoſition, containing nothing oppoſite to his Melancholy, he conſented and went thither, but with an intention not to return any more to Rome, but to wander about the world until ſome change ſhould happen in Tarquin's fortune. For, ſaid he within himſelf, ſince I cannot hurt the tyrant, and ſo revenge my Father's death, and deliver my Country, to what end is it to condemn my reaſon to perpetual ſlavery, and to captivate my ſelf eternally? what glory, or what advantage is it to me, to live obſcurely, and go for the moſt ſenſeleſs and the moſt ſtupid of all mankind; and be withal an utter ſtranger to all pleaſure and ſociety? I cannot in the condition I am in, be guilty of either Vice or Vertue, but live after ſuch a fantaſtick manner, that ſince there were men, never any lived as I do. Yet for all this, could the hope of Revenge and of Glory but keep poſſeſſion of my heart, I could have patience; but to live without pleaſure, or ſo much as the hope of any, is abſolutely inſupportable, and that which I can no longer endure.

Thus was Brutus ſo ore-whelmed with melancholy, and ſo weary of the life he led, that he reſolved to leave his Countrey, and become a voluntary Exile. Being therefore confirmed in this deſign, his onely ſtudy was to put it in execution, and put himſelf in a poſture to leave Rome, and at the firſt to go no further than Metapont, knowing he had ſtill a many good friends in that place. He was alſo ſomewhat confident that Licinius and Racilia would receive him in his baniſhment, and would ſend him ſomewhat to ſubſiſt, though they were never ſo angry. Not but that when he thought of leaving Rome, and loſing all occaſions which might happen in his abſence to do Tarquin a miſchief, it a little ſhaked his reſolution; but after all conſideration, ſeeing no likelyhood of any to happen a long time, and being no longer able to endure that reſervedneſs wherein he lived, he hardned himſelf in the reſolution he had taken, wherewith he neither acquainted Racilia, nor the young Hermilia, who, as I told you, knew not as yet that ſhe was Brutus's Siſter, as being too young to be truſted with a ſecret of ſo great importance. So that being unchangeably reſolved, he deſigned his departure within three dayes, pretending he would return again to Rome, ſo to deceive his Aunt, whom he avoyded as much as lay in his power, becauſe ſhe perpetually preſſed him, to know whence that new affliction proceeded, which ſhe obſerved in him. But affecting ſolitude as much as might be, the day before his departure he walked along the river ſide, and there revolving in his mind whatever had happened to him, he remembred the pleaſures he found in the converſation of Dama, Chryſis, and Bellanira, and thereupon oppoſing one paſſion to another, he was ſatisfied he ſhould find ſome comfort, even in this, that though he quitted the noble ambition of being the Deliverer of his Country, he might aſpire to the Conqueſt of ſome great Beauty.

But his mind could not entertain all thoſe imaginations without ſome confuſion, as he hath ſince confeſſed to me; nor could he well diſtinguiſh between that which comforted him, and that which afflicted him, when turning about at the noyſe of a Chariot, a Slave very ſubmiſſively asks him, whether the Chariot he ſaw coming were in the right way to Racilia's houſe? Brutus being obliged to anſwer him, told him after his affected ſimplicity, that it was the ready way; which ſaid, not enquiring whoſe the Chariot was, nor who was in it, nor ſo much as looking that way, he continued his walk, ſo great was his melancholy. Nay this very adventure added to it, and cauſed him to ſtay out later than he ſhould have done: For, ſaid he, to what end do I go into any company, wherein I muſt be what is almoſt inſufferable to be, and ſuch as is below the envy of all? Is it poſſible, continued he ſighing, is it poſſible to be more unhappy, than to be what no man would be, no not the vileſt Slave upon the face of the earth? Amidſt theſe thoughts Brutus continued his walk, and that ſo long, that ere he returned the Lamps were lighted at Racilia's. 'Tis true, he met there with excellent company, but that you may know how much he was ſurpriſed in it, I muſt tell you, that the wife of Spurius Lucretius was there with her incomparable daughter Lucrecia, as alſo the beauteous and divine Valeria; he met there alſo with Sivelia and Murius, whom you have ſeen with the King, and I my ſelf was come to accompany theſe noble perſons, who were come upon no other deſign, than to ſurprize Racilia in her ſolitude. But as this illuſtrious Roman is a perſon of conduct and œconomy, our reception was ſuch as if we had been expected, beſides that it was with a great cheerfulneſs, for Lucrecia's mother and mine were her intimate friends, Murius was ſome kin to her as well as the other two, Valeria and Lucrecia ſhe had a great eſteem for both for their own ſakes, as alſo for theirs of whom they derived their being, and for my part, I was alſo entertained upon Sivelia's account. Omitting therefore nothing requiſite to our entertainment, ſhe preſently gave order the houſe ſhould be adorned with that magnificence, as if ſhe were to keep ſome great Feſtival. So that Brutus returning, and entring into a large arched hall, furniſhed to admiration, he wondred to find there ſuch a noble company; for you are to know, that as he had not the priviledge of much converſation, ſo was he not acquainted with all the Beauties in Rome, for he had never ſeen Lucrecia unveyled, nor had much more knowledge of Valeria, though

Valerius was of his caball. It happened so that he was no sooner entred, but those two Beauties shining ful into his sight, dazled him into a change of colour. For though Valeria were not haply as exactly handsome as Lucrecia, yet she may well be accounted a very excellent person. In the mean time, though none conceived Brutus could contribute any thing to the company, yet as one of good birth, and Nephew to Racilia, he was saluted, but with that coldness of complement, wherewith we entertain those whom we esteem not, and, without allowing him any part of the discourse, it was continued in the same channel it was in before. For his part he onely harkned to what was said, and earnestly viewed Lucrecia, who certainly that night shined with an extraordinary beauty. For though I know you have seen her with Prince Sextus, yet I shall not stick to say, she was at that time handsomer than she can be now, though she yet deserve admiration. It was impossible a complexion should have more lustre, or an eye more majesty, and withall more sweetness than she then had. Nor indeed did Brutus look on her indifferently, which when I observed, I came to her, and whispering to her smiling, You see Madam, said I to her, how great the power of your beauty is, since that Brutus, as brute as he is, is sensible of it, and admires it. If that which you call Beauty in me, replied she smiling also, produce no more glorious effect than this, I shall not hastily be too proud of it. But truly, said she, I so much pity poor Brutus, that I have not the heart to laugh at his stupidity.

As she said this, a great noyse was heard in the Court, and presently Racilia had notice, that the Prince of Pometia, and Prince Titus, who said they had lost their way a hunting, desired entertainment there for that night; but the truth of the business was, that the former of the princes, being fallen in love with the young Hermilia, took this occasion to give her a visite. Now these Princes being vertuous persons, especially the Prince of Pometia, Racilia out of consideration both of equity and prudence, received them kindly, though she ever abhorred Tarquin. Besides that, having a large and fair house, and that the Princes brought none with them but their Slaves, she was not much troubled at their coming, and so she staied with her former company, as if she had no further care to take. In the first place the Prince of Pometia related how he and Titus lost their way, but he did it with so much art, that I am confident the fair Hermilia as young as she was, easily perceived that she was the occasion of that hunting, and that that Prince looked after no other pray then that of her heart; for turning her head a side, she blushed, and seemed not to heed what he said, though he listned very attentively.

But at last, all having taken their former places, Brutus having not all the while said any thing, Titus fell into some private discourse with Lucrecia's mother and Sivelia, so to do his brother a courtesie, for by that means he might the more freely entertain Hermilia, who was somewhat shie of engaging into discourse, while Lucrecia's mother was with her Aunt. So the general discourse happened between Racilia, Valeria, Lucrecia, Hermilia, the Prince of Pometia, Mutius, and my self; as for Brutus, he said nothing at all, though sometimes he was very desirous to speak something, simply or heavily, according to his custome, especially because Tarquin's sons were in the room. But he hath told me since, that he was so loath to speak indiscreetly before Lucrecia, that he thought better to be silent, then to say any thing that night. But the discourse was changed after such a manner, as gave him occasion to observe, that Lucrecia's Wit was as great as her Beauty. For you are to know, that as in Rome they work admirably in earth, whether it be for Vessels, or Statues, so Racilia, who studied curiosity and convenience as much as might be, had excellent Vessels, insomuch that the Slaves who waited on her, covering certain tables, and placing all things necessary for the treatment of so noble a company, the Prince of Pometia observed that one of the tables was of the same material with those Vessels I mentioned, and was admirably wrought. It was supported by three children, who seemed to have so much adoe to carry it, that one would think himself obliged to help them to bear it up. The Prince liking it very well, began to commend it, and was going towards it the better to consider the workmanship of it. Which the two Slaves, who were covering it, perceiving, they lifted it up to bring tō him, but so rashly, that they overturned it, and broke it all to pieces. That it seemed very admirable to all the company, appeared by the cry they all made when that mischance happened, except the Mistress, who seemed not to be at all moved at it. As for the Prince of Pometia, who was the innocent occasion of this mishap, he made a thousand excuses to Racilia; but she not being in the least angry with the Slaves, who had so indiscretely spoyled such an excellent commodity, told the Prince, that the onely trouble she had, was, that it was broken before he had had satisfaction of seeing it; but yet that happiness might be recovered, she would have another of the very same making; which when she had said, she with a great calmness commanded those who had broke that, to fetch another out of a certain place she directed them to, and to have a care they did not break it. Ah Madam, cryed out Lucretia, looking earnestly on her, How I love you for your great patience, and that you are not of those Women who are angry, at all times, in all places, before all sorts of persons, and for all things! For I do not conceive any thing nobler than to raise one's self above a certain testiness, which is contracted by custome, and to which most Women are prone enough, since that many times it makes them do as fantastick things as folly it self would put them upon. It is true, replyed Racilia, that to be soon angry is an ill custome to take up, both for one's self and others. And I think, added pleasantly Valeria, that fair Ladies ought to have a greater care to reform this fault, than others; for excessive anger injures Beauty. To that purpose continued Lucrecia, I saw, not many dayes since, a very handsome Lady, who, upon such an occasion, became in an instant very deformed, and continued so for above four hours. She had then some extraordinary cause to be angry, replyed I, or haply she had something spoyled as considerable as this table of Racilia's. Not at all, replyed Lucretia, and the adventure is so odd, that I have a mind to tell it you. You will oblige me much, replyed Racilia, for Hermilia is naturally so Passionate, that if she have not a care, she will come to be very cholerick. 'Tis true, replyed the blushing Beauty, that I am naturally somewhat enclined to this froward passion, but yet yet I do not conceive I have given the fair Lucretia any occasion to make pleasant stories of the extravagances of my passion. For my part, said Martia, (who is of a nature violent enough) I cannot be such an Enemy to Anger, my I am perswaded, that it is it makes the vertue which seems to be opposite to it; for, it is certain, a great patience is an effect of great courage, and a great courage is oftner found in those who are of a cholerick disposition, than in those who are so dispassionate, that a man knows not when they are offended, nor when they are obliged. Passion and Choler, replyed Lucilia, are two different things; but therefore I oppose what you say, added she, I shall be glad to hear what Lucretia sayes, for I am perswaded that sometimes Examples are better Masters than Precepts. I must indeed confess, sayes Lucretia, that I ow a great part of my moderation to the impatience of two or three of my acquaintance, and principally of her whom I am going to tell you of. Imagine then, continued she, this Lady, who is very buxome, to be in the best humour in the World the last time I saw her, for she was free, jocund, complaisant and lightsome. That which partly caused her to be in so good an humour, was, that looking in the glass, she thought her self that Morning handsomer than ordinary, and that two other friends of hers and my self, had told her so much while we were walking in her Garden. To be short, her complexion was more serene, her eyes gentle, and her lips carnationed; but at last, having walked enough, she brought us into her Chamber. She had no sooner lifted up her veyl, but she goes to the glass, questionless to be confirmed in the high opinion she had of her beauty; but what was most pleasant, was, she found it so strangely overcast, that she could onely see her self as if it had been through a thick mist. So that not knowing of a sudden whether there were any mist in the Chamber, though it were very fair weather, she turned somewhat troubledly toward her friends and me, which we perceiving, and knowing whence it proceeded, as being just opposite to the glass, as well as she, laughed at it; and I told her jestingly, that that accident was a punishment for the excessive delight she took in her own Beauty. But it was no sooner out of my mouth, but she blushed for madness, and without making me any answer called up hastily one of her Women to know what had discoloured her glass. But instead of asking it mildly of the maid, who was but young, and seemed to be simple enough, she presently changed her voyce, her countenance and action, insomuch that she who a minute before was of a composed air, and had a mild and modest look, ceased immediately to be what she was. For not giving her Slave time to answer what she asked, she presently imagined she was to blame for asking, and that she knew the reason of it without her telling. She added, that certainly it must be she, who thinking her self pretty, instead of minding her work, did nothing but view her self in the glass. This gave her occasion to tell her, that she was much deceived, if she thought her self handsome, and to ask her why she pretended to it, and whom she so much studied to please, and talked to her so many trivial stories, that I was never so much ashamed of any thing, as I was of that person for the concernment of my sex. And when the poor Girl, whom she so much exclaimed against, would have said something to justifie her self, her Mistress presently found something else to quarrel as, so that at last having compassion on her, I would needs excuse her. But I had hardly opened my mouth, ere the incensed Beauty changing the object of her anger, fell upon me, and told me that if I offered to excuse her, I should make her so impudent, that she would be no more for her service, multiplying words so strangely, that no other had the leisure to speak. In the mean time, the Roses and Lillies of her delicate complexion were so disturbed, that they were not discernable; for her face was enflamed into a deep red, the white of her eyes was changed, which were inlarged beyond their ordinary size, looking disturbedly and scatteringly, and indeed, as if she saw not what was before her; the figure of her mouth was not the same; she repeated the same thing twenty times, and she seemed rather a mad Priestess of Bacchus, than a modest Roman.

But in fine, all this came to nothing, for when she had ranted and scolded, and vented her extravagances to weariness, it appeared she had no reason at all to be angry. For when she came down into the garden to entertain us, she gave order her chamber should be perfumed against she came in, so that in obedience to her commands, burning much perfume, the glass was overcast with it, and the poor Slave, who never thought of looking into it, perceived it not. She thence at last conceived the maid had not done any thing of what she thought, and that she was to blame for having kept such a stir. But though she was convinced of this, yet was there not an absolute calm in her mind; on the contrary, a certain conscience of her weakness raising a new tempest in her, suffered her not to rest free from some tossings of indignation all that day. She answered peevishly all that spoke to her; she quarrelled with all attended her, and that before whoever came to her, without ever considering whether it were civil or not; nay I am not certain whether she came not so high as to threaten a little Slave she had. I was never so much astonished at any thing, as to see this strange transport of spirit, and withall, what an alteration Anger made in this great Beauty. You so pleasantly describe this fantastick anger, replyed I, that though I am naturally somewhat inclined to it, I shall henceforward take a great care to correct it in my self, though I am of opinion, that this inclination of nature ought not to be blamed; nay, on the contrary, hold, that Anger in noble and regulated minds, is an argument of greatness of courage and integrity. For if you look upon this passion in a discreet man: you will find it never breaks forth but upon some resentment of injury, wherein reputation is concerned, and that it is a pure effect of his vertue, and speaks the tenderness of his soul, the delicacy of his mind, and the clearness of his apprehension. For how can a man of an upright soul resent a manifest injustice, and not carry a heart sensible of it? Or he who sets a high value on his reputation, receive an affront without indignation? Nay I am of opinion, added Martia, that, to speak generally, the temperament most enclined to choler, is that of gallant Spirits. Yet all nations certainly, replyed I, are not perswaded that Choler is a necessary ingredient of Valour; on the contrary, the Lacedemonians hold, that it is prejudicial to it, which is the reason that they animate their Soldiers to fight with a sweet harmony, to infuse joy and tranquillity into into their ſouls; and before battels ſacrifice to the Muſes, to oblige them to preſerve their reaſon entire in fight. That which to me ſeems moſt inconvenient in choler, replyed the ſage Racilia, is, that perſons of weak conſtitutions are more ſubject to it than others, as children, and ſuch as are in a declination of age and reaſon, are angry at any thing. In like manner, ſick perſons, who are not maſters of their reaſon, are vexed at trifles, ſuch as they are aſhamed of when they are in health; and laſtly, women (if I may be ſo free to the diſcredit of my ſex) for the moſt part, being not capable of any great fortitude and ſtrength of parts, are many times hurried into humorous vexations, as appears by the relation of Lucrecia. I agree with you, replyed I, that indeed it argues a weak mind, and little diſcretion to be angry at ſmall matters; but I withal maintain, that never to be moved, ſignifies rather an inſenſible mind, than any ſtrength of reaſon. Nay I preſume to affirm, that it is no vertue to be inſenſible, that Anger may produce good effects, and that it is juſt ſometimes to give it way; but withal, I aver it is danger when it becomes habitual, and that it is commendable to bridle it, and that a man muſt never be over-maſtered by it. Certainly, replyed pleaſantly Lucrecia, where there is not a ſtaid mind, Anger is a dangerous habit, and ſuits not ſo well with women, for I have obſerved a certain attraction in affliction and tears, but I have never ſeen any beauty in anger, nor known any impatient that were withal agreeable. That which is not inſupportable in this paſſion, ſays the Prince of Pometia, is, that its object omits not any limit as other paſſions do. As for inſtance, if a man have a great tenderneſs for ſome one particular perſon, it is only for that very one's ſake that he ſhall betray a certain weakneſs, while his paſſion laſts, which is the only teſtimony he gives of all thoſe pleaſant extravagances, whereof he knows himſelf guilty. But as for anger, it faſtens on all things, it equally reaches things ſenſible and inſenſible, and the mind is incenſed by things of ſmall, as well as thoſe of greater concernment, according to every one's humor. You are in the right, replyed Lucrecia, for an inraged Muſician breaks the ſtrings of his Inſtrument, a Painter flings away his Pencils; a Senator will be angry if you diſſent from his Opinion; a Husband quarrels with his Wife for being too expenſive; and a Wife quarrels with her Husband if he be too covetous; a great Beauty falls out with her own Hairs when they will not be ordered as they ſhould be; and if it be true, that there are any Lovers in this world, it is poſſible, added ſhe ſmiling, they may ſometimes confer their diſcontents together, upon over very ſlight occaſions, if ſo be they are of a cholerick diſpoſition.

Lucrecia acted this exaggeration with ſuch a grace, that ſhe gained the commendation of all the company for her wit, and Brutus hath told me ſince, that almoſt forgetting his artificial ſtupidity, he had been likely to contribute his praiſes to thoſe of the reſt. And indeed he prepared himſelf to ſpeak, but the fair Hermilia haſtily prevented him, which I only obſerved, but at that time made no great reflection upon it, for I hearkned to Hermilia, who not willing to quit the diſcourſe about anger, made it her buſineſs at leaſt to excuſe it. But in fine, ſaid ſhe, how is it poſſible not to be angry at many trivial things which happen, for it is in reſpect to theſe that I would ſpeak of anger, that is, how can the mind be ſo qualified as not to be ſtirred to anger at a many inconſiderable accidents, which every moment happen beſide all expectation? Hermilia indeed is now in the right, ſaid Valeria, ſince that to ſpeak in general terms, it is eaſier not to be hurried into paſſion upon ſome important occaſion, than never to be moved at theſe ſudden ones, when haply Reaſon ſtands not on its guard, but the mind is ſurpriſed, and moved before it take time to conſult. For my part, added Matius, I ſhall never believe the Gods have beſtowed on us ſuch paſſions, as we may not innocently uſe; and I am ſtrongly perſwaded, that as there may be a Love without Crime, ſo there may be an Anger without any juſt blame, and that it is the uſe of it only that requires regulation. I am of opinion, replyed the gallant Prince of Pometia ſmiling, that only Lucretia deſerves to be the Halcyon of Anger, if I may ſo expreſs it, and that it is from her that we muſt receive inſtructions how to qualifie this tumultuous paſſion which is ſo diſpleaſing to her. The Prince of Pometia hath ſpoken ſo excellently well, replyed I, that it is fit the fair Lucrecia grant what he demands. Let her make what orders ſhe pleaſe againſt Anger, replyed Matius, ſhe ſhall have much to do to keep it quiet in my heart; and for my part, ſaid Hermilia, I muſt needs quarrel with her ſeverity. You would do better, if you advantaged your ſelf by her example, ſaid Racilia to her; but for my part, ſays Valeria, it will be no great trouble to me to ſubmit to her. And it will be leſs to me to enact my pretended Laws for the Ladies, replyed Lucrecia, for I have no more to do than to bid them imitate your moderation. To be ſhort, continued ſhe, as it is not my duty to regulate another's reſentments by my own, ſo I have no more to ſay, but to propoſe Herminius for a pattern for men, as I do Valeria to all of my own ſex; for I know by experience that they are both ſubject to a great ſenſibility of ſpirit, and that if Reaſon had not taught them the lawful meaſure of anger, they would be over-maſtered by it, as well as ſo many others. Ah Madam, ſaid I, looking upon her, you do not know me, I am not fit to be a pattern of patience, for if you knew how ſenſible I am upon ſome occaſions, and how angry I am with my ſelf for it, it would move your pity, and you would ſeek into your own reaſon for that which you cannot find in my heart, as having much more frailty than can be imagined. For my part, added Valeria, I confeſs I am miſtreſs enough of my own paſſions, I have the art to conceal my anger, or at leaſt to repreſs it, ſo as it never tranſported me to ſay any thing which I repented when my paſſion was over. Ah Valeria, replyed Lucrecia, how much am I obliged to you, for having given us in few words the moſt excellent rule in the world!

I would ask no more of all women, than to keep within thoſe bounds; for if they ſhould do ſo, they would never be haſty or fretful, they would not be always chiding their Slaves, always quarrelling with their Friends; they would not be violently hurried into paſſion, before thoſe that come to viſit them; they would have a reſpect to themſelves, and would not cloud the ſerenity of their eyes with a ſtorm of fury. But if you quite take away anger, ger, replys Herminia pleasantly, I know not how Ladies can beget an awe and respect in such as make addresses to them, since in my judgment it is their only defence. For instance, if any one be so bold, as to entertain a Lady with some discourse that is displeasing to her, I am confident, if she blush with anger, and give some testimony of her displeasure in her eyes, this forward person will presently shift discourse, rather than continue it, out of a fear to displease her. But on the other side, if she be so patient, that she express no sign of anger, he will at last make her angry in good earnest. You press this too far, replies Lucrecia for though I am an enemy to excessive anger, yet I allow women to express their indignation; even to fierceness; but I would that the redness which anger spreads upon their cheeks, should but add to their beauty, not disorder their minds, and that they preserve their respect rather by a modest severity, than by angry expostulations, which at no time become a woman, especially when they are such as are worth nothing, raised upon frivolous grounds, and a disparagement to such as are subject to them. I mean those passions which spring up anew continually, those persons who are subject to them, never taking any care by a strong resolution to correct so ill a habit, which by rendring them less fair and pleasing, brings them sometimes into the hatred and contempt, not only of their superiors, but even of their inferiors.

Lucrecia having proceeded thus far, the banquet was brought in, which put an end to this pleasant and profitable entertainment. Brutus all this while said not a word; but ceased not to admire Lucrecia, with whose Wit he was more taken than with her Beauty, though her beauty were admirable. But that he might be at the same time acquainted with all the perfections of Lucrecia, it happened they came to speak altogether of her goodness; whereof Valeria related a many instances, though much against the others will, insomuch that the night was wholly spent in her commendations. So that when all were retired, Brutus was wholly taken up with thought of Lucrecia.

It happened, that the chamber where this Beauty was disposed to lodge, joyned to a closet which was in Brutus's, which having been sometime a passage between those two chambers, they had only nailed up the door which went out of it into that where Lucrecia and Valeria lay. But there being certain chinks in the door, through which it was easie to see what was done in the place where these two Beauties were; Brutus, who had often taken notice of it, could not with-hold, being returned into his chamber, from going into the closet, and beholding these two Beauties whilst they undressed themselves, in whom he discovered a thousand new perfections. For the dress of Roman Ladies hiding the neck, he knew not until this instant the perfection of theirs; indeed his heart being already destined to Lucrecia's service, even before he knew so much, he fixed all his observation upon her with such a stedfast view, that he had not the power to close his eyes all the night after. This pleasing Idea, though full of all delightful charms, troubled his rest, insinuating a kind of commotion into his heart, betwixt grief and joy, which raised in him a thousand different imaginations. It made him a long time forget the design he had taken to leave Rome within two days, and to banish himself voluntarily from a place, where it behoved him to hide his soul, if he would preserve his life, and where he saw not any likelihood of revenging his Father's death, or delivering his Country, as he intended, whilst he confined himself to this foolish disguise. At last, after a long deliberation, suddenly recollecting himself, and remembring the resolution he had taken to go away, it vexed him that he had seen Lucrecia, he endeavored to blot her out of his imagination; he looked upon this accident as a new misfortune, which gave him the knowledge of so excellent a person, when he had resolved to go so far from the place where she was: It is true, said he to himself, that as I shall see and be seen of her, I need not much regret her absence, since if I fall not in love with her, I shall not lose so great a pleasure in depriving my self of her sight. For though fair objects delight our eyes at all times, even though our hearts be not touched, yet the pleasure of the eyes is a mean pleasure. A garden of flowers would please my eyes as much as the sight of a fair woman, for whom I have no passion my self, nor desire that she should have any for me. On the other side, if I love her, I shall lose less by this separation; for after all, how passionate soever I become, I dare never express it to her, nor hope for any allowance thereof; and how can she love a man in whom appeareth nothing of wit or conversation, one that she values less than the meanest, and most stupid Slave?

Let us think no more of Lucrecia but pursue our design of quitting Rome, a place where lives a person, who perhaps may make me yet more unhappy than I am. In what part soever of the world else I shall fall in love, I shall be less miserable; for I may hope not to be despised, I may obtain leave to say, that I love some one, or at least to complain of her cruelty.

Thus Brutus believing he had mastered his own will, passed the rest of the night in thinking upon his journey; and as soon as the Sun appeared, he rose with intent to walk alone without thinking on the company at Racilia's house. But what soever his intention was, he had not power to go away without the curiosity of going into the closet, through which he could see into Lucrecia's chamber. This desire was so great he could not resist it; in fine, he entered, and peeped in at the same cranny as he had done the night before, but his curiosity received little satisfaction, for though he saw Lucrecia asleep, yet he had a less sight of her than when she was awake, because she slept in so modest a posture, that he could see nothing but her right hand, in which she seemed to hold carelessly a little white veil which covered half her face. This hand indeed was so white, that it made an end of the theft her eyes had begun, and stole away his heart. Yet did not Brutus perceive this infancy of love; he called the first motion of his passion, curiosity; he resolved to walk alone, to avoid meeting with Lucrecia, that he might not be obliged to speak in her presence, fancying to himself a kind of pleasure in being separated from her, that so he might not accuse himself of having spoken indiscreetly before a person to whom he found a great inclination in himself to use all his Rhetorick, if he had been in such a condition, that he durst have discovered his thoughts.

He went hereupon to walk in a Meadow bordered with Willowes interwoven with thick bushes, which butted upon the Tiber; Thither he went with a resolution to return home, till the fair troop were gone; for having openly professed stupidity, he was not tyed to any rules of civility, and the presence of the two Princes did no longer oblige him to a self-constraint. So that to compass his design, he went, followed onely by a Slave, to take a light repast with the Priest of a little Country Temple, not far from the place which he had chosen for his walk. In fine, he ordered it so well, that he went not back untill it was within an hour of sun-set, and then not doubting but that the company which caused his solitary humour was departed, he took his way along the River to go home. But as he began to walk, he was touched with a little kind of discontent for not having seen that admirable person whom he avoyded to meet. He condemned himself almost at the same instant, and giving his thoughts leave to range without any fixed object, he sent the Slave that attended him before, and in this manner walked along the River, not well knowing where he was, untill coming to the midst of the Medow, he beheld there women seated at the foot of an old Willow, who chanced to rise at the same time, as he perceived them and began to walk away. Scarce were they risen, but he knew these three to be Valeria, Lucrecia, and Hermilia, who knowing him, as he them, turned aside to avoyd them. For Hermilia her self was not onely ignorant that she was Sister to Brutus, but was a stranger as well as her two friends, to the true worth of this noble Roman. Not willing therefore that their conversation should be interrupted by a man, who, as they conceived, could add nothing to it, they turned as I said, aside. This action gave Brutus to understand what it was that obliged them to shun him, whereat he was infinitely troubled, yet did he comply with their intention, and saluting them afar off, went directly on to the house of his Aunt, imagining that the rest of the company were there still. But this belief deceived him, for he found Racilia alone, who told him, the two Princes had been gone ever since the morning, and that the mother of Lucrecia, Sivelia, Mutius, and I, were newly departed. How comes it then, replyed Brutus, that Lucrecia and Valeria are here still? That, replyed she, proceeds from some concernments of Family, which have moved Lucrecius, father to Lucrecia, and Valerius, father to Valeria, to remove their daughters for some time out of Rome. But being careful to whom they would trust their daughters, they have thought fit to commit them to my government, while the fair weather holds, which courtesie they have desired upon account of the alliance which is between our Families, and the friendship there is between these maids and Hermilia, there being no concernment of yours could hinder it; for that, added she smiling, you are not thought any dangerous person. Brutus having heard what Racilia said, blushed, though he himself knew not why. However he returned some answer to what that sage person said to him; which done, he discoursed with her about divers things. He asked her, if Sivelia, whom he knew to be an enemy of Tarquin's, had not informed her of any thing, whence might be raised a hope of some change in Rome; to which she answering, nothing at all, he was infinitely sad, and began to bemoan the cruelty of his destiny, and complained of it with so much sense and passion, that Racilia hath told me since, that she never heard man speak so well, nor so feelingly as he then did. That which yet encreased the affliction which he received from his own lamentations, was, that seeing those three fair ones, whom he had seen in the Meadow coming towards him, he rise up purposely to avoyd them, but with such an aversion, that she extreamly pitied him.

But Brutus was scarcely gotten out of this delightful company, but repenting him of his purpose, he returned into the place where it was, and secretly condemned himself for the intention he had had. For in fine, said he, since there is almost no pleasure but that of the sight, which I may pretend to participate with rational creatures, it were hard to be deprived of it, but I should at least make this advantage of fair objects, as to entertain my self with delightful imaginations. Upon these thoughts, Brutus making a short return, spent the evening amongst these lovely Virgins, but it was rather to harken to them, than to entertain them. Yet he made a shift to speak once before Lucrecia, but it was with affected simplicity, though he was with much trouble forced to it, for thinking it uncivil not to answer what was asked him, and withal not daring to answre to any purpose, it must needs have infinitely afflicted him.

Lucrecia never having heard him speak before that time, whispered to Hermilia, and asked her whether he never had any more wit, which Brutus overhearing, felt such a vexation as he had never felt before: For before he had seen Lucrecia, he was extreamly pleased that he was thought absolutely stupid, because it conduced to his design; but for that admirable Virgin, he could not endure she should have the same thoughts of him, as so many others. Nay he was encouraged in the good opinion he had conceived of her, by divers things she that day spoke in the commendation of Goodness; for in fine (said she to Hermilia, who maintained that it was sometimes prejudicial to be over-good) a great mind without goodness may be feared and hated, but it is never loved: And I am so much confirmed in what I say (continued she, speaking somewhat lower) that I would rather have the stupidity of Brutus, than the wit of the cruel Tullia, though she have one of the greatest in the world. But my Lord, though Lucrecia intended not that Brutus should have heard her, yet he did; and what is remarkable in it, is, that though he could not think himself obliged any way by this discourse of Lucrecia, yet he humored himself into a certain delight, to think that she wished rather to be what he was, than to be Tullia; so that flattered with his imagination, he, with much satisfaction, listned to the discourse of these three maids. For my part, said Lucrecia, I take such a pleasure to be good, that I am resolved to be so while I live, and consequently must needs prefer a great goodness without wit, before a great wit without goodness. But certainly, replied Hermilia, those persons that are so good, that they can never be otherwise, are not very diverting; and to tell you what I think, I am of opinion, that goodness alone hath in it something faint, weak and displeasing, whence it comes, that it signifies almost nothing in some people. But it cannot be so said of wit; for I know some persons much given to be mischievous, whom whom yet I am taken with, though I am confident they will do me an ill turn, when ever it lies in their power. On the contrary, I know another person of exceſſive goodneſs, one who would not be guilty of a thought of ceaſing to be good, even to her enemies, who yet is infinitely troubleſome to me, inſomuch that hours ſeem ages, when I am alone with her. And hence I think I may with reaſon affirm, that Goodneſs accompanied with wit, is good for all things, but without it, is almoſt good for nothing. Ah Hermilia, cryed out Lucrecia, you are an unhappy body to ſay ſo; for it is uncredible, that Wit without goodneſs is fit onely to do miſchief, and that goodneſs without Wit, hath at leaſt this advantage, that it can do no hurt. But, replyed Hermilia, an exceſſive goodneſs is ſometimes hurtful to thoſe that have it, for when you are feared by none, you lye open to the affronts of all, and are thruſt to the wall ſooner then another. That indeed which Hermilia ſaith, happens ſometimes, replyed Valeria, and through a certain malignancy that is in the world, if you are not thought able to return evil for evil, you muſt never expect good for good. So that were I to have my wiſh, I would certainly deſire as much wit as goodneſs, were it onely to make uſe, when occaſion ſerved, of that precious quality, which without queſtion raiſes the eſteem of all the reſt, and without which they deſerve no great commendation. But though one ſhould have nothing to do with the world, replyed Hermilia, Wit is ſtill more neceſſary than Goodneſs; for as to Converſation; Goodneſs contributes nothing to it. Nay, on the contrary, continued ſhe laughing, it may be ſaid, it is very prejudicial to it; for thoſe who are ſo exceſſively good can find exceptions at nothing, they approve all things, they endure all things; and ſo the diſcourſe dies every moment. No Hermilia, replyed Lucrecia, I muſt diſſent from you in that, ſince that onely thoſe who have Wit and Goodneſs together, give life to Converſation. For are they not of a contrary humour to thoſe, who abuſe and calumniate their acquaintances, whereas it may be inferred from what you ſay, that thoſe onely beget diverſion, who raiſe quarrels and conteſtations in companies? But to be more ſerious, I boldly affirm, that it is onely a rational goodneſs which diſtinguiſhes men from beaſts, and the greateſt expreſſion of reaſon that can be given, is, to be able to hurt, but out of a conſideration of Vertue and Goodneſs not to do it. Yet theſe good People without Wit, replyed Hermilia, who are good, and know not why they are ſo, what employment will you put them upon? And theſe perſons of great wit, replied Lucrecia, who make no other uſe of it, than to deceive thoſe who truſt them, to rail, and raiſe ſcandalls and reports, what buſineſs have you for them? You preſs me ſomewhat too hard, replyed Hermilia, for I confeſs I ſhould be to ſeek how to diſpoſe of ſuch malicious perſons, as ſhould make others harms the buſineſs of their wit. But do you alſo, to requite me, acknowledge that you would be much troubled what to do with thoſe good dull ones, who are guilty of neither malice nor delight. To reconcile you both, replyed Valeria, I think miſchievous perſons are to be avoyded, how witty and divertive ſoever they may be, and that they are not to be particularly acquainted withall; and that the good are to be excuſed, out of a conſideration of their great goodneſs, and their imperfections are to be born with, notwithſtanding their want of wit. But to put a queſtion ſomewhat harder to be reſolved, added Valeria, I ask you both, whether you would have an extraordinary Wit? For my part, replyed Hermilia, I ſhall ſoon chooſe; and I as ſoon, replyed Lucrecia, for I am already reſolved. But this ſatisfies not me, replyed Valeria, you muſt tell me, whether you have choſen; Methinks, replyed Hermilia, you might eaſily gheſs that Lucrecia hath taken the great Goodneſs with the indifferent Wit; and you might as eaſily conceive, added Lucrecia, that Hermilia hath choſen the greater Wit, and indifferent Goodneſs. Yet I am confident, added this wiſe Virgin, that if there were two ſuch perſons, ſhe whoſe goodneſs were greater then her wit, would be much more beloved than the other. I know not whether ſhe might be more beloved, replyed Hermilia, but I am certain that ſhe whom I have choſen would be the more eſteemed. But what ſignifies that eſteem, replyed Lucrecia which begets not friendſhip? for I lay this as a principle, we ſhould not deſire to be eſteemed, but in order to be loved, or at leaſt to be thought worthy to be loved. If you value not an Eſteem without Friendſhip, replyed Hermilia, what will you have me to conceive of a kind of lukewarm friendſhip without eſteem? For I cannot believe that one can have an eager affection for a perſon of mean wit, how good ſoever he may be. If the love we have for a good perſon be not grounded on the eſteem we have for him, replyed Valeria, it muſt needs proceed from the acquaintance we have with him, which we conceive obligeth us to love him. Nay then, replyed Hermilia, I perceive ſhe that makes the propoſition, declares againſt me. On the contrary, replyed Lucrecia, it may be ſaid, we are both of your ſide; for though you ſpeak againſt goodneſs, yet we know you to be one of the beſt in the world. It is indeed true, replyed ſhe, I am not wicked; and to ſpeak truly, I would not be otherwiſe than good; but it is true, that there are a ſort of miſchievous people that pleaſe my humour, and ſome good, who are troubleſome to me, and to ſpeak generally, goodneſs is almoſt every where oppreſſed. Yet that hinders not, replyed Lucrecia, but that vertue ought to be the foundation and ſupport of all the reſt; and that we ſhould wiſh rather to ſuffer injuſtice, than to do it; beſides that, to ſpeak rationally, Goodneſs is a vertue ſo well becomes a woman, that I know not any ſhe hath greater need of. I acknowledge, replyed Hermilia, that a wicked woman is a Monſter; but certainly, one that is ingeniouſly malicious, addes much to Converſation, and it were a great loſs if there was not ſome ſuch. Since you are ſo much taken with them, replyed Lucrecia, I wiſh you may never want ſome of thoſe women, who can wink at nothing, who condemn all things, who tell merry ſtories of their beſt friends, who, as ſoon as they are out of ſight, abuſe them; who envy the praiſes are given them, and themſelves commend them leſs than thoſe who are not acquainted with them; and to be ſhort, who do them more hurt than they could expect from a mercileſs enemy, and leſs good than from a generous one. And the more to puniſh your obſtinacy, aded Valeria, to Lucrecia's wiſhes I add thus much; I wiſh with all my heart, that you may have one truly good friend, who may acquaint you with all the treacheries the reſt are guilty of towards you, that so you may at last become equitable, and acknowledge with us, that true Goodness is preferred before greatness of Wit, how shining so ever it may be.

As she said these words, Valeria rise up, whereupon it being late, these three maids retired, and left Brutus, who had hearkned to them all the while, with little ceremony, yet Lucrecia took leave of him with greater civility than the other two, which he took infinitely well. For arguing from the civility she had for him in the condition he was in, that she would esteem him, if she were better acquainted with him, he was so ravished with the consideration, that it begat in his heart a certain pleasant commotion, which one might presume to call Love; or at least something he felt, which he could never define.

In fine, not to abuse your patience, Brutus, who was resolved to depart, without acquainting any, could not perform it so soon; for something being yet wanting, which was necessary for his journey, he took occasion from that light hindrance, to make the less hast, not thinking himself that Lucrecia was partly the cause of his change of resolution. But three or four days after he was sensible, that the Beauty, Wit, and Goodness of that person, had made a strange progress into his heart, for he could not keep out of the company of these three-maids. They at first thought him very troublesome, which he himself observed; but being such a one as was not to be treated uncivilly, neither would they do it; insomuch that at length, making no account of him, they spoke before him as freely as if he had not been in place. Brutus by this means having Lucrecia always in sight, and viewing her with all the charms of her Beauty and wit, fell deeply in love with her. But to his grief Love entred his heart without that insinuating companion which they call Hope, which by her beguiling charms makes men undergo such long and violent afflictions. Whence it came to pass, that Brutus, as soon as he was convinced that he really loved Lucrecia, was extremely troubled, and look'd upon it as a second motive to remove himself far from Rome. To what end, said he, should I entertain this fruitless passion, which I must never presume to discover? How can it be imagined that the stupid Brutus should be capable of admiring and adoring the incomparable Lucrecia? But alas! continued he, though she understood my passion, I should be no less miserable; for is it possible she can love a man in whom there is not the least appearance of wit? And to come yet nearer home, when I should trust my self to her discretion, when she should be convinced I am not what all the world takes me to be, what likelihood is there she should admit the addresses of an unfortunate man, who dares not betray his reason, lest he lose a life which he hath designed to sacrifice to the liberty of his Countrey? Shall I go and tell her I am a Conspirator, when at the same time I am to tell her that I love her? Shall I entertain her with interests of State and Revenge at the same instant when I am to treat her with Love and Respect? But if I should thus entertain her, is it probable I might make some advantage of it, or that she would ever be prevailed with to run fortunes with such a wretch, as in all likelihood will never be otherwise? But supposing such a miracle should be done, which cannot, that she should be moved with my affection, is it probable that Lucrecius, a man of spirit and ambition, should bestow his Daughter upon a Sot, or that Tarquin would suffer me to marry the daughter of a Woman, who is not engaged in his interests but by force? No, no, Brutus, said he sighing, thou must not love Lucrecia, and if thou doest but imagine it, thou wilt really be as great a stranger to thy Reason as now thou seemest to be. Renounce then at once both the object of thy Hatred and that of thy Love, forget Tarquin and Lucrecia; stifle together thy growing Affection, and thy desire of Revenge, since it is fruitless to cherish either; and go seek in another climate a gentler Destiny than what thou hast found in thine own Countrey.

Hereupon Brutus thought his Reason was convinced, and that he should infallibly depart. But it was not a quarter of an hour that he had been thus resolved, ere he had a fresh conflict in his soul, which made him a minute after reflect on things quite different. What do I, said he? what do I? Am I still the same Brutus who ever was guilty of an importunate desire of revenging the death of an illustrious Father and a vertuous Brother? Have I forgotten the commands of the one, and the instructions of the other? Have I overcome the Love I had at Crotona, that I might forsake Rome? Have I for no end parted with the sage Damo? Have I fruitlesly renounced the use of my Reason, and hath that importunate Vertue (Patience) which in time overcomes all things, absolutely forsaken me? For my part, added he, I believe the Gods consider my weakness, and have purposely brought me to the sight of this admirable person whom I adore, to stay me here, and hinder me from being so unworthy as to quit the design I had of delivering my Countrey. Certainly there must be something extraordinary in this emergencie; for what likelihood is there, that a blind chance should direct Lucrecia to his house, at what time I had secretly resolved to be gone, and that having never seen her, I should goe it were purposely, when I had but two or three dayes to stay? Besides, I at first avoyded her as much as lay in my power; she hath hardly spoken to me since I have known her; and yet methinks I have alwaies been designed to her service, so violent is the affection I have for her. What probability is there that Love should nestle in my breast amidst so many thorny distractions, were it not decreed that the beauty of Lucrecia should cause the safety of Rome, by flattering on me a love that stays me, and permits me not to forgoe the revenge I have undertaken to execute? Let us then cast our selves upon the disposal of Fortune, by submitting our heart to so excellent a Beauty: Let the love we receive from the eyes of Lucrecia enflame our hatred to Tarquin, and if we must be unhappy in this affection, as it is very likely, let us bear our misfortunes as just punishment for that unworthiness we have been guilty of, in thinking to remove from Rome. Let us with courage endeavour to subdue the heart of this illustrious person, and at the same time overturn the throne of this infamous Tyrant; although, if I may truly speak my thoughts, I am confident it will be easier for me to snatch the government of Rome out of the hands of the proud Tarquin, than deliver my heart out of the power of the divine Lucrecia. Let us love then, let us love, since it is the will of Fate, and without considering what may happen pen to us, let us obey the inclinations which directs us to adore Lucrecia. Let us look on her as a perſon hath preſerved vertue in our ſoul, which we ſhall eternally acknowledge, even though ſhe ſhould never do ought for us, ſince it is ſhe that hath cheriſhed in us the deſign of Rome's deliverance.

This ſtorm being over. Brutus's ſoule was as it were in a calm, which made him conceive that this reſolution proceeded from ſome ſupernatural inſpiration, and ſuch a friendly correſpondence happened there upon this adventure between his Heart and his Reaſon, that he thought no more of his departure; his thoughts were wholly taken up with the love of Lucrecia, while he expected an occaſion to make Tarquin feel the weight of his hatred; ſo that he ſuffered his heart to wander into the love of that admirable perſon, though he found no other preſent advantage of his paſſion, than that he was ſtaid in Rome by the attractions of this incomparable Virgin, whom yet he neither durſt ſay he loved, nor hope to be loved by.

Being thus reſolved to love, he was ſo much ſatisfied in himſelf, that it was viſible in his eyes and countenance, inſomuch that Racilia having obſerved it, took occaſion the firſt time ſhe had a private diſcourſe with him, to ask him the reaſon of it. But he ſatisfied her not, for there being naturally a certain myſtery in Love, he thought it diſcretion not to reveal a Secret, which he himſelf knew would be thought extravagant by any one who had not the ſame apprehenſions of it as he had. Giving therefore his paſſion all the liberty imaginable, he endeavoured to double thoſe chains whereby he was already faſtned, and miſſed no opportunity to ſee Lucrecia, and to hear her ſpeak.

In the mean time, Racilia, though ſhe knew Brutus to be much more conſiderable, as to point of gallantry, than he ſeemed to be, yet did ſhe allow theſe Virgins the ſame freedome as before; nay, which is more, prayed them to admit Brutus to walk with them, telling them, that it might haply enlighten his mind, that they ſhould pity one in his condition, and endeavour what they could to diſperſe that deep melancholy which encreaſed his natural ſtupidity, adding, that their preſence had already in ſome part leſſened it. Not, my Lord, but that Racilia was as innocent in this as Vertue it ſelf, but ſhe ſo much pitied the life Brutus led, that ſhe was glad any way to make it more comfortable. But to ſay truth, ſhe could not conceive he would entertain Love without Hope, nor that any thing amorous could lodge in that heart, which Revenge had ſo long ſince taken up. Beſides, that it is not unlikely, but that if Brutus had a deſign to marry, ſhe would have been glad it had been either with Valeria or Lucrecia; as for Hermilia ſhe knew well enough that Brutus was not ignorant ſhe was his Siſter.

This Society by this means became pleaſant enough, for beſides that theſe three Virgins were excellent good company, yet the admiſſion of ſome other perſons made it better and more divertive. There was a Siſter of Collatine's, who ſpending the ſeaſon of the year in the neighbour-hood, came thither often, out of a deſign to render her Brother ſome ſervice with Lucrecia, whom he was in love with. The Prince of Pometia and his brother Prince Titus came thither divers times; for though they were Tarquin's Sons, yet the conſideration of their vertue exempted them from the hatred which men had for their Father. Commonly Mutius came along with them, and for my part, I had ever ſome commands or other from the vertuous Sivelia, to her whoſe houſe ſo many amiable perſons made their rendezvous. So that though Racilia profeſſed all the ſeverity of a vertuous Roman, yet being of a mild nature, allowing the freedome of the Countrey, and having a confidence in the vertue of thoſe perſons, who were under her charge, and conſidering that the men who came to viſit them were very reſpectful, as alſo her kinred, all except the Prince of Pometia, Titus, and Collatine, ſhe her ſelf was extremely ſatisfied with a company wherein was nothing but what was innocent. Lucrecia's alſo came thither ſometimes, and Sivelia oftner.

But as it is not my own Hiſtory which I relate unto you ſo I ſhall not tell you, that Mutius and I had a certain paſſion, cauſed in us by the ſame perſon, ſince we both had an affection for Valeria; for then I ſhould have too many things to acquaint you with, which have no relation to the adventure of Brutus. But I ſhall give you to underſtand by the way, that Lucrecia had eſteemed Collatine and Brutus, that Hermilia was courted by the Prince of Pometia, though it was ſuſpected he was a ſervant of Collatine's Siſter, who was called Collatina; that Titus was in love with her I laſt named, and that Love it ſelf was as it were the Soul of this fair Troop. But indeed the love was not reciprocall, for Lucrecia had a great averſion for Collatine, and knew not that Brutus was ſo deeply in love with her. Valeria had no affection for Mutius, and little more than friendſhip for me: but for Collatine's Siſter, ſhe certainly had an eſteem for Titus: and Hermilia, without all doubt, had a ſtrong inclination for the Prince of Pometia, though Racilia believed it not, and indeed is yet ignorant of it. Notwithſtanding all this, Love was ſo well diſguiſed among theſe perſons, that nothing was viſible but Courtſhip, Reſpect, Civility, Complement and Friendſhip. It happened ſometimes, through the care every one took, to conceal their Sentiments, that Viſits were given without the leaſt private diſcourſe with the perſon beloved. One time among the reſt, I remembred, the Prince of Pometia diſcourſed altogether with Collatina, Titus all the time entertained Lucrecia, Collatine courted Valeria, and Mutius, and I treated Hermilia. But for Brutus, conceiving himſelf not ſuſpected of any, he quitted his ordinary reſervedneſs, and alwayes kept near Lucrecia. This indeed was no great ſatisfaction to him, for not daring to diſcover himſelf, ſhe ſuffered him meerly out of pity, and out of regard to his quality and her friendſhip with Racilia. But yet indeed he took a great pleaſure to ſpight Collatine: not that he could be jealous of Brutus, but that Brutus kept him from having any private diſcourſe with Lucrecia. Nor indeed was Brutus at firſt jealous of Collatine, for beſides, that in Point of gallantry Collatine was none of the moſt conſiderable, it was eaſily perceived that Lucrecia had an averſion for him, though ſhe diſcreetly concealed it. But his fear was of the fair and ſubtil Collatina, whoſe inſinuating, ſubmiſſive, and obliging humour, was very likely to do her Brother a good office. So that after a while, Brutus had to deal with at the ſame time, reſentments of Love, of Jealouſie, of Hatred, of Revenge, and of Ambition; yet without any rational hope of ever being able to ſasatisfie any one of these violent passions. For it was not likely Lucrecia should love him before she knew what indeed he was; it was as unlikely he should discover unto her a Secret, which known, might divert him from endeavouring the deliverance of Rome, and being revenged of Tarquin: it was also somewhat improbable he should suddenly ruin a Prince, whose power was strengthened by his cruelty: and for the ambition he had to arrive at the rank of his fore-fathers, he had no great reason to hope it while his reason were in captivity, and Tarquin in the Throne. Hence was it that sometimes he thought himself the most unfortunate man living. He now and then slipt into Rome to confer with Licinius and Valerius about his main design so long since undertaken. Here was he entertained whole dayes together, with the exorbitances of Tarquin, the cowardise of the Senate, and the small hope they had to meet with an opportunity to discharge themselves of what lay so heavy on their hearts.

But Brutus in the mean time entertained himself with his own thoughts, and the Muses, about the love he had for Lucrecia; for, having, as I told you, been acquainted with Pythagoras's daughter, and travelled into Greece, he could have complained in verse of the cruelty of his amorous fortune, could he but have hoped that Lucrecia might one day be acquainted with his love. But according to the posture of his soul, he made no advantage of his talents, since he durst neither speak nor write, and yet he was almost out of himself to do either. For though Poetry be not yet very common at Rome, where they know little more than those Acrosticks of Sibylla, yet Lucrecia, Valeria, and Hermilia, understood more of things of this nature than a many others, by the means of a Greek Maid a Slave of Racilia's, whose mother had sometimes lived with the learned Cleobulina, daughter of Periander King of Corinth. This Slave having an excellent understanding, had secretly taught them somewhat of her language, and had repeated to them a many excellent compositions of Sappho and Phocylides, with which they were infinitely taken. Which Brutus coming to know, was extreamly troubled, in that he durst not make use of those things which haply might bring him into favour with Lucrecia; and thinking withall in himself, that he could not pretend to any esteem from her, he was afflicted beyond all belief, insomuch that in some intervals not considering the hazard of his life, not troubling himself about the designs he had against Tarquin, he resolved to acquaint this admirable Virgin with his love, and that as a man that knew how to express his thoughts in other language, than what he ordinarily spoke. Yet could he not stave off a certain fear, that, in case he succeeded not, Licinius, Valerius, and Racilia, should perpetually hit him in the teeth for discovering himself, besides the consideration he had that Tarquin might make Licinius suffer, when he came to know he had abused him. Thus resolving on nothing absolutely, he led a most distracted life, his melancholy not admitting any consolation; for he was neither able to struggle with his love, nor durst acquaint her with it who was the cause of it. Nevertheless he still loved, and that with an extreme obstinacy, for though Lucrecia added no fuel to his passion, yet did it sensibly encrease, even despair having that effect in him which hope hath in other Lovers; For in fine, said he 'tis true, I cannot hope any thing, yet this cannot weaken my love, since my despair proceeds not from Lucrecia, but it is the extravagance of destiny which makes me uncapable of hoping any thing: She does not certainly favour me much, and she were to blame if she did, and I am obliged to her for her indifference for me, since it is not the same Brutus she is accquainted with, that I would have in her favour. But alas! continued he, that other Brutus is at such a distance with Fortune, that it is not likely he will ever dare shew himself to Lucretia; and if I renounce not one part of my reason, she will still be ignorant of the love she hath kindled in my heart, and consequently I shall be the most unfortunate man alive. How (cryed he out, as he hath told me since) shall not Lucrecia, the admirable Lucrecia, know that thou lovest her, and thou art not such a Sot as thou art taken to be? Canst thou be contented to be ever the object of her contempt and her indifference? No, no, continued he, I shall never do it; nay though I should lose my life, though I should hazard all, and that Rome must eternally be subject to the tyranny of Tarquin, Lucrecia must know that I live under her power. She is discreet, good, and generous, and it may be she will not cast away a man, that out of excess of love trusts himself to her discretion.

But weak man that thou art, resumed he, hast thou forborn all rationall discourse for so long time, onely to tell Lucrecia that thou lovest her? Think, think on the love thou owest thy country, not on what thou maist have for a person, who haply will not have any for thee. Remember thy Father cut off by the cruelty of Tarquin; thy Brother dispatched the same way, and that both dying, commanded thee to revenge their loss. Consider Rome enslaved by the most horrid Tyrant the earth affords; regard so many thousand of vertuous families expecting their safety from thee, and since thou wilt be base, imagine that the discovery of thy love to Lucrecia may haply cost thee thy life; and think at length, if there be any thing of vertue yet remaining in thee, what blot it would be to thy memory to have preferred the love of Lucrecia, before that of Fame and thy Countrey.

Upon this, such a tempest rose in Brutus's soul, that it was easily perceiveable he had not herein taken the advice of his reason. To be short, he was that day so dejected and so melancholy, that he would not see any body, and the more to avoyd all company, he walked out into that Meadow, where I told you one evening he had seen Lucrecia, Collatina, and Hermilia sitting on the River side, discoursing with the Prince of Pometia, while Racilia walked a little aside with Collatina's Mother, this company being come thither since his coming out alone.

Being thus engaged not to avoyd Lucrecia, though he wished it, he made towards the place where he was, and having saluted the whole company, he found their discourse to be about Love, and that the Prince of Pometia opposing Hermilia (who still purposely contradicted him) held that it was not the proper vertue of a woman to have an insensible heart, and on the contrary maintained that a Lady could not be throughly assured of her self until a violent affection had possessed her soul. For in fine, said he, I find that a woman makes no great difficulty to oblige those whom she hath no tenderness for, to forbear the expressions of their love; I find it is no great reputation to wrestle with a weak and unsetled unsetled inclination; but for a woman, courted by a man of extraordinary worth, whom she also loves, not to engage her self too far, and notwithstanding all the sympathy of a reciprocal love to preserve Vertue impregnably seated in her heart, is certainly of great merit. Yet my Lord, I conceive, replyed Valeria modestly smiling, that it is best not to study alwayes for this expression of Vertue, lest that at first drawing in to love innocently, one should come at last to love beyond the limits of Honour. For my part, said Hermilia, I conceive it more glorious to oppose love, than to entertain it, how innocent soever it may be. And for mine, said Collatina, (who secretly carried on her Brother's interest) I must, notwithstanding the great severity the Roman Ladies profess, affirm, that where the rules of civility are observed, there is an infinite pleasure to be beloved, and, if I may presume to say it, to love. For in fine, if the enjoyments of Friendship be thought delightful, only comparatively to those of Love, which they say are greater, it were madness not to love something, it being supposed the use of it were not forbidden, I could not have believed, replyed Valeria smiling, that a Roman Lady should make Love's party good with such confidence. She is so good a Sister, replyed Hermilia smiling also, that she would rather forsake the interest of her Sex than of her Brother.

Whilst these Virgins were thus engaged, the fair Lucrecia fell into such a deep muſing, that she minded not what was said, though she were concerned in it. On the contrary, entertaining her self upon the first discourse of the Prince of Pometia, in the commendation of Love, she quite forgot the company, till that Collatina taking her by the arm, told her laughing, that she must contribute to that conversation; asking her whether she thought Love a troublesome thing or a pleasant. Lucrecia answered, that she could say nothing of a thing she was not acquainted with. To take away that pretence, we must describe that passion to you, replyed the Prince of Pometia, who having an excellent wit, made it his business to say all he could to the advantage of Love. He describ'd all the insinuations of Hope; he represented the surprises of the first desires which that passion inspires into us; he enumerated the delights, the transports, the tempting illusions it causes, the pleasant reveries that accompany it; and in fine, omitted nothing which might relate to that noble passion. Having so done, he prest her to tell what she thought of Love. But she absolutely refusing, her companions set upon her and persecuted her so long, till at last she promised they should have her opinion, conditionally they would permit her to write it down. Enquiring therefore who among them had any table-books, it happened that only Brutus had one.

Whereupon, this concealed Lover, who was glad of an occasion to have any thing of the writing of Lucrecia, presented her with his table-book, wherein she writ what she thought of Love. But my Lord, that you may the better understand what a trick she put upon them, I must set down the same words which she writ, which she assured them contained her true sentiment of love.

Hereupon Herminius spying a table-book upon Arunces's table, took it, and writ down the same words as Lucrecia had made use of; which done, delivering the table-book to Arunces and Amilcar, they therein found the ensuing words;

Past, how, there, quickly, ah, but, not, sweet, if, soever, last, were, love, can, no, is love.

How (replyed Amilcar laughing, when he had read these scattered words) is there any rational sence in what I have read? For my part added Arunces, I confess I can make nothing of them; and therefore think that Lucrecia's design was to find her friends somewhat to do, and not desirous to discover unto them what she thought of Love, pleased her self by putting them to the trouble to pick sense out of words which had not any.

What you say my Lord, replyed Herminius, continuing his relation, was the opinion of the Prince of Pometia who having read what Lucrecia had written in Brutus's table-book, told her that she was a very wag, so unmercifully to abuse her friends, and not give her opinion of a thing of the greatest importance, and the most delightful in the world.

I am not to learn, replyed she smiling, that it is the property of the Gods onely to speak obscurely; but all considered, since that out of a consideration of modesty I have conceived my self not obliged to give my opinion expresly of a thing I am not able pertinently to speak of, you must either interpret my words or not understand me. But seriously, said Valeria to her, is there any sense in what you have written? I protest to you, replyed Lucrecia laughing, there is not onely sence, but very pleasant sense, and excellently well expressed; and that I never in my life have, nor ever shall speak better. But that you may not charge me with any vanity, continued she, I must tell you that the words are not mine, but I have borrowed them, I know not whence, nor yet from whom. Certainly, replyed Hermilia, you are not much beholding to the Lender, and you may as easily return as much to those of whom you have borrow'd them; for whatever you may be pleased to say, what you have written here signifies no more than so much Gibberish. Neither is it so good as to pretend to that fustian language of canting, whereby some that are crafty over-reach and elude the simpler sort of people, for there is not any one who would not easily perceive there were no sense in what you have written. For instead of saying.

Past how there quickly, ah, one should say.
Ah how quickly there past,

And so of the rest, it were as good as it was before, or to say better, as bad. If you would but change the order of the words, replyed Lucrecia, you would infallibly find my true meaning; but without jesting, said Collatina to her, is there any reason in these words? Sincerely, replyed Lucrecia, the highest in the world; and I much admire that four such piercing wits as you are, cannot sift it out. I would fain see (added she maliciously, thinking to make sport) whether Brutus can understand it better than any of you, and shall desire him to give his judgement of the question in hand. For my part, replyed Collatina, if Brutus understand this language better than we, I shall think it very strange, I pray let me first once more, see these inchanted words, replyed Hermilia, wherein Lucrecia sayes there is such excellent sense, which yet seem not to con-contain any reaſon; for if it be ſo, there was never in this world ſuch a Metamorphoſis.

Hereupon the table-book was handed from one to another, till it paſſed through all, none being able to make any ſenſe of it, nor did any think of giving it to Brutus, all being obſtinately deſirous to gheis at what Lucrecia had written. For Valeria, who underſtood her, told the Prince of Pometia, that certainly Lucrecia did not diſſemble, and that there muſt be reaſon as what ſhe had written by her very looks, but at length none being able to make any thing of it, Brutus, who had a huge deſire to ſee thoſe words, asked for his table-book, which had not been ſo ſoon reſtored to him, had not Lucrecia, who was glad they could not find out what ſhe had written, taken it from them; as for Brutus, ſhe little feared his interpretation: Snatching it therefore out of Hermilia's hand, ſhe returned it to the owner, who having received it, retreated two or three ſteps, and ſet himſelf ſeriouſly to conſider the words. While he was looking on them, he could hear Collatina jeering at his earneſtneſs therein, ſuppoſing he ſought what he ſhould never find. But that which pleaſed him infinitely, was to hear Lucrecia chiding her for being ſo uncivil as to make ſport at him. In the mean time Brutus, who was of an excellent reaching wit, proper for the finding out of ſuch things, apprehended Lucrecia's fancy, and diſpoſing the words into their genuine order, he found they made up two verſes of Phocilides which had been tranſlated, that he had known them a long time, and that the Greek Slave at Racilia's had taught them Lucrecia. Finding therefore the humour very ingenious, and Love being at that time predominant in his heart, notwithſtanding what thoughts he had a little before, he could not but ſatisfie a violent deſire he had to give Lucrecia a ſecret teſtimony of both his underſtanding and his love. Beſides that, perceiving ſhe would not explain her own verſes, he concluded ſhe would obſerve the ſame ſecrecy as to the anſwer. For you are to know, that thoſe two verſes, the words whereof Lucrecia had onely tranſpoſed when ſhe writ them in Brutus's table-book, are two verſes very amorous and pathetick, of ſuch an eaſie natural ſenſe, that you cannot but remember them, when I have once repeated them; and in fine, thoſe words which appeared ſo terrible ſhuffled out of their places, when they were diſpoſed in their proper order, expreſſed Lucrecia thus;

How ſweet were love, if not ſo quickly paſt,
But ah! there is no love can ever laſt.

Ah Herminius, cryed out Amilcar interrupting him, how it troubles me that I could not diſcypher theſe verſes! but I muſt ſee whether theſe words are the ſame with the other. Whereupon taking the table-book wherein Herminius had written them, he compared them word for word, till he had found there was no difference betwixt that fantaſtick canting and theſe two verſes of Phocilides; which done, Herminius thus continued his relation.

Brutus therefore having unravelled this confuſion of words, and found in them the two verſes I have mentioned, immediately made two others, fantaſtically tranſpoſing the words, as thoſe of the other, as you may ſee by what I ſhall write under the former, conditionally you do not interrupt me for the interpretation. For now that you have the Secret, you may eaſily find them. Content your ſelves therefore, that I onely tell you the words which I write as I ſpeak them.

Laſt, permit, ever, and, my, ſhalt, grac't, all, ſame, tion, love, ſhall, love, beauty, find, with, thou.

I give you a thouſand thanks, replyed Amilcar, that you have given me a diſpenſation as to the diſcyphering of theſe words; for I ſhould never have done it. But to comfort me, let me ſoon know that the others were as little able to do it as I.

That I muſt, replyed Herminius, and that without any flattery; for Brutus having wrote theſe words under thoſe of Lucrecia, and returned them to that admirable Virgin; the table-book paſſed through the hands of all the company; but to ſay truth, rather to abuſe Brutus, than look for any ſenſe there. For the Prince of Pometia was of opinion with Valeria, Collatina, and Hermilia, that Brutus underſtood no more of the buſineſs, than to ſet down certain words at randome. So that not able to keep from laughing at his pretended ſimplicity, their cenſure of his words was quite contrary to what they made of Lucrecia's; for though they could make nothing of Brutus's, nor indeed endeavoured to find any thing in them, ſo poorly were they conceited of him; yet they affirmed they underſtood them, and that they were of admirable ſenſe. They abuſively repeated the firſt words, which they ſaid made a wonderful harmony.

But while they ſo unmercifully jeered one whom they knew not, Lucrecia, who was of a nature could not endure to make ſport of ſuch as were not thought the wiſeſt, took the table-book from them; and ſeriouſly conſidering what Brutus had written (that he might ſee ſhe did not ſlight him) was ſomewhat ſurpriſed to find theſe words relative to thoſe he had made uſe of: Faſtning therefore her mind, as well as her eyes, upon what Brutus had written, he went aſide two or three ſteps from her companions, and looked on the words ſo attentively, that he underſtood Brutus as well as he had done her; for ſhe there found theſe two verſes, which anſwered thoſe of Phocilides.

Permit my love, thou with all beauty grac't,
And thou ſhalt find ſome love ſhall ever laſt.

Lucrecia had no ſooner decyphered theſe Verſes, but ſhe bluſhed, and that the more when turning to look on Brutus, with ſome amazement, ſhe met his eyes half way, and ſaw in them a certain trouble, and withal a certain quickneſs, which ſhe had never before obſerved. But how ſtrangely ſoever he might be ſurpriſed by this accident, ſhe made ſhift to conceal it, for ſhe would neither interpret her own words, nor diſcover Brutus's, ſo that having ſomewhat recovered her ſelf out of the amazement ſhe was in, ſhe came to her friends, and told them they were better gheſſers than ſhe, for he could make nothing of what Brutus had written: Nor did I intend it for any but your ſelf (replied he negligently with his accuſtomed ſimplicity) which though it ſeemed to be very bluntly ſpoken, yet did it confirm Lucrecia in what ſhe believed, which was, that there was ſomething extraordinary in this adventure.

This

This made her so infinitely desirous to be at liberty, to reflect on what had happened to her, that she insensibly engaged the company to a little distance by walking aside; onely Valeria, who was acquainted with all her secrets, she drew aside, and related to her what she had met with. But is it possible you speak seriously, replyed Valeria, or is it by chance that you have made two verses of these extravagant words of Brutus, who haply knows not himself there is any such thing in them? You do not consider what you say Valeria, said Lucrecia to her, for these two verses are so pertinently answerable to mine, that Brutus must of necessity have understood what I writ, and making them on a sudden, must of necessity have an excellent understanding, though he be accounted the most stupid among men. It is, certainly, excellently well done, replyed Valeria, and as certain, that he was never before guilty of any discovery of Love of this nature; and not to dissemble longer with you, since Brutus is an understanding man, he certainly loves you, and for some dayes past, I have observed him perpetually looking on you. Nay I am perswaded, added she, the love he bears you hath cleared his understaning, and that the fire your eyes have darted into his soul, hath enlightned his reason. Ah Valeria, replyed Lucrecia, my eyes do no miracles, and Brutus must have been long since what I now find him. 'Tis true, replyed Valeria, I now suspect somewhat more than ever I did, for I remember I have known Brutus privately spend whole dayes with Licinius and my Father, and so it is not impossible something may be shrowded under this counterfeit stupidity.

But when all is done, how is it imaginable that a man should alwayes conceal his understanding, and expect an emergency of love to manifest it? I should therefore rather conceive it a prodigie, and that Brutus inspired by love, should speak this time as those do that speak Oracles, who many times understand not what they say. However it be, added Valeria, the adventure is so considerable, that it is fit the whole company were acquainted with it, that every one may give his opinion of it; for, after all, what Brutus hath written will never be taken for any declaration of Love, if you be not so pleased. No, no, replyed Lucrecia, let us not be so hasty, for if Brutus have those parts in him which he would not discover to the world, for some reason to me unknown, I shall do him no prejudice; nor indeed would I have him think that I have unriddled his verses. Besides that I shall not interpret my own, for Collatina, who, as you know, is perpetually speaking to me of her Brother, would believe when she had once seen his verse, that she had no more to do, than to assure me of Collatine's fidelity to engage me to entertain his affection. Therefore let us not say any thing of this accident, not even to Hermilia nor yet to Racilia, until we know Brutus somewhat better than we do. Valeria hereupon promising to do as she would have her, they came up to the company, which soon after dispersed it self. For the Prince of Pometia returned to Rome, and Collatina's mother went the same way.

In the mean time Brutus was so infinitely satisfied, to find by the actions and looks of Lucrecia, that she understood him, that all the reasons he could rally up to engage his passion, were not able to beat him off from his resolution of loving Lucrecia; and he was so pleased to think that he had at the same time given her a slight hint of his understanding and his love, that at the same instant, Hope, which till then was a stranger to his heart, became absolute mistress of it, and brought along with her all those pleasures, which are her Attendants in ordinary. Let us love, let us love (said he in himself, when he was come to a place where he might freely reflect on what had happened to him) and let us not oppose our good fortune; let us engage our liberty for all our life, let us double the chains which fasten us to Lucrecia, let us double them with those hands which must break asunder those of Tarquin's Tyranny. Let us enjoy all the pleasures of an Infant-love, and hope for all those of a fortunate Lover. Let us believe the love of our Countrey, and that of Glory not to be inconsistent with them; On the contrary, let us be assured, that the onely ambition of being worthy of Lucrecia's affection, will hasten the deliverance of Rome; and let us not raise those difficulties, which haply we shall never meet with. Let us then discover to Lucrecia all our Love and all our Worth, and let us not imagine a half-confidence in her, which may equally eclipse our Reputation and our Love: for haply, continued he, if we do not make it her interest to conceal our secret, she will go and reveal it to some one who may do us a discourtesie. I now perceive, added he, I have carryed my self inconsiderately for the safety of my life, but I cannot repent me of it, and I had rather die this day, now that I know that Lucrecia does but imagine that I love her, and am not Brutus the stupid, then be assured to live an age, without the happy acquaintance of this admirable person.

On the other side, Lucrecia could not quit her thoughts and observance of Brutus; but as often as she saw him, she thought she saw somewhat in his eyes she never before had taken notice of, and met at the same time with love and greatness of mind. This raised in her an unspeakable curiosity, to dive into a secret which seemed to her so extraordinary; yet would she do nothing in order to the discovery of it, not so much as take any occasion to speak to Brutus, though she passionately wished it. But Chance befriended her the next day, for it happened that Lucrecia, who was naturally much inclined to solitary musing, walked all alone into a large Court which was behind Racilia's house. But that in case the weather were over hot, they might have the pleasure and convenience of the sight of the Garden, there was lately built a large Arbor, open of all sides, opposite to the stairs which led into the Garden abutting on a spacious walk that crossed the Court. Lucrecia therefore having left Valeria and Hermilia in a sloathful humour, that kept them within doors, as thinking fittter to entertain themselves in the Hall, took a turn into the Garden, intending to return to her friends as soon as she had done. But insensibly forgetting her first design, and withall her her self, she walked so long thinking on a hundred several things one after another, that growing weary she returned into the Arbor I spoke of, with intention to rest her a while, for there were seats all about it. They had also taken care to put curtains to all the sides, which, if need were, might be drawn against the Sun; so that Lucrecia finding the place very convenient, goes in, sits down, and continuing her thoughts, looked into the Court. She was no sooner sate down, but Brutus comes in to her, who having walked a long time in a little Wood which was behind the Garden, came to this Arbor to rest himself, not knowing that Lucrecia was there, the curtains being drawn on that side he came in at; for I had forgot to tell you, that there was an entrance into it on any side.

That which is particular in this accident, is, that Brutus, engaged in deeper meditations than Lucrecia, was as much surprized to find her there, as she was to see him come in. But if he were surprized, it was with much delight, for having never been with her alone, he thought himself absolutely happy to find her in that posture, especially being resolved, as he was, to discover himself truly to her, and to acquaint her with his love. But though he passionately wished for the opportunity which Chance now favor'd him with, and that he saw himself at liberty to speak, yet had he such an extraordinary commotion, and so great a disturbance in his heart, that he could not but blush as well as Lucrecia. For though the adventure the day before had made this great Beauty extremely curious to know precisely what thoughts she should have of Brutus, yet was she somewhat troubled to find her self alone with a man whom she did not conceive to be such as the world took him, and one who had manifested his love to her, in so strange, so ingenuous, and so gallant a manner. Nevertheless, having not any way discovered that she understood those two verses he had made to answer those she had made use of, she recover'd her self, and returned his salute.

But though she might without any hazard of censure, have staid there with Brutus, the place being open to all the house, as also the Court, where a many Gardeners were at work; yet she pretended as if she would not sit down again, but re-assume her walk. Brutus perceiving her purpose, spoke hastily to her to divert her, and taking hold of a corner of a large veil, which she had on her head, but hanged carelesly over her shoulders; Ah Madam, said he staying her, do not forsake a wretch you are not acquainted with, who yet dies out of a desire that you may; but dares not discover himself to you, if you grant him not the favor of an audience without witnesses. Deny me not then the suit I make to you, that you would but hear me, and that without interrupting me. For, Madam, I have so many things to acquaint you with, that to hear me, I must bespeak all your goodness, all your patience. Lucrecia hearing Brutus speak in this manner, was extremely surprized; for though she believed him to be other than he seemed, yet could she not avoid a strange amazement, to hear him speak in an accent quite different from what he was wont. So that not knowing on a sudden, whether she should grant or deny his request, she a little while stood irresolv'd, though advising with her heart, she was extremely desirous to know what oblig'd Brutus to conceal his worth from the world; for she was satisfied as to what then obliged him to discover it to her: However she was in doubt what to do, insomuch as that Brutus reading her irresolution in her eyes; I beseech you, Madam, said he to her, do not deliberate about what you have to do, seat your self where you were before I came, and be assured, that if I durst cast my self on my knees to obtain what I desire, I should not rise before you had granted it. But since I dare not almost do any rational action when I may be seen of any, neither may I any way express that extraordinary respect which I bear you, lest if I should manifest that awful adoration which is due to the admirable Lucrecia, I might discover part of my reason. If you but knew my amazement, replyed this Beauty, looking on him with eyes wherein might be seen the characters of curiosity, you would not think it strange to see me at such a loss of resolution, for my thoughts are burthen'd with a thousand things at once, which I am not able to tell you, but you might easily conjecture. In fine, added she, how can I possibly take you to be the same I have ever known you, or imagine that you can eternally disguise your self as you do? Is it possible to guess at what obliges you to this, and to conceive that you should single me out to reveal a secret of this nature to? To me, I say, whom you have found ever indifferent, if not uncivil, to you, and who have not done any thing which might oblige you to make any difference between me and Valeria, Collatina, or Hermilia. Ah Madam, replyed he, you have done one thing which hath placed you in my heart, in a rank different from the others; for as to Valeria, I have only an esteem and a friendship for her; I love not Hermilia, but as being her Brother; and I look on Collatina as Sister to my Rival, whom therefore I ought not to trust my self to. But for you, divine Lucretia, I consider you as the only person who governs in my heart, and who only deserve to know the whole secret of my fortune. I am therefore resolved to cast my self so far into your hands, that my life shall be every moment at your disposal. For the secret of your Fortune, reply'd modestly Lucretia, I should not do well to tell you I am not desirous to know it, since it is not likely; but I intreat you proceed not in it, nor tell me any thing which may make me prefer the former Brutus, whom I have known, before him I now begin to know. If you are impartial, reply'd he, I am confident you will not be offended at what I shall tell you; if you are not, I shall shew you so easie a way to be revenged of the injury I shall have done in adoring you, that to ruine me, you need no more than commend me, for if you but tell any one that Brutus hath any understanding, I am sure to be presently sacrificed to the Tyrant. Fear not then any thing, Madam, from a man who puts his life into your hands, and it may be, does something more. I am so inclin'd to pity the unfortunate, reply'd she, that looking on you as the most wretched of mankind, since you are forced to conceal the understanding you have; I also consider you as such a one, as it is not the pleasure of the Gods I should destroy, but rather assist: but yet once more, tell me nothing which may cause me to repent of this indulgence I have for you.

With this Lucretia sitting down, and Brutus seating himself close by her, he in few words acquainted her with the cruelties of Tarquin towards his family, the flight of Tarquinia and Licinius, his abode at Metapont; thence he came to tell her of the desire he had to return to Rome, there to serve his Countrey; the way the sage Damo had found out for

for him to return thither safely, by concealing his understanding as he had done; the miserable life he had led since his return, and the resolution he had taken to wander about the world, so at least to deliver his Reason, since he could not Rome. This condition, Madam, said he to her, was my soul and affairs in, when you by the Charms of your Wit and Beauty staid me here whether I would or no. Since that Madam, I have done what I could to resist you; I have objected all that to my self which I conceive you would have had me; and I left nothing unattempted which might oblige me to cease loving you. But when I had done all, it was impossible, so that at last I am resolved to acquaint you with my fortune, and discover to you my passion, and withal let you know, I am furnished with more understanding than is believed, and that thence I may assure you I have much more love than you can imagine, though I do not think I could give you a greater argument of my reason, than the expression of the love I have for you.

All that you tell me is so strange, replyed Lucretia, that you should not think much that I have not interrupted you, though you have said many things which the stricter rules of civility allow me not to hear. But indeed the strangeness of your fortune, the miseries of your life, and the confidence you have reposed in me, by trusting me with a secret of this nature, have obliged me not to interrupt you, but to suffer you to say what you please, reserving to my self the liberty in my turn to acquaint you with my thoughts.

For answer therefore to what you have said, give me leave to assure you, that I think my self so much obliged to you for the esteem you must needs have for me, that the preservation of my own life should not engage me to hazard yours, by revealing what it so much concerns you that none know. But that done, generous Brutus, I must tell you, that to give an infallible testimony of the greatness of your understanding, and constancy of your soul, you must overcome this affection which you say you have for me; and to give me an assurance of your pretended love, you must never more speak to me of it. Ah Madam, cryed out Brutus, it is impossible for me to do any thing of what you enjoyn, for I assure you I shall no longer struggle with my passion, but will rather die with grief, if you grant me not the favor sometimes to tell you that I love you. Were it not inhumanity to deny this weak comfort, to a wretch that puts his life into your hands, who trusts you with the greatest secret that ever was trusted to any, and who gives you the highest testimony of esteem that any man could give?

Consider Madam, that I am the most unfortunate of men, that I was on the point of setting my reason at liberty, when you chained it up, that my own Sister knows not that I am her Brother, nor indeed that I am not the stupid Brutus I seem. Consider I say, that besides the miseries of my House and Countrey, I am also burthened with those of my Love. For, Madam, I declare it to you, I love you without any hope, and expect not any return of my love, since it were unreasonable the admirable Lucretia should love a man whom the world despiseth, whom Fortune hath cast off, who is every moment in danger of being destroyed by Tarquin's cruelty, who hath almost quitted the hope of delivering his Countrey, who must never discover his reason, and who must trifle away his life with the reputation of a man of no understanding. But after all, though I do not hope to be loved, yet I shall think my self happy enough, if you but give me leave to tell you that I love you, and suffer me submissively to complain of all my sufferings. I do not see how I can pretend to less, or desire less; and that your vertue as cautious as it is, cannot without cruelty deny me a thing wherein there is neither engagement nor danger. For (added he, not giving her time to answer) you cannot fear it should be suspected I were in love with you; and much less that you should permit my love; and when after an age of afflictions you should be pleased to express a certain kind of goodness, which I might call an innocent favor, there is no fear I should make it known, since I could not be at such a loss of discretion without hazarding my life, or exposing my self to incredulity. For if the stupid Brutus should say he were not hated by Lucretia, none would believe it, and if he went by any reason to prove it, it might cost him his life. Consider then, I conjure you, that you are the only she in the world whom I durst trust with the most important secret of my soul. 'Tis true, Racilia, Valerius, and Licinius, know the secret of my Fortune, but it is you, only you know that of my Love. It is you, Divine Person, added he, shall be my Mistress, my Friend, and my Confident; it is you shall be all the world to me. If I deliver Rome, you shall partake in the glory; and if I cannot do it, you shall condole with me, for the miseries of my Countrey, and shall be to me instead of Kinred, Friends, and Fame. Admit then, I beseech you, a Lover that desires nothing, that hopes nothing, one that could not boast of your favors if you did him any, that makes you the sole disposer of his destiny, and and that believes he hazards nothing, when he endangers all, since that, if you deal unkindly with him, he is resolved no longer to live. I therefore declare unto you, Madam, that if you feel not in your heart some favorable inclination to entertain my passion, I expect not you should be faithful to me. On the contrary, I give you leave immediately to tell Valeria, Hermilia, nay even Collatina, though my Rival's Sister, that I am not what I am thought, that I have more understanding than is conceived; that I am engaged in some Plot at Rome, that Tarquin must destroy me; and if this suffice not, tell it Tarquin himself. For what else concerns me, imagine not that I offer you a transient love: on the contrary, I shall tell you in Prose as much as I did in those two Verses, which you will understood, though you would seem not to do it. Assure your self therefore, Madam, that I shall love you eternally; and withal consider, you that are so ingenious, that you will have that advantage over me, which no other Beauty can have. For in fine, all other Lovers, how faithful soever they may be, are at the best but faithful in their hearts, since that many times they are not so in their words, and that a thousand reasons of Civility, Decorum, and Custome, oblige them to commend other Beauties, when occasion requires; nay they have their she-confidents, who share in their affections. But, according to the rate of my destiny, I cannot commend any but you, nor love any else whatever; and as I have already told you, all my wishes, all my hopes, all my felicity, is terminated in you. And if possibly I might obtain of the admirable Lucrecia any thing beyond my hope, I should not onely think my self the most happy, but the most glorious man in the world; nor would I change fortunes with the greatest Conquerours, whose Victories Fame hath spred through the world. Speak then, Madam, speak, continued he, but with that goodness and justice which may shew you pitty the most unfortunate Lover that ever was. If you were simply a Suitor for my compassion, as the most wretched of all men, replyed she, you might assure your self of it; but that quality of a Lover which you would put on, obliges me to deny you all pity. Ah, I beseech you Madam, remember what you said yesterday,

Since love cannot last long without hope, replyed Lucrecia, and that I shall give you none, this personated love will soon blow over. However, added she, trouble not your self a bout your Secret, for as I have told you already, I conceive my self obliged to be faithful to a man, who is so well opinioned of me, as to trust me with his life; and that you may be satisfied, that I will do any thing I may lawfully for you, and that I have no design to ruin you. I must ingenuously confess, that I understood yesterday what you writ in your Table-book, and was surprized at it, that not being able to contain within me all the reflections I made upon that adventure, I acquainted (my other self) Valeria with it, But yet fear not, added she, any prejudice from this discreet Virgin; for besides that she is naturally good, I am confident she will never speak of what she knowes, if I doe but desire her, and will go immediately and do it.

If you admit me to love you, replyed Brutus, it is certainly requisite you have the goodness to take care that what you and Valeria (whose vertue I am satisfied of) onely know, may go no farther. But if that cannot be, as I told you, I have done all I can, and you have no more to do then to punish my presumption by my ruin. In the mean time as it is permitted to one that is unfortunate to fancy comforts to himself out of any thing; so you will give me leave to believe, in case you be faithful to me, that it is beeause you are not yet fully resolved to ruine me. Ah Brutus, replyed Lucrecia, you distract me strangely, for I cannot be so base as to ruin you, yet I cannot endure you should interpret my generosity to my disadvantage.

While she was speaking thus, she spies Hermilia coming out of the house, and Valeria staying her by force, as if she would have hindred her from coming to the place where she was. And indeed it was so, for it happened that Hermilia having through the hall window seen Brutus and Lucrecia together, took pity to see her obliged to entertain a man whose conversation was no way pleasant, which made her tell Valeria that she would goe and relieve her. But Valeria knowing the adventure of the Verses, and being withal very willing that Lucrecia should discover Brutus's secret, justly suspected that so long a discourse might produce something; and therefore that it might not be interrupted, she would have kept Hermilia from disturbing them, telling her, it were fit to leave Lucrecia alone with Brutus, were it but to punish her for her wilful humour the day before, when she would not tell what she writ in the Table-book. But at last Hermilia getting from Valeria, came running to the place where Lucrecia was, who, not much troubled at the interruption, left Brutus, and went to meet this fair Virgin, whom she hardly thanked, for having delivered her out of a company which she said was very troublesome to her. Yet did not Lucrecia speak with her accustomed freedome, as being not quite disintangled from the adventure had happened unto her, but Hermilia reflected not much on it, but believed that little disturbance she descryed in Lucrecia to have proceeded from the trouble she had had to entertain Brutus, who not able suddenly to shift himself into his stupidity, chose rather to remove himself further from Lucrecia, then coming near her to say nothing to her, or at least nothing that might please her.

In the mean time, Lucrecia, though at the present she had no thoughts of entertaining Brutus's love, was yet particularly careful to speak in time to Valeria, to let her know, that what she had told her the day before, was of greater consequence than she conceived. Yet could she not speak to her till they were retired to their bedchamber; for before, either Hermilia or Racilia was always with them. But as soon as they were private, Lucrecia acquainted her friend punctually with all that Brutus had said, celebrating the greatness of his understanding; and the difference that was between his ordinary manner of speaking, and when he spoke freely; and in fine, pretending to Valeria that she had a great esteem for him, though she were not half acquainted with him. But all considered, added she, I wish I had not known him, or that he had been satisfied to have chosen me onely for his friend, to comfort him in his affliction. Ah Lucrecia, replyed Valeria, since, after a manifestation of love, you wish him that made it your friend, I am confident you would soon admit him as your Lover: I must then needs be prepossessed with a very strong inclination, replied Lucrecia, for though I am perswaded one may lawfully love once in their life, so it be withal innocently, and should believe there is nothing so Pleasant as a tender crimeless love, yet must I needs, as I said, have my mind extremely prepossessed to ingage my self into Brutus's love, since that you may easily judge, that considering his reputation in the world, my Father would never consent I should marry. For my Mother, knew she truely how things stand, I am confident she would lay her commands upon me to entertain Brutus's affection; for her heart is so sensibly possessed with the memory of his illustrious Father, that the hatred she hath for Tarquin is certainly grounded upon the death of Junius, with whom she was very intimately acquainted. But you may well think, added she, that I shall not go and reveal this secret to her, and consequently have nothing else to do, but to avoyd meeting with Brutus. But if you over-warily avoyd him, replyed Valeria, those who observe it will take occasion to suspect something, for you have ever seemed less desirous to shun him then any. And therefore, added she laughing, do not avoyd him so wilfully, have a better confidence of your self, and onely resolve to make good your heart while we stay here.

The

The advice you give me, replyed Lucrecia with a gentle smile, hath something injurious in it, for it might be thence inferred, that you do not much believe I really would avoyd Brutus. But that you may be satisfied, I tell you nothing but truth, added she, I will do what I can to hasten my return to Rome, for in fine, I must needs acknowledge I have so great an esteem for Brutus, as to wish he might think honourably of me.

The next day Lucrecia writ divers things to her Father to oblige him to send for her home; but the reasons which moved him to send her for that part of the Summer into the Countrey, being the stronger, Lucrecia's endeavours proved fruitless, so that she was forced to be content to remain at Racilia's for she had a soul too great to give the true cause of her desire to return to Rome, since Brutus's life was concerned in it. In the mean time, this disguised lover, from his first opening of his love to Lucrecia, was glad of any occasion to entertain her, or to write to her; and having an ingenuity beyond the ordinary rate of men, he found out a hundred wayes to conveigh his Letters, and that so as she could not but receive them. But all notwithstanding, Lucrecia having a real aversion from engaging her self to Brutus's love, one day represented unto him all the difficulties which she thought might break the obstinacy of his love to her. For in fine, said this discreet person to him, you may easily judge that my Father would not bestow his Daughter on a stupid Brutus; and you may withal conceive that the Brutus, who I think worthy my greatest esteem, is not in a condition to discover himself; and therefore not finding how I can any way dispose of my self, you will excuse me if I intreat you not to speak to me any more of your love. As for my friendship, said she to him, it is at your service, and I promise you withal, that I will not avoyd you, as for some dayes I have, conditionally you admit Valeria, who knows all the secrets of my heart, one of our company. Your pleasure shall be my will, returned Brutus, so you will permit me still to love you, contenting your self that I shall not challenge your affection, till your heart should be overcome by the greatness of mine, and be forced to do me justice. Till then that you be onely my friend, since you are so pleased, and that I may be accounted Valeria's, I am content; but withal, vouchsafe to stay till you fully understand what I am; and if when you are throughly acquainted with my heart, you can deny me yours, I shall have no other business in this world but to dye. I shall then at once forget the love of my Countrey, that of Glory, and that of Lucrecia, and shall have no more to do but to commit to dust the purest flame that ever shined in amorous heart.

From that time, my Lord, had Brutus more of Lucrecia's company than before, for that Valeria being admited into the Club, Lucrecia did not so much avoid him. Yet Hermilia stood many times in his way, that he could not entertain Lucrecia with his passion, for she was seldome out of their company. As for Valeria she was so charmed by the excellent endowments of Brutus, that in few dayes she became as great a friend to him as she was to Lucrecia; and that which augmented the friendship of these two persons, was, that Brutus acquainted this discreet Virgin with the particular correspondence he held with Valerius.

But notwithstanding all the enjoyments the company of these two admirable Virgins afforded him, yet was he still very unfortunate; for though he knew that Lucrecia had really a great esteem and friendship for him, yet was he not contented, because it is particular to that passion his soul was engaged with, not to be satisfied but by it self.

This found matter of perpetual complaint, notwithstanding the prohibitions of Lucrecia to the contrary; but commonly he did it by Letters which though he found a hundred wayes to get into her hands, whether she would or not, yet would she not answer any, till at last thinking at once to satisfie him, and oblige him to do what she would have, she resolved to silence all his complaints with one answer; but lest she might engage her self too far, she onely sent him these words.

You' shall know more of Happiness.

But my Lord, this message soon brought Lucrecia another, which I must needs shew you, for having undertaken to entertain you with the History of Brutus, I have got from him whatever I thought requisite for your satisfaction: See then the answer of this disguised Lover.

When I profess more reason, you tell me I shall be more happy; Ah Madam, how hard is it to preserve so much Reason where there is so much Love, and how long must I continue miserable! You give me certainly, Madam, an excellent Precept, but I cannot follow it. All the Sages of Greece told me as much before I knew you, but it is onely you have taught me that all their instructions are fruitless. Never had I such a disturbance in my soul as now, and that which sinks me deeper into despair, is, that haply it might be said; that for what concerns you I had no reason to despair. For certainly you exercise no cruelty on me, nay I am obliged to celebrate your goodness; but is it not equally certain, that you love me the less, by how much my affection is the greater to you? You look on my passion with so much calmness and indifference, that in my judgement you would be more sensible of it, were it onely a pleasant fiction wherein you were nothing concerned, nor knew any more than the relation from some eloquent person. Ah Madam, how cruel are you if this be your true apprehension! and how much more cruel if it be not! and how careful are you to conceal the truth from me, so to make me the most unfortunate of men! What shall I say to you, Madam? since I find you so insensible as to Love, I doubt me you are more as to Friendship; and that all the expressions I have received of yours were onely strong imaginations, and so many pleasant sallyes of your mind. Have I not other afflictions enough in my passion? The difficulty to speak with you; the sad necessity of my self restraint and reservedness; the absence you every day threaten me with, and whereof the very thoughts murthers me; to which you shall not need add an insensibility the most unkind and the most cruel that ever was, and especially since it hath all the appearances of humanity and candor. What I desire is, I confess, too much for me to receive, but it is little for you to grant; Heaven is my witness I desire nothing else. Tell me but once, I admit your love, and forbid you not to hope you may be loved; and then though you never speak to me more, I shall be content, and my passion will be dissolved into serenity and joy. But if the terrible word of four letters frightens you, and that he be the cause of all your fears. I shall consent that for the future, this LOVE be called respect, or Friendship, or what you please, provided that between us it signifie something quite different from the name. Pity me Madam, pity the purest and most unspotted Affection that ever heart was capable of; you will certainly, could you but see the tempestuousness of my thoughts. My mind is discomposed by the disorder of my heart; and I am sometimes afraid I shall really come to be what the world believes me, if you do not change my destiny. May I presume to tell you, Madam. I do almost repent me I have ever loved you; I have wished I could love you no longer; nay, I have endeavoured it. But soon after, I have found I was not master of my own thoughts; I have condemned my endeavours, and repented of my repentance, as of a crime. This, Madam, is the deplorable condition I am in, and must be while you are so pleased; for I am not to be acquainted with my own frailty, which you know as well as I, and therefore it is to little purpose for me to complain and threaten at the same time, since all I have to do is to suffer, to dissemble, to be silent, and to love you eternally.

This Letter being very full of passion, Lucrecia was a little stung with it, insomuch that she resolved to return Brutus a longer answer than she had done before. For indeed not to conceal any thing from you, the great worth of this illustrious Roman, the generosity of his heart, his gallantry, the confidence he at first reposed in her discretion, the disconsolate life he led, the respect he had for her, the experience she had of his vertue, and the pureness of his apprehensions, together with a certain passionate stile, which was that of all his writings; had kindled in her soul a certain affection, the force whereof she was not acquainted with. Yet I am confident, you will infer from the answer which I shall read to you, that she had a certain obliging tenderness for Brutus, though she never allowed a thought which was not vertuous and innocent. But that you may know whether I am in the right or no, hear what was Lucrecia's answer.

I should never have believed that Innocence could have been so cowardly as I find it in my own heart. For I assure you, that though I fear not any thing either as to you or my self, yet am I haunted with a secret distrust, which is no small affliction to me: I cannot precisely tell what it is I fear, and I cannot but fear what I cannot tell; nor can the consideration either of all my own vertue or yours, restore my mind to quiet and composure. It is so overcast and disordered with thousands of niceties and doubts, that if the tenderness of my heart were not engaged on your side, I know not whether I might not repent me of a great part of that goodness which I have for you. But to give you my true thoughts, I am perswaded this civil war will yet last some time. I could wish it were at an end, for you know, as War banishes all pleasures from those places where it hath to do, so that whereof my heart hath for some time been the Seat, suffers me not effectually to apprehend the joy of being by you preferred before all the world, and governing in the heart of a man of extraordinary worth, and (which I value much more) one whose affection is composed of Vertue and Sincerity. In fine, is it not true that in some late private entertainments, you have observed I had not the least liberty or command of my mind? Is it not as true, I was neither merry nor melancholy, neither absolutely dull, nor absolutely chearful? That to speak truely, I was neither absolutely mild, nor altogether severe, and that if you had never found me more amiable than you did those two dayes, you had never loved me? However, I hope you will not blame me, the rather, if you consider I have an infinite passion for Reputation and Innocence. I know there is nothing criminal in your affection, but I know my own weakness, which is such, that I am afraid of any secret I never was but thened with any, and all novelty distracts me. Yet it may happen, that observing from time to time the integrity of your resentments, I shall seriously resolve to share an innocent Secret with you; and shall then give my soul way to entertain all the sweetness it may find, in being tenderly loved by a person who knows how to love, and who can love with respect and innocence. I should tell you a thousand things more, should I pretend to answer your Letter exactly, and acquaint you with the true state of my soul. But I have not the leisure, and am not certain whether I have the will; for, seriously, the disquiet of mind is such as I am ashamed of.

I am confident, my Lord, that though this Letter contain nothing in it of extraordinary Obligation, yet you cannot otherwise think than that Brutus should take it as a very high favour, as wherein he might easily perceive that Lucrecia had a great esteem and a strong inclination for him. Nevertheless he found in it some things to complain of, as you may judge by the answer he returned to it, whereof this is a Copy.

If I love you not beyond what any one can love you, if my love admit any thing which the most exact and nice Vertue can any way censure in it self, if I can live contentedly, or, to say better, but onely live until you love me, I wish I were the wretchedst of mankind. This is all the answer I shall make you, deserve no more of a wretch, whom you have already made lose his understanding and his reason, and if you change not your thoughts, will make him also lose his life. But Madam, what necessity is there to answer you, you sufficiently answer your self? You fear, you say, and cannot tell what you fear; You are engaged with the most fervent and the most accomplished love in the world; and if I dare say so Madam, with your own goodness and compassion, and yet all your fears consist of a sort of nice Difficulties, as you your self call them, that is to say, reasons which are onely shadows of Reason, such as a great and noble Soul, as yours, shall never entertain. Upon these niceties then, you would easily deprive him of all content, who of all the world hath the greatest love for you. For these niceties he must be condemned to perpetual torment, so as to be dissolved into sighs, groans, and complaints, and must accuse all your past goodness as so much cruelty. Certainly those who fiercely and disdainfully repulse their Lovers, are not haply as inhumane as you are; for their fierceness is a remedy against it self, and many times saves those whom it might bring into despair. Besides, those, when they are so scornful, they believe they have reason to be so, and are not swayed by niceties, and their rigour therefore is so much the more excusable. But for you, Madam, what shall I say to you? Shall I complain of you, or shall I commend you? I am in doubt whether, so much am I disordered; but this I know, whether you are merciful or cruel, nice or not, I cannot but love you while I live; and all the difference will be this, that as you are pleased I shall be the happiest or the most unhappy of all Lovers. Alas Madam, is it possible you can destroy all my felicity, all my joy, haply some part of your own, only because you know not whether you would have what you would, or that you wish it imperfectly? Have compassion on me. I beseech you Madam, let us once be an example, that perfect Vertue is not inconsistent with perfect Love, and that it were very unhappy, if it were deprived of the sweetest pleasure, or to say better, the only in the world. What serenity will you infuse into my mind, if you can afford that which you desire unto your own? What glory were there equal to mine? With what Kings, and with what Lovers would I change condition? O ye Gods! how doth this very thought crown me with joy, in the midst of all your cruelties? But if you are resolved still to oppose my happiness, I tell you seriously, you will either give me my death, or make it my perpetual wish. Consider therefore Madam, what you do, and the more to engage you to be tender of my life, remember that the safety of Rome is haply concerned in it, and that you cannot ruine me without exposing your Country to eternal slavery.

Lucrecia having received the Letter, shewed it Valeria in a little close Arbor, which was at the corner of Racilia's Garden; but she did it with so visible expressions of disturbance in her looks, that her friend not able to guess at the meaning of it, asked her the reason. For in fine, said she to her, this Letter hath nothing in it which is not full of respect and passion; and I am confident, it is no trouble to you that Brutus loves you. I confess, it replyed Lucrecia, but that which infinitely afflicts me, is, that I have not that command of my heart, so as to be able when I should desire it, to avoyd loving him. It is certainly in my power, added she, not to give him any expressions of it, but if I do it, I am so much the more unhappy; for when ever I force my self to hide from him part of that esteem which I have for him, I am presently haunted, notwithstanding all my resistence, with a certain fear to destroy his affection by over-concealing my own. Not but that I believe I may love Brutus innocently, for the last time my mother was here, she expressly commanded me to entertain Brutus with that correspondence of affection, which a vertuous maid may express to a man that were to be her husband, adding to this command another, that I should never discover what she enjoyned me.

But my Lord, I had forgot to tell you that Racilia, who was not ignorant of the great friendship, was between Lucrecia's mother, and Brutus's father, and had often observed that her Nephew had a violent inclination for this excellent Virgin, took one day occasion to confer with this Illustrious Roman, whom she knew to be implacably exasperated against Tarquin, and told her she thought it very strange her Husband should suffer Collatine to make publick addresses to Lucrecia, since it was generally known she had an aversion for him. To which Lucrecia's Mother reposing an absolute confidence in Racilia, made answer, that for her part she was infinitely troubled at it, nor could imagine any way to divert her Husband from it, who proposed to himself great advantages by an alliance with Tarquin. But not to trouble you with an account of these two Womens discourse, it shall suffice I only tell you, that Racilia, confident of her discretion, to whom she spoke, acquainted her that Brutus was not what he was thought to be; she produced divers of his Letters to confirm, she had said no more of him than he deserved; and in fine, represented him to her as the worthy Son of a man, for whom she had had a very tender friendship, as a secret enemy to Tarquin; and as the illustrious lover of her Daughter. Whereupon summing up all together whatever they thought might help to break off the marriage with Collatine, Racilia obliged Lucrecia's Mother to lay her commands upon her Daughter to be very civil to Brutus, not making any further discovery to her. For knowing that the principal reason which moved her Husband to admit a marriage with Collatine, was that Collatine was of the Blood royal, she doubted not but that marriage being broken off, he would be content she should take Brutus with all his stupidity, as being Tarquin's Nephew. Not knowing therefore truly how things stood, she laid that command on Lucrecia, which contributed much to the happiness of Brutus.

Hence it was that Valeria understanding by Lucrecia the command, which her Mother had laid on her, took occasion to tell her those little difficulties were groundless, and that she was of opinion she might innocently entertain Brutus's affection. But Valeria, replyed Lucrecia, if I should, and he not know what my mother hath enjoyned me, he will haply esteem me so much the less, and if I acquaint him with it, he will think himself the less beholding to me for what I shall do for him; so that I am in the greatest confusion in the world. For, I wish Brutus's love, and haply should be won to love him; Yet am I tormented with insurrections of Fear, Shame, and Repentance. I wish I had written harshly to him; I wish I had not answer'd him at all; I wish he had not written to me; I wish he would write to me every day; I wish he had never loved me; I wish he would love me eternally; and in fine, I wish things so different and inconsistent, that when I examine my self, I am almost dead for fear I should love Brutus better than he loves me. For according to my present apprehensions, I could wish, were it possible, he never had loved any thing, or that he might love nothing besides my self; and if I could reflect on all the passages of my soul, I should there find jealousie, despight and pride, but withal a mixture of vertue, innocence, and an obstinate desire of glory, all which torment my soul beyond all imagination. If Brutus had heard what you have said, replyed Valeria, he were not over miserable: but I can assure you, replyed Lucrecia, that if he understood the true meaning of all my words, he would not be much the less miserable: You are in the right, Madam, (replyed this illustrious Roman, starting from behind a thick-set hedge, where he lay hid, and withal, casting himself on his knees) for there is no condition more miserable, than that of not being hated, and yet so treated as if one never were to be loved. Ah Brutus, cryed out Lucrecia blushing, I shall not excuse the presumption you are guilty of, in discovering to me that you have over-heard me. Ah Madam, replyed he, what have I heard, whence I may derive the least favor? On the contrary, is not this irresolution of your soul, absolutely insufferable? Ask Valeria what she truly thinks of it, and I doubt not but she will tell you, if she speak sincerely, I have reason to complain, that you are yet to consider whether you should admit my love or not. I must acknowledge, Madam, I did not think my self to be so miserable, nay sometimes I flattered my self that these groundless difficulties, wherewith your Letter was so well furnished, had really no place in your heart. But for ought I can perceive, you are not yet certain whether you should love or hate the miserable Brutus; and his fate is still so doubtful, that your own heart is yet ignorant of its own secret resentments. Complaint is so natural to Love, replyed Valeria smiling, that I wonder not at yours; but when all is done, you should think your self happy to have heard what Lucrecia hath said of you, & she her self should be satisfied that you have heard those things which might excuse the tenderness of her heart. Ah Valeria, replyed Lucrecia, I am so little satisfied in my self, that I would willingly change hearts with you. If the fair Valeria, replyed Brutus, do but justice to the love of Herminius, I should haply get something by the exchange. Do not I pray charge me with injustice, replyed Valeria, at the same time, when out of pure goodness I am your advocate; and accuse me not of having a heart more tender than Lucrecia.

Hereupon these three persons being mutually satisfied, Brutus and Lucrecia appealed to Valeria to judge of those differences should happen between them. For in fine, said Lucrecia to Brutus, if you can perswade Valeria, that a vertuous person can entertain such an affection as you mean, I shall consent to admit yours, conditionally you never oblige me to be openly undutiful to my Father, that in case he dispose of me contrary to my inclination, you will endure it patiently without hating me; and when that happens, you never see me after. Ah Madam, replyed he, these are strange conditions, but I must accept them, provided on your behalf you suffer my passion; you favor me with all the opportunities you can to speak with you; you receive my Letters, and answer them; and lastly, cheerfully permit all those innocent expressions of love I shall make to you. So you rest satisfied with the resentments of my heart, replyed she, I shall do what you desire, as soon as you have perswaded Valeria, as I have already told you, that a vertuous person may be engaged to love, and shall have proved it to me rather by example than by reason; for not to dissemble with you, added she, I have not much to learn of what might be said to justifie a vertuous love. Ah Madam, said he to her, if there want nothing but to convince you, I am the happiest of men. For I know at Metapont an admirable Virgin, of whom I have heretofore spoken to you, who hath not conceived she hath done any thing prejudicial to her reputation, in resolving to love. Might it please the Gods, replyed Lucrecia, it were the daughter of Pythagoras. Your prayers are heard Madam, replyed he, it is of that sage person I am to speak to you, and in few words to satisfie your curiosity, and furnish you with an example; I am only to acquaint you that Damo had fortified her heart against the addresses of the most vertuous persons in the world, as believing she could not meet with any one man, in whom there were a conjunction of Wit, Vertue, Goodness, Gallantry, Tenderness, and Fidelity. She could not I say, be perswaded it were possible to find a Lover, whose desires exceeded not the limits of Innocence, nor his transports those of Discretion; so that despairing to meet with a man of a vertue great enough to love, at the rate of that affection, which she imagined requisite in an upright well-meaning person, she was resolved not to love any thing but Glory. But at length one of the most famous Disciples of Pythagoras named Alcmaon, falling deeply in love with her, and bringing along with him all those perfections which she thought it impossible to find in any one man, she changed her resolution, and after a many thousands of applications, from Alcmaon, and thousands of services tendred and performed, she hath entertained his affection, and given him expressions of hers; she hath received Love-letters from him, and hath answered them; she hath favor'd her Lover with a thousand opportunities of private entertainments; she hath received verses from him, and hath returned others to him. Ah! might it please the Gods that the incomparable Lucrecia would make as amorous for me as those of Damo were for Alcmaon. But that you may not find me in any untruth, and my withal be satisfied of the tenderness of this vertuous person's heart; Be pleased to hear some of her amorous Poetry, and, if you can, inform your self thereby what are the pleasures of Love, and be convinced that Vertue it self inspires this passion with charms, so that these two things not being incompatible, you might love me without any distrustful reservedness. Hereupon Valeria, who knew Lucrecia's humor as well as her self, knew well she desired no more than that her innocent affection might be justified by some authority, pressed Brutus to repeat those verses of Damo; whereto Lucrecia by her silence consenting, he told them, that those verses had made such an impression in his heart, that they had found a place in his memory, though he had not much troubled himself to keep them in mind. Not that they are, added he, so excellently good, but that they have a certain vein of passion, which I am taken with, and wish you were also. Upon this, Brutus recollecting himself a little, repeated the following verses, which Damo had made under the name of Lysis, though they were directed to Alcmaon.

Who Love account a cruel pain;
For can there be a greater bliss,
Than loving, to be lov'd again?

My joys, when Lysis's constant love
I view, arrive at such a height,
That to deject them is above
The humble power of scorned Fate.

He who in Love is deeply read,
Knows the least trifle to improve;
In ev'ry glance her bright eyes shed,
A thousand harmless pleasures move.

A smile, a sigh, one little sight,
Contribute charms to our desire;
Her grief confers to our delight,
Her very tears encrease our fire.

Then Lysis we no more delay
To make our mutual passions known,
At which let wondring Lovers say,
Their souls are twisted into one.

Cu

Can you any longer doubt, divine Lucrecia (said Brutus to her, having repeated those Verses) that a vertuous person may love once in all her life? Can you, I say, who know the reputation of Dame, and who have heard, there is not another maid in the world so severely vertuous as she? Love therefore, charming Beauty, or at least suffer your self to be loved; and if you will not make amorous verses, suffer others to do it for your glory: Suffer me I say, to do any thing which may convince you of the greatness and tenderness of my affection, that when you once are, it may prove contagious to you. For, in fine, Madam, if we do not a little love that which loves us, there can be no sensible pleasure in being loved. Be pleased then to enjoy your self in the empire of my heart, by granting me a part of yours. You have so much of it in my friendship, replyed Lucrecia, as might content you. Ah Madam, replyed Brutus, how little is your acquaintance with Love, if you believe the most fervent friendship in the world can satisfie it! No no, Madam, deceive not your self, I cannot possibly be happy, if I am not loved after another manner than one loves his friends. I dare not presume to tell you that I will you should love me, continued he, but if I may without crime think it, I should wish your heart were in a condition to feel what it never felt, and what it should not for any besides the too too happy Brutus. I should wish, I say, you were moved when ever you saw me, and that from me alone you should derive all your felicity. My demands, Madam, added he, are indeed great, for a man that deserves nothing, but all considered I demand nothing but what is innocent. I absolutely forbid my desires all criminal favours, and in fine, wish no more than you will, so you will permit me to love you, and that continuing my adorations of you with the same fervency and sincerity, you will give me leave to believe, that if I am not loved, I may be.

Upon this, Valeria interposing her self between them, carried things with so much discretion, that though Lucrecia said nothing that might positively engage him, yet did Brutus think himself happy. For, in fine, he was allowed to make his complaints, and write to Lucrecia, when he could not come to speech with her. It was also promised he should be answered; they permitted him to hope he might be loved: He was assured of certain meetings with her in the same place, conditionally the business might be carried so as Hermilia and Racilia should not suspect any thing. For though Brutus affirmed to Lucrecia that his Aunt was not ignorant of his having more understanding than he made shew of, yet did they stand in fear of her, as not suspecting she knew any thing of his passion.

Now was it that illustrious Roman thought himself the happiest of men, and what before had contributed to his affliction, seemed now to conduce to his happiness. For now he found that his disguise was as advantageous to his love as to his hatred, since he could approach both Lucrecia and Tarquin, and fear neither Enemies nor Rivalls, thinking himself so felicified in the love and esteem of the admirable Lucrecia, that he valued not the disesteem of all the world. He was no more troubled to be silent before all people, since he was permitted to speak of his love to the person that caused it; and when he could but get into that close arbour, where Lucrecia began first to shew him favour, he found more pleasure to be there alone, than he could have done in the most pleasant company Rome could afford, though he were at liberty to display all the perfections of his mind.

Nor was the love of his Countrey hereby any thing abated; no more than that of Glory: on the contrary, since that he assured himself of the Love of Lucrecia, he thought himself doubly concerned to endeavour the destruction of Tarquin; not onely because he being once ruined, Collatine would let fall all pretensions to Lucrecia, but also out of a pure disinteressed motive, as conceiving it necessarily contributed to the glory of this excellent Beauty, that by the deliverance of Rome, he should set his own reason at liberty; and withal put himself into such a condition, that all the world might take notice of the passion he had for her. As soon therefore as love had possessed it self of the empire of his heart, he redoubled his former endeavours to accomplish that great design, wherewith his soul is at this day burthened. Nor was he disturbed by any melancholy apprehensions for some dayes ensuing that wherein Lucrecia had honoured him with the first expressions of her love; nor knew any other affliction than what proceeded from the impatience he had to give his Mistress another private visit; when any occasion hindred Lucrecia and Valeria to meet according to their innocent appointment: But this was no small penance to him, even so great, that one day it grew so violent upon him, that he thought not a simple Letter sufficient to express to Lucrecia the earnest desire he had to see her again. Having therefore an excellent and easie vein of Poetry, though none knew it but Lucrecia, Valeria, and my self, he enclosed a paper of Verses in a Letter he writ to Lucrecia, with intention to deliver it to her himself, as he often did, when he could not meet with her but in company. But this Letter he made a shift to deliver her, as she sate betwixt Collatine and my self, for we often made visits at Racilia's, whither we were drawn by no mean concernments. I am confident you are desirous to know how he would carry the business so, as to deliver this Letter to Lucrecia; but that you may conceive how it was done, I am onely to tell you, that Lucrecia, Valeria, two or three other Ladies, Brutus, Collatine and I, were all together in that close Arbour, where Brutus had the day before seen Lucrecia, and where he had that day met her, had we not disappointed the meeting. Having, as I told you already, written his Letter, and being very desirous to know what Collatine said to Lucrecia, and more to oblige Lucrecia to think on him, while his Rival entertained her; he took a walk out of the Garden for to get behind the Arbour, whence he had once before overheard a discourse between Lucrecia and Valeria; and there, as I told you, he placed himself to hearken to what Lucretia said to Collatine, and afterwards to appear before that excellent person, in hope of some occasion to deliver her his Letter. But it so happened that this Beauty, who it seems was not much taken with Collatine's discourse, rested her self negligently on the hedge of the Arbor, and amidst her thoughts had passed her hand thorough, wherewith she sate plucking the leaves, not thinking what she was doing. Brutus seeing it, soon knew it to be Lucrecia's fair hand, and was fully satisfied it could be no others; for besides that, her hand was of a particular kind of making, she had on a ring, that she always wore, which absolutely convinced Brutus he was not deceived. Not much minding the design to hearken to what was said in the Arbour, he put into the fair hand of Lucrecia a little Table-book, which he had purposely caused to be made for to write Letters to her in; and (out of a transport of love, which he could not retain, though with all the reason he had he endeavoured it) kissing it he shut it, thereby to let her know, that what he gave her could come from none but himself. Lucrecia being surprized at this accident, began to blush, and thought to have cried out: but by good fortune, reflecting suddenly on the adventure, she apprehended what it was, and withheld her self. Yet Collatina asked her very importunately what the matter was, but she onely told him, rising up, that she had hurt her hand a little, whereupon drawing it to her hastily, she wrapt it into a corner of her veyl, as if she had hurt it indeed, though it was onely to hide the Table-book she had received from Brutus, who for his part was so well satisfied with the adventure, that he came not into the Arbour, out of a fear he might not conceal the present agitation of his mind, but went and walked alone.

In the mean time, Lucrecia having cunningly conveyed the Table-book into her pocket, resumed her part in the discourse; but when they had sufficiently rested themselves, they all began to walk, without observing any order, for sometimes the whole company marched all in rank, and spoke all together, and sometimes they divided themselves into particular entertainments. It happened by this means, that not able to fasten any discourse with Valeria, with whom two women talked whisperingly, I came all alone after Lucrecia, who was entertained by Collatine. But it happening that as she went she wanted something out of her pocket, and that at the same time Collatine said something to her, whereat she was displeased, she minded not that she had dropped the Table-book which Brutus had given her: For my part though I walked musing yet seeing it fall, I took it up, and opened it, with intention to write some gallantry in it, before I returned it to Lucrecia, whereat she should much wonder when she saw it. But I was much surprised my self, to meet with Brutus's Letter and Verses he had there written; of both which these are Copies;

You will find by these Verses, that I think on you, when haply you bestow not a thought on me; but I shall intreat you, Madam, to assure your self, that the affliction I have that I cannot speak with you, is greater than the pleasure my Rival finds to entertain you; and to do me justice, be pleased to let me read in your bright eyes, when I shall have the happiness to see them, that his entertainment hath not been pleasing to you. I had rather not observe in them any favour for my self, than be in suspense whether there is any for him. Believe it, Madam, and withall, that with as much impatience, as love, I wait for the happy satisfaction to entertain you privately imploying my self no otherwise in the mean time, than in perpetually saying.

When will the Fair, for whom I burn,
This place with her rich Presence bless?
Dear minutes fraught with happiness;
Ah will you never, ne're return?
From Night to each successive Morn,
Sorrows my Quiet dispossess;
Dear minutes fraught with happiness;
Ah will you never, ne're return?

Having read this Letter and Verses, I was no more desirous to write any thing in the Table-book, as being in an incredible disturbance. That which caused it, was that I knew the writing of Brutus for though he endeavoured to appear stupid, yet upon some necessary occasions he made a shift to write. Knowing therefore by chance, his hand, which was the easier to be known, as having somewhat a strange Character, for that Brutus had learned to write at Metapont, and not at Rome, I was in such a trouble, as I am not able to express to you. For I could not believe Brutus able to write well, either in Verse or Prose, nor that he could love Lucrecia, nor be loved of her. No more could I conceive that some other should make use of that disguise, it being very unlikely any one should trust him with a secret of that consequence; and if so, who should that be? There was none but he at Racilia's; and there came no other men thither, but the Prince of Pometia, who was in love with Hermilia; Titus, who was a servant to Collatine, and Marius, whom I but too well knew, had an inclination for Valeria. Thus not knowing what to think, and being resolved to dive into a secret of that concernment, I thought fit to take Valeria aside as soon as I could conveniently. But not desirous to cause Lucrecia that trouble which her knowing that I had seen her Table-book might give her, I chose rather to intreat Valeria to tell her friend that she had found it; for having an infinite esteem for that beauteous and discreet Virgin, I should have been extreamly troubled, my sight should cause her any confusion. But in fine, not to spend time on frivolous things, you are to know, that I spoke to Valeria, that I shewed her the Table-book, and to engage her to satisfie my curiosity, I gave it her without any condition at all, intreating her to deliver it to Lucrecia, after the manner I had proposed, and conjuring her, if it were a thing lay in her power, to deliver me out of the affliction I was in. But as this Wench is infinitely generous and free, and that I desired not to know the secret of her friend, but in case she might lawfully reveal it to me, so she told me, that she durst not satisfie my curiosity. In the mean time, she charged me not to speak of what had happened to any whatever, and to reward my discretion, promised she would manage the business so, as that Lucrecia and she being but the same thing, he who had written that Letter and those Verses, should make but one with me. To be short, Valeria, who thought it might be some advantage to her, that I were admitted into the Society, and that haply I might in many things be serviceable to Brutus, by the hatred I bore Tarquin, resolved to speak that night to Lucrecia, and acquainted her with what had happened: For she conceived, and rightly, that without doing so, she would not be engaged to repose any confidence in me; which done, she doubted not of her consent, that I might be of the Conclave, and her commands on Brutus to trust himself to my discretion, and to receive me as a friend. It is true, for the latter I needed not her assistance: for you may be pleased to know, that having parted with

Valeria,

Valeria, I walked out all alone into a spacious Meadow, joyning to that Orchard which is beyond the Court, where I no sooner was, but I descried Mutius coming towards Racilia's, but perceived him set upon by four men, who persued him with their swords drawn, and cryed out to him, that he must die. Having no weapon about me, I thought indeed they would make their words good, and that Mutius was irrecoverably lost, for the place was very solitary, and was not enclosed to Racilia's house. But though Mutius were my Rival, yet I thought my self obliged to relieve him. To that end I for a little while hid my self behind an old Willow to discover who they were that set upon him, that I might the better single him out of the four, whom I should endeavour to disburthen of his sword. But I had not a moment to deliberate, for seeing them press hard upon Mutius, I ran strait to them, calling them base cowardly villains, thinking by my confidence to make them believe that I was allured of relief. While I was speaking to them, and putting my self in order to doe what I could for Mutius; Brutus issued out of the Orchard with the same intention, who by a threatning action would signifie to those that set upon Mutius, that if they gave not over they might haply have the worst of it. Hereupon joyning our forces, and being by this expression of courage somewhat confirmed, that Brutus was not what he was taken to be, we engaged two of these Assassinats to make at us. But immediately closing with them, Brutus snatched his sword from him he had to do with; for my part I could not do as much, for he that I was engaged with was excessively strong in the arms however I held him play so well, that pressing hard upon him, his sword became so engaged: that I easily broke it. By which means he not being in a condition to hurt Mutius, and Brutus having disarmed his man, these two having gotten from us ran away. Mutius having thus but two to deal with, and Brutus being furnished both for defence and assault, as I was going to fasten behind one of them, these two Rogues, who were as cowardly as wicked, cry'd quarter, and begged audience, Mutius conceiving it concerned him to know what reason they had to set upon him, promised them what they desired, provided they delivered their swords to me; which upon promise of life they did. They hereupon confessed they were ordered by Tarquin to pitch upon some occasion to dispatch Mutius, when he went out of Rome; that understanding he was to come to Racilia's, they for more certainty waited him in that place; adding, that they were not afraid to set upon him there, as knowing that Racilia had not many people with her that could make any defence; that further, this Meadow was at an indifferent distance from the house, and convenient enough for an ambush, as having on the one side an Orchard, on the other a little Wood. They were no sooner disburthened of this confession, but Brutus transported with fury against Tarquin's injustice, said four or five words after such a manner, as I had never observed in him before. But he suddenly with-held himself, as soon as he perceived that I observed him; whereupon I joyning with Mutius, put divers questions to these Villains; which done, leaving them to their evil destiny, we left them at liberty either to repent, or commit new crimes. Yet that they might not discover that they had revealed Tarquin's violence in case it were not thought safe to publish it, Mutius furnished them with what might recommend them to Souldiery, in some other part of the world.

Mutius being on horse-back, I desired him to go before, telling him he would follow; I am content, replyed he, it is but just I should make it know, that I ow my life to you both. Hereupon Mutius riding forwards, Brutus and I were alone, according to my desire. But so fierce was the desire I had that he would discover himself to me, that I was resolved to speak to him as one that were partly acquainted with his Secret. For, in fine, said I in my self, if Brutus be the same Brutus that I know, I hazard nothing by telling what I have aimed to tell him, and if one the contrary he be such as I imagin him, I shall accomplish my design. Being thus confirmed in my resolution, I made a hault, and taking him by the arm, and looking steadily on him, Shew me I beseech you, said I to him, your Understanding, as you have done your Courage. For I know more of you than you think, and haply it concerns you more than you conceive, to have a confidence; for if you trust me not, I shall not think my self engaged not to discover the excessive curiosity I have to dive even into the bottom of your heart. But to oblige you to it, added I, I promised you an inviolable faith, and I offer you my friendship, without any jealousie that is ill bestowed, for if you are beloved by Lucrecia, you deserve the love of all the world. Brutus hearing this discourse, was extreamly surprised, and presently inferred, that Valeria had discovered him to me, and that it was to no purpose for him to conceal himself. Whereupon making a loud acclamation, Ah Herminius, said he, you are happier than I, for since Valeria hath acquainted you with her knowledge of my Fortune, she must needs love you, even so far as to have lost a great part of her reason and prudence. Not but that if any one were necessarily obliged to know what I see you doe, I had not made choice of you for that end; for in fine, said he to me. I know you to be a person of honour, that you love Valeria and hate Tarquin. 'Tis true, generous Brutus, (said I to him with an incredible astonishment) I profess honestly, I hate the Tyrant and love Valeria, but I must add, I admire Brutus. But, continued I, that you may see my sincerity, I will tell you by what adventure I came to know you: whereupon, I related to him what had happened, intreating him not to be troubled that I knew his secret, and assuring him that Lucrecia should never find that I had the least knowledge of it. Upon this Brutus, who was not ignorant how much our Family had been persecuted by Tarquin, my Father dying an Exile, would not have an imperfect confidence in me, and since I was so happy as to have his good thoughts, he opened his heart to me, desired my friendship, and offered me his, and we stayed so long entertaining one another, that Racilia fearing some accident had befallen us, sent out to seek us. By this means we were forced to repair to the company, but before we had quite reached it, Brutus put on his ordinary Meen and simplicity, and received the commendations which Mutius gave his valour, as one that knew not what it were to have courage. In the mean time, I drew neer Valeria, and told her I knew Brutus without her, and craved her pardon that I had not exactly observed the instructions she had given me.

But my Lord, not to be so particular in this part which concerns my own relation, Valeria and Brutus got Lucrecia's consent that I might be admitted into confidence; and there was such a noble friendship between us, by reason of the several interests, whereby we were united, as also through a great sympathy of humor and sentiments, that for a certain time we lived very pleasantly. But as for Mutius, though he had been assaulted by the orders of Tarquin, yet would he never take their advice who counsell'd him to remove further from him. For my part, I should have been glad he had, first, because that in removing from Rome, he also removed from Valeria; and secondly, for that he being once out of the way, the assassination would have made a horrid noise in the world, and would somewhat have enflam'd the detestation all had for Tarquin. He so dearly loved Valeria, that he chose rather to expose himself to a second assassination, than forsake her, though she loved him not. So that he earnestly intreated me to say nothing of what the Villains had discovered of Tarquin; but, said I to him, How can you hinder Brutus from telling what he knows, considering his natural stupidity? People so little reflect on what he says, answered Mutius, that it will signifie nothing, if you but keep counsel, insomuch that Mutius persisting in his opinion, I was forced to turn him loose to his own inclination, and to be faithful to him out of a principle of generosity.

In the mean time, this friendship with Brutus brought me much oftner than before to Racilia's; for it was the pleasure of this illustrious man, that she knew I was his friend; whereupon this excellent woman told him, that Sivelia also knew the secret, by which means our correspondence encreased, and that if Hermilia were but acquainted with it, our company might be free and unreserved. But indeed she obliged us to so much circumspection, that Brutus told us one day, it was absolutely necessary she knew that she was his Sister, that so strong a reason might oblige her to secrecy; adding, that it were not amiss Racilia knew that Lucrecia and Valeria were not ignorant of it; so that in fine, Brutus having thus disposed Racilia, she told Hermilia one morning that Brutus was her Brother; and Brutus told her himself that she was his Sister, expressing himself so discreetly, and so obligingly, that this amiable Virgin was extremely surprized at it. What was most remarkable, was; that though she was really glad, yet was not her gladness free from disturbance; however, it was then considered as having no other reason, than that her astonishment obscured the freedom of her mind; and that it is but very lately that I discovered that it proceeded from her having engaged her affection to the Prince of Pometia. This is yet a Secret both to Brutus and Racilia, therefore I shall entreat you not to speak to them of it; for indeed Hermilia is very unhappy to place her love on a man, whose whole Family her Brother makes it his business to ruin. But in the mean time, she could not be charged with loving the Son of a Prince, who had poisoned her Father, and put her elder Brother to death, for when she began to love him, she knew not that she was Sister to Brutus. Nor indeed can she be charged with any inconstancy, for certainly she never discovered any thing to the Prince whom she loves, that were prejudicial to her Brother, nor indeed doth he so much as know that she is Sister to Brutus.

But at length to return whence I have digressed, this first amazement of Hermilia being over, she carried her self as one that was glad of such a Brother as Brutus, so that ever after, when there was none but Racilia, Valeria, Lucrecia, Sivelia, Brutus, and my self, our Society was nothing but Freedom, Brutus being the most pleasant company, and the most divertive person in the world. Not that he openly professed himself a servant to Lucrecia, no more than I did to Valeria, but we had brought up a certain gallantry of friendship, which signified almost as much, since that the desire of pleasing, compliance, services and addresses, were the effects of it. When Brutus was minded to do some high piece of Gallantry, he ever did it under my name; so that directing it openly to Lucrecia, it served at once to hide Brutus's love to her, and mine to Valeria. But the love of Collatine and Mutius were extremely troublesom to us, for when they came to Racilia's with the Prince of Pometia and Titus, and that Collatina was there, how pleasant soever their company be in it self, we were strangely weary of it; but among the rest Brutus was orewhelmed with it, for as soon as any strange face appeared, he was forced to resume his stupidity, and suffer Collatine to say what he pleased when he was with Lucrecia, which was no small affliction to him. One day I remember above all the rest, which was the last Festival day that were celebrated in the Country, wherein Brutus was both extremely satisfied, and extremely afflicted. But since you are both strangers, that you may the better understand it, you are to know, that there is one day yearly set apart for the celebration of a certain Feast, which is called the Feast of the Fountains, on which every one adorns the Fountains and Wells, which are within his grounds, with Garlands of Vervein and Flowers. This is performed with great ceremony, for these Garlands being prepared, are carried to the Temple dedicated to that use, where he that is to do the ceremony, sprinkles them with Holy water, which among us is in great veneration. This done, they pick out the fairest maids of the Quarter where the Feast is kept, who are that day cloathed like Shepherdesses; and they have each of them as many Garlands as they can conveniently carry. Thus burthened, they march two and two, having before and behind them little Chorus's of Musick, who sing certain things in praise of the Waters, and the Gods which dispose of them. In this order they march from Fountain to Fountain, placing these Garlands upon little Altars of Turfs, purposely erected for that end. This Feast then falling while Valeria and Lucrecia were at Racilia's, it was celebrated with great magnificence and joy: for there being a many Fountains about this vertuous womans house, & that she is very punctual in the observation of all the ancient customs of the Country, especially those which have any concernment of Religion, she was particularly careful for the solemnity of this Feast; and those who thought themselves interessed in the persons that were at her house, would not certainly fail to be at a Ceremony of this nature, For though it was at first instituted upon considerations of Piety, yet there is withal something of Gallantry in it. So that that the Prince of Pometia, Titus, Collatine, Manius, and my self, went thither, and brought some others with us. As for women, besides Valeria, Lucrecia, Collatina, and Hermilia, there were two kinswomen of hers, who are of the house of the Aquilii, and four or five other handsome Lasses. According therefore to the custome, all the men sent in a huge number of Garlands of Verveine and Flowers, for those who were to carry them; for in these occasions, the Lady who hath most given her, is the most honorable. But that it may be known on whom these Garlands are bestowed, those who send them cause the Garlands to be tied with divers knots, which must be of the same colour as the Lady is in, to whom they are sent, she being obliged that day to have on her Shepherdess's habit divers knots of the colour she is most delighted with. By this means is she known who hath most Garlands; and the people superstitiously believe, that she to whom that happens, will infallibly within that year meet either with some great happiness or some great misfortune. It does indeed often so fall out; and if Reason were not stronger than Example, one would be almost obliged to believe it. However it be, this Feast was celebrated at Rscilia's with very gallant Ceremony, for all the women that were to carry the Garlands, were handsome, neat, and well made; there was an incredible abundance of Flowers, the Musick was as good as that of the great Feast of the Salii; the order of the Ceremony was punctually observed, even the day as to weather, favored the celebration of this Country Festival; the Banquet was under a great bed of Jesimin on one side of the Court, in the midst whereof was a fountain, which they had covered all over with Garlands of Flowers; and the rest of the day was spent in walking and pleasant discourse. It happened in the mean time, that Collatine and Brutus had, under my name, given so many Garlands to Lucrecia, that she had more than all the rest, unless it were Valeria, to whom I had sent more than would have served to exceed Lucrecia; but desirous to let her friend have the honor of the Feast, she caused some of them to be laid aside. Whereupon Lucrecia having the advantage, all according to the custome, bid her prepare her self for some great joy, or some great affliction, every one endeavoring to expound it according to his fancy. Some told her she should bring all hearts into subjection; others that her rigor would cost some servant of hers his life, whose loss she should notwithstanding regret; only Brutus speaking to her with his eyes, signified to her what she was more pleased with, assuring her by his looks, he should love her eternally. It was certainly a strange torment to him, to see Collatine always near Lucrecia, and I must confess it moved pity in all that saw him. Not that Collatine is a strange person, look'd on now as a Husband, but considered then as a Lover, he seemed not to deserve Lucrecia. For if you look narrowly on him, Collatine is neither well nor ill made: he neither hath a great, nor a little heart; he neither speaks admirably well, nor excessively ill: He is at no great distance from a good capacity, but he advances not a subtil intellection of things. If he be guilty of no considerable Vice, neither hath he any extraordinary Vertue to distinguish him from other men; and if he have never done any unworthy action, neither hath he ever given any Heroick expression of a great Courage. In fine, he is one of those men who never spake any thing which was not spoken before; one whom a man can neither praise nor dispraise; one of those who being spoken of, are never mentioned in their own name, and who are most commonly better known, by saying he is such a woman's Husband, or such a man's Son, than barely by their own names. By this account therefore, Collatine should be no great eye-sore to Brutus, who, beside all this, knew that Lucrecia had a natural aversion for this Rival: nevertheless, so prone are we to hate those who pretend to conquer the heart we are secretly possessed of, that how confident soever Brutus was of Lucrecia's affection, yet at certain times he could not endure Collatine. But there were also other times, wherein he thought himself so happy in the love and esteem of that admirable person, that he easily pardoned the contempt of all others. To advance his satisfaction, it hapned that this discourse was such as suited excellently well with his humor; for all the young people that were in the company, being seated at one of the great beds of Jesimine I spoke of, a young Aquilian began to speak of the glory which Lucrecia had received in having more Garlands of Flowers than all the rest, who yet were such as deserved to be first in all places. The truth is, said Lucrecia to him, those who bestowed them on me, may more justly pretend to the praise than I, unless they may not haply be blamed for not making a good choice. But men are so accustomed, added she, to use the term Glory in every thing, that they can hardly speak without it, whereas that word in my opinion, should be attributed to those only who have done some great exploit in War, or to those who are eminent in some Vertue or Science. But do you conceive, said I to her, that one may not say to a beautiful person, that she is very glorious in conquering all hearts, and establishing an Empire to it self without Arms, without Injustice, and without Violence? This Empire is many times so ill established, replyed Valeria, that it were very weakly founded upon the glory which hath no other support than the inconstancy of most part of those who make it their business to love; but after all, I conceive that to be true glory which consists in deserving the esteem of vertuous persons, and not in their love, for this passion hath many times such a fantastical birth in the hearts of many persons, that it were unjust to attribute much glory to those women that are loved, though haply it were more unjust, to blame those much who love them. As for Glory, said Manius, I am of opinion it principally pertains to Military actions, and that the valiant may pretend to it more than others. I agree with you, replyed I, that the valiant deserve it; but withal the vertuous may lay claim to it as much as any. For my part, I am of Herminius's mind, replyed the Prince of Pometia; and I, added Titus, but it must be withal acknowledged, that the gaining of a battel deserves a higher glory than the simple mastering of the passions. To follow custom, replyed I, a victory of this nature makes more noise than that you speak of, but I am yet to know whether the desert be so great, as also whether it be not more glorious for a man to conquer himself than others. But by this account, said Hermilia, we cannot pretend to much glory, according to Manius's sentence, for women go not to the wars. Ah Hermilia, cryed

ed I, the Ladies have their victories and their triumphs, and know so well how to wage war even in the time of peace, that, whatever Lucrecia may say, they deserve much glory; but to speak truly men have more than women in some occasions, and I am perswaded it is much more glorious for a man to be loved by a vertuous woman, than it is for her to be loved by a vertuous man. For in my opinion, the excess of beauty takes away from the honor of the conquest, and an exceeding handsome woman, that subdues a heart, deserves no more glory than a Conqueror, who having an Army of a hundred thousand men, and intelligence within a small City, should take it without resistence. The glory therefore of women I take principally to consist in this, that their endowments exceed their beauty, and in a word, their deserts be equal to the love men have for them, though they lost all that rendred them handsom. For my part, replyed Marius, I am an adorer of the Ladies, yet all considered, I take it for granted, that in the business of Love, Glory is not much concerned. How, replyed the Prince of Pometia, would you think it no glory to be loved? The greatest pleasure in the world, replyed he, but methinks I should not think it that which ought truly to be called Glory. For in fine, if one be loved by a person of no vertue, he hath nothing to boast of; and if he be loved by a vertuous person, she raises so many niceties, that a man must always disguise himself, he must hardly ever look on her, he must strangely endeavor to conceal himself, he must complain of her indifference, when haply she hath not any; a man must not say he loves her, and must be obliged to so many artifices, and so many mysteries, such certainly as Glory hath no acquaintance with. If you speak of vanity, replyed I, am of your mind, but as to glory, I must dissent. For in the first place, I conceive it pertains as much to Love as to War, and that this relation is the more symbolical, by reason of the combats, the victories, and the triumphs of it. But I hold farther, that the more secret a Love is, the more glorious is it to the man beloved; and if you will appeal to the Company to judge, I shall undertake to maintain, that there is nothing so pleasant, nothing so glorious, as for a man to be loved by a person of great merit and a great vertue, though the world know it not, nor haply never should.

As I spoke thus, I observed that I much obliged Brutus, and did not displease Lucrecia by defending a cause wherein they were so much concerned. Besides, that I was not sorry that I had engaged my Rival to maintain an opinion, which, besides its ill consequence, must lose him in the esteem of Valeria; and I pressed him so hard, that conceiving himself bound in reputation obstinately to make good what he had advanced, he undertook to do it. He spoke the first, thinking it an advantage to give in his reasons before I had mine, so that the whole company favoring us with a silent audience, Marius began to state his opinion by a definition of love made to his own fancy. To make you acknowledge that true which I maintain (said he directing his speech to me) it is only to be considered, that Pleasure is the soul of Love, as I may so say, and that if Love had not in it an ingredient of something pleasant, people would not be in love. When we speak of love, our minds are carried away only with the pleasures of it; Hope it self is the mother of many sensible delights; nay we find them even in our very afflictions, so that grief and joy are only the effect of Love, which admits not any thing of Glory. For a man dares not boast of the least favor without dishonor, and a Lover that divulges the indulgences of his Mistress, does himself more injury in divulging them, than she does her self in favouring him. And to speak seriously, what glory doth that man deserve, who prefers his pleasure before all things, who regards nothing but what should make him happy, who makes it his business through all his life to avoid whatever may hinder his enjoyments, and who thinks not of having any thing else to do than eternally to pin himself to her sleeve, by whom he thinks himself loved? I know well, there is nothing so pleasant, nothing so charming; but I also apprehend, that every thing having some advantage which is particular to it, Pleasure is the particular attendant of Love, as Glory is of Valour. But though it were true, that a certain kind of Glory might be found in Love, it should not thence follow, that it must be a concealed love; for in my judgement, there can be no secret Glory: and to speak of Glory according to the notion I have of it, it is properly that which we mean by the word Fame. If it spread not, and fill all places, it diminishes, and signifies as much as nothing, as being the reward only of transcendent actions. On the contrary, in Love, and especially in these secret Loves, the noise and noise is that which is most avoided. A man stifles the Letters which he writes and receives; appointments are commonly in solitary places; they who love for the most part speak as low as they can, they conceal from one another the best part of their thoughts, and were it not for envy and detraction, Fame would not be much troubled with proclaiming amorous victories. Thus I suppose I may conclude, that if Love be the subject of any Glory, it must be a publick professed love, as was that of one of our Kings, who having taken a Virgin prisoner in the Wars, fell so deeply in love with her, that he got a Son on her, who afterwards became his successor. But to think that such a love as none have any knowledge of, may be glorious, is that I shall never believe, and you will not find very easie to maintain.

I know not, replyed I, whether I shall find it so hard to make my party good, or no; But this I know, that I do not believe my self confuted. To answer you then in some order, I shall presume to tell you, that (considering how you have endeavored to define Love, saying, that pleasure is its soul) I must acquaint you with what Glory is; for you speak of it, you seem not to know it well, and that you have taken Vanity instead of it. It is indeed certain, that there is a certain resemblance between these two, though really there be the greatest difference between them that may be. For Vanity is only a beguiling appearance, which subsists not but by some other, and never makes use of Vertue, but true Glory is something so pure, so great, and so noble, that it admits not the least mixture of this Vanity which you take instead of it. Glory is as necessary a result of a vertuous action, as light is an effect of the Sun that causes it, and it results after a manner which hath no dependance on any other different cause. For as a vertuous action continues still the the ſame, though it be done without teſtimony, ſo it neceſſarily follows, that Glory, which, as I may ſo ſay, is born with it, infallibly attends it, though the action be not divulged. Thus remains a glory for well doing, though the world know it not; and, after all, a man muſt be his own ſpectator, and though he were ſure never to meet with any other approbation than his own, yet muſt he ſo act as if he expected that of all the world, imagining as it were a glory to himſelf, even in his own eſteem. Beſides, it is certain a man ſhould labour more for his own eſteem than that of another, and to deſerve glory rather than to manifeſt it. For in my opinion, if any thing can weaken the glory of a good action, it is the care a man takes to make it known. Not but that it is natural enough to be deſirous of praiſe, but it may be withal affirmed that this deſire is an argument of weakneſs, ſince it is certain that this violent deſire which poſſeſſes the hearts of many people, proceeds from this, that they would have divers teſtimonies of their vertue, and not ſatisfied with their own judgement, wiſh theirs confirmed by that of others. But, all conſidered, who ever is over-deſirous of the noyſe which ordinarily follows noble actions, loſes of the honour he ought to expect. It may, I conceive, be eaſily hence concluded, that if Glory may be loſt in the divulging of it, it may ſubſiſt without being made known at all; and conſequently, though a great action were ſecretly done, yet is it not deprived of its glory, which is concomitant with the thing whence it ariſes and depends, on that, and not on the Caprichio's of Fortune, who blames or commends whom ſhe pleaſes, ſometimes with reaſon, ſometimes without.

Having thus proved, if I miſtake not, ſufficiently, that Glory depends rather on Vertue, than Fame: I am further to ſhew, that ſhe is not alwayes chained to the chariot of Victory, and the triumphs of Conquerors. The Empire certainly of Glory is univerſal, for there is a glory to be learned, there is, to be generous, juſt, and good. It is glorious to poſſeſs all the Vertues together, as alſo to be eminent in any one; there is a certain glory in all the liberal Arts, nay even to be excellent in the Mechanicks if it ſtands with a mans condition; nay the ſimple endowments of Nature want not their glory, and it hath been the expreſs pleaſure of the Gods, that it ſhould be the inſeparable companion of whatever is graceful and good in this world. It is, in fine, a kind of glory to be well skilled in the games and recreations men have invented, whether it be to ſhew their ſlight, or try their good fortune. So that it were a very ſtrange thing, that Glory, which a man meets with every where, ſhould not be found in Love, eſpecially ſince it is of ſuch conſequence in Friendſhip: for it is generally acknowledged, that it is a glorious thing to be able to love one's friends conſtantly, and to be ſo deſerving as to acquire noble acquaintances. But to confine my ſelf to Love, ſince it is the ground of the diſpute, by the ſame reaſons that you ſay Glory appertains to War rather than to the peaceable Vertues, I maintain, that it is more to Love than to any thing elſe, ſince it is confeſſed that there is a ſtrange reſemblance between Love and War. In Love, as I have already ſaid by the way, they talk of Combats, Victories, Conqueſts, Chains, Irons, Ovans, Slaves, Captives, Priſoners, Priſons, Defeats, and Triumphs, and to diſcourſe gallantly of Love, it is ſo neceſſary to uſe all the terms of War, that a man cannot do it without; ſince, that in the one as well as the other, there are ſecret Intelligences, Surpriſes, and Stratagems. But though it were granted you, replyed Mutius, that Love in general is able to diſpenſe Glory, it will not be given you that this is to be underſtood of that ſecret love I ſpeak of. I have told you already, replied I, that that the more ſecret a love is, the greater is the pleaſure, and truer the glory; for can there be any thing more pleaſant or more glorious (added I, looking on Brutus, yet ſo as was not perceived) than to be loved of that perſon for whom of all the world one hath the greateſt eſteem, and to receive as an acknowledgement of his merit, the affection of a woman, who is eſteemed and admired, and whoſe ſingle approbation is more glorious than that of all the ſex beſide? Do but imagine, ſaid I, what glory it is for a man to entertain ſecret thoughts of happineſs amidſt a great company, being neer his Miſtreſs, and ſeeing her frowning on a Rival, who haply knowes not you are his, and is utterly ignorant that you are poſſeſſed of the heart he endeavours to conquer? Do you think Mutius, it is poſſible for a man to enjoy this kind of pleaſure without a ſence of that which is in glory moſt pure, moſt raviſhing, and moſt delightful? No certainly, but when a man ſees himſelf preferred before all the world, by a perſon whom he equally prefers before all, he infallibly receives all the ſatisfaction that glory can afford. Can there be any thing ſo glorious, as for a man to ſay to himſelf, though his Rivals know nothing of it, nay though it may be in their preſence, This admirable perſon who ſlights all that come neer her, hath beſtowed her heart which was never before ſubdued, on me; ſhe derives all her happineſs from me, as I doe all mine from her; I even engage her reaſon to ſubmit to the paſſion ſhe hath in her ſoul; ſhe does for me whatever vertue will permit her to do; I triumph, in fine, over the heart of a perſon whom I eſteem, and whom I love beyond my ſelf; and this triumph is ſecret, while my Rivals diſcourſe their fruitleſs ſighs in her preſence. I aſſure you Mutius, I ſhould think my ſelf more glorious in this ſecret triumph, than if I triumphed publickly after a victory of another nature. Nay I am confident this kind of ſecret glory raiſes the heart even to a certain noble pride, whereby a man contemns thoſe who he knows can never arrive at the happineſs he is poſſeſſed of; and certainly it muſt be, that you never knew any ſuch glory, nor ever imagined there was any ſuch thing, ſince you cannot comprehend that Glory is conſiſtent with this ſecret Love, and that with ſuch inſinuation, that it far exceeds whatever the moſt glittering vanity can afford, that is pleaſant to thoſe whoſe hearts are poſſeſſed by it. Further, thoſe who are equally made up of Love and Vanity, who love not, but to the end it might be ſaid they are loved, never arrive at a true, nay not at a quiet glory: for though nothing be in ſo much diſgrace as Indiſcretion, yet thoſe who are moſt indiſcreet would not be thought ſuch as they are. But theſe, on the contrary, take a thouſand trifling and ridiculous occaſions to make known that which they would ſeem to keep very ſecret. Sometimes they muſt ſeem to be diſturbed, ſometimes melancholy, ſometimes frolick, that people may ask what troubles their minds minds; to which answering ambiguously, they give men occasion to imagine what they would have believed. They must drop Letters purposely to be seen, though they seem to be very much troubled at it; they must trust their secrets to some false Brother or Sister, by which means their pretended favours are blazed abroad, though sometimes they must of necessity be moved to see that people believe not what they relate. But for my part, I am very incredulous as to what these favourites of good fortune tell me, who give out, that no conquest is difficult for them, and boast of a hundred adventures, which in all likelihood they never knew any thing of: for whoever can love can be silent, and Secrecy is a thing so engaging in Love, that without it all the favours a man receives are neither pleasing nor glorious, and to do you justice, it was excellently well said of you ere while, that were it not for destruction and envy, Fame would not be much acquainted with what passes in the Empire of Love. You might have added, imprudence and vanity, for commonly it is not known what passes between two Lovers, but either through the vanity of the Servant, or the imprudence of the Mistress. But indeed however it may come to pass, there can no great glory arrive hereby; for if the servant be indiscreet, he deserves not the favours he hath received, and cannot thence derive any true glory; if the Mistress want conduct, his conquest may be pleasing, but not very glorious: and if Envy and Calumny acquaint Fame with what passes between two Lovers, it never proves to their advantage. I know there are innocent Loves, which yet come to be discovered through pure misfortune; but when it does happen, I believe a person of Honour ought to be troubled that his conquest is made manifest, and that there is none more glorious than that which is not known to any. For, in fine, it is not Fame that bestowes true Glory, she onely proclaimes it; and Glory without Acclamations, is able to subsist, and to render a vertuous man happy. Fame and Love never were much acquainted; Mars may haply employ her upon divers occasions, but for Love, the God of Silence is his onely friend; for as to Fame, she is certainly an enemy to both loves and lovers, and the true glory of two persons mutually loving, consists in this, that they are themselves the onely witnesses of their tenderness and vertue, and esteem themselves and one another so highly, that their own approbation is sufficient to make them happy. Secrecy is principally that which makes for the glory of a Lover; and I maintain, that when a man is so fortunately circumspect, as to be able to conceal an affection of this nature from the eyes of the world, he feels in himself a a certain secret pleasure, which cannot arise but from that glory which a man takes in loving, unknown to others what he thinks deserves the adoration of all the world, together with that of being loved by that onely person which he can love.

Whereas you say that Pleasure is the soul of Love, I grant it, but I expect you should also grant, that to speak rationally, Glory is the nicest of all the pleasures of this passion: for in fine, whatever you may call favours, signifie in love what the Ensigns doe in war; there must be such things had, nay they must be had out of this main consideration, that they are the emblems of Victory, which is alwayes succeeded by Glory: how pleasing soever they may be in themselves, yet would they not be desired with so much earnestness, were they not attended by Glory: but when all is done, they are not desired that they might be divulged, but that they might be concealed: However it be, this is certain, that when a Lover can oblige a person of great vertue, and a great mind, to do for him those inconsiderable things, which if you take away Love, there was no reason she should do, though the things in themselves are not unlawful: he places so great a glory in a triumph of this nature, that it may be said, that as there is no love without pleasure, so there is no true pleasure in that love which hath no concernment of glory: Retract therefore your opinions, and repent of so injurious a design as to deprive the noblest of all the passions of that which distinguishes it from that kind of love which even Tigers are capable of, which is much different from that I speak of.

While I thus discoursed, Brutus, who applied all I said to himself, was incredibly enlivened; for if ever concealed Lover found the sweetness of the secret glory I pleaded so much for, it was questionless Brutus; since that while I spoke, he stood neer this Rival, who was so far from suspecting he was loved by that person whom he loved, that he thought him not capable of entertaining any love at all. But if I did him any pleasure by displaying the apprehensions I knew him subject to, I caused so much disturbance in Lucrecia, as that she could not forbear blushing. However her blushes were not interpreted as they might have been, though Collatine observed them; for to speak truely, it was not easily imaginable there should be such an intrigue of affection between those two persons.

But to return at length to the question in debate, the whole company gave sentence against Marin, who doubtless was sorry he had undertaken that task. Not but that he is naturally given to crack ing and ostentation, and consequently spoke as he thought; But that Valeria reproached him after such a manner, as he might easily infer that she would never give him occasion to employ Fame to publish the favours he should receive. Yet Marin is a person of extraordinary merit, but certainly he is too ambitious of fame and publick acclamations. It is true, he hath a heart contains whatever may deserve them, for Rome affords not a stouter man than he, nor one more capable of doing those heroick actions which cast honour even on whole Nations.

But my Lord, to return to my Story, you are to know that the subtil Collatina, whose business at Lucilia's was onely to do her Brother a good office, and who is a person of the greatest curiosity in the world, staying two or three dayes with Lucrecia and Hermilia, took an humour one morning to search Lucrecia's Cabinit; which she had forgotten to lock. Not that she did with any designe look for that which she found there, but with intention onely to take something out which Lucrecia had worn, for to present her Brother with, as a favour she had procured for him; but the first thing she met with, was a Letter of Brutus's, whose writing she knew not. However pursuing her curiosity, she read it, and found it so excellently well written, that she was much surprized at it, though it were couched in such terms, as spoke not clearly, that the writer was loved, yet such as gave occasion to imagine he was not hated, nay put it out of all doubt, that that he might love, and that most passionately. She was so surprised at this accident, that she read over this Letter three times, yet could not imagine who had writ it; but going to search if there were any other, Racilia comes accidentally into the chamber where she was, whereupon locking the Cabinet hastily, yet keeping the Letter, she could not continue her search, by reason Lucrecia came also into the room. Collatina in the mean time was strangely perplexed, as not knowing whether she should acquaint her Brother or not with what had happened; for she was loath to raise any jealousie in his heart. But she thought it not unfit, he knew he had some concealed Rival. She at first suspected I might have written the Letter, but coming that day to Racilia, she cunningly engaged me to write something for her, to discover my writing, which seeing it was nothing like that of the Letter, she was at a greater loss than before, for she was confident that neither the Prince of Pometia nor Titus had any hand in it, since they made it their business to further Collatine's marriage with Lucrecia. As for Brutus, she little suspected him to be her Brothers Rival, clearly forgetting she had ever seen of his writing: but believing him very simple and natural, she thought she might fish out of him, who had within some few days past, sent to Racilia's, so to discover something of this Letter, which caused her so much disturbance. Being thus resolved, and to that end putting her self in order to go and find out Brutus, who was walking in the garden, Collatine comes in, but in his way meets her alone reading the Letter once more, before she spoke to Brutus, but with so great attention, that as she read it, he looking over her shoulder, read it also, wherein he found these words, and heard Collatina after she had read it, breaking forth into this exclamation, not thinking any had been so near her; Who would ever have thought Lucrecia should receive such a Letter?

It is now past all dispute, Madam, that I shall never be satisfied; for if I see you not, I die, and if I do see you, I die also, in that I can but half see you, and that before so many witnesses. What necessity is there I should be miserable? Of all that you say to others, I make no advantage, neither do you Madam, since they do not allow it that esteem which they ought; and though they cannot but admire you, yet they consider not your conversation as the most delightful, and the most charming of any in the world. But for my part I dare not commend you as they do, nay I may not presume to honor you with that affection which they call Friendship. O ye Gods, was ever any self-constraint more harsh, more insupportable, and more importunate upon your compassion! If your delicate mouth can say nothing that may comfort me, let your fair hand at least acquaint me with my condition in your soul, that I may know whether, amidst that throng of people that sometimes crowd about you, you secretly afford some few thoughts on a man who bestows all his on you, and who would not live but to love you.

Collatine had hardly read over this Letter, with all the commotion a Lover, who feels the first agitations of jealousie rising in his heart, could be guilty of, but snatching it out of Collatina's hands, Ah Sister, said he to her, is it possible that you should be the bearer of such Letters to Lucrecia, and is it possible she should receive them? As to your first question, replyed Collatina, it is not true; to the second, I must confess it, that you may not justly blame me. But I pray, replyed Collatina, who is this fortunate Rival of mine, who presumes to write so amorously to Lucrecia, and who expects to be answered? I know not, replyed Collatina; and as you came in, I was going to Brutus who is on the other side of the Garden, hoping to know of him who hath sent hither within these three or four days, for I have taken this Letter from Lucrecia unknown to her; I know not the writing, and all I can tell you is, that it is not Herminius's. Ah Sister, you are too cruel to raise a jealousie in me, and not inform me of the Rival that causes it. This past, though Collatine came purposely to give Lucrecia a visit, yet instead of repairing where she was, he went with Collatina to Brutus, little imagining that the Rival he so earnestly looked after, stood nearer him than he thought. Being come up to him, he asked him whether there had been any great company at Racilia's, since his last being there; whereto Brutus not guessing at Collatine's intention, and thinking he asked him that, as conceiving him only able to say yea or no, simply answered there had not been any body. But I pray, replyed subtilly Collatina, came there not some Slaves hither, directed to Lucrecia that brought her any Letters? Brutus, who could not imagine what she would drive at, and knew not of the coming of Slaves, answered, again simply, that he had not seen any. But do you not know this writing (said Collattina, shewing him his own Letter, not thinking he had writ it) and did you never know any Letter received by any one of a writing resembling this? Brutus looking on what Collatina shewed him, was much astonished, for he presently perceived what it was. However, he had such a command of himself, that neither his Rival nor Collatina could observe any disturbance in his countenance. But to gain time to reflect on this adventure, he took upon him to read the Letter over and over, and having in so short a time well considered the business, he concluded that Collatina knew not he had written it, for he suspected not that Lucrecia had betrayed him, but believed that some accident yet unknown to him, had brought this Letter into his Rivals hands. Fearing therefore he might haply shew it to some body that would discover it to be his writing, he took at once a crafty and confident resolution; for having sufficiently considered the Letter, he, with a simplicity excellently natural, told Collatina that he had never seen any writing so like his own as that was. No, no, I warrant you, replyed Collatina, abusing him, you never writ this Letter. I do not tell you that I have (replyed Brutus without the least disturbance) but only tell you that this character is much like mine.

Upon this Collatina and his Sister left Brutus, without the least suspicion that he had any hand in that they were so inquisitive about, so much were they deceived in his fained stupidity; besides that if they had not thought him so stupid, they would hardly have suspected he should write to one in whose company he was every day. Thus was Collatina excessively disquieted, for the more he strived to guess who should write this Letrer, the more unlikely was he to find it.

On the other side Brutus was not without affliction; for he was not a little troubled that this Letter fell into the hands of Collatine, not so much for his own interest, though it concerned his life, as for Lucrecia's. So that seeing Collatine and his Sister halted to talk together, he took a walk about to find out Valeria, that he might acquaint her with what had happened, by whom Lucrecia might be informed, conceiving she yet knew not that she had lost the Letter. He was so happy as to meet with Valeria in a place where he might safely tell her what he pleased. Valeria having reasoned a while with him about what was to be done to hinder this adventure from spreading any farther, went immediately to Lucrecia. To gain time, they entreated Hermilia, having acquainted her with the business, to go meet Collatine and her Sister, and entertain them in discourse while they should resolve what to do. They were indeed at a mighty loss; but at last Valeria told her, that since there was no name mentioned in the Letter, it were best that Lucrecia first spoke of it before Collatine, and that she took some occasion to say that she found it in one of the walks on the Fountain Feast day, when there were so many people at Racilia's, and that she could not imagine whose it should be. Ah Valeria, replyed Lucrecia, I cannot have that confidence. You must have much more, replyed Valeria, if Collatina shew this Letter as directed to you. Besides, Brutus's life being concerned in it, if it should be known to be his, methinks nothing is to be sticked at. But if you would, replyed Lucrecia, you might do what you propose to me, for though I am confident that Collatina must have taken this Letter out of my Cabinet when I left her in my chamber, you may say you gave it me to keep. I will do so, said Valeria, but you must first see whether Collatina have taken any more. Going hereupon to satisfie themselves in what they desired to know, they found that of all Brutus's Letters there wanted only that, and so went to entertain Collatina, his Sister, and Hermilia, who were in a low room, while Racilia was busie with some that were expresly come from Rome to speak with her. They were no sooner entred the room, but Lucrecia perceives in Collatine's eyes the first startlings of a violent jealousie, and in Collatina's a fierce indignation. Nevertheless she kept her countenance, and not expressing any notice she had taken of the change of theirs, she asked Collatina where she had met her Brother, and afterwards asked Collatine what news at Rome. Whereto he answering coldly, Valeria, who knew what she had to do, began to play upon him for his sadness, and telling him that when a man is in a melancholy humor he should never make visits, but stay at home. I was not (replyed he coldly) so sad when I came from home as I am now. And what sad accident have you met with by the way, replyed Hermilia? It may be, replyed Valeria, he hath lost a Letter of as great consequence as that I found the last Feast-day, when there were so many people here: I am sure if I had lost such a one I should have been extremely troubled. But before you can lose any of that nature, replyed subtilly Lucrecia, it must be conceived you are fit to receive such. It is then a very strange Letter, replyed Collatina. To be free with you, answered Valeria, it is such a one as in my judgment seems very like a Love-letter; and were it not that the over-curious Lucrecia had taken it from me, lest I should shew it to some one to find out who writ it, and to whom it was directed, I would presently shew it Collatine, that he might assist me to discypher it. Valeria spoke this in apparence so ingenuously, that Collatine began to hope that the Letter he had might be the same which Valeria spoke of. So that desirous to be satisfied, he solicited Lucrecia to shew it him; Collatina, who was of the same opinion with her Brother, tlod her that she must communicate that Letter, for they both concluded that if she could not produce it, they could not charge her with any thing. Hermilia for her part knowing what Valeria and Lucrecia drove at, took occasion to tell Collatine, that that Letter was not so terrible. For, in fine, said she very cunningly, it is easily perceived that he who writ it is in love, but there is nothing whence it may be inferred that he is loved. But why did you not shew it me, says Collatina to Valeria? Because Lucrecia was pleased to take it away from me, replyed she, but to engage her to shew it you, I should in revenge make you believe that she her self lost it. Ah Valeria, you take a strange course to make me shew it; but I shall not do it, added she, if Collatine and his Sister promise me not never to speak of it, and to restore it me as soon as they have read it; nay I will do nothing, if, that you may be disappointed from shewing it to others, you consent not it may be presently torn to pieces.

You may imagine, my Lord, that considering the violent desire which Collatine had to be satisfied in this business, he promised to do what Lucrecia would have, and that his Sister did the like. But for Valeria, and Hermilia, Brutus's life being concerned in it, as also the reputation of their friend, they did that in this adventure to deceive Collatine and his Sister, which cannot well be imagined. Lucrecia pretended to go and fetch the Letter which she said was in her Cabinet, carrying herself so in the business, as if she made no question but to find it there. But as she went to her chamber, which was the other side of the house, she spies me coming in, and points to me to come straight to her, which I obeyed; but not affording me leisure to speak, she told me, what had happened, and I promised her my best assistance to deliver her out of the trouble she was in. I went therefore immediately to the company, as if I had not met her at all, soon after which Lucrecia returning I saluted her, as having not seen her before. But Lucrecia having returned my salute, began to tell Valeria that she asked her for a thing she had not, and that she must have taken it again out of her Cabinet; for, added she, I am certain it was there yesterday, and as certain that it is not there now. I assure you, replyed Valeria, I took it not. It must be then Hermilia, replyed Lucrecia. For my part, answered that fair creature, I can assure you I have it not. But, replyed Valeria speaking to Lucrecia, is it not because Herminius is here that you make a new difficulty to shew it? No indeed, replyed she, for I am confident of Herminius's discretion: but there is nothing so certain, as that some body hath taken it. It must be then Collatina that hath it, replyed Valeria, for as to Hermilia, I see by her looks she hath it not. Valeria herein speaking the truth, Collatina blushed, so that Lucrecia, Valeria, Hermilia, and I, said all together, that certainly Collatina had it, that she must produce, produce, or at least, for her justification, permit Hermilia to search whether she had it about her or not. To be short, this confident wench, who yet does every thing she does handsomely and discreetly, beset her self to do what was given her in charge. Whereupon Collatina perceiving the Letter would be found about her, and believing by the cheerfulness of the other three, that the business was as they made it, told them laughing, that it was true she had it. But she added a little lye to the matter, for she hath since confessed she took it out of the Cabinet, but she then affirmed she had found it in Lucrecia's chamber. As for Collatine, he was so glad to think the Letter had not been written to his Mistress, that he joyned his entreaties with mine to his Sister, that she would deliver it, since she confessed she had it. Collatina accordingly delivers it to Valeria, who was very earnest to have it, saying, it was she that found it, and consequently it belonged to her. But as soon as she had it, she shewed it to Collatine, as if she had not known that he had seen it. Collatine also pretended he had not read it before, but coming at last to my hands, I said I knew who had written it, and to whom it was directed, but would not discover it, because the Lover was one of my friends. This past, I earnestly entreated Valeria to bestow that Letter on me; for if you knew, said I to her, in what affliction the Lover is who writ it, you would pity him. But to satisfie you further in this adventure, you are to know, that this Letter was never seen by the Lady to whom it belongs: for he who writ it had it about him the day there were so many here, intending to send it to his Mistress that evening, which was the time he could with most ease deliver his Letters to a young Slave she hath lately entertained. You will therefore do justly if you restore it to me, and never speak of this accident, for by divulging it, there will be a necessity of discovering what men were here at the celebration of the Fountain-Feast, and then haply it might be guessed what Lady were concerned in this Letter. As for Collatine, added I, I have nothing to beg of him upon this occasion; for I look on him as a man so rational, that I am confident he will do that for my friend wich he would wish were done for himself, were he so happy as to be in a condition to lose some Love-letter which the fair Lucrecia should have received. As I spoke this, after a manner, ingenious, yet earnest enough, Collatine and his Sister were convinced the thing was no otherwise than as I said, so that the jealousie of this Lover was by this means absolutely smother'd.

But to disguise the business a little further, Valeria said she found some difficulty to deliver me the Letter; for it may be, added she, if you restore it to him that writ it, he will send it to his Mistress, and so I shall occasion her receiving a Love-letter. And if he do not send that, replyed I, he would haply write another more passionate; therefore trouble not your self with these groundless inconveniences, but let me have that which you have found. Hereupon Hermilia, Lucrecia, as also Collatina, telling Valeria I spoke but reason, I became master of the Letter, which absolutely cured Collatine of his jealousie. He was fully perswaded that if that Letter had been written to Lucrecia, she would not have suffered it to come into my hands; for some daies he was not well assured whether I was his Rival or not: however, he did not suspect me to have written that Letter, because he knew my writing. His mind therefore being fully becalmed, he was the rest of the day more jocund than ordinary; and to tell you the truth, Valeria, Lucrecia, Hermilia, and I, were not very sad; for we were so elevated, that we had once more secured Brutus's life, and that our imposture had proved so fortunate, that we were excessively merry that afternoon.

But that which was most excellent was, that when Collatine and his Sister were departed, and that Brutus was at liberty to speak in private with Lucrecia, she told him she would not have him write to her any more, and had almost told him as much as that he should not love her any longer. After all, said she to him, when you have well considered it, it is a kind of madness to be engaged in any affection how innocent soever it may be, since it alwayes layes one open to censure. For how can one love without writing? How can one write without passion? How can one be assured not to lose Letters, when one writes so often? And how, in case one may lose any, can we expect alwayes to meet with such as interpret things of this nature to the best? On the contrary, is it not true, that as soon as it is said a man loves a woman, it is believed she also loves him; and that as soon as it is thought a woman loves a man, they distinguish not between her loving, and her being subject to censure, and then it is immediately imagined that the expressions of her affection exceed their true bounds? Therefore Brutus, if you will take my advice, love me not, for it is a sad thing to consider that the unhappy accident that discovers the innocent affection which is between us, should expose your life to the cruelty of Tarquin.

Ah Madam, cryes out Brutus, how cruel are you your self to speak to me thus! and with how little experience of Love, if you think he troubles himself with any ratiocinations, or that he can be distracted by fear or difficulty? On the contrary, obstacles and dangers encrease it in a generous mind; and if you knew, Madam, what pleasure I feel when ever I consider that by discovering my love to you, I have put my life into your hands, you would not say what you do. For, Madam, since it is in your power when you please to betray me to the world, methinks I ow you my life a hundred thousand times, and that if you preserve it, you preserve it as a thing which belongs to you, and in which you have a greater interest than my self. Admit not then any repentance, I beseech you, for those innocent favours you have done me: I receive them with so much respect, I remember them with so much gratitude, I enjoy them with so much pleasure, and I desire the continuance of them, with so much earnestness, that if you should change your mind, you were the most unjust person in the world. And lastly, Madam, this dayes adventure ought not to discompose you, for if Collatine had taken away my Letter, I should have met him by the way, and rather then your reputation should have been prejudiced, I would have exposed my life a thousand times. Banish then all fears, Madam, I beseech you, recommend your heart to an innocent confidence, be satisfied that you know you are Vertue it self, that your example makes me more vertuous than I should be, that in fine, there is nothing can upbraid your self with; and entertain not as you do, the apprehensions of misfortunes which likely will never happen: for to expect in love at all times as much Prudence as Vertue, is the onely way to be alwayes miserable. Alas, replyed Lucrecia, is it so easie a matter to be happy? I know not Madam, said he to her, whether it be possible the experience you have of my affection, might render you happy; but this I am certain of, that as long as you repent you not of that goodness you shew me, I cannot be miserable, and defie Fortune, though she sometimes makes even Kings unhappy, that ever she shall be able to force Brutus to think himself unfortunate, while he hath the glory of your favour, and while he shall be so happy as not to see you in the power of another. 'Tis true, Madam, I can live contentedly, though I possess you not, provided another do not enjoy you; and I love with so much tenderness, that the onely pleasure of your favour and indulgence enables me to endure, without repining, all the torments which are the inseparable attendants of love.

I know not what you will say of me, replyed Lucrecia, that I permit you to speak so long without interruption; but certainly, there is so much obligation even in my silence, that you should not quarrel at it. For while you have been speaking, my reason hath suggested a hundred things against you, which I was loath to tell you, and indeed never shall. And therefore since I am so unjust as not to follow all these advices, you were better spare the grief it would be to you to know, that I do my self some violence when I bear it not, and that it is with a pleasure to me to hear you.

This past, Brutus said so many excellent things to Lucrecia, that their hearts were in an absolute composure and calm; I restored Brutus's Letter to that fair Lady, and for some dayes she and her Lover met not with any disturbance: 'Tis true, this fair weather lasted not long; for you are to note, that the day of the Fountain-feast the Prince of Pometia, Titus, Collatine, and Marius, concealed so ill their several passions, that Racilia, desirous to break those haunts, hastned her return to Rome, so to deprive these Lovers of all opportunites, that might be advantageous to their Loves. Not that Racilia was fully acquainted with the designs of those two Princes, but knew as much as engaged her to cross them. But when Brutus came to understand that Lucrecia was to return to her Fathers, and that he was now to lose all occasions of entertaining her, he was insupportably afflicted. 'Tis true, he had the comfort to see that Lucrecia shared this affliction with him, and took this separation most heavily. There was yet a weak hope left of seeing one another at Valeria's; for Brutus being at liberty to go at any time to Valerius's house, he imagined thence great advantages to his love. But all considered, he was extreamly afflicted at Lucrecia's parting; and their conversation at that time was so amourously passionate that I shall not repeat it, lest I should move you too much; for I have a many other things to tell you, which will sufficiently engage your pitty. Their onely comfort was, that bidding one another adieu, they promised to write to one another every day if they could; and accordingly, when they were returned to Rome, there passed not a day wherein they heard not of one another. Things fell out at first so happily for Brutus, that his love was no longer secret, neither to Lucrecia's mother nor Racilia; but these two vertuous Ladies approved it so well, that they were resolved to use all their endeavours to compleat it in a marriage. So that the admirable Lucrecia making no longer difficulty to entertain an affection absolutely innocent, writ more obligingly to Brutus than she had ever done before: for as to Visits, they could not be easily contrived, at least with that liberty, that they might speak freely one to another, since it must have been when none were at Valeria's when they came thither. But being both of a disposition highly passionate, they endeavoured to comfort one another by certain assignations of the mind, as I may so express it, for they agreed upon a certain hour every day, during which they promised to think one of another: and that which was remarkable in it, was, that Brutus did really many times wait for that hour with almost as much impatience, as if he expected to see Lucrecia. For he found something so pleasing in being assured that she expresly thought on him at the same time as he thought on her, that when he thought fit to express to me the enjoyments which this kind of assignation afforded him, I could no longer doubt but that he was the most amorous of all mankind. He would indeed tel me, that he never writ with more ease and greater passion to Lucrecia, than when he chose that hour to write in, and that the confidence he had that Lucrecia was as Punctuall in thinking of him as he was of her, did both sharpen his invention, and augment his love. I shall read you one Letter thus written, that you may see Brutus dissembled not when he said so, and with acknowledge that the greater a love is, the more ingenious it is to find it self great pleasures, as well as great affliction. But what is yet further considerable, was the manner how I came to know this new kind of assignation. You are then to know, that coming one evening to see Brutus, I staid there so late, till the hour appointed with Lucrecia was come, so that on a sudden I perceived he had left me, though I was in the room with him. My meaning is, his mind was at such a distance from what I said, that he behaved himself as one whose spirits were otherwise employed, and would have been glad to have been alone. I left him a while in that posture, but after a tedious waiting, out of the curiosity that is permitted in a friend tenderly intimate, I importuned him to tell me what he ailed. He at first made some difficulty to confess the business his mind was taken up with, as fearing I might laugh at this supererogation of love; but at length seeing me importunate to oblige him to speak he turned to me, and having conjured me not to make sport at his amorous ponderings, he told me that Lucrecia then thought of him, that he was obliged to bestow an hour on her; and that if I had not the goodness to speak to him of Lucrecia, I should not speak at all, and should leave him either to meditate or to write. It were much better to leave you to the last, replyed I, for you would not find that delight in what I should say, as you would in what you should write; as for what you should onely think and not write, Lucrecia were never the better for it. Thus engaging him to follow advice, conditionally I might see what he did, he writ the Letter I am going to read to you.

I assure, Madam, better perform the promise I have made you, that by telling you in this instant that I am as good as my word, and that my thoughts are wholly taken up with your charms, my love, your goodness, and the eternal faith I have promised you. In this employment I have already bestowed almost an hour: but is it possible for me to tell you how many things I have thought on in that time? I cannot, though I should write till the morning; for the thought is much more nimble than the hand, and the thought of a Lover much more than that of other men. But Madam, you may assure your self I have thought nothing unworthy you; and, if I may presume to say so, unworthy a man you affect. Pardon me this vanity. Madam, it is haply more excusable than you conceive. For in fine, the acclamations of the people, supposing I could deserve them, Statues and Triumphs should not raise me to so much, nay I should haply think my self as much above all things as I conceive my self beneath you; Ah Madam, it may be I have told you as much before, but I cannot but repeat it again: Is it not possible you should apprehend what pleasure it is to be loved by the most admirable and most accomplished person in the world? You would find there were nothing so pleasant, and that in proportion to this felicity all other are but misfortunes. Yet conceive not, Madam, but that these ever happy minutes are mingled with those that are less happy. But for that I am only to consider the injustice of Fortune, and reflect on the invincible difficulty which hinders me from seeing you often, and acquiring the esteem of others, that so I may be more worthy of yours. How can I be assured Madam, that you love me as much as I wish, proportionably to the merit of my passion, or at least as much as your last morning seems to promise me, even in not promising it to the mean time, Madam, know that I do not punctually obey your last command, which was that I should love Varon more than I loved you; for I love you both equally, since that really you are but the same thing. I do by one oath more confirm it to you, and if I fail I shall be content, as an ungrateful and perjured person, to forfeit all the affection you cast on me. But Madam if you will love, even to my Tomb, tell me so much I beseech you, and believe me, you can neither tell it me too often, nor too clearly, since that I know no pleasure, no joy, no comfort, save that of imagining that I am alone mirrored in your heart, and that you will never force me thence.

Brutus having writ this Letter and shewed it to me, and folded it up in order to be sent away the next day; he opened it again and added this Post-script.

Consider with your self that I am the most miserable man in the world, when I am one day without seeing you; Ah! if you consider it not, I am much more miserable than I thought my self.

I should never have done, if I should stand to particularize all the little circumstances of the loves of Brutus and the vertuous Lucrecia, who was perfect in that admirable art of making the tendereſt passion in the world consistent with the greatest vertue: for she never was so rigorous to Brutus, as to give him occasion of any rational complaint, nor was she ever so prodigal of her kindness as to question her innocence.

But not to wrong your patience over-much, I must hasten to tell you, that Brutus was hardly warm in his hopes of happiness, but Lucrecia's mother died, whereat he was so much troubled, as if he had never met with a greater misfortune; for, besides that the consideration of the friendship that was between them made him more sensible of her loss, as also the grief which Lucrecia took at it, his affliction was increased in that with her he lost all his hopes. About the same time there was a great conspiracy, ready to break forth, discovered: For, my Lord, though Brutus's soul was taken up with the love of Lucrecia, yet is it certain, that of glory and his Countrey were not dispossessed; but even while he seemed to write such excellent and such passionate Letters, was he not unmindful of the liberty of his Countrey; and if I should acquaint you with all the attempts he made, and which only Fortune crossed in their effects, you would stand amazed at it. That which is considerable, is, that though he were the first wheel in all the commotions that happened in Rome, yet was he not so much as suspected to have a hand in any; his affected stupidity eluding as well his Enemies as his Rivals. It did indeed much retard his happiness in his love, a misfortune would admit no remedy, since it would have been madness in him to acquaint Spurius Lucretius that he was a more understanding man than he was thought, for it would infallibly have cost him his life, by reason of the obligations which were between Lucretius, Tarquin, and Collatine. Brutus by this means was incredibly afflicted, and the pleasure he before had found in being loved, was turned into the greatest torment in the world. For certainly there is nothing more cruel than for one to know that he is loved equally as he loves, and yet to meet with perpetual obstacles in the accomplishment of his happiness. In fine, to shorten my relation, for six months Brutus writ every day to Lucrecia, there happening no miscarriage neither to his Letters, nor to those of that admirable Lady; but it being impossible to be always so careful, but that sometimes one may forget what he seems most to mind, it unfortunately happened that Lucrecia passing through her Fathers chamber, dropped one of those little Table-books, which I told you Brutus had caused purposely to be made to write to her. Lucretius seeing it fall, instead of calling to his Daughter, suffered her to go out of the chamber, & took it up; for being made after a particular fashion, he was so curious as to look on it. Opening it therefore hastily, not thinking to find in it any thing should move him, he was much surprized to meet with a Letter directed to Lucrecia, and that a Love-letter. But that you may be the better informed, I will read you a copy of this Letter, which Brutus hath furnished me with; for this unhappy writing being that which utterly wormed him out of all felicity, he still remembers it, to encrease his misery. This was it Brutus writ to Lucrecia.

Fortune was pleased yesterday to punish me for that excessive generosity, which made me prefer the interest of R——— not only before my own satisfaction, but haply before yours: for in fine, excellent Lucrecia, I did in a manner nothing of all I had proposed to do, as being extremely out of humor. But that you may know how far the love I bear you exceeds all considerations of glory and friendship, you are to know that my disturbance happened through my endeavors for the liberty of my C——— and that I could find no diversion even in the company of one of the most vertuous persons in the world, and one most endeared to you and me. But certainly it is impossible to avoid disquiet, having lost all occa- ausion of seeing you, and withal imagining the advantages of your conversation. I go out in the morning about the great affair you know of, and if I can I will come to the place where I could not yesterday. Do me the honour to meet me there, for I will do whatever lies in my power, to come and tell you in that place, that I die for love, and withal, that there is nothing more pleasant, nothing more charming than to die so.

You may well imagine, my Lord, that Lucretius was much surprized at this Letter, yet knew he not the character, as having never seen of Brutus's writing; nor would he shew it to any who should better inform him, because he could not do it without making it known that Lucrecia had some under-hand Loves; besides that imagining some other wayes to screw out this secret, he thought not of this. In the mean time, being an understanding man, he easily apprehended when he had read the Letter twice over, that the R. standing by it self almost at the beginning, stood for Rome, and the C. about the middle stood for Country; but all could not enable him to guess at the person who writ to Lucrecia. He also concluded that this Lover was engaged in some Plot against Tarquin, nor did he doubt much but that this Lover was loved, yet could not imagine who it might be. He at first thought to call Lucrecia, to make her confess by force what he desired to know; but changing his purpose he thought fitter to take some other course to find out the truth, looking on that as the last refuge, if this failed. Finding therefore in the Letter that he who had written to Lucrecia, entreated her to come that day to a place where he was to go, he resolved his daughter should be secretly followed thither, so to discover who was at the place where she was appointed to come. This commission he gave a certain Slave, who being very faithful to him, acquitted himself punctually of this charge. According to the appointment and the pleasure of Fortune, Lucrecia came to Valeria's in hopes to meet Brutus there, for that it seems was the place he had appointed her to come to; but Brutus being forced even against his will, to stay at Licinius's, where there was a secret Club, consulting about the great affair they had then in hand, entreated me to go and make his excuses to this beauty, which employment I was very glad of, not onely out of the great affection I had for Lucrecia and Brutus, but also because of the opportunity I had thereby to see Valeria. To serve therefore my friend, I went to the place where he was expected, not thinking there was a spy to observe who came to Valeria's. It happened also, that Lucrecia, Valeria, and my self, being very merry together, we staid till it was very late, besides that Valerius, whom I had left with Brutus, had enjoyned me to stay his return home, that I might know what had been resolved on at the Club, whereat for some reasons it was thought fit I should be.

In the mean time, this Slave of Lucretius, Lucrecia being gon from Valerius's, acquainted his Master where she had been, and assured him that none came thither besides but my self. Lucretius was hereupon perswaded that I was a Servant to his Daughter, and conspired against Tarquin. This apprehension had some appearance of truth, for he knew I had often seen Lucrecia at Racilia's while she was in the Countrey, and there were not many then knew I was in love with Valeria; and as Brutus had often made use of my name in divers gallantries and addresses to Lucrecia, as I have already told you, so had it raised a small report that I had some affection for her, insomuch that sometimes Collatine himself knew not what to think. Lucretius therefore having received some slight intimations, of what I tell you, absolutely concluded I was the Conspirator, and the Lover: for my Father dying in banishment, he thought it was likely I might be as guilty of hatred to Tarquin, as love to Lucrecia. So that having thus reconciled the business, he caused this Beauty to be called to him, and carrying her into his Closet, he began to treat her most reproachfully, and that with so much transportation and fury, that Lucrecia, who is sweetness it self, was much amazed at it; but what encreased her amazement, was to see in her Fathers hands the Table-book, which she thought safe enough elsewhere. Not knowing therefore how to excuse, much less clear her self, she resolved to be patient, and withal summoning the greatness of her spirit and courage, she bore all that Lucretius said to her, and heard him with the greatest attention might be, so to discover whether he knew who had written to her. But she soon perceived he knew not, for Lucretius having tired her with the bitterest reproaches, told her there was yet one way left whereby she might excuse her weakness, which was to acquaint him with all she knew. For, said he to her, since your love hath such an influence on Herminius, as to oblige to communicate to you the designs he hath against Tarquin, you must give me the particulars, and by giving me occasion to do the King a signal service, engage me to forget your miscarriage. Lucrecia hearing her Father speak in this manner, was surprized afresh; for she gathered from his discourse, that he knew not the truth, and was not acquainted with Brutus's writing, since he believed me to be in love with his Daughter. She at first was a little glad to see that her servant's life was out of danger, but was at the same time troubled that I was unjustly suspected. She therefore did all that lay in her power to perswade Lucretius that I had not writ the Letter, and to convince him that my love to her was as to a Friend, not a Mistress. But there being a many circumstances which made Lucretius's opinion seem the more likely to be true, he was the less satisfied with his Daughter; For in fine, said he to her, if you say true in that, why do you not tell me who writ what I find in this Table-book? For to think, continued he, to deny all, and confess nothing, is absolute madness. All I can tell you, Sir, replyed Lucrecia, is, that my misfortune is greater then my guilt, and if I have entertained his affection, whose Letter you have in your hands, it was by the commands of the most vertuous Mother in the world. I know well that yours, replyed he hastily, affected Tarquin's enemies; but though that be true, yet it justifies not you; and if you discover not to me all you know of the Conspiracy, I shall engage you in such a manner, into the interests of those whom you wish ruined, that you will be forced to change your opinion. I may well change my fortune, replyed she, but for my judgement it is impossible; therefore Sir, press me no further, all the favour I beg of you you is, to believe that Herminius is no servant of mine, and that he writ not the Letter you now have in your hands, as I shall make appear to you by shewing you his writing, which is quite different from that. But to deprive you at once of all occasions of persecuting me to no purpose, I declare that I will never tell you who writ that Letter, and though I knew all the circumstances of any Conspiracy, I should not discover it. Nevertheless know, that my heart is still innocent, and that I am not engaged in any thing that is criminal.

Lucretius being hereupon enraged against this admirable Virgin, treated her with the roughest language he could, thinking thereby to terrifie her into some confession. But seeing her not to be shak'd out of her constancy, he resolved to force her to marry Collatine; for he had long since observed her backwardness as to that business. Since you will not, said he to her, discover what I so much desire to know, I must needs engage for some concernment of your own, to hinder this secret Conspirator from acting any thing against that Family into which you shall be disposed. I therefore command you to prepare your self to marry Collatine within three dayes; he was importunate with me this morning about it, and I will it should be absolutely effected within the time I allot you, and that in the mean while you see no body, and least of all Valeria; for since you have made her the Confident of your criminal loves, she is not fit to be acquainted with your marriage.

Lucrecia hearing this resolution of her Father's cast her self on her knees, beseeching him with tears not to force her to marry Collatine. You may choose, said he to her, and to avoid it you have no more to do than to name this secret servant of yours, and discover this Conspiracy: for if you will be so obstinate as to do neither, I will immediately carry this Letter to Tarquin, that he may take some course to find out whose writing it is. Nor shall I so much as blot out your name, and thereby manifest your weakness, chooling rather to see you covered with shame, than expose my house to the indignation of an incensed Prince, who haply will come to know this enterprize by some other hand, and thence infer, that my Daughter having a Servant among the Conspirators, I might be ingaged in the Conspiracy. There is therefore no mean, you must either discover your Servant, or marry Collatine, or be content that I carry this Table-book to Tarquin.

You may easily judge, my Lord, what an extremity Lucrecia was in, for she was confident Tarquin knew Brutus's writing and as confident, that if that Prince came to discover he had any understanding, it would prove the occasion of his ruin, though he contributed nothing to the liberty of Rome. On the other side, to marry Collatine was a thing almost insupportable, but to expose Brutus's life was much more. She was ever over-burthened with the thought that Lucretius might haply do what he said, and that it would be spread about Rome that she had a secret Love, which it may be would not have been thought so innocent as indeed it was. So that seeing which way soever she directed her choice, all was insufferable, she wished for death as the onely remedy could free her of all the miseries she was in a manner over-whelmed with. But looking on this as a fruitless wish, she made use of perswasions, intreaties and tears, to move her Father not to force her to a choice wherein she must needs be unhappy, what resolution soever she took. What made her the more desperate, was, that when she imagined her self in her Father's case, she thought he had reason to be displeased, though really she deserved no blame, nor indeed could she oblige him to change his purpose, and all she could do was to prevail with him not to take any absolute resolution till the next morning. But to secure her, he set a guard upon her chamber.

Lucretius being thus convinced, that if I were not a Servant to his Daughter, I must be of the Conspiracy, went and told Tarquin that there was some plot a-foot wherein I was engaged; upon which intimation, this Prince, alwayes ready to believe what ever was said against the children of those whom he had ill-intreated, sent out orders to take me. For besides Lucretius's intelligence, he had been informed by some of my ill-willers, that I contracted not any particular friendship with any but such as were ill-affected to him. Being therefore satisfied with a bare pretence to destroy me, he gave order I should be secured, but it could not be issued out so secretly, but a friend of Sivelia's having notice of it, acquainted her. She immediately caused me to be found out, and told me I must leave Rome and provide for my safety. But there being many things to engage my stay there, I could not easily resolve to depart, nor haply should I at all, had not Valerius and Brutus come and told me that the Tytant had discovered somewhat of the Plot, and believed that I was the onely man had been named to him. It was impossible then for me to stand out any longer; I was forced to depart, and that without bidding Valeria adieu.

Brutus knew not all this while that he was more unfortunate then I, yet that day he began to be a little disturbed, as having neither heard from Lucrecia, nor sent to her. Nor could even Valeria her self rid him of this disquiet; for though she had at least so much friendship for me, as to be concerned in my removal, yet was she not in condition to go as far as Lucrecia's, who on the other side was in an incredible discomposure, as having passed the night without any sleep, and yet not fastened on any resolution. And certainly when she considered that she was to marry Collatine, and should see Brutus no more, she suffered something beyond all imagination: but when it came into her mind, that her Father might carry her Lover's Letter to Tarquin, that he would discover the writing, that she should lose her reputation, and that Tarquin would put Brutus to death. She was at a loss of all reason, and was no longer Mistress of her own thoughts. It could never enter into her imagination, that she should ever accuse him whom she loved beyond her self, and so she had onely two things to examine. But the more she considered them, the less able was she to make any choice whether of these two indigestible propositions she should accept. That which added to her misery, was that she could have neither advice nor comfort; for Lucretius had taken such order for her close imprisonment, that she had not the liberty either to write or speak to any whatever. But there was a necessity of resolving on something, though this Beauty after a night passed without so much as closing her eyes, was the next morning as far from any resolution, lution, as she was the night before, she indeed began to change her judgement when she understood by a woman slave who waited on her, and was locked into the Chamber with her, that she heard one tell a man that was talking with her Father, that I had made my escape, and was out of Tarquin's power: whereupon representing to her self more sensibly the danger Brutus was in by her means, in case he were discovered by this Letter, her onely consideration was how to secure her Lover, and she conceived there should nothing seem hard for her to do upon that account, nay not even marrying with Collatine. So that Lucretius coming into her chamber when her mind was thus taken up, and earnestly pressing her to choose, or expect to see him do what he said he would, she felt in her self so great an apprehension of Brutus's death, and the loss of her own reputation, that she promised to marry Collatine, conditionally Lucretius would return the Letter he had, that he would never enquire further who writ it, and as much as he could, trouble not himself to guess at him. Lucretius believing that when she were wife to Collatine, and consequently engaged into the interests of a Prince, whose near kinsman she had married, she would be easily induced to ruin even the whole Faction, whereof her former servant was, promised to do what she desired, provided the Letter should not be returned till the wedding day; and that till then, she should pretend her self indisposed, so to avoid the occasions of all visits. Thus Lucrecia, notwithstanding all the aversion she had for Collatine and all the tenderness she had for Brutus, expected the celebration of the Marriage with some impatience, that so she might secure her servant, by remanding a Letter which might haply cost him his life. She thought not fit to acquaint him with her condition, because she imagined he would advise her to somewhat disadvantageous to himself, and that he could not easily apprehend what resentments she then had for him.

Brutus, in the mean time, though he were much troubled at my departure, was yet much more that he heard nothing from Lucrecia. But understanding that they gave out at home that she was not well, he inferred that she was out of humour to stir abroad, and that she had failed writing to him upon no other account, not dreaming that it would not be long ere he heard the saddest, and to him the strangest newes in the world. According to what he had resolved, my Lord, Lucretius, who thought it the safest way immediately to dispose of a Daughter, cajoll'd by a secret love, managed the business with so much discretion and diligence, that he engaged Collatine to press him for his Daughter Lucrecia; and he carried it with so much judgement, that Tarquin consenting to the marriage, it was presently concluded, and three dayes after solemnized. All was done very privately, Lucretius giving out, that his Daughter being yet in mourning for her Mother, it was not fit it should be done with much ceremony. So that the first newes that Brutus had of it, was, that Lucrecia was in the Temple in order to be married to Collatine; for having been employed in satisfying those who had taken any alarm at my departure, he had heard nothing at all of it. But he had no sooner heard this newes, but he received this Letter from Lucrecia, which contained onely these words;

Being obliged by a cruel necessity, either to marry Collatine, or be the cause of your death, I have chosen rather to abjure all the pleasures and enjoyments of my life, and consequently make my self eternally unhappy, than to expose yours to my anger. Bemoan my hard destiny, I beseech you, and, in gratitude for what I have done for your sake, forget me, if you can, and see me no more; for I must love you no longer, and yet I should not avoid it if I saw you. Obey therefore the cruel command I lay on you, to see me no more, and assure your self I shall lead such a sad and solitary life, that I shall give you no occasion to think me guilty of inconstancy.

I leave you to consider what a condition Brutus was in when he read this Letter; he knows not yet himself what he thought in that terrible instant, and all the account he gives of it, is, that not knowing precisely what he intended to do, he went to the Temple where they said Collatine was to marry Lucrecia. He was no sooner in, but he understood that the Ceremony was past, and that all things were performed in much hast, because it was feared Lucrecia might swoun. He understood also, that Lucretius, notwithstanding his daughter's indisposition had caused the Ceremony to be performed; and that as ill as she was the cruel Father was gone along with her to Collatine's house. Not knowing therefore what to do in this distracted condition, he went to Valeria's, whom he acquainted with his misfortune by shewing her the Letter he had received. But in all things his countenance spoke so much despair, that he moved a great compassion in generous Valeria. Well, said he, looking on her with the tears in his eyes, what say you now of Lucrecia? What must I think of her? and what must I do? Can you imagine by what charms Fortune hath changed her heart, or what strange adventure hath obliged her to prefer Collatine before the unfortunate Brutus? For my part, replyed Valeria, I understand nothing of it, nor indeed can imagine either that Lucrecia hath ceased to love you, or hate Collatine, or altered her judgment. But do you understand, replyed Brutus, why she should not acquaint me sooner with this design; or why, in case Lucretius have used any violence, she hath not given me leave to die before she married Collatine? For it is fine, since the affection she had for me, was not strong enough to hinder her from becoming the wife of my Rival, she should also have given him the satisfaction of my ruine, and spared me the grief to see her in the embraces of another, and see my self forsaken by a person for whose sake I was willing to forsake all things, and for whom haply I had forfeited much of my reputation. It is just in you, O ye Gods, (said he to himself, while Valeria was speaking to some one that asked for her) to punish me, for having admitted into my heart any passion that should divert it, or haply hinder it from the deliverance of my Country. At the first dawning of my love I looked on Lucrecia as the person by whom I was staid at Rome for the execution of this great design; but I must now look on her as an unconstant woman, who is the cause that I have not destroyed the Tyrant. She took up all my thoughts; her representation followed me me into all places; and though I then believed I did all that lay in my power to revenge my Father and Brothers death, and to shake Tarquin out of his throne, yet now I am of opinion, that I was more employed about the love I had for Lucrecia, than the hatred I had for the Tyrant. But is it possible, returned he, that Lucrecia, the vertuous Lucrecia, should be dazled with a greatness so weakly established, since it is grounded on injustice? Is it possible, I say, she should ally her self into a Family which she knows I am obliged to destroy? Does she believe that any concernment of hers shall hinder me from turning Tarquin out of the Throne, if opportunity favor me to do it? Or will she, to secure the Tyrant, reveal what design I have against him? Proceed Lucrecia, proceed, continued he, for by exposing me to the cruelty of the Tyrant, you do me less injury than by making me feel your own. Valeria coming to him when he had proceeded thus far, he renewed his complaints, beseeching her assistance, at least to find out what might be the motives of Lucrecia's defection: for I cannot be perswaded, said he to her, that she is so poorly opinion'd of my heart, as to imagine that I can entertain death with less ease than I can her loss. Do me but the favor, continued he, that I may see her, for if she be not so merciful to me, I shall certainly think no violence too great for me to do my self.

This discourse of Brutus came from him with such earnestness, that Valeria fearing he might haply do himself some violence, promised to do what he desired, though she was not certain to prevail; for she sufficiently knew Lucrecia's heart, and only fore-saw that since she was resolved to be Collatine's wife, she would be no longer Brutus's Mistress. But willing to appease the present grief of this despairing Lover, she told him not what she truly thought.

While Brutus thus groaned under incredible afflictions, Lucrecia amidst her melancholy, had one great comfort, in that her Father had kept his word with her: for being ready to go to the Temple, he got Brutus's Letter returned to her, so to secure his life. Nor could she but be somewhat pleased that she was taken ill at that time, and continued so still, because the indisposition of her body served for a foil to that of the mind. But all considered, what comfort soever she might raise from the present thought of having sacrificed her self to the safety of her Servant, yet soon after she thought her self the most unfortunate person in the world: for she irrecoverably lost a man whom she infinitely loved and esteemed; she married another for whom she had an extreme aversion; she ally'd her self into a Family, which all vertuous persons endeavored to ruin, and she resolved to give her self over to perpetual solitude. But at last these considerations contributing to her melancholy humor, she fell really sick; by which means it was more easie for her to conceal from Collatine the small satisfaction she found in being married to him. She would needs remove from Rome purposely to avoid all meeting with Brutus. She began to commend the air of Collatia, as being better for her health, in so much that she was conveyed thither sick as she was. By this means was she in a condition to be more solitary, never hardly to see Brutus, and to see her Husband less often, who being obliged to shew himself at Court, would be forced to leave her many times.

In the mean time Valeria could not come to sight of her, for Lucrecia writ a Letter to entreat her not to attempt it, for some reasons which she should one day acquaint her with. So that Brutus not knowing what to do, was afflicted beyond all expression. Yet were there some intervals, wherein he found some slender comfort, to understand that Lucrecia was sick and melancholy: but there were also others wherein he gave so much way to his despair, that he had not the command of his own thoughts, and there was no consideration of violence which his mind reflected not on. But the great vertue which garded his soul successefully, opposed all those irregular apprehensions which his love and his despair suggested; yet could it not overcome the extream desire he had to see Lucrecia, though she had forbidden it him in the last Letter she had written to him. Directing therefore all the efforts of his mind to find out some way to satisfie himself, he cunningly informed himself, by the means of Valeria (who might more easily come to know it than he) that Lucrecia who began to recover, though against her will, her former health, spent the afternoons for the most part, when her Husband was absent, all alone in a Garden, adjoyning to Collatine's house: and that sometimes she staid there till she went to bed, when it was fair weather and the Moon shined. Brutus being thus particularly informed what Lucrecia did, acquainted not Valeria with his intention, lest she might oppose it: but when he was fully satisfied of all he desired to know, he trusted himself to a faithful Slave, who had lived with him ever since his being at Metapont. Pretending to go into the Countrey, he went by night to Collatia, and took up his lodging, disguised at a man's house whom his Slave was acquainted with: for having been there divers times, he knew the walls of Collatine's Garden were but low, so built purposely for the prospect of the first story of the house, which is built on one side of the garden; which not being absolutely level, hath in one part divers hedge-rows and little arbors, that the unevenness might the less appear.

Having thus laid his design, he came, as I have already told you, to Collatia, at a time when he knew Collatine was not there, and that his Sister was at Rome with her Mother, who was yet alive. But to do his business the more easily, he had brought with him one of those Ladders, which fasten on a wall as soon as they touch it, and had so well provided for all things that might contribute to his entrance into the garden, where they said Lucrecia came every day, especially in the evenings, that he doubted not a successeful issue of his enterprize. For he knew that the walls of Collatine's Garden were in a lone street, through which none passed after it was once night. It is true he had some reason to fear any one came along with Lucrecia; but he had been so perswaded that she was always alone, that, considering the desire he had to see her, this difficulty signified nothing with him. He had also this advantage, that he feared not to be seen from the house, though it were built towards the garden, because that uneven corner which I mentioned, was taken up by two or three large Arbours. But in fine, not to trouble you with so many inconsiderable circumstances, which you may easily suppose, you are to know that Brutus, not debating his resolution any longer, undertook by this course to see Lucretia, besides that having the reputation of stupidity, and being withal of some kin to Collatine, though he were found in the garden, it would have passed for a little extravagance of a man whom many believe to be quite out of his wits; by which means Lucretia should fear neither the jealousie of her Husband, nor censure of the world. Brutus therefore came thither one evening, attended only by his slave, whom he appointed to wait him on the out-side of the garden-wall; and he was so fortunate, that as soon as he was gotten down into the garden, and hid himself in one of the little Arbours, he by the light of the moon sees Lucretia beginning her walk, having forbidden her women to follow her, and left them sitting in a little Lodge at the Garden-door. 'Tis true, he was somewhat troubled to see that in a quarter of an hours time she came not to that side where he was, nor could he go where she was, without being seen by those women who sate in the Lodge. But at last Lucretia in her solitary humour seeking obscurity, quitted the plain part of the garden, and passing along a thick hedge-row, came to that arbour where Brutus was; who fearing that if he were perceived before she were come quite to the place, she might call her women, hid himself to give her way to come in. She was no sooner in, but sitting down she fetched a deep sigh, and that with such an accent of anguish, that Brutus was extremely moved at it, and transported with love, without any further hesitation. Ah, I beseech you Madam, said he, casting himself on his knees before her, tell me whether the unfortunate Brutus be any thing concerned in the sigh he hath now heard; and if he be, permit him to return you sigh for sigh, till he expire at your feet, and assure you dying, that there never was any servant more amorous nor more faithful, than he whom you have with so much cruelty forsaken. Lucretia was so surprised to hear Brutus speak, and to see him in the posture he was in, that she was not able to express her astonishment by any crying out: on the contrary she was seized by a most piercing grief, and continued a while unable to speak. Yet thrusting him from her with her left hand, she made a sign to him with her right, that he should be gone, and that he was to blame for what he had done. No no, Madam, said Brutus to her, you need not thrust me away, since I am come for no other end, than to know from your own mouth the cause of my misfortune. And I beseech you, said Lucretia to him, going to rise, have you as great a care of my reputation as I have had of your life, and expose me not to a suspition of having spoken to a man, at such a time and place as this. The place where you are, replyed he, is so far from that where you have left your women, that they can neither see me, nor hear me; nay they cannot come towards this place but you must see them, and you further know, your reputation can receive no prejudice from the stupid Brutus, and that the Brutus, whom you are acquainted with, hath no design against your innocence. Permit therefore Madam, that I ask you what I would fain be satisfied in; for if I were sure to be discovered, I should not be gone, since it is certain I cannot injure you. But am I obliged, replyed he, to obey a person who hath taken her heart out of my hands, to bestow it on my Rival? Ah Brutus, replyed Lucretia relenting, I were more happy, and, it may be, more innocent than I am, if either I had done it, or could yet do it: yet raise no advantage to your self of what I tell you, for I assure you, you will be never the more happy for it. Nor shall I satisfie you so far, continued this illustrious Lady, as to particularize my misfortunes, lest that by justifying my self to your apprehension, and acquainting you how much I have obliged you, and the true state of my soul, I should engage you to love me as you did formerly. How Madam, interrupted he, can you suffer me to be ignorant of what you thought, while you made me the most unfortunate Lover that ever was? Can you wish I should not know what might be the pretence, or excuse of your cruel proceedings? Can you desire I should be utterly ignorant of what is done in your heart? Ah Madam, if it be so, I must think you never loved the unfortunate Brutus, nor ought he to love you, though he were in a condition to dispose of his own thoughts. But alas, he is far from it, for he loves you and adores you, notwithstanding all your infidelity. Ah, I beseech you, replyed Lucretia, accuse me not of infidelity and be satisfied that I am so generous not to accuse you as causer of all the misfortunes of my life; since that it is upon your account that I am wife to Collatine. Upon mine, Madam, replyed Brutus? It is certain, replyed Lucretia sighing, and since you are so desirous to know the true cause of your misfortune and mine, you shall have it. Whereupon Lucretia told him how she lost the fatal Letter, which her Father had found; which passage she aggravated so with words so fitting expressing the confusion she was in when Lucretius would oblige her to discover who writ it, or to marry Collatine, that he was extremely moved with it, especially when she fully convinced him that the fear of hazarding her own reputation, and principally that of exposing the life of such a man as was to the cruelty of Tarquin, had obliged her to submit to her Father. Consider now (added she after she had ended her relation) whether I have loved you faithfully, and whether I deserve to be thought inconstant. However it be continued this vertuous Female, as my love to you hath been alwayes innocent, and that I can love you no longer, since I am Collatine's, I must, though I die for't, resolve never to see you more. For this reason is it also that I am resolved not to see any, but shall lead a life so solitary, that though you should be unjust as to persist in your love, you shall never have any opportunity to let me know of it. Nay I will so carry my self towards Collatine, that I hope accepting my melancholy, he shall have nothing to object to me. Yet can I not but acknowledge that the aversion I have for him will last as long as I live: but after all, since a consideration of honour hath prevailed with you to conceal your reason for so many years, I must needs think my self obliged by a like motive, to conceal the aversion I have for my Husband, and the affection I have for a Lover. Ah Madam, it is much easier to conceal ones Passion than ones Love, and if you ever had any for the unfortunate Brutus, you would rather have permitted him to die a thousand times, than forsake him. For,

Madam,

Madam, do you consider the sad condition I am in? Another Lover would find a hundred comforts in such a misfortune as this; he would betray your inconstancy to all the world by his complaints; he might revenge himself by pretending to some other affection, and he might haply be recovered of his misery by such a remedy, or at least would be the better enabled to bear the ill success of his love through the consolations of his friends. But for my part, Madam, who am the unhappy man that all the world shuns, and no body knows, I am not capable of any comfort. You were to me all the world; I found in you a Friend and a Mistress; I found in you all pleasure and all glory; and I imagined my self so happy when I had but one minutes private discourse with you, that I would not have changed fortunes with the most fortunate Monarch in the world. I was somewhat pleased with my self, that my understanding was onely at your service, and for your sake; you were absolute Mistress of my will; you had the same power over my desires; and in fine, you had such a soveraignty over me, that never any Empire was better established than yours. But what said I (resumed he, correcting himself) you had? you have the same power still, and it is onely Death that can dissolve it. It is true Madam, how unjust soever you have been in preferring my life before my quiet, I am the same man I was; and it shall be your fault, if I find not some lenitive in my misfortunes. Ah Brutus, replyed Lucrecia, since I have changed my fortune, you must change your judgement. But Madam, said he to her, continually I shall beg nothing of you, that I use so much as tell you that I love you, what matters it to you what is done in my soul? Permit me then to see you sometimes; you know Collatine and I are of kindred, that he can never suspect me to be in love with you, and that my palpable stupidity will give me as much freedom any where as I would take. Give me leave to see you, provided I never entertain you with the secret resentment of my heart. No, no, Brutus, replyed Lucrecia, I would not you should esteem me less than you have; nor will I ever do any thing which I may object to my self as destructive to true glory: for all considered, to be Collatine's Wife, and Brutus's Mistress, are two things absolutely incompatible. Ah Madam, replyed he, will you then be pleased to become my Friend? I heretofore in the beginning of my love refused your friendship, but I now beg it, and that with tears. When I proffered you my friendship, replyed she, I could without any difficulty entertain your love; but alas Brutus, the friendship of a Lover is not to be accepted when a woman is once another mans wife, and hath the least tenderness for her reputation. Resolve therefore not to love me any longer, and that, if I may so say, for my sake, as I have resolved to be unhappy for your sake; and that you may be assured, I do all I can, and haply more then I ought, I permit you to believe, that I shall grieve for you while I live. On the other side, fear not I shall ever discover your secret: for though you cannot in any likelihood destroy Tarquin, but you must withal give check to the fortune of that Family, into which I am entred, I shall by nothing to your charge while you meddle not with Collatine's person. Not but that if you conceive I speak for my own interest, I should advise you forsake Rome; to set your reason at liberty, to go and live at Metapont, where you have friends of both sexes, and where you may be cured of what passion your soul is sick of. For in all likelihood Vice will ever triumph over Vertue. Brutus will be alwayes miserable, and Tarquin alwayes happy. How, Madam, replyed the unfortunate Lover, you would have me forsake Rome, quit the design of revenging my self, and delivering my Countrey, but for no other end than that I might be the farther from you. Ah Madam, I neither can do it nor ought, and if Death do not deliver you from my presence, you shall never be delivered from it. I shall be delivered from it, replyed she, if I reside constantly at Collatia, whither you will have no pretence to come; and though Collatine himself should command me to see you, I would intreat him to pardon my disobedience: and this pretended stupidity which heretofore furnished me with a pretence to see you, shall henceforward be my excuse not to see you again; but I shall think my self the more obliged, if without any further dispute you obey the command I lay on you, not to endeavour it. But is it possible, replyed Brutus, that my sight is become so insupportable to you, and that having expressed so much goodness as to let me believe that I might be the object of all your happiness, I am now thought the onely cause of your misfortune? For I tell you once more, Madam, that if you will be pleased to be my Friend, I shall not think my self absolutely miserable: and if I ever forget my self so far as to speak any thing to you whence you might gather I would be treated in the quality of a Lover, I give you leave to acquaint Tarquin that I am a dangerous Conspirator, and deserve death. But do you think, replyed she, that when I lost you, I withal lost all reason, and that I can be perswded that Love may be turned into Friendship, or Friendship into Love, when one pleases? If it be so in your heart, added she, you never knew any true passion; and I should punish you for your dissimulation past with eternal banishment. One might indeed in a short time pass from Love to Hatred; one may sometimes pass from Love to Indifference, and it is not impossible to ascend from Friendship to Love; but to descend from Love to Friendship, is that I cannot comprehend how it may be done. I could believe, added she, there may be some Husbands, who having been infinitely indulgent of their Wives, are after a long time cooled, so as to have onely an indifferent affection for them, which may be called Friendship: but for a Lover to become a Friend, is a thing I conceive impossible, and shall never believe. Persist not therefore in the proffers of your friendship, or the desire of mine: for since Fortune hath been pleased to cross the innocence of our affection, I will see you no more, and I profess to you, I shall hate you, if you continue to perswade me to a thing which I believe inconsistent with my duty. For in fine, Brutus, you but too well know that I have loved you, and you haply imagine that I shall love you as long as I live, therefore our conversation can be no longer innocent: one look of yours raises a controversie in my soul; I must not any longer trust either you or my self in such a case as this; and I have already spent too much time with you, in debating a thing already resolved. Go your wayes therefore, Brutus, go, the unfortunate Lucretia commands you; be careful of the life she hath preserved you, and remember sometimes, that it hath coſt her all the happineſs ſhe could expect. But hold, added ſhe, riſing from her ſeat, think on nothing that concerns me: for if I thought you remembred it, I could not haply forget you. How, Madam, cryes out Brutus, you cannot but remember me, and can you imagine I ſhould obey you, when you command me to forget Lucrecia? No, no, Madam, abuſe not your ſelf, it is not onely death can raze you out of my heart; and if the deſpair that hovers about my ſoul were not kept off by the love I bear you, my hand ſhould ſoon rid Tarquin of an Enemy, and Lucrecia of a Lover. But Madam, ſince that if I loſt my life I ſhould ceaſe to love you if exceſs of grief take it not away, I ſhall not, which I do not but out of a pure conſideration of love, ſince, as you may eaſily imagine, Madam, I muſt expect to live the moſt miſerable of any man in the world, which can afford nothing more inſupportable, than for a man to ſee his Enemy in the Throne, and his Miſtreſs in the embraces of his Rival. For, all conſidered, Madam, I concur with you, that Love can never be remitted into Friendſhip, and when I begged the quality of your Friend, I onely meant to tell you, that I ſhould never ask any thing of you but what a vertuous friend might deſire of a vertuous woman. Aſſure your ſelf therefore, Madam, that I ſhall love you to the laſt gaſp, and that I ſhall love you ſo intirely, as never any man did the like. But in requital, Madam, added he, promiſe me that you will not make it your buſineſs to hate me; for I had rather be deprived of your ſight, than that you ſhould not promiſe to love me alwayes. Ah Brutus, I neither can nor muſt promiſe you any thing, replyed ſhe; in the mean time, I muſt leave you, and be gon, for I ſee one of my women coming to tell me that it is time to retire; and indeed Brutus turning his head ſaw a woman-ſlave who was come half wayes the Garden, and made directly towards the place where he was. This put him into a ſtrange diſturbance, for he thought he had a thouſand things more to ſay; nay he imagined that if he had ſaid them, they would have moved Lucrecia; but if he ſhould have offered to detain her by force, ſhe would have taken it in much diſpleaſure. He therefore ſubmiſſively took her by the garment, and would, out of an amorous tranſport, have kiſſed her hand, and intreated her to favour him for one minute more: but this vertuous woman, troubled at her very ſoul for him, certainly did her ſelf a ſtrange violence in refuſing him what he ſo paſſionately begged. So that commanding him abſolutely to let her go, and doing it as one who expected obedience, he in effect obeyed her: he diſmiſſed the hand and garment of this afflicted Beauty; and he had this comfort at leaſt, to perceive ſhe thought well of his reſpect and obedience. For having gon as far as the entrance of the Arbor, where this diſcourſe paſſed, ſhe turned to him, burſting forth into tears, and reaching to him the ſame hand which ſhe had taken from between his, Farewel Brutus, ſaid ſhe to him, might it pleaſe the Gods that the innocency of our affection would permit me to think on you, and that you might alſo think of me. At theſe words Brutus taking her by the hand ſhe preſented to him, kiſſed it with ſuch a tranſport of love, that if ſhe had not drawn it back with ſome violence, he had not ſoon diſmiſſed it. But this ſlave, who was come to tell Lucrecia that it was about the time ſhe uſed to retire, was ſo near, that he was forced out of a conſideration of reſpect, to withdraw himſelf without anſwering the laſt words Lucrecia had ſaid to him. When ſhe was departed, he looked on her through the leaves as long as he could, but ſaw ſhe had let down her veyl, which he conceived was to hide her tears from the ſlave that followed her. He alſo obſerved, that ſhe twice turned her head towards the place where ſhe had left him, as alſo that ſhe went from him very ſlowly; for though he was in an unconceivable deſpair, yet the exceſs of his love quickened his apprehenſion of any thing related to his paſſion; but to any thing elſe was inſenſible.

Lucrecia and her women being gotten into the Houſe, and having locked the lodge-door that went into the Garden, though he knew not well what he thought on, yet could he not reſolve to be gone. For obſerving a greater light in one part of the houſe then in any other, he concluded it was Lucrecia's chamber, and looking on the Windows, he had ſuch a diſturbance and confuſion in his thoughts, that it were impoſſible to expreſs them. He found indeed ſome eaſe in ſeating himſelf in the place where that Beauty had ſate, and in that poſture he intertained his love and his affliction till the break of day, not thinking of the Slave who knew his deſign, and waited for him without the Garden. But at laſt the Cock crowing acquainted him what time it was, he went out as he came in, and repaired to the houſe where he had taken up his ſecret Quarters.

In the mean time, as Hope is ſuch a Montebank in Love, as inſtead of one real pleaſure, entertaines us with a hundred imaginary, he was really perſwaded he might ſee Lucrecia in the ſame manner another night: but though he came to the ſame place, he met not with her; for this vertuous woman conceiving he might come again, went thither no more. So that Brutus not thinking it ſafe to ſtay any longer in that place, whither Cillatine came the next day, returned to Rome exceedingly grieved: for Lucrecia's vertue rendring her more amiable than ſhe were otherwiſe, it made him the more unfortunate. Not long after he was told that Lucrecia had perſwaded Collatine to make the walls of his garden ſomewhat higher, though it much prejudiced the proſpect from the houſe, which he might eaſily apprehend onely for his ſake. This nevertheleſs diſcouraged him not, for having a heart as great as his love, he omitted no artifice or opportunity from the time that Lucrecia was married, to ſpeak with, or ſend Letters to her, or to oblige her to permit Hermilia or Valeria to ſpeak to her of him; or to procure the favour that he might ſee her in ſome place, though he ſpoke not to her. He alſo, notwithſtanding the hatred he had for Collatin, made frequent viſits to him, in hope of ſome occaſion thereby to ſee Lucrecia: but all theſe contrivances and deſigns amounted to nothing, Lucrecia leading a life ſo ſolitary, and diſengaged from the diſturbances of the World, that I think there never was woman gave higher expreſſions of a great vertue than ſhe did. For it is out of all controverſie, that never Wife lived better with a Husband than ſhe did with Collatine, though ſhe had an averſion for him; nor did ever Miſtreſs expreſs ſuch a conſtant rigor and ſeverity towards a ſervant, though ſhe had a tender affection for Brutus. This was was Brutus extremely taken with her vertue, and fearing that disconsolate solitude might shorten her life, he sent her word by Valeria, that he had so great an esteem for her, as, to break her from that reserved carriage, he would make it his main business to avoid her, that so she might quit that melancholy course of life; conceiving his misfortune would be the less, if he were alone unfortunate. But she would not be perswaded, nay would not so much as return Brutus thanks for his compliance and respect. However, I dare assure you he was never in his life so deeply in love with this admirable woman as he is at this present; nay I may presume to tell you, that the love he beares Lucrecia is greater than the hatred he hath for Tarquin: but his love is upon the hardest condition that love can be capable of, since it admits no Hope, nor the sight of its object. All the comfort therefore that he hath, is, what consists in the hope of satisfying that just hatred he hath for Tarquin, since he can now pretend nothing to Lucrecia.

Herminius having left off speaking, Aronces thanked him for the excellent entertainment of so pleasant a relation: and Amilcar expressed himself so well satisfied with it, that if he could have resolved to be constant, he would have wished himself Brutus, as unfortunate as he was, looking on his History as a thing extraordinary, though it was not furnished with those heroick adventures which raise the admiration of those that hear them. But to make some advantage to your self of the acquaintance I have made you with Brutus, replyed Herminius, speaking to Aronces, acknowledge that you are neither the most unfortunate Lover, nor the most unfortunate man in the world: for certainly Brutus being now past all hope, and leading such a life as he does, is a thousand times more miserable than you are. Ah Herminius, cryed out Aronces, I am not of your opinion, but account my self much more unhappy, in that I have to fear Clelia's death, than Brutus is to see Lucrecia in the arms of Collatine. But my Lord, the misfortune you fear, replyed Amilcar, it may be, will not come to pass, and so your fear is of a disaster that is uncertain; but for Brutus he is past the fear of a mishap, he undergoes it, and that without any hope of seeing any end of his suffering. He hath yet this comfort, replyed Aronces, to know that Lucrecia cannot suffer any thing but what the affection she hath for him, imposes on her; but for what concerns me, I see Clelia exposed to the violence of a Tyrant, whether he love her or hate her: nor can I yet perceive by what means I can deliver her, nor who will deliver my self. It being by this time very late, Herminius and Amilcar retired, and left this illustrious Lover at liberty, to compare his misfortunes with those of the illustrious Brutus.

MADEMOISELLE de LONGUEVILLE.

MADAM,

THE Opinion I have of your Goodneſs muſt needs be very great, when I think the preſumption I am guilty of, in this addreſs ſo innocent and juſtifiable, that I do not much doubt your pardon. It is certainly no ſmall one in me, to make uſe of your name, to do that, which, of all things, I take the greateſt pride and pleaſure in; that is, confidently to let the world know, I cannot receive a favor with half as much freedom and ſatisfaction, as I can acknowledge it. To thoſe I have received from Your ſelf, I cannot but add the many extraordinary Obligations, I am indebted to your noble Relations, and particularly thoſe at CUMBERLOW; and among thoſe, to that accompliſhed Perſon, whom the World juſtly admires, to find, at ſo few years, ſoaring in a Fame ſo high, as that of the Author of the HISTORY of PHILOSOPHY. Theſe, Madam, are ſo great, and conſequently, preſs ſo much upon my memory and reſentments, that, ſince the greateſt acknowledgments I can make of them, are, in my apprehenſion, much below the advantages I have made thereby, it is no miraculous effect of Gratitude, if I graſp at any occaſion to do it.

For, what I now preſent you with, MADAM, I need ſay no more, by way of recommendation of it, than that it is a third Volume of that excellent ROMANCE, whereof you were pleaſed with ſo much kindneſs to receive the two former; with the ſame fate too, that is, that it hath gone through more hands than one. The advantages you are to make of it, I am not to preſs, ſince it is, among your other perfections, not the moſt inconſiderable, that you can diſcern the excellencies, and diſcover the defaults of things of greater conſequence, than thoſe of this nature. But when I reflect on your Sex, I cannot but do my Author this right, that as no man hath put greater obligations on It, than he, by the noble and generous characters he hath honour'd it withal; ſo is it but juſt, you have that eſteem and affection for him, which you have not for any other.

Thus, MADAM, having given you an account of this addreſs to your ſelf, and preſumed your pardon for it, I have a far greater confidence to obtain it for another I make to Heaven; which is, that you may meet with that indulgency of fortune and happineſs, which ſo much good nature, ſo noble an education, ſuch vertuous inclinations, and excellent endowments, as yours are, may juſtly expect. And this, MADAM, ſhall be the perpetual wiſh of,

Your moſt humble and moſt obliged Servant,

J. DAVIES.

BOOK II.

AS no part of the life of Brutus was reserv'd from Aronces, he went the next day to his Chamber, imagining he might receive some delight by discoursing with an unhappy lover, whose misfortunes parallel'd his; and these two illustrious Lovers did at first so Sympathize. and love so united both their hearts, that though they were both miserable, and that their discourse contained nothing but melancholy subjects; yet a delightful pleasingness did at this time dispel those dull fumes which clouded their Intellectual Faculties: But whilst they did as it were thus sport away the tedious hours, and that Herminius endeavoured by the assistance of his friends, both to prosecute his passion, prejudice Tarquin, and serve Aronces, the discreet Amilcar acted for Aronces against Tarquin, for Clelia and Plotina, and all the other Captives, and endeavoured likewise to engage the fierce Tullia to deliver all those Prisoners, principally those to whom he was obliged both by friendship and inclination: He writ to Tarquin, to the Prince Sextus, to Artemidorus, and Zenocrates: Yet had he time to compose several things, which are usually made but in a pleasing idleness; for Herminius and he made each of them a short song, according to the African custom: They had a certain gallant Air which contained both ingenuity and love, pleasure and rapellery; they sing both simple and natural expressions, and it seems that they intended but to trifle time in making these songs, and that 'twas not impossible others fancies should concur with theirs. In the mean time, as they had sent to the Camp for Celeres and Zenocrates, they came to Rome, but could not inform them of any considerable thing in reference to their affairs; for during the Truce, all the young men went continually from the Camp to Rome, and from Rome to the Camp; Artemidorus not being willing to permit Zenocrates and Celeres to be more happier than he, went with them to see Aronces, whom he highly esteem'd; and these three being arrived at Rome, and having the same liberty as Herminius, to visit Aronces; they passed some days in a society pleasing to unhappy persons; for as these new Comers were of this secret, they were commonly together; and after Dinner, Racilia, Hermilia, Valeria, and Sivelia accompanying them, there was doubtless a society composed both of accomplished and agreeable persons: For though Aronces, Amilcar, Herminius, and Celeres were men of known integrity; 'tis certain that Artemidorus and Zenocrates had extraordinary merit: Artemidorus was well made, he had a judging spirit, and a grandure in his Soul; but he so equally possessed all good qualities, that though he was a complete man, he was just one of those which make a particular Character, and which resemble not any person, though many would willingly resemble him. For Zenocrates, he was tall, of a fair proportion, and good deportment, white teeth, a lively tincture, brown hairs, a most agreeable smiling, and a pleasant countenance which gave delight to all; but he had a certain languishing indifferency to which his temper carried him; it gave him sometimes a stupidity of Spirit, which made him appear as if he were in an idle dotage, and obliged him to keep in certain occasions a kind of melancholy silence, that he could not suffer without some slight reluctation, when he knew he might if he would speak more agreeably than the most part of those to whom he gave such a peaceable audience: But for all this admirable dulness, the gallantness of his Spirit and ingenuity appear'd when he writ either in Verse or Prose; and I can assure you, that if he had an heart more susceptible of loves impression, it had been very fit to make illustrious Conquests: for Zenocrates was (as I have already told you) fair, and of a good deportment, he had much Spirit, he was both discreet and wise, he had a charming affability; all his inclinations were noble, he was modest, respectful, and faithful to his friends; but a languishing melancholy so possessed his Spirits, that though he was an accomplished Gallant, he could not affect any one person, though adorned with all the excelling features, had he been assured of a correspondency in love; so much did he fear dangerous enterprises. He had beginnings in love, which should have had continuance; but the Fire which flamed in the morning, extinguished in the evening. I know not how he could make an opiniative lover, for the faculty would have hindred the augmentation of his passions, the great difficulty would have rebated his Spirit, and the only thought of a long constancy, would have much perplexed him; he had no desire to engage himself to love a person which was not above him, neither would he resolve with himself to love one of that quality, if fortune had forc'd him to do it; so little he affected to enterprise difficult things: Had he likewise passed the commencements of his life without having any of those Demy-Mistresses, that are loved without inquietude, that are willingly left on the first occasion that presents: 'tis not but confessed, that he had been in love, and he might be again: But those which are intelligent in tenderness, believe not that he was capable of any great attachment; and though he was accused of some temerity and inconstancy in love, he was known to be very sincere and agreeable in friendship, and he was so amiable, and merited such estimation, that he would not be known without esteem in love. Artemidorus and he being then joyn'd with their illustrious friends, this Society had been full of delectation, if those which composed it had been more happy; there was during this time a small cessation in the distemper of Aronces, which deferr'd the Voyage Celeres and Zenocrates had resolv'd on; Amilcar having acquainted this unhappy Prince, that he had confer'd with Tullia, that he was the Confident of her Jealousie, and that he did not despair but he should oblige her to deliver Clelia; and farther told him, that this cruel person had promised him to suborn him which kept her, and that on his part he was engaged to carry this fair Virgin into Africa, and not let her return from thence: He knew moreover that those of Ardea, which negotiated with Tarquin, demanded above all things, the rendition of the Captives; and it might be if Tarquin should refuse to do it, he would exasperate the people and the Soldiers, which might justly murmur, to see that he had rather continue the war, than to accord a thing of so little consequence: and that by this means it would be possible to excite some commotion in Rome, and the Camp where they should have need of two men as valiant as Zenocrates and Celeres: Thus their departure being defer'd, and hope having taken possession of the heart of Aronces, the conversation became a little more delightful: But there happened an accident which gave some disturbance to this favourable disposition; for as things were reduced to this estate, unknown persons enterprised one night to take away Clelia; they fastening scaling Ladders to the Windows of her Chamber, some of the Guards their confederates having given them admission at one of the Garden Gates: 'Tis true they were constrained to retire, because he to whom Tarquin had confided the keeping of Clelia, hearing some noise awaked, and went with a party of his Companions to the same Garden, where they found a man of a good presence at the head of 10 or 12 others, whilst two resolute Soldiers ascended those two Ladders they had put against the Windows of Clelias Chamber, who was then in a strange perplexity; for she did not know whether those that endeavoured to open her Windows, were friends or enemies; she saw no likelyhood that this enterprise was made by Aronces, since Amilcar who had the liberty to see her, had not advertised her of it; so that she imagined there was more probability to think it was the cruel Tullia, who would have her in her power: But this imagination soon vanished, for how valiant soever he was which had undertaken this enterprise, he must yield to number; for those whom he had left to secure the Garden gate by which he entred, being disanimated, and the Gate shut upon him; there was no other resolution for him to take, than to render himself or die like a desperate person: And as the State of his Soul permitted him not the hope to live happy, he chose the last, and acted such prodigious things, that Clelia and Plotina who were now dresst, and who beheld that which passed in the Garden (by Cinthias beams which illuminated it) had compassion to see a valiant man reduced to such a condition, whose visage they could not discern: Clelia fearing he (that so valiantly defended himself) might be Aronces, and desiring rather to expose her self to save the life of a valiant Enemy, than let a faithful lover perish, she cryed to him who kept her, that he should not kill one deserted by his men, for there remain'd now none but himself to oppose so many adversaries: The voice of Clelia perswading him to whom she spoke that it may be she knew who that unknown was, who so resolutely defended himself, and believing he should render a great service to Tarquin to take him Prisoner, he commanded him to endeavour it, but not kill him; and this brave stranger who had heard what Clelia said, turning his head to see her, three of those which environ'd him spying this advantage, cast themselves upon him, seiz'd his Sword and took it from him, though he made terrible efforts to hinder them: 'Tis not denyed but he was dangerously wounded in divers places, but being resolved to sacrifice his life (since his enterprise was destroyed) he acted the part of a desperate man; but he was now compelled to yield to number, and submit himself to the conduct of them who had disarm'd him; his strength being so decayed by his loss of blood, that his feeble limbs could scarce support him. In the mean time as this news was divulg'd, all the Palace were alarm'd; the cruel Tullia being advertised of it, and Jealousie having wholly possessed her Spirit, she was more irritated against him which hindred Clelia from being taken away, than against him which endeavoured to do it, she would have known his name but no person could tell it her, neither would he acquaint her with it: Tullia then demanded if any of his men had survived the Combat, but they answered her that two of those he had employed in this occasion, and who were hurt as well as he, knew not themselves, or at least wise feign'd not to know it: This giving no satisfaction to Tullias curiosity, she sent for Amilcar, to endeavour to discover if this unknown had attempted this enterprise for Aronces, and he which had the keeping of Clelia sent to advise Tarquin what was passed: there was such a great noise dispersed of it throughout Rome, that Aronces had quickly notice of it, but very confusedly; for some said Tullia had plotted it, desiring to have the prisoners at her dispose; others that Tarquin had contriv'd it, to have them in his power without angring Tullia; and that his design had proved ineffectual, through the inconsideration of those to whose confidence it was committed: Some said 'twas Aronces, others said 'twas Horatius, and so many various relations were formed according to

to the capricious humour of those which reported them, that 'twas impossible to ground therein any real conjecture: Aronces hearing these several reports by Brutus, Artemidorus, Zenocrates and Celeres, was much perplexed to know how he should comprehend the reailty of this adventure. Herminius assured him, there was no appearance that Horatius had left Ardea, and it could not be Tullia, because she at this time imployed Amilcar on the same design: there was no reason to imagine it was Tarquin, for he knew better how to carry on his enterprises. Aronces could not then tell what to think, for the more he considered still what his imagination proposed to him, he conceived far from the truth: but at last he believed, that as the Prince Sextus had a violent inclination for Clelia, before he was captivated with Lucretias beauty, and that he was injust and violent in his passions, he had attempted to steal away this fair person, both from him and Tarquin; finding more true semblance in this opinion, then all those he had premised, he fixed his thoughts here, and was so overcome with grief, that he designed to revenge Clelia for that violence which was offered her, and to seek all means to assault Sextus; he having need of no assistance both to vanquish and punish him: but after he had contrived this revenge, he saw Amilcar enter, and not doubting but he was of the same opinion, he went to him and said; tell me my dear Amilcar; do you yet believe that Sextus is more amorous of Lucretia, then Clelia, since the last nights adventures? I assure you replyed Amilcar, Sextus had no hand in it, for I come from being Tullias Agent so discovering who hath made this attempt; and from speaking to him who hath so couragiously exposed his life in this dangerous occasion. What replyed Aronces, have you seen him which hath so valiantly defended himself? Yes replyed Amilcar, I have seen him, and seeing him, I see that fortune hath given you none but illustrious Rivals. Is the report then true that 'tis Horatius? replyed Aronces: No replyed Amilcar, but not to hold you in suspence, it is the Prince of Numidia who hath performed this grand action. What? cryed Aronces, is it Masharbal, which would once more take away Clelia? he had no such thought (replyed Amilcar) for he protests he pretended no other thing then to free her from the cruelty of Tarquin, and to remit her into the hands of Clelius and Sulpicia, whom he assures me are nigh Rome. By your favour Amilcar, said Aronces to him, tell me all you know of this adventure and how you knew it. Since you will be informed in all particulars replyed Amilcar I must tell you that Tullia sent for me, that I obeyed her orders, and I found such a fury seated on her countenance that it almost struck me into a Palsie; at first she accused me to be one of the confederates in the last nights enterprise; but I gave her such solid and satisfactory reasons to excuse my self, that as she is endowed with all the advantages of a grand Spirit, she imagined I was too real to equivocate with her; and not knowing what to think, she sent me to him who appeared to be the chief conductor of this enterprise; but I confess I was astonished when I knew the Prince of Numidia had acted it, as he was almost buried in grief, and very much hurt; he did not so much as cast his eyes upon me when I approached him: No sooner did he hear my voice, but he turned his head, and extending his hand towards me; though said he to me you be alwayes my Rivals friend, yet I am glad to see you, to tell you, before I expire, that I dye with a strange regret not to have had so much affection to him, as to yeild him Clelia without repugnance, or hate him so much as to dispute her with him; and assure him (if you ever see him) that I pretend no other advantage in delivering Clelia, then to give her liberty, and render her to Clelius and Sulpicia, who are not far distant from Rome, and are at this time——As he desired to pronounce the name of the place where they resided, his strength failed; and though we applyed all remedies to recover him, there was a full Hour elapsed before the expiration of this fit; but though his fainting spirits were recovered, he was yet deprived of reason; for since that he knew not what he had told me, and I could not demand of him where were Clelius and Sulpicia, and seeing he had lost the use of reason, I conceived it would be dangerous to acquaint me with it before so many persons, and though the Prince of Numidia be your Rival, I should incur much blame, if I should let him be treated with severity, and not disclose his quality both to Tullia and Tarquin, to whom they have sent an expres to inform him of the precedent accidents, and discovering it was the Prince of Numidia which would have delivered Clelia: I shall hinder you from being thought conscious of it, and clear my self from all suspition. I would do the same (replied Aronces) were I in your condition, bnt I am much afflicted: for I fear, and not without cause, that this accident will confine Clelia to a closer imprisonment, and that your design will not take effect.

As 'tis by Tullia's means I hope to procure her liberty (answered Amilcar) this accident will not destroy our intentions; but will, as I conceive, much conduce to the furtherance of them; for Clelia's Keeper having retained her with so much circumspection, hath acquired such credit of Tarquin by frustrating this design, that if Tullia suborns him, as she hath promised, it will facilitate her escape; but in the mean time we must arm our selves with patience; as there appeared some probability of truth in this conjectural opinion of Amilcar, and that lovers usually catch at any shadowy glimpse of hope, though grounded on incertainties; yet a dull melancholy eclipsed the countenance of Aronces, Amilcar demanding from whence it proceeded? He confessed he would admit of no consolation, whilst any of his Rivals pretended affection to Clelia, the Gods know, said he, that I am not capable of envy, and that I do not emulate the glory of any one; but when it reflects on my Passion, I cannot confine my grief, especially when I see a Rival endowed with excellent qualities, expose his life for the safety of a person I love, whom she beheld with her own eyes to contend for her liberty; and 'tis impossible being as generous as she is, she should requite with ingratitude the curtesie of Masharbal. Oh Sir (replied Amilcar) it is not so, for I have seen Clelia, I have told her his name whom she saw so courageously defend himself, but far from retaliating any affection to him; she believes that taking her from the power of Tarquin, he had the same thoughts as heretofore, when he would have taken her from Horatius, when he fought with him on the Thrasimenian Lake; and this delicateſſe of love which you teſtifie, gives you grief built on no rational foundation. What (replied Aronces) do you believe I have juſt complaint to deplore the condition to which fortune had reduced me? what? do you believe I can ſupport a voluntary impriſonment, without ſome regret not to have power to deliver Clelia? Ah Amilcar purſued Aronces, 'tis certainly little leſs difficult for Brutus to draw a Veil of ſtupidity over his reaſon, then for me to make uſe of mine in ſo ſtrange a manner; for in fine, if I ſhould continually labour for to deliver Clelia? if I ſhould every moment expoſe my life to effect it, I ſhould not ſuffer leſs then I do, in nothing but reaſoning with my friends upon incertain hopes; but I am very glad to hear that this enterpriſe proceeded neither from Tullia's hate, nor from Tarquin or Sextus love. For Sextus, replied Amilcar, caſt away fear, for Artemidorus hath told me, he is ſo amorous of Lucretia, that he cannot command his Paſſion; nor can he teach his tongue to bury her in ſilence.

As this Rival cannot prejudice Brutus (replied Aronces) I receive extream ſatisfaction at it; for if he where not his, I am really perſwaded he would be mine; which would be dangerous for Clelia in this eſtate. Whilſt Aronces thus ſpoke, Brutus arrived, and a little after Artemidorus, Zenocrates, and Celeres, to whom they confided the whole ſecret of the intended enterpriſe, reſerving only Brutus his affection for Lucretia; and they being ignorant of it, believed there could be nothing more ſatisfactory to Aronces, then to perſwade him Sextus had deſerted Clelia, and that he was caught in the ſnares of Lucretia's beauty; but if this diſcourſe pleaſed Aronces, it afflicted Brutus, whoſe heart was at this inſtant ſupplied with a new hatred againſt Tarquin, ſeeing now (as if it were before his eyes) the expiration of his father and brother, and the total deſtruction of all his family; all the crimes of the Tyrant and Tullia had wholly preſſed his thoughts, and Sextus his love for Lucretia, did ſo diſcompoſe the ſerenity of his temper, that he would not ſuffer them to make any mention of it; for ſaid he to Celeres (who ſpoke of this Princes Paſſion that Species of tranſportment) which ſeizes Sextus when his eyes ſaluted a beautiful perſon, cannot be termed love; for if a clear inſpection could be made into his heart, there would be found nothing but impetuous deſires, which reſpect neither a becoming grace, nor vertue, there would I ſay be found an Antipathy between his Paſſion and Spirit; I am even perſwaded he doth not much care to be beloved, and that he would be as content if a woman ſhould offer her ſelf to him, through the conſideration of intereſt and ambition, without reſigning her heart, as if ſhe was forced by a violent affection to favour his love; but 'tis otherwiſe in thoſe which are rightly capable of love, they being not perfectly happy, unleſs there is a reciprocal affection, and there are none but thoſe which are infected with brutiſh appetites who regard not what motive obliges any woman to uſe them with civility. 'Tis true (ſaid Aronces) an intereſſed is a ſuperficial favour, and I ſhould have no great obligation to a woman which would rather ſubmit her ſelf to my fortune not affection. But it happens ſo often (replied Amilcar) that thoſe whom fortune favours, merit not to be favoured by themſelves, and they would much wrong their judgements to complain that a woman permits their viſit, rather through intereſt then love. I am of your opinion (replied Artimidorus) that an intereſſed Lady merits not to have a lover which conſiders her through any other cauſe then his own ſatisfaction; and Brutus hath reaſon to ſay that this ſpecies of reſentment cannot rightly admit the term of love, ſince 'tis not correſpondent; for if we conſider well what paſſes in the hearts of two perſons formed after this nature, we ſhall find avarice in the Ladies, and brutality in the lovers. That which you ſay (replies Brutus) ſquares with reaſon; but I muſt add, that a Lover compoſed of his humour, can neither be faithful nor happy, for in his heart the end of an irregular deſire is the beginning of another; and ſince he diſregards the love of his beloved, he reſpects nothing but pleaſure in the fruition, and is capable of an amorous impreſſion at the ſight of any thing which delights his fancy: theſe brutiſh Lovers cannot confine themſelves in their voluptuary paſſions; ſometimes affecting brown, and ſometimes fair perſons; and in fine, their affections are in a manner ſo brutal, that the love of the moſt ſavage and cruel Animals is no leſs then theirs; therefore I ſhould extreamly commiſerate the fair and vertuous Lucretia, for having ſurprized the heart of Sextus, did not her ſolitary retirement ſhelter her from the perſecutions of ſuch a Lover: and as Herminius noted the agitation of the ſpirit of Brutus, he diverted the ſubject of their diſcourſe to the adventure of the Numidian Prince, which was conſiderable enough to deſerve their attentions; for it ſeemed very extraordinary that an African Prince ſhould have ſo much intelligence in Rome as to enterpriſe to take Clelia from the Palace of ſuch a Prince as Tarquin. And paſſing from one thing to another, they had a deſire to pre-divine the actions of this violent Prince, when he ſhould have notice of this accident; ſome ſaid he would be tranſported to the ultimate extremity againſt the Numidian Prince; others that for his own intereſt he would conſider the quality of Meharbal; ſome ſaid he would poiſon him; but Aronces who was wholly compoſed of generoſity, and whoſe heart was ſenſible of compaſſion ſince the laſt conference with this illuſtrious Rival; and ſince he left a Letter at his departure from the Willow Iſland, intreated Amilcar to reverſe, by his ſedulous indeavours any cruel ſentence ſhould be decreed againſt him; and Amilcar ſo flattered Tullia's humour, and wrote ſuch a judicious Letter to Tarquin, that the ſtorm of anger ſoon vaniſhed, which threatned the deſtruction of the Numidian Prince; and what they deſcanted upon, proved but airy imaginations; 'tis true his wounds were dangerous, and his death almoſt inevitable, his Fever augmented, his reaſon was not yet remitted to its proper ſeat, and thoſe which dreſt him much feared his Recovery, ſo that we many very well ſay his deplorable condition condition was some means to secure his life. It was most remarkable in this incounter, that Tarquin learning the Quality of the Numidian Prince, conceived his love for Clelia incited him to steal her away, he not being ignorant that Clelius a long time resided at Carthage; imagining then Clelia more amiable since she had attracted such illustrious persons, he felt a reduplication of love in his heart, and the cognisance he had to find a new Rival, renewed his affection, if I may use that term, he had even some joy to think that whatsoever Aronces was, he would have some despight against the Numidian Prince for endeavouring to deliver Clelia; and his thoughts were constant with those of a violent Prince, though love had never been the prevailing passion; he gave order to redouble the Guards of Clelia, and confirmed an ampler Commission to him who commanded them, which was very satisfactory to Aronces, because that Amilcar, assuring him that Tullia was perswaded she should gain him, he might hope suddenly to effect Clelia's liberty; he knew likewise that those of Ardea obstinately persisted in requesting Tarquin to deliver the Captives before the commencement of the Treaty, and that people began to murmur at Rome, as well as the Soldiers in the Camp, because Tarquin denied their proposition.

These things put such a favourable disposition in the spirit of Aronces, and all his friends, that they found themselves capable to enjoy all the sweetness hope gives them, who passionately desire any thing; for there is a hope of revenge, as well as a hope to possess a Mistress; those which had no effective interest in this place, were at last interested in their friends behalf; as for Artemidorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates, and Celeres, 'twas friendship which confin'd them to this place, but for Brutus and Herminius, they had both many interests to induce them to reside here, their friends, their love, and their Country; and things being now reduced to a better state than they had seen them long before, they were partakers of the same hope; 'tis not that Brutus expected any thing on Lucretia's part, which might advantage him, but at least he imagined, if he destroyed Tarquin, he should likewise destroy Sextus; so that a jealous resentment exciting in him a desire of revenge, it seemed to him he could no less act against Tarquin in quality of a Lover, then of a true Roman. Hope thus finding entertainment in the hearts of so many discreet persons, their conversations was very agreeable, when they consorted at night to render an account what they had learned concerning their common interests; it often hapned that Racilia, Hermilia, and Valeria were there; for Valerius permitted his daughter to remain sometimes two or three dayes with Hermilia, who was become her chiefest friend, since the solitude of Lucretia; for Clelia, she had likewise her part in the repose of others; Amilcar acquainting her with the hope he had, giving her news of Aronces; and assuring her according to the information of the Numidian Prince, that Clelius and Sulpicia were not far from Rome, and Plotina fitted her humour with such Scenes of mirth, that they at this time chas'd away those melancholy thoughts condens'd by the contemplation of her miss-fortunes; there were likewise other happy Lovers, for the Prince of Pometia knew he might claim affection in Hermilia's heart, who thinking all those which assembled at her Aunts house, contriv'd nothing but how to compass Clelia's liberty, remained satisfied to have acquired the affection of one of the most virtuous Princes. Titus on his part had received such demonstrations of love from Collatina, that he was glad the time gave him occasion to repay a visit to his Mistress, the most unhappy were Artemidorus and Zenocrates, who had both assuredly interests without Rome. 'Tis true, the last not being of a humour to send his heart and spirit where he was not, had more tranquillity than the other. Amilcar one evening noting that Brutus had brought them into Hermilia's Chamber, she keeping it by reason of some indisposition, and with whom Valeria was then, demanded of him, if the serenity of his spirit proceeded from his fortune or temperament, and of Artemidorus, if his anxiety was an effect of his misfortune, or the melancholy of his humour, as to Zenocrates (replied Artemidorus) I can only answer you for him, that he makes his own tranquillity; and I can answer you for Artemidorus (replied Zenocrates) that the sensibility of his heart acts as much against him as his evil fortune; if those who give us audience, were informed in our lives (replied Artemidorus) they could perhaps confess that my sensibility is more excusable than sometimes your indifferency; for you know absence (which is a great disease in love) is not a very sensible malady in you, but on the contrary, cures you of many others. In truth, replied Zenocrates smiling, which added a grace to his expression. You tax me with an unjust reproach; I confess sometimes I do not remember those persons I see not, but I protest unto you, as soon as my memorative faculty represents them to me, they command the same affectionate priviledge as before. You discourse of this so pleasantly (replied Hermilia) that you seem to have no desire to remember those you have loved, when they are absent from you, because you can affect none but those who are present before your eyes. Yet (replied Artemidorus) he is not assured to love all those he sees, for he is subject to certain petit absences of heart, which sometimes must distract his friends; and 'tis certain I have seen him more than once waver in his affection; 'tis not but he knows how to make declaration in love; for I remember he writ four in the compass of a day, which contained much gallantry; 'tis true, 'twas only to divertise a company of amiable Ladies. But (said Zenocrates, dying his cheeks with a blush) I may very well say I have had a thousand loves in my life; but among all those, I can scarce insert three or four in the Catalogue of true loves; and I am assured, if you compare mine with yours, you may conceive me to give you the denomination. 'Tis not (added he) that I believe those men, who boast of a violent passion, love not a little more than others, which are more sincere; and for my part I believe I love as much as I can love, and that if it were as permanent and durable as some, I should be the most amorous of men; but I confess it sometimes sooner passes away than that of Artemidorus, who believes he should recede from his honour, if he should be suspected to change first, there are some hours, when it hath continuance, it disturbs my repose; and when I make my voluntary imprecations to explicate my self out of this amorous labyrinth; for I may very well say love is a great affair. Ah Zenocrates, cried Amilcar, if love is a great, it is an agreeable affair. You ought then to be perswaded in what you say (replied Herminius) since if you love none of this nature, you deny your own expressions. I pray, said then Zenocrates to Amilcar, learn me how I must order my self, when I would dissemble love, for I have more than twenty times essayed to do it, without arriving at my intended end. For my part (replied Amilcar) I find no great difficulty in it; for when I see a jovial Lady, who hath any facility in her humour, or gaiety in her spirit, and that I find my fancy disposed to make a volatile love, I can desert when I please, and which gives me delight as long as it lasteth; I accustom my self to speak to this person more than any other, I look upon her, I praise her, I continually cast forth artificial sighs resembling true ones, I sometimes sing some slight Airs I formerly composed, which she applies to her self, and sometimes I express my self in amorous Verses, languishing regards; and in fine, I tell her I love her, or at least make such pretentions, afterwards for that small pleasure she hath taken in my affability, she retaliates hers, hope then possesses my heart, and after that I feel I know not what, that I call love; for in fine, that you be not deceived, it is not of these slight imaginary loves, as others, where love precedes hope, since in this, hope must precede love, and he must first be assured of the progress of his affection, before he commence his; the Lady you chuse must not therefore be so full of complacency, that her behaviour hath too much facility, neither must you chuse women whose hearts you can conquer but by forms; but you must find one neither too austere nor too facile, who hath no particular Gallant, and who affects Gallantry, neither must she have a furious spirit; 'tis good she should be a little tractable in love; and in fine it suffices she should be fair, young, a little merry, and without capriciousness; for if she hath more imagination than judgement, she shall be so much more fit to make one of those Demy Mistresses, that I may leave without despair, when my fancy prompts me to do it, and with whom I may pass most pleasant hours. You exaggerate that so handsomely (said Valeria) that I believe Zenocrates will essay it on the first occasion. In truth (replied he smiling) I think I should now experiment it, were there any Lady here which might admit the Character of Amilcar; but for my misfortune, I know none of this humour at Rome, do you know at Leontine, at Panorme, at Syracusa, and at Agrigentine, said Artemidorus to him. I confess it (replied he) but it may be before I return, my fancy will, as usually, soon vanish. But, said Herminius to him, it seems requisite to me, that we should be better informed of your Adventures, I know Artemidorus hath recounted them to Aronces, after he had acquainted him with his own; but it would not be just to trouble him to relate them; and 'tis much better your self should satisfie our curiosity. For my particular (said Zenocrates) should I undertake to recount my History, I should no sooner mention my self, but Artemidorus would interrupt me; and affirm, I am not well acquainted with my self; and I believe my Adventures ought not to be known of so many persons, and there are some considerable accidents in my fortune, which are not convenient to publish, till it pleases my destiny to change the state of things; but for Artemidorus, it much imports his repose, that all friends should know his fortune, to banish the most unjust grief, ever seis'd a lovers heart; for till this time none can perswade him he hath injury, and as 'tis convenient for his repose, I offer my self to be his Historian; for though I should not be accused of too much ardency or levity in love, I condemn it not. I would therefore have the permission to recount the affection of Artemidorus; for if these persons here present do not perswade him, that the excess of his secret grief is unjust, he will never be cured; all then testified a great impatience to obtain the consent of Artemidorus, for Brutus was not ill pleased to know, if he might find a lover as unhappy as himself: Herminius, by a tender resentment, wished the power to consolate Artemidorus; Amilcar, by an universal curiosity, desired to know the life of this Prince, and both Valeria and Hermilia, according to the nature of their Sex, had an earnest desire to hear the narration of Zenocrates, induced thereto by a natural resentment, incident to Ladies of their quality and perfections; for Aronces, as he knew all that which had happened to Artemidorus, he augmented the curiosity of the Company; and in fine, he was so prest by their forcible perswasions, that he consented Zenocrates should relate his adventures; but not desiring to be at the recounting of them; and Aronces having already heard them, he requested him to withdraw into his own Chamber; and after their departure, Zenocrates having consider'd on what he had to say, began to speak in these terms, addressing his speech to Hermilia only, he being then in her Chamber.

The History of Artemidorus.

THough Sicily is not so far distant from Rome, that I conceive you are ignorant of the Customs thereof, yet I pre-suppose there's many things which never arriv'd your knowledge; for, Madam, to speak ingeniously, the Romans so despise all other people, that they believe they should injure themselves even to know their manners. And our Ladies not being so reserved as here, 'tis requisite you should be pre-acquainted with the general usage of divers places, I shall have occasion to insert in my narration; for fear you condemn not in particular those who have interest in things, I intend to relate unto you. I shall then tell you, Madam, that Sicily having at this time the Commerce of Affrica and Italy, as well as of Greece and Asia; I may say this famous Isle is the common Country of different Nations, and there there is a confluency of divers people in all places where Commerce is moſt conſign'd, and except at Panormes there's ſcarce in any part the true manners of the Country; and 'tis rare that in all the Maritime Towns except that I intend to mention, they have a certain ſpirit which retains ſomething of their oppoſite neighbours; ſo that the Coaſt of Meſſina which was called heretofore Zanqle, when the Gyants, as is reported, inhabited it, hath a reſemblance with thoſe of Rhegium, the Coaſt which looks on the Ionian Sea, with the Aſcaique and Heraclea and Agrigentine with the Africans cuſtoms; but for Leontine which is the native Country of Artemidorus, the Cuſtoms there have ſome Conformity with all theſe different Nations, agreeing likewiſe with thoſe of the Country; but to ſpeak in general, there is in all places ſo much liberty and gallantry, that without doubt there is ſcarce any Country in the World, where one may have ſuch a delectable reſidence: For beſides that the Country is pleaſant, fertile, and very diverſified, the peo, le are full of ſpirit, and have generally ſo much; as for that reaſon they are ſuſpected to be artificious and a little inconſtant. But as I ſhall ſpeak but of Leontine and Agrigentine, I ſhall tell you nothing of the other Cities of this famous Iſle, neither ſhall I much trouble my ſelf to ſpeak of the firſt, becauſe I cannot do it without mentioning many things, which have reference to the Princeſs of the Leontines, Siſter of Artemidorus, whoſe Adventures I ought not now to recount to you: be contented then to know, that as the Country of the Leontines is nigh the fertileſt in the Iſle, all pleaſures are there in their great Luſtre, except in Syracuſa and Agrigentine, where I may ſay with the permiſſion of Amilcar, all the African Gallantry hath paſſed: But to come to the principal Hiſtory I have to relate to you, without telling you all thoſe ſlight things which reſemble themſelves in all the Commencements of love in the World: You muſt know that this illuſtrious unhappy perſon, is his Brother who is now Prince of the Leontines, and of the admirable Princes who hath now found an Aſylum in the King of Cluſium's Court, and being at his birth endowed with all noble Inclinations, he was in eſtate to merit the eſteem of all thoſe who knew him: For his perſon I ſhall ſay nothing of it, for you ſee 'tis framed according to the exact rules of proportion; but for his Spirit, though you know it hath all advantages imaginable, yet I aſſure you, you do not ſufficiently know it; for his grief hath ſo clouded his humour, and left ſuch an indifferency and melancholy, that he hath no more the ſame agreement he uſually had in his converſation, and that he yet would have, ſhould joy reſume its uſual place in his heart: As for his temperament 'tis without doubt tender and paſſionate, he loves glory and is extremely grateful, maintaining the greateſt of all Vices, is ingratitude; he is both liberal and juſt, and few have equalled him in merit: 'Tis true that for thoſe he doth not eſteem, he hath not a too regular civility, he is very free to thoſe which pleaſe him, elſe reſerv'd to all. Artemidorus then meriting that Character in which I have repreſented him to you, and being in a ſplendid Court, ſubmitted to the Love of an amiable Virgin, as ſoon as he returned from a Voyage he had made into Greece: 'Tis true ſhe was none of the greateſt beauties, but ſhe hath ſuch an agreement, that ſhe gave envy to the faireſt, and love to the moſt inſenſible; for though her Perſon is well made, and infinitely pleaſing, ſhe hath a ſweet and tempting ſpirit, which repels nothing, but attracts all; ſhe hath it neither too free nor too ſerious, and there is ſuch a charming facility in her entertainment that 'tis not ſtrange if Artemidorus was ſurpriz'd with its attractive Charms, and I may very well aſſure you, that I think this Virgin which is called Clidimira, had nigh as much affection for him, as he for her, at leaſt ſhe gave him ſuch innocent teſtimonies of eſteem, which made him believe ſhe would permit him to bear her Chains: Artemidorus being thus immerged in love, Clidimira made ſome ſeeming difficulty to ingage her ſelf to love him, becauſe ſhe foreſaw the Prince of the Leontines would not ſuffer her to eſpouſe him, there being ſome difference between him and her Father; but flattering her ſelf with the hope that the love of Artemidorus might ſurmount this obſtacle, ſhe took care to foment his paſſion, and gave him ſuch innocent demonſtrations of affection, as a vertuous virgin might licenſe a man ſhe believ'd might one day eſpouſe her, for as ſhe wrote gallantly and tenderly, Artemidorus received many Letters from her, and during a long time, he was the happieſt Lover in the world: But in the end he was eclipſed, by the Prince his brother who ſeeing this love was divulg'd in the Court, caſt out ſome expreſſions, intimating his diſſenting from it; Artemidorus therefore uſed all poſſible means to perſwade his brother to alter his determinate will, though there was no likelihood to effect it; and the Prince of the Leontines ſeeing with what order Artemidorus ſpoke to him, forbid him not only to think of eſpouſing her, but to abſent himſelf from ſeeing her, declaring to him that if he would not obey him, he would confine this Virgin to a place where he ſhould not ſee her, and ſeeing Artemidorus perſevere in his affection, he defended Clidimira from ſuffering his brothers viſits, yet ſhe would receive him into one of her friends houſes; in fine, ſeeing all his Commands were ſlighted, he committed her to the cuſtody of her who commanded the vailed Virgins at Leontine, which are conſecrated to Ceres, and he more eaſily effected his intention, becauſe Clidimira having no mother, and being rich, he made her intereſt a pretext to incloſe her there. In the mean time, Artemidorus was overwhelm'd with grief, for Clidimira was in a ſacred place where no violence might be offered her; on the other ſide, this Virgin being thus immured in a ſolitude, and not having permiſſion to breath himſelf in the open ayr became buried in ſuch a languiſhing melancholy, that it much impaired her health. Artemidorus having notice of her indiſpoſition, and having ineffectually tried allways both by affability and violence, either ro divert his brothers indignation or to ſteal away Clidimira, and fearing her grief would bring her to the Margent of her Grave, cauſed information to be given to the Leontine Prince, that to eſſay to cure his paſſion, he was reſolved to perform a Voyage, on condition that as ſoon as he was departed he ſhould ſet Clidimira at liberty; or at the leaſt

commit her to a Lady of quality; who ſhould be reſponſible for her; afterwards divers Perſons engaging themſelves in the negotiation of this affair, this unhappy lover to deliver his Miſtris fled both from himſelf and Country; by a pure reſentment of love, for you muſt not think he had any deſign no more to affect Clidimira, he being at this time more amorous then ever, at his departure he writ a Letter, containing many tender and paſſionate expreſſions, which he left with a confident of her paſſion to deliver her, and withall to tell her that he would ſacrifice all for her intereſt, and that he would account himſelf happy in his exile, if ſhe would inviolably preſerve her affection; aſſuring her that if the ſtate of things did admit of any mutation, he would unknown to any return to Leontine to ſee her, and to carry her away with her conſent, if ſhe had any deſire to run his fortune, he recommended her to the Princeſſe his ſiſter, and to all his friends at Court, not forgetting to perform any thing a faithfull lover is oblig'd to do, after that he embarqu'd in a Veſſel which returned to Rhegium, carrying with him all Clidimira's Letters as his only conſolation during his exile; for I forgot to tell you that the Prince of the Leontines was not ingaged to free Clidimira, unleſſe Artemidorus departed the Iſle. Behold him then imbarqu'd not for any long Navigation, but as the Sicilian Sea is very dangerous, an impetuous wind roſe on a ſudden, forcing the Veſſel where Artemidorus was, between thoſe two Rocks ſo famous for Shipwracks, known by the name of Sylla and Charibdis; 'tis true the fortune of Artemidorus was ſo happy that the Pilot having had a deſign to ſteer his courſe to Meſſina where the Tempeſt had caſt him, his Veſſel which was ingag'd between thoſe two famous Rocks, after it had ſuffered much agitation, run upon a ſhelf of ſand not far from the ſhore, thoſe who were within ſeeing the Veſſel take water on all ſides, reſolv'd to make their Arms their Oars to ſave their lives; for Artemidorus he ſignalized his love in this encounter, for not believing at firſt he could ſave a Caſket in which were all the Letters of his Miſtreſs, and being not reſolv'd to leave them, he remained laſt in the Veſſel; but in fine, having tied his Caſket on two Oars laid a croſs, and faſtning them with a Cord to his left Arm, caſt them into the Sea, throwing himſelf after, ſwimming with ſo much force that he reach'd the ſhore, and preſerv'd thoſe precious teſtimonies of Clidimira's love, part of the goods caſt into the Sea were again recovered and part loſt, and the Shipwrck was very nigh Meſſina, Artemidorus went thither, but he was in a condition to be commiſerated, for his equipage was loſt, and his men periſh'd, and if he had not remembred that he knew a man at Meſſina, which heretofore belong'd to the King his father, he had been expoſ'd to extream neceſſity; for the Captain of the Veſſel was not of Leontine, and was withall reduc'd to ſuch miſery that he was not in eſtate to afford him any aſſiſtance. Artemidorus being gone to Meſſina had the fortune to find the party he ſought for, but as he would not have his quality known, he chang'd his habit, & took a common ſouldiers habit, had he deſired to appear like himſelf, that man who aſſiſted him was not in a capacity to fit him with an equipage proportionable to his condition. Artemidorus found ſome relaxation in his misfortunes, when he conſidered that by this diveſting himſelf of his gorgeous attire, he ſhould not be ſubject to all thoſe ceremonies which are inſeparable concomitants to perſons of his condition in their paſſage through forraign Countries, he was much troubled to chuſe a place where he ſhould reſide; for in the eſtate where he was he would not paſſe to Rhegium he having no acquaintance there: after ſome conſultation with himſelf, he had a deſign to go to Heraclea, from whence he hop'd eaſily to have notice what tranſactions paſſed at Leontine, he thought 'twould be advantagious for him to take this reſolution, becauſe there was war now between the Prince of Agrigentine, and the Prince of Heraclea, for the limits of thoſe two petty eſtates: For as you know Sicily is divided into ſo many different Dominions, that 'tis impoſſible they ſhould alwaies be at peace, and as the Leontine was enemy to the Agrigentine Prince, Artemidorus believed if he ſhould bear arms againſt him, the Prince his brother after he was inform'd of it would perhaps repent of the injury he had done him againſt the intereſt of his love, 'tis not but Artemidorus as he is juſt did not know that the Prince his brother was injuſt in hating the Agrigentine Prince, who was a man of extraordinary merit, deſiring therefore to go to the War, he had rather take the part of the Heraclean Prince then anothers, enemy to his brother; after he had ſpent one moneth at Meſſina, he departed from thence with a deſign to liſt himſelf in the Heraclean Troops; but going thither he met ſome avant coureurs of the Agrigentine Army, & he would not have been taken, he did what he could to eſcape them, and he having met eight or ten Cavaliers which were returning to the Heraclean Camp, he animated them to their defence; and they ſo couragiouſly defended themſelves, that there was ſcarce ever ſeen a Combate ſo terrible, and of ſuch a long continuance between ſuch an unequal number, the Agrigentines being four times as many as the Heracleans; for Artemidorus, he acted ſuch prodigious things (remaining alone in fighting Poſture) that they which environ'd him reſolv'd to ſave his life, though he refuſed to render himſelf on any conditions: at laſt, overpower'e by number, he was forced to receive his life, after his Sword was broken: There was amongſt theſe Agrigentines a man of quality, called Terillus, who judg'd this action too bold and advent'rous to be perform'd by a ſimple Cavalier, ſuch as his habit repreſented him, and he ſaw ſomthing in his ayr ſo great and noble, that he believed he ought not to treat him as a common priſoner, he cauſ'd him to be attended with much circumſpection, and after he had ſent back part of his men to the Camp, he went himſelf to preſent his priſoner to the Prince, who was gone for two or three days to the City of Agrigentine. Artemidorus was doubtleſs much afflicted to be a Princes priſoner, who was at ſo much enmity with his Brother, that 'twas almoſt impoſſible they ſhould come to any reconciliation; for he believ'd if he knew his quality, he would thereby much advantage himſelf; and the Prince of the Leontines when he was advertiſed of it, would would perhaps be transported with anger against Clidamira, because he would look upon her as the immediate cause of this inauspicious accident; he therefore hoped he should not be known, there being no great commerce between Leontine and Agrigentine; and having heard he was at a Castle he had built on the further side of the City, he thought he should not be expos'd to the view of many persons; that he should suffer but the disquietude of imprisonment, and that in some general exchange of Prisoners, he should recover his liberty; and to flatter himself with some consolation, he likewise imagined, that the Wars between those two petty States would soon be put to a period, and that there was nothing more requisite for him, then with constancy to support his imprisonment: Being settled in this resolution, he patiently submitted to their conduct. But Madam, before I declare to you in what manner Artemidorus was presented to the Agrigentine Prince, and how he was treated, 'tis necessary for me to give you a brief character of the Prince to whom he was presented, and of the Princess his Daughter, and another person of the same Sex, who hath much part in this History; to the end that in the continuation of my recital, you may have a more perspicuous understanding of what I intend to relate; for, for my part, I love to have an accurate description of those of whose adventures I receive a narration. Therefore I must tell you, that the Prince of Agrigentine is a man in all things illustrious, His house to which the principality appertaines, is not only most Noble, and of great Antiquity, but more eminent by the opposition it made against the Tyranny of the cruel Phalaris, who rewarded the inventers of any new punishment, and whose injustice is at this time in so much horror amongst the Agrigentines, that I dare not pronounce his name but with detestation; for to entertain their hatred against him, and render his name odious to posterity, they one day in a year publikely shew (with Imprecations) a brazen Bull made by one call'd Perillus, to the end those whom the Tyrant would put to death, should be therein enclos'd, and a fire being made round about it, the voices they pronounc'd resembling bellowings, would the less attenerate the peoples hearts; you may conceive his Tyrannie by this invention which was made to please him; but he found one act of Justice in his life, for he put him to death in this brazen Bull who was the Inventor of it, though he was accustomed to recompense those who invented such things; But if he was just to Perillus, the gods were just to him; since after innumerable cruelties, he expired (like Perillus) in this brazen Bull; and the hatred which the Agrigentines had conceiv'd against him was so great, that because his Guards were habited in blew, which he employed to exercise those cruelties, they forbade their dependants from wearing this amiable colour, and 'tis but about a year since that the Princess of Agrigentine at the earnest request of one of her friends whom she passionately loved, hath again introduc'd it: But to resume the thred of my discourse, the Prince I have mention'd being of an ancient Race, and enemy to this cruel Tyrant, he is in much veneration at Agrigentine, and if he should be recommendable but by his own vertue, he would be very much respected by his Subjects; for besides as he nigh governeth the City as if it were a Republique, he hath spirit, learning, capacity, and experience; He is an excellent Soldier, and a great Captain, he keeps his Troops in exact Discipline, he knows the art to make himself fear'd and lov'd by his Souldiers in particular, and his Subjects in general; he hath qualities befitting a man of his Birth, he is courteous, civil, and obliging, principally to the Ladies; he understands and speaks with facility many languages, he favours learning, he is magnificent and liberal, and hath an heart sensible of glory; he takes all innocent pleasures, he retains a certain gallant ayr, demonstrating to those which know him that his heart is susceptible of love. But if this Prince merits an high encomium, he hath a daughter worthy of him, and able to command admiration from all, Philonice is the Princess of Agrigentines name; she is the most surprizing Person in the world: for you must know, that as the Princess her mother was wrapt in the cold embraces of the grave ere she compleated a triennial age, her illustrious Father having at this time many warlike Preparations, which have since impal'd his brow with victorious Laurel, instead of leaving her at Agrigentine, caus'd her to be educated at a magnificent Castle belonging to him, scituated in the Campagne; and as she appear'd in the world, she was adorn'd with all imaginable politeness, and I assure you without flattery, that she is acquainted in many things which her only imagination hath dictated to her; and for her Person, 'tis infinitely pleasing, her head is crown'd with black resplendent hair, she is of a mean stature, yet so agreeable and noble, that it admits of no disadvantage, her action is free and natural without any affectation, the circumference of her visage shews the extreams of an imperfect Circle, and almost form'd it to a perfect oval, the new fallen snow was turn'd in comparison of the refin'd purity of her complexion, her mouth for shape shamed the imitation of the most exquisite Painters, and all the features of her face had so near a kindred of proportion and symmetrie, as the severest master of Apelles art might have call'd it his glory to have copyed Beauties from her as the best of models, her eyes darted forth such a radiant splendour, as neither the firmest eye, nor the strongest soul could arm themselves with resistance of proof against these pointed glories, but there results from all these perfections such a modest ayr on the visage of Philonice, that her only physiognomie clears what blemish can be imputed to the vertue of her soul, and delicateness of her spirit, 'tis not but when she meets with any that she neither esteems nor pleases her, she hath a certain coldness which (without being uncivil) seems more touching to those to whom it is address'd, she's affable, but the grandeur of her soul, and habitual probity, retains her from making those delusive caresses which by many Ladies of the Court are practised with so much Prodigality; but for a person she loves, there's no Princess in the world can testifie her tenderness in more obliging and real expressions; she is of such a liberal inclination, and all her resentments are so discreet and generous, as she believes her action should not

bely her words; for ſpirit, ſhe hath it to admiration, ſhe ſpeaks both naturally and gallantly, ſhe writes pleaſant Letters in a ſtile ſo natural, reſerving her quality, that I can mint no expreſſion to equal their praiſe, ſhe hath a ſolid vertue, glory is the cheifeſt of her delight, her heart is tender, ſpirit firm, her amity both conſtant, ſincere, and agreeable, ſhe's diſcreet in all her actions, ſhe's never capable of any tranſportment, ſhe is both young and wiſe, ſhe hath judgement without experience, and prudence without pride, and ſhe is ſo accompliſhed, that I can tax her of nothing but of too much vertue, ſince, 'tis certain ſhe is ſo modeſt, that ſhe doth not well know it, at leaſt ſhe ſpeaks as if ſhe eſteem'd her ſelf not ſo much as ſhe ought; 'tis true, ſhe accuſes her ſelf in ſuch an ingenious manner, that her own words betray her. There's likewiſe in this place another Virgin, whoſe Father is Governour of the Caſtle of Agrigentine, who is highly eſteem'd by Philenice, not without deſert, for beſides as ſhe is fair, and hath an engaging ſpirit, which both pleaſes and charms all thoſe who approach her, ſhe knows how to fit the humour of all Perſons, her Diſcourſe is admirable, ſhe never appears diſtemper'd at her company, ſhe hath a modeſt jovialty, that gives delight to many perſons. This Virgin called Berelisa hath moreover ſuch a paſſionate ſpirit, that ſhe makes her glory conſiſt in knowing how to love her friends; and as Philenice hath much inclination for her, ſhe is commonly with her: The day in which Artemidorus was brought to the Caſtle of Agrigentine, ſhe was with this Princeſs in a great Hall, where the Prince her Father was, with many other Ladies leaning on a Balcony which jetted on the Court, to ſee twelve ſtately horſes that had a little before been ſent to her Father, and ſhe deſiring to go next morning to the Chace, he would have both her and Berelisa chuſe thoſe they would have for that gallant ſport; as their eyes were wholly imployed in ſurveying theſe Horſes, Terillus who had taken Artemidorus entred into the Hall, followed by his priſoner, leaving his men at the entry of the gate; you know Artemidorus is of a gallant deportment, which will eaſily make you believe that he attracted the regards of the Agrigentine, Prince of the Princeſs Philenice, and the amiable Berilisa, and all the reſt of the company, for though his habit was but ſimple, yet had he the ayr of a perſon of Quality, though in the deſign he had to diſguiſe himſelf, he affected unuſual ſimplicity: 'Tis true ſeeing all perfections concenter in theſe Ladies, he would not hinder himſelf from ſaluting them with ſuch a grace, that diſpoſed them to conceive a good opinion of him; In the mean time Terillus who preſented him to the Prince of Agrigentine, ſeeing him prepared to give him attention, thus ſaid, Sir, I come to preſent to you this Priſoner, I am obliged to praiſe, and to excuſe the weakneſs of thoſe who took him, and to give you occaſion to treat him with civility; for to ſpeak as a perſon of Honour, who ought to commend the courage of his enemies, it hath ſometimes been more eaſie for me to put five hundred men to flight, then to vanquiſh this valiant man; for there was ſo much difficulty to make him render himſelf after his Sword was broken, that I conceiv'd it requiſite to acquaint you with his valour; to the end, that treating him according to his merit, he ſhould repent himſelf from having expoſed his life, rather then to be your Priſoner.

It is ſo natural (ſaid Artemidorus) for generous Conquerours to praiſe the courage of thoſe they have vanquiſhed, that I ought to draw no vanity from the praiſes you have attributed to me. He which praiſes you is ſo brave himſelf, replyed the Agrigentine Prince, that you may glory in his praiſes, and if you had ever ſeen him in any dangerous occaſions, as he hath ſeen you, you would retribute the like praiſes to his Valour; and as your great magnanimity and the air of your Viſage eaſily diſpoſe me to believe you are of illuſtrious blood, though your habit contradict that opinion: Tell me what you are, and what's your condition, and what motive induc'd you to take ſuch an unjuſt party? I know by your accent you are no Heraclean, but I am confident you are a Sicilian, and concluding you a Sicilian, and not an Heraclean, I confeſs to you I cannot tell preciſely, whether you are of Syracuſa, Panormus, Eryces, Meſſina, or Leontint, though it ſeems your pronunciation ſpeaks you the laſt. Sir, replied Artemidorus, as I have many particular reaſons which oblige me not to diſcover either my Name or Country, diſpenſe with it if you pleaſe, and I aſſure you I will not complain of you, if you do me the favour to treat me as a private Soldier, and as a Priſoner of War. Whilſt Artemidorus thus ſpoke, Philenice and Berelisa attentively fix'd their eyes upon him, and the Prince of Agrigentine after an exact ſurvey, noting the whiteneſs of his hand, turning towards Philenice and Berelisa thus ſaid: I pray, What think you of this Priſoner? may I credit his words, or my reaſon? For my part (replied Philenice) I find him to have the air of a perſon of Quality. For my particular, added Berelisa, I am perſwaded this Priſoner is a man of condition and ſpirit, and if he ſhould have confeſſed it to me, my belief would not receive any ſtronger impreſſion: For, purſued ſhe, depreſſing her voice, if he was but a ſimple Soldier, he would heighten his condition to be more civilly uſed. Philenice confirm'd what Berelisa had ſaid, and all the other Ladies were of Opinion, that this Priſoner was neither a ſimple Officer nor Soldier: The Prince of Agrigentine turning towards him with a gallant and civil air natural to him; As 'tis advantageous for you we ſhould doubt of your words (ſaid he to him) and that all theſe Ladies will not believe you, nor ſuffer me to do it, permit me to think you are not ſuch a perſon as you repreſent your ſelf, therefore you ſhall be treated with all the civility and courteſie that a generous Priſoner may claim, but kept with as much exactitude as perſons of quality; and in time (it may be) you will reſolve to ſpeak with more confidence. 'Tis not for the vanquiſhed to give laws to the vanquiſher, replied Artemidorus, and I have doubtleſs nothing to do, but conſtantly to ſupport my imprisonment; I render thanks to theſe Ladies for their advantageous opinion: Artemidorus pronounced theſe words with ſuch a noble Air, that it added a confirmation to their belief; and having ſent for Berelisas Father, who (as I have already told you) was Governour of the Caſtle, he commanded him civilly to treat him, and to take ſtrict care of him; who departed with his Priſo-

ner as soon as he had received this expres order from the Prince. But to the end (said the Prince of Agrigentine, addressing himself to Berelisa) this Prisoner should have no desire to cancel those Chains the fortune of War hath impos'd upon him, give him, I entreat you, those of love. 'Tis affirm'd it is so dangerous to desire to give much, without exposing themselves to take a little, replied Philonice (seeing Berelisa fram'd no answer) that I would not counsel her to obey you. Her silence (he replied) gives consent, and she hath so attentively beheld this Prisoner, that I imagine the Beauty of his Person hath already storm'd her Inclination. I ingeniously confess (answered Berelisa, a vermilion Tincture shadowing her Cheeks) this Unknown pleaseth me, without knowing him, I pity him as an unhappy person, whom I believe worthy of my compassion, and to whom I will voluntarily render all the favour lies in my power, not prejudicing your service. If you oblige him to love you, replied the Prince of Agrigentine, he will love his imprisonment, he will bless his captivity, his chains will be grateful, he will it may be change party, and you will give me a new Subject, by procuring a new Slave. At these words all jested with Berelisa, seeing it pleas'd the Prince, and they were minded the more to do it; by reason Terillus there present was amorous of Berelisa, though she could not affect him: This Lover thus finding all to counsel his Mistress to conquer this Prisoners heart, and having noted he had lookt upon him with extraordinary attention, he even wished he had not taken him, and could not conceal his anger from Berelisa, who perceiving it, and not being thereat displeased, suddenly chang'd her manner of speech, to answer to the Railery of the Agrigentine Prince: She told him that after some consideration, she imagined she should perform a charitable Office, to give love to this Prisoner, but to the end (pursued she) that the more glory should reflect on me, I must first know whether he is a person of quality, whether he is of your enemies Country, or whether he is amorous, that I may efface his first Mistress from his heart, that I oblige him to renounce his party, and to forget his Country. But if he should change his party (replied Terillus) would he be worthy of your esteem? and do you believe, that a man without honour should merit your love? For my part, replied Berelisa, I love glory as much as any person, and I cannot suffer a degenerate action; but in case of love, I would not have honour to be alledged to me, to destroy my intentions; and if I had a Lover, and that I was so unjust as to demand a testimony of affection from him, which did not rightly square with Justice, I would he should be unjust for the love of me, and that he should yield to love me; for if I make no scruple to be injust for the love of my self, sure I cannot think it fit my Lover should do it for the love of himself, and that he prefers his interest to my will, I know to speak prudently, love ought not to contradict honour, but to speak as Mistress of it; Love ought to make a Lover act any thing to please his Lady. Ah Berelisa (replied Philonice) you say too much of it, for the means to esteem him who obeys you, if you command him any unworthy act. I have already told you, replied she, that I can esteem my Lover no more than my self, and that I would he should be capable of all that I do, and all that I would have him do; 'tis not that I should be assured, I should be ever incapable to command any indignity; but I am likewise assured, that a Mistress cannot think it good that she should not be blindly obeyed, and that if he disobeys, he should yet pretend to be a lover. For my part, replied the Prince of Agrigentine, which have (it may be) as much experience in love as war, I believe that a man of honour, which sees himself constrained to commit an unworthy action, or disobey his Mistress, ought not to perform her commands, but detest his Empire, and endeavour to cure his amorous Lethargie, by the knowledge he hath of her Injustice, but he ought not to pretend to continue to be beloved, sure to speak of the thing in general, it appertains not to a disobedient lover to aspire to that advantage, and when 'tis ones misfortune to love a less generous person, he must renounce her love and favours, to preserve his liberty, to reason on all that she commands him; it is a thing so opposite to the Laws of this Passion, that 'tis only fit to destroy the Empire of Love; all those Titles of Prisoner, Captive and Slave, which are given to a Lover, are infallible marks he is obliged to obey; and he must relinquish the Empire of this God, which makes so many happy and unhappy, if he will not obey without reason and knowledge, but when I conclude, he must always obey his Mistress, I infer he must submit to none but those who have generous hearts. But Sir, replied Terillus (whose spirit was inraged) if a man is obliged to obey without any consideration, what then belongs to reciprocal Love? Do you think it should be just that a woman should refuse inconsiderable favours, saying, her virtue restrains her, and that a man may not say to a woman that he is retained by love from obeying her? For if you desire a Lady to give you an assignation, she says by doing it, she should hazard her reputation: if you entreat her to write to you, she will answer you, that though it may be innocent, it is so dangerous to accustom her self thereto, that she cannot resolve to do it, and these things she refuses by a resentment of glory, are not things criminal, yet you will have a Lover refuse nothing; and that in a word, there should be no reciprocal Love. I pray, replied Philonice, to please Berelisa, do not you imagine, that if it should be true that a woman might love as she should be beloved, she was obliged to the same things, for there are reciprocal affections, whose testimonies ought to be different. 'Tis true, said the Prince of Agrigentine, for Kings ought to love their Subjects, and Subjects their Kings, yet their obligations are different; for the one hath power to command, the other ought to obey. Fathers and Children ought likewise to have a mutual affection, and so there should be between Masters and Slaves, though their Duties have no resemblance; likewise, though the heart of a Mistress, as well as a Lovers, ought to be tipp'd with a tender beam of affection, yet the testimonies have some disagreement; a lover was never heard to say to his Mistress, I command you to obey me; yet no person is ignorant, but in a Ladies mouth a command is more obliging than a request, and between entreating, ordaining and commanding, custom hath yet certain distinctions, which makes a lover, whose heart is framed in the delicate mould of love, rather to desire his Mistress to ordain, than entreat any thing of him, and to conceive a greater pleasure would accrue to him by the word command, than request; therefore I conclude, that a lover must obey, or relinquish his love; for as soon as he commits any disobedience, he flies his love, and hath no more right to pretend to any affection: and if the fair Berelisa can acquire this valiant Prisoner to inrol himself under my Standard, I shall esteem it a greater felicity. I confess (replied she) I should not be displeased at it; and were I advantaged with a larger proportion of Beauty, or graced with more charms fit to conquer hearts, I would not despair of my intended surprizal; for all my intelligent faculties seem to court my heart to affect him. You sometimes so harshly censure those you know, said Terillus to her, that this your new kind of injustice doth not surprise me. Those you say I know are, it may be such strangers to themselves (replied Berelisa to him, her accent expressing her anger) that they have no great reason to accuse me of injustice. After these words the Prince of Agrigentine changed the Discourse, speaking to all the Ladies, which were to accompany the Princess, the subsequent day to the Chace; and when night began to vail the skie with its sable mantle, the Prince and Philonice, with all the other Ladies return'd to the Palace situate in the middle of the City; Terillus followed the Prince of Agrigentine, and Berelisa remained at her Father's house, who was named Afranor, and who being of the most conspicuous quality next the Prince, had the sole power committed to him, when the Prince engaged in any warlike action. In the mean time the Chace next day was performed with all imaginable magnificence; the day was ushered in by a fair morning, not one cloud wrinkling the brow of heaven, and the company wholly fashioned to delight Philonice, who could guide with much dexterity the reins of her horse, and who was dresst after the most gallant exquisite mode, had this day all the pleasantness of her humour, and Berelisa alone had such disposition to melancholy, that she could not surmount it; Philonice had therefore for her a thousand obliging cares; for though she did not passionately love blue, which she had caused to be used at Agrigentine, on purpose to please Berelisa, she was at this time clothed in that amiable colour; she had sent to her a kind of Coif with plumes, to shade her from the scorching heat of Phœbus; and in fine, she forgot nothing which she thought might oblige her to banish this severe melancholy. Nevertheless Berelisa could not conceal her distemper. 'Tis true, that as she did not affect Terillus, and that he did this day importune her, she conceived him to be the sole cause of her anxiety; and when Philonice having separated her from the company, demanded her the reason of it: she answered her it was the great concourse of people. But, said Berelisa to her, who would you banish? I would assuredly banish Terillus, replied she, and if I might effect my desires, added she smiling, I think I should send him to the place of that valiant Prisoner, to whom I would willingly resign his, for at least, if he did not delight, he would not importune me. Seriously (said Philonice to her, shadowing her cheeks with a modest smile) I believe the valour of that Unknown Person sways your inclination. 'Tis true, I have a good opinion of him, replied Berelisa, but above all, that which engages me to desire to serve him, is, a resentment of amity; for (as you know) I have a Brother very dear to me, who hath already completed a year in peregrination, and who it may be is exposed to such adventures; I fancy that there is a certain equity which obligeth the gods to render us all the good we desire; and I am resolved to desire all I may for this Unknown, in hope that the gods will cause the like to be retaliated to my Brother, in what place soever he resides; for, as you know, Telesis is as well my Friend as Brother, and I am both his Sister and Confident; and conceiving my self more obliged to love him, because he treats me as a Friend, than because he is my Brother, my thoughts continually reflect on him, and 'tis assuredly the prevalent motive, which hath induced me to interest my self in this valiant Unknown. Telesis is certainly worthy of your expressive tenderness, replied Philonice, but I know not (added she) if this Prisoner was deficient in those noble qualities which had raised him to the height of an accomplished man, he would as much remember you. There's no doubt of that, replied Berelisa, but I principally interest my self in this Unknown, because there's some resemblance between him and my Brother; for Telesis is nigh of his age, and (as you know) well proportioned, he hath given some evident testimonies of his courage, he hath spirit; and in fine (if I dare say it) as gallant as the Prisoner seems to be. As Berelisa thus spoke, she was interrupted by the Agrigentine Prince, who told her the Chase would not permit a long discourse, and that they should not transpose the pleasures of it; so that Berelisa gallantly answering the Agrigentine Prince, the rest of the Chase passed in an agreeable manner, and at night the Prince made a magnificent Feast to all the Ladies, which had enjoyed the benefit of this Princely sport; Artemidorus, who was lodged in a Chamber, which looked upon the garden of the Agrigentine Castle, had seen them return from the Chase; for though his Chamber was but a few higher than the Garden, it was built on such a rising ground, that it discovered all the Country which environed the City; the sight of a company where joy seemed to be so universal, gave some addition to his melancholy; for he imagined what would be Clidimiras grief, if she knew he was Prisoner to an enemy of the Leontine Prince; he even thought that his absence alone would cause her an incredible affliction, and when he remembred all those demonstrations of affection which had past between them, he doubted not but she should employ all the moments of her life to think of him, and regret his absence; and he felt not only his own grief, but he suffered that which he presupposed Clidimira would endure for his consideration. In the mean time, his Guards reported divers things to Afranor, which persuaded him that this Prisoner was of a greater condition than he said; he was kept very exactly, though though treated with much civility, he had the liberty in the day time to be alone in his Chamber, and those which had taken, had not rifled him, because his Valour claimed their respect, he had divers Letters of Clidamira, which he often perused to consolate himself; for when he departed from Messina, he thought that desiring to pass for a simple Cavalier, 'twas not convenient for him to carry that precious Casket, which was depositary of all the secrets of his heart, but contented himself to take the Letters of Clidamira, to give him some consolation during his voyage: Artemidorus living in this manner, spent whole days in ruminating on Clidamira: and Berelisa by a resentment of inclination, pity, generosity, and tenderness for her absent Brother, was very solicitous to render this Prisoner all those things she conceived might sweeten the rigour of his imprisonment: But if in the beginning she believed her self obliged by the prementioned reasons, she found her self afterwards engaged by a more puissant motive: You may remember (as I have already told you) that the Chamber of Artemidorus was a foot higher than the Garden, from whence the prospect is very delicate; for it had two Windows, the one facing the Campagn, the other the end of a Walk, which looked upon a Garden-knot, so enamelled with the choisest of Floras treasure, and beautified by Art in such ingenious manner, that Art and Nature did contend therein for mastery. This Walk being very agreeable when the Sun doth not guild it with its radiant Beams, Berelisa towards the Evening often repaired thither, and there being two seats at the ends, and in the middle of this Walk to repose on, commodiously to enjoy the fair prospect, there was a seat against the Window of Artemidorus so contrived, that though the Window was grated, it admitted the conveniency of discourse with those which were seated on this side the Walk. It often hapned, that Artemidorus, which was obliged to Berelisa for the good opinion she had testified of him, saluted her with much respect, when his Window was found open; and Berelisa, who was civil and courteous, and who had a secret unknown reason, which rendred her more affable than ordinary, did often entertain discourse with Artemidorus; but as 'twas not possible for her to harbour an ill opinion of him; the more she saw, the more she esteemed him; and seeing melancholy enthroned in his face, compassion so invaded her heart, that seeing every day the charming Princess of Agrigentine more usually than before; the Prince her Father being gone to the War, she often spoke to her of her Prisoner, for she sometimes used that term, she having such a special care of him, and she did it principally to give Berelisa the curiosity to converse with him, to the end that acknowledging his merit; she might at the Prince her Fathers return, endeavour to obtain his liberty, and Philonice, who is compassionate and generous, and who seeks occasions to render any one any curteous office, told Berelisa, that the first fair day she would go to the Castle of Agrigentine, to see if she had reason to give such encomiums of her Prisoners spirit, as 'twas then the faireſt season in the year: the next being serene and calm, correspondent to the desires of this Princess, and she being willing to perform her promise made to Berelisa, went to the Castle with this amiable Virgin, accompanyed with many Ladies, carrying likewise with her one that had relation to her, whom the Prince of Agrigentine had sent to certifie her of a considerable advantage he had gained over his enemies; for he was one of Berelisas Friends, and was of a pleasant disposition, she believed he would render their recreation more delightful, and it succeeded as she imagined; Berelisas humour being at this time tun'd to the highest pitch of mirth; but in fine (without trespassing on your patience, by relating those things which have no reference to the life of Artemidorus) I shall tell you, that the hour being come when they might take a commodious walk in the place, I have already mentioned, Philonice, and all the company went thither; but as Berelisa told her, she would not expose her Prisoner to speak before so many persons, the Princess only (followed by Berelisa) went towards the Window of Artemidorus; who seeing the Princess approach, saluted her with a profound reverence; after which (through respect) he would have withdrawn himself from the Window; but Philonice recall'd him, Return valiant Unknown, said she to him, return, and do not flye those who seek you. I am, Madam, so unworthy of this honour, replied he, that you ought not to think it strange, if I would have deprived my self of a pleasure that I am incapable to merit. All honest unhappy persons, replied the generous Philonice, merit every ones compassion; and if you should be but what you pretend, you would deserve the protection I offer you; but to speak sincerely to you, I desire you precisely to tell me whence and who you are? If I would, Madam, replied Artemidorus, I might easily invent a lye, which you cannot presently disprove; but as I profess sincerity, I believe I had better ingeniously confess unto you, that I have reasons which depend on none but my self, which both obstruct me from telling you the place of my Birth, and from inventing any fabulous narration. But at least confess, replied she, that you are of a quality proportionable to your spirit, and that as you have neither the language nor heart, you have not the Birth of a simple Soldier; for in fine, I assure you Berelisa is very much your friend, and I should be as much, would you have this sincerity for me; you may confide your secret to us, without fearing to be betray'd. The secrets of an unhappy person, Madam, replied he, are so little worthy knowledge, that if I should be what you think I am, I should not acquaint you with mine, for I should appear very ungrateful to recompense your generosity by a long recital of melancholy adventures; therefore, Madam, if you please, do not command a thing that I cannot nor ought not to perform; and be certain, that I am so sensible of the honour you have done me, that if my misfortunes were of that nature to admit of any diminution, the honour you vouchsafe me, by conversing with me, would give a cessation to my miseries. Ah Berelisa, you have reason, said the Prince to her, and your Prisoner is not what he would make us believe. I pray, Madam, (said then Artemidorus) acquaint me whether the Prince of Agrigentine hath given me to the fair

Bereliſa. No, replied Philonice, but ſhe ſo much intereſſes her ſelf in your affairs, that ſhe is inſenſiby accuſtom'd to entitle you her Priſoner, and to oblige others to uſe that denomination; for as you will not diſcover your name, you ought to be known by ſome remarkable Title. I am very happy in my misfortune (replied he) to be the Priſoner of ſo fair and generous a perſon. In truth, ſaid Bereliſa bluſhing, you have thereby no great advantage; for though I call you my Priſoner, 'tis not in my power to break your chains. As ſhe had thus ſaid, all the company approach'd, ſo that Philonice being ſeated, and having commanded all the Ladies to take their ſeats, and Cliſias likewiſe, whom the Prince of Agrigentine had ſent to bring news of his Victory: The converſation began in this place, Artemidorus believing he was exempted, would have retired; but as Philonice had found the grandeur of his ſpirit, which had given her much curioſity, and being perſwaded he was a perſon of quality, ſhe commanded him to ſtay, and at leaſt to give attention to what they ſaid, if he would not have any conference with them: Artemidorus returned thanks to the Princeſs for the exceſſive bounty ſhe had demonſtrated to him, and remain'd, leaning againſt the bars of his Window, which look'd upon the ſeat where this company were; hardly were they ſeated, but Cliſias ſaid, 'Twas more happier for one to be a Priſoner of War than Love. If one being a Priſoner of War could not be a Priſoner of Love (replied Philonice) you would have reaſon to ſpeak as you do, but in my opinion, they are not incompatible chains, and one may have them both. In this caſe (replied Cliſias) a man ſhould be very unhappy. As he thus ſpoke, Bereliſa caſually looking on Artemidorus, ſaw he changed colour, and preſuppoſing he might be both a Priſoner of War and Love, ſhe had both a deſire to ſay ſomething to him, and to make Philonice note the change of his countenance; but a little after, repenting her ſelf of this firſt thought, not knowing wherefore, ſhe bluſhed, and held her peace, permitting Cliſias to continue his diſcourſe; who anſwered Philonice, he would ever maintain, that a Priſoner of War without Love, was leſs unhappy than a Priſoner of Love in Liberty. It ſeems to me agreeable, then ſaid Philonice, that as there is no man here, but this valiant Unknown, which can know the weightineſs of thoſe divers chains, 'tis for him to give his opinion; for my part, who have ever had my heart free, who have never been a Priſoner, and who according to all appearance never ſhall be; I cannot give you a ſatisfactory anſwer, therefore I requeſt Bereliſa to command her Priſoner to anſwer you. As Love reigns in all Countries (replied Artemidorus) and it is found in all ſorts of Perſons, without any diſtinction of conditions, I will not ſay I do not know Love; therefore, Madam, without expecting the command of the fair Bereliſa, I will obey you, and on the contrary maintain, that how unhappy ſoever a Priſoneu of Love is, he had better be ſo, than a Priſoner of War; 'tis not that the chains of a Lover are leſs weighty than thoſe the fortune of War impoſes on any man; but there are a thouſand and a thouſand pleaſures which accompany the firſt, and which are not found in the ſecond. But after all, ſaid Cliſias, a Priſoner of War, how carefully ſoever he may be kept, hath his heart and ſpirit free, and is certain one day to be freed from his reſtraint; whereas a Priſoner of Love in an apparant liberty, is in a continual ſlavery; for he not only doth not what he would, but doth not think what ſeems good to him; he knows not when his impriſonment will finiſh, nor can he wiſh the concluſion of it. That which you ſay, replied Artemidorus, ſeems to make againſt you; for ſince a Priſoner of War continually deſires to recover his Liberty, and that a Priſoner of Love doth not deſire it, it follows that the chains of Love are more pleaſing than the others; in effect, there's no punition in Love, which hath not been preceded or followed by a pleaſure, and deſperation often comes after one hath taſted the ſweetneſs of hope, without which there can never be any violent Love: for is it not true, that the grief of abſence comes not, and cannot come till after one hath had the pleaſure to enjoy the preſence of a perſon one regrets? And fear likewiſe doth not poſſeſs a Lovers heart, till hope hath firſt led the way; and Jealouſie is never altogether violent, if it is not in the heart of a beloved Lover, or who at leaſt believes himſelf to be; 'tis not that other Lovers can be infected with Jealouſie, but 'tis not ſo cruel as that I have before ſpoken of; moreover, thoſe who have the infelicity to find Miſtreſſes, whoſe Inconſtancy renders them unhappy, have at leaſt had the ſatisfaction to be beloved: and I in fine maintain (as I have already ſaid) that all the puniſhments of Love are either preceded, or followed by moſt great pleaſures; I likewiſe confidently ſay (added he) that a part of thoſe pains, which make ſo many groan, ſigh, and emit forth many dolorous exclamations, hath ſomething more pleaſing than that Liberty you mentioned, when you affirmed that a Priſoner of War without Love, is leſs miſerable than an amorous man in Liberty. I ſubſcribe to your opinion (replied Cliſias) that there's no torments in Love, but are either preceded or followed by ſome pleaſures; but to ſpeak ſincerely, thoſe pleaſures are dangerous, ſince they render the privation more ſenſible, and imprint all the ſubſequent misfortunes in a more lively character; for 'tis certain, that ſometimes a favourable regard cauſes many diſpleaſing hours; becauſe one imagines, that if he was continually nigh the perſon he loved, and obtained nothing more than the only pleaſure to ſee, and to be ſeen of her, he ſhould be crowned with happineſs; and nevertheleſs it often arrives, that after one hath tried a hundred inventions to attain but a ſight of the beloved object; It happens, I ſay, ſhe is found in a humorous temper, and that which he believed would have elevated him to the ſupreme top of felicity, often precipitates him into the gulf of deſpair; on the contrary, when one finds her affable, he is but a little more happy; for that Lover, who thinks he ſhould be content, when he ſhould be proſtrate on his knees before his Miſtreſs, at that time is deficient in many things, which ſhould compleat his happineſs; likewiſe inſtead of praiſing that favour, ſhe accords to him he hath ſo much deſired, he requeſts an hundred other things, and believes himſelf himself as unfortunate, as if he had obtained nothing: I even affirm, that 'tis not in the power of the fairest person in the World, to make an amorous man confess (during the space of six Months) that he is content; so true it is, that Love is uncapable of power to render one happy. I confess (replied Artemidorus) 'tis difficult to find a Lover which desires nothing, and who always says he is content; but I sustain, that that which frames one part of his pleasure, is, that there's always something wanting to his felicity, that he hath a certain species of an amorous inquietude, which is the most pleasing and agreeable pain imaginable, and that one of the most sensible pleasures is, to hope with an ardent desire. 'Tis true (replied Clisias) you have reason to speak so much of the advantage of hope; as for me I know (pursued he) that I have noted an hundred, and an hundred times in my life, in divers occasions, that not only a Lover without hope hath no great pleasure, but that usually he merits no more to be happy, as soon as he is content; no sooner is he assured to be beloved, but the fire of his former love grows extinct, at least he is not so sensible, so solicitous, so exact, so constant, and so respectful as before, and the certainty he conceives to have pleased his Mistress, taking from him the desire to please, he ceases sometimes to please no more. Ah Clisias, replied Berelisa, I would hate a Lover, if he could take as much care to preserve my heart, as he hath done to acquire it. You have reason, Madam (replied Artemidorus) for I believe a man who is negligent when beloved, deserves to be hated, and that it is as just to desert the love of those negligent Lovers, as those which are unfaithful: I know not (added he) if the procedure of those persons, whom good fortune buries in a certain Lethargie of heart, where they lose all the sensibility of love, have not something more outragious than that of those inconstant Lovers, which are charmed with noveity; at least I know, that if I was a Lady in such an adventure, I should be more displeased, that my own charms destroy love in the heart of a Lover, than if others should deprive me of it. You discourse so well of this (replied Philonice, rising from her seat) that I die for fear you should not be at one time a Prisoner of War and Love. I am very rederable to you for such an obliging fear (replied Artemidorus) I therefore presuppose, Madam, that it only proceeds from a conceit you have, that I have not merit enough to entitle me a happy Lover. As Love is as blind as Fortune (replied Philonice) you know it never favours merit, and I confess to you, my thoughts did not proceed from that cause your modesty dictated to you: In fine, Philonice said something to Artemidorus, to intimate to him, she did not believe that which he said of himself; and to assure him, that she would serve in all occasions: After which they began to take a Walk; but whilst it lasted, Berelisa's Prisoner was the subject of their conversation: Philonice likewise prayed Clisias to entreat the Agrigentine Prince on her part, that this Prisoner might have liberty to take the Air, his Guards accompanying him; and few days were added to the age of time after Clisias return to the Camp, but Agrasor had order to permit Artemidorus to go forth with his Guards, and that they should shew him those things worthy of note in the City, which invite the curiosity of strangers: They presented to his sight the magnificent ruines of a great Palace, called the Palace of the Gyants, where were Columns of such a prodigious immensity, that it evidently appeared the first Inhabitants in this Isle were of a larger proportion than other men; he likewise saw admirable Aqueducts, which are at Agrigentine; he visited the Temples of Æsculapius, of Vulcan, of Hercules, of Jupiter, of Concord, of Juno, and of Pudicity, that stately Structure being erected by the Princess of Philonice, to evidence the immaculate purity of her Soul; he saw many magnificent Tombs, built as Memorials for many Horses; for you must know, that those of the Agrigentine Land in particular, are of such admirable strength and beauty, that they are every where famous, and they are so excellently good, that their Masters have raised for them several magnificent Tombs, so great hath superfluity been at Agrigentine, since it encreased in Riches; at first it was a City of small importance, but when Phalaris swayed the Scepter, there were numbred nine hundred thousand Inhabitants. But to return to Artemidorus, since he had the permission to walk, he more often saw Berelisa, for in the design he had to acquire her friendship, to the end he might by her assistance more facilely recover his liberty: The more he saw her, the more Berelisa found him amiable; and this puissant inclination became so predominant, that she could not doubt but love did insensibly steal her heart; and as her Virtue was eminent, she blush'd at this weak resistance, and would have made some opposition (thus correcting her self, as she hath since told me) What's become of my Reason? I despise Terillus who adores me, who is of a proportionate condition to mine, and resign my heart to an unknown Prisoner, who hath no affection for me, and who it may be hath placed his Love on another Object: But, said she, can I doubt of the condition of this Prisoner? His Spirit confirms me that his Birth is Noble, and all those groundless suspicions, which my imagination suggests to me of the pre-engagement of his heart; his civility to me disperses those aery vapours, and confirms me, that Love hath not yet triumphed over him, and that his heart is at my devotion? No Berelisa (added this amiable Virgin) flatter not thy self, and believe if he were in love, he would acquaint thee with it; and perhaps, if thou should'st disclose thy affection to him, he would not credit it; resolve then to repel this dangerous inclination thou feelest ready to force thy heart; resist the merit of this Unknown, and weave not the web of thine own destruction, thou dar'st not commit this secret to the fidelity of any person, though it should crack the Organs of thy Vital Faculties. This was her last resolution, and during some time, she believed she had eradicated this affection from her heart, there happning an accident, which diverted her self from the contemplation of this object; for Telesis her Brother returned from Travel, and as they tenderly loved one another, their joy swell'd to such an height by the sight of each other, that all former occurrences were now buried in oblivion; he related related to her all those adventures which hapned in his voyage; he acquainted her with all the Atchievements of gallantry he had performed in those places he had passed, and desiring to go to the Camp, though the Trees now began to be periwigg'd with Snow, he left with her divers Letters. and the pourtracture of a person whom he then loved, and of whom he made a pleasing relation: Berelisa having her spirit thus buried, felt not for some days her usual inquietude; as her soul was in this tranquillity, she one Morning repair'd to the aforesaid Walk, where she had hardly taken two turns, but she heard one speak very high in Artemidorus his Chamber: Berelisa hearing this noise, and not being able to comprehend the occasion of it, approaching thither, and heard the Prisoner earnestly entreat his Guard to redeliver what he had taken from him; and he answering in insolent terms, he would not, but that he would carry it to Afranor, to the end he should transmit it to the Agrigentine Prince: She had scarce heard this, when the Prisoner reiterated his entreaties with so much earnestness, that she conceiv'd what had been taken from him, was of too great a concernment to be seen; so that tenderness engaging her heart, and curiosity her spirit, she called him by his name, who so much contested with Artemidorus: This man hearing himself called by his Master's Daughter, went to the Window, requesting her to inform him what she desired: I would have you tell me (said she to him) why you give such uncivil language to a Prisoner, whom you ought to treat with civility, and from whence proceeds the grounds of this Contestation? Madam, (replied this man, his eyes sparkling with anger) this Prisoner hath suborn'd some of my Companies, for having taken from him a Letter, with intention to carry it to my Master, he so much prest me to render it him, that I was transported with anger, by reason he thought me capable to betray my fidelity. I pray, Madam, (said then Artemidorus, speaking to Berelisa) if you repent not of your excessive goodness towards me, do me the favour, I conjure you, to use your power over this man, as that Letter I have written may not be seen by any person. You see, Madam, (said he who had spoken to Artemidorus) this Letter must consequently be of importance, and that I should have injured the Trust reposed in me, if I had rendred it to him. I protest unto you, replied Artemidorus, that it neither concerns the Prince of Agrigentine, nor Afranor, but hath only reference to my self. To find a mean to reconcile you (replied Berelisa) permit me to survey your Letter, and relie on my discretion, and if I find that neither the Prince, nor my Father have any interest in it, I will redeliver it to you, and oblige him, who hath taken it from you, not to disclose any thing, neither will I ever speak of it; without this I am assured your Keeper will not render it to you: but on this occasion (added she) I believe I can easily obtain it, sure he imagines I will neither betray the Prince nor my Father. This man consenting to Berelisas Proposition, Artemidorus was constrained to suffer this Virgin to peruse what he had written, imagining after she had perused it, she would permit him the favour to write another, or to send this to Clidamira, for 'twas to that fair person, to whom this this Letter was addressed: After he had consented to what was proposed, and when his Keeper had given the Letter to Berelisa, she found it contained these words,

IF I only tell you I am the unhappiest Prince in the World, I should not sufficiently inform you of the grandeur of my Misfortune;

At these words Berelisa staid, and a joyful motion seiz'd her spirits, seeing that secret inclination which had taken possession of her heart had a more noble foundation than she imagined; so that this resentment renewing the tenderness of her heart, she often read these three or four lines, as if she had there desired to limit her curiosity; but at last rebeginning the letter she found the contents framed after this manner,

IF I only tell you I am the unhappiest Prince in the World, I shall not sufficiently inform you of the grandeur of my Misfortune; but assuring you I am the unhappiest Lover that e'er submitted to the laws of Love, my infelicity cannot be paralleld; for since my Liberty is restrained, I know not whether you are free, nor whether till this time you have retained your affection inviolable; I am only ascertained that I see by your Idea continually present before my eyes, all the compassion of two of the most exquisite Beauties Nature e'er made for wonder, cannot sweeten the rigour of those miseries I endure: Behold to a Cruel King———

As this Letter was not fully finished, Berelisa could know no more, but she knew enough to disturb her repose; since if the beginning flattered her with joy, the conclusion saddened her heart with grief: for if she had learned this Prisoner was a Prince, she had likewise learned he was a Lover, and that he believed he was beloved; and as she learned it with some agitation of spirit, her Cheeks were planted with a roseate tincture, insomuch that she turned her head to conceal the blushing from Artemidorus. In this disturbance of her heart, grief produced the same effect, as joy had done before, giving an additional innovation to that esteem she conceived his merit might command; for there is nothing sooner to augment a new-born inclination in the heart of most women, than to learn that those they love have already gained the affections of others. Berelisa was in a strange perplexity, time not permitting her so much leisure as to consult her reason in this occasion; but at last generosity and tenderness being the more prevalent, she told the Keeper, that this Letter neither concerned the Prince of Agrigentine, nor Afranor, expressly commanding him not to speak of it; and being seduced by a jealous resentment, she commanded his Keeper to endeavour the discovery of him, whom Artemidorus had suborned, to the end he should be dismissed his place; afterwards she desired him to leave the Prisoner at liberty, to speak with her in the Garden, that she might read his Letter to him; and this man obeying her, Artemidorus came to render her thanks, and to spend some time in walking with her, whilst two of her attendants spoke to him, who commanded Artemidorus his Guards at the end of this Walk. How shall I methodise my language, Madam, said he to her, to thank you for your last signal favour, and what may I do to testifie unto you my recognition? You will cancel that obligation (said Berelisa, the blood leaping into her face) by wholly confiding your self to my discretion, for though your Letter acquaints me you are of Royal extraction, that you are amorous, and that your Love is reciprocal, it doth neither inform me of your name, nor hers you Love, nor of the place of your Nativity; and I desire satisfaction in those things before I re-deliver your Letter. Ah, Madam, said he to her, if you knew the importance of your demand, you would, it may be, not persist in requesting it; for you are so generous, that I am confident you would not prejudice me in any thing. On the contrary (replied Berelisa) 'tis principally to generous persons, to whom it appertains to be in power to prejudice, because they have no good will to act it; therefore without repenting what I have said, I redemand satisfaction in those three things. For my Name and Country (replied Artemidorus) I can tell you, not being ashamed of either, though I cannot do it, both without danger and prudence; but for the name of the person I love, since my Letter hath not declared it to you, I suppose I ought not to do it, and you ought less to persevere in that demand, added he, since you are so obliged to that charming person; for, Madam, if she had not enslaved my heart, and had I been free, when I came to Agrigentine, I should assuredly have been amorous of you, and doubtless much importun'd you with my complaints, for as I love with an immeasurable ardour, I should have griev'd you more displeasure than Terillus; therefore, Madam, since you have this obligation to the person whom I love, constrain me not to violate my discretion, and remain satisfied that I expose my self to sufficient danger, by telling you that I am Brother to the Enemy of the Agrigentine Prince. What? (replied Berelisa) Are you Artemidorus, Brother to the Leontine Prince, who departed from this place about six months since? Yes, Madam, I am that Artemidorus, who would not, it may be, have been so civilly treated, as he is by the Agrigentine Prince, and the charming Philonice, had they known his true condition; I therefore declare to you, Madam, (said he) that the only interest of my love hath obliged me to so fear a long imprisonment, and hath detained me from discovering my quality. Whilst Artemidorus thus spoke, Berelisas spirit was much disturbed; for you must know, that Telesis her Brother, who had related to her all the adventures of his Voyage, had told her, that he was amorous and beloved by a Leontine Virgin, whom the Prince Artemidorus (absent from thence) formerly affected, and that he had left in her custody at his going to the Camp, a Pourtraicture, and many Letters; but as she had given but slight attention to his relation, she not imagining to have any particular interest therein, she had forgot the name of that person, and not knowing, if it were her, to whom Artemidorus had begun to write, she had both an extreme desire to acquaint him with her Brothers recital; and to peruse those Letters he had left with her, to see whether she could gather any satisfaction from them: As her imagination fancied divers things, the irresolution of her spirit was visible in her eyes; which Artemidorus noting, believed her inquietude proceeded from her not being resolved whether she should discover his quality to her Father, that he might declare it to the Agrigentine Prince: But this opinion soon vanished, for Berelisa devining his thoughts, and not willing he should believe her capable to reveal a secret he had confided to her, thus said, looking attentively on him; Think not I examine whether I ought to discover your Name, I declare to you I am not resolved to reveal it, on condition you will promise me two things, the one not to enterprise any thing against the Agrigentine Prince, the other positively to tell me all your love; for it may be I know many particulars in your Fortune, of which you your self are ignorant. As they were on these terms, and that Artemidorus demanded of Berelisa the beginning of his Letter, Philonice arrived; Berelisa therefore not being willing neither to answer nor to deliver him his Letter, went to the Princess, who made her a thousand caresses, and told her she came to bring her good news; for in fine, said this charming Princess, the Prince my Father will return in four days, having finish'd the War with Honour; and having forced his Enemies to make Peace, and till 'tis concluded, Clisias hath obtained that your Prisoner should be on his Parole, and that he may walk where he pleases without his Guards, on condition every night he repairs to his Lodging in the Castle; the conversation Clisias had with him, having imprinted such a good opinion of him in his mind, that he thought himself bound to perform this civil courtesie, and if you believe it requisite, he shall accompany us when we go to meet the Prince of Agrigentine at Carisalis, which, as you know, is about eight miles hence; for it seems just to me you should permit your Prisoner to go, to the end he not appears ingrateful: Berelisa, whose spirit was prepossess'd with many different things, did not give a regular answer to that which Philonice propounded; she therefore made a sign to Artemidorus, who remain'd behind, to approach; telling him he was obliged to the Prince of Agrigentine, and explaining to him of what nature was this obligation. Artemidorus receiving much joy at this news, gave many thanks to the Princess: But I pray, said she to him, do not thank me yet, for it may be Peace may not be easily concluded, and many Months may be expired e'er you recover your Liberty; but your Guards being dismiss'd (added she) be more cheerful, and expect the end of the War with more tranquillity. Artemidorus answered to this discourse with much spirit and civility; and Berelisa being in a profound melancholy study, Philonice jested with her, demanding the cause it; for, said she, you are less subject than any Virgin to those absences of spirit, which reproach so many amiable persons, your heart is ever amongst those with whom you are, you divide not your self betwixt your present and absent Friends, and it must necessarily be, there's something which pleases, or extraordinarily displeases you: In the mean time, you have need that the gayety of your humour appears in its greatest luster the day we go to Carisalis, since I intend all the Ladies shall go thither on Horse, deck'd in their most gorgeous attire: Berelisa then endeavouring to replant the banish'd joy in her face, told the Princess that she was somewhat indispos'd, but she hoped her indisposition would diminish ere the day she intended to meet the Agrigentine Prince; but whatsoever she did, 'twas impossible for her to remit in her eyes their ordinary tranquillity; and Philonice return'd; not being able to penetrate into the secret of her heart.) Before her departure, she made known to Asranor the Order of the Prince of Agrigentine, whose Letter she shewed him, so that Artemidorus was not obliged to suffer the inutility of his Guards: But though it effectively gave him joy, he could not hinder himself from being afflicted, that this Order came not one day sooner, because he should not have been exposed to that adventure he had been, nor engaged to discover his secret to Berelisa: He infinitely esteemed, and had much amity for her, but in case of love, he affected not to discover it to any one, if necessity did not thereunto compel him. This grief was nothing in comparison of Berelisas, when she was alone in her Chamber; for that violence and puissant inclination she had for Artemidorus, which she thought she had overcome, suddenly assaulted her Soul; and the knowledge of his condition and love, placed both a resentment of glory and jealousie in her heart, which augmented her tenderness: As soon as she was in her Chamber, she had a design to look on all those things Telesis had left in her custody; but one of her Maids who had shut the door, not thinking of it, remaining yet in the Garden, she must have patience till she could be call'd; but expecting her coming, What did she not think? What said this amiable Virgin to her self? Have I surmounted my heart, when I did not know Artemidorus? and can I not be Mistress of it, when I know he is amorous, and is beloved? But if it chance (replied she) that the Person my Brother loves at Leontine is the same who hath inflamed Artemidorus; would it not be possible to banish her from his heart, by displaying her infidelity? for by that means I shall render a curtesie to my Brother, by taking from him such a Rival, and it may be to my self, if I can acquire such a Lover. But what do I say, Fool as I am (replied she, as she hath since told me) have I lost my Reason? or am I so inglorious as to desire to love one who doth not affect me? No, no, added she, I have not doubtless such degenerate thoughts, as to love Artemidorus, but I at least imagine that the desire to gain his love is not criminal, whilst it neither makes me say or do any thing repugnant to the exact rule of decency; the desire to please in general is not esteemed a crime, wherefore then should it be one to desire to please a great Prince in particular, without any other design than to be preferr'd by him before all other persons in the World. As she had thus said, her Maid arrived, and opened the Cabinet, where she presently entred; and visiting all the Letters her Brother had left, she was clearly convinced that the person who had writ them, was the same of whom Artemidorus imagined he was faithfully beloved; she looked on the Pourtraicture; but though her Mirror spoke her Beauty superiour to Cidimiras, she found a certain Air in the Physiognomy of her Rival, which much displeased her, it seeming very agreeable, and she even dispaired, finding so much spite in Cidimiras Letters, because she feared the sight of this Pourtraicture, and those Letters would only introduce jealousies into Artemidorus his heart, without chasing Love from thence, and that she should give an Enemy to her Brother, without acquiring a lover, yet had she some pleasure to think she should acquaint him, whose heart she would conquer, that his Mistress was unfaithful; for, said she, as soon as he shall be informed what had passed at Leontine, he shall know the very next day after he departed, there arrived a stranger who presently gained the estimation of Cidimiras, and perhaps, if I pre-acquaint him with her infidelity, he will esteem himself obliged to retribute to me my courtesie I desire: But presently suppressing the imagination, she could not resolve to do it, and doubtless she would never have performed it, had she not received the next Morning a Letter from her Brother, intimating to her that the Prince of Agrigentine had sent him to Syracuse, to negotiate some important Affair, and that from thence he would go to Leontium, to have some private conference with Cidimira. Berelisa then seeing her Brother absent, conceived it the best time to prosecute her intended resolution: Though this thought did seem to settle the emotion of her spirit, sleep did not this night close the casements of her eyes, and the Sun did no sooner guild the fringes of the Clouds with his luminous radiations, but she took an exact survey of Cidimiras Pourtraicture, and perused her Letters: She would have reserved some Letters from Artemidorus, they being flourished with too much Eloquence; but it hapned that in those which were most Rethorical, her affection to Telesis was painted in such lively Colours, that they conduced most to eraze Cidimiras love from the heart of Artemidorus; Pity likewise invaded her heart, when she read those affectionate lines this Prince began to write to this Leontine Virgin, considering to what height his grief would swell, when he learn'd his love was requited with such ingratitude; but when she remembred he had told her, that if his heart had not been pre-engaged, she should have been the Saint, to whom he would have paid his devotions; and the Letter he began to write to Cidimira, evidencing this verity, her modesty could not hinder her from willing his love to Cidimira, was now buried in oblivion, though she was resolved not to testifie any affection to Artemidorus, nor to act any thing which might in the least blemish her reputation, unless he first by his amorous, yet real expressions, confess'd Cidimiras inconstancy had stop'd the progress of his love; and that he made to her a total resignation of his heart: But not knowing how to compass the discovery of this design, Artemidorus presented her with an opportunity to effect it; for after he had visited Asranor, and the Princess Philonice, he thought himself so obliged to Berelisa, that she might justly chalenge the next visit; he therefore went to her Chamber, and found her in her Cabinet, there there being nigh her on a little Jasper Table, the Pourtraicture of Clidimira (the case whereof was shut) her Letters were likewise there, he not knowing whose they were, by reason he could not see the Writing: Her eye no sooner reached him, but Berelisa blushed, and would have treated him with more ceremony than ordinary; but Artemidorus opposed it with much address: I pray, Madam, (said he, in a low voice approaching to her) remember that 'tis but for you I am Artemidorus at Agrigentine, and that in what estate soever I may be, I should have more glory by respecting you, than by receiving so many inutile demonstrations of your Bounty. After that she desired Artemidorus to take a seat, which having done, he earnestly entreated her to render him that Letter he had begun to write to the person whom he loved. That Person, replied Berelisa blushing, is so unworthy to receive, that I believe my self bound not to restore it to you. Ah, Madam (cry'd Artemidorus) it appears you do not know her, for I can assure you, if you knew her. I know not (replied she, her Cheeks being stain'd with Blushes) what I should do, if I knew her by my self, but I am very well assured I hate her for the love of you; for not to vail truth with artificial conceits, you love an unfaithful person, who certainly is very affectionate to them she loves, but who contracts an irreconcileable hatred against those whose affections she hath deserved. But, Madam, (cry'd Artemidorus, much astonished at those words) I have not told you the Persons name whom I love, and I believe 'tis impossible since yesterday you should have notice of it. To demonstrate to you what I know (replied she, opening the case where Clidimiras Pourtraicture was enclosed) see if you know this Picture. Ah, Madam, (cry'd Artemidorus) I know it too well, if 'tis true, Clidimira should be unfaithful; but, Madam, (added he, changing colour) who gave you this Pourtraicture, which was at first intended for me, and which had not received the last hand of the Painter before my departure? Hath not Clidimira sent it me to bring me some consolation during my imprisonment? And hath not this charming person, heving notice of the place of my residence, by some way unknown to me, thought by this means to obstruct my death? You will see by this Letter (replied Berelisa) giving him one her Brother had left her; and Artemidorus taking that she offered to him, suddenly opened it, and knowing the Characters were framed by Clidimiras hand, he read these words,

Clidimira to Telesis.

I Confess to you Artemidorus hath given me many testimonies of affection, and likewise assure you this Picture was at first designed for him; but the mutability of my Fortune intruding many intimable obstacles to impede the progression of this love, my reason did at last free me from it; and as I doubt not but absence will be a sufficient remedy to cure the affection of Artemidorus, I freely engage my self to permit yours; and promise you (as you desire) that if his love receives no variation, it will not in the least alter my intent, of having no Commerce with him, and of loving Telesis, whilst he perseveres in his love to Clidimira.

Whilst Artemidorus read this Letter, Berelisa attentively fix'd her eyes upon him, and noting the change of his countenance, expressed some emotion of joy; which Artemidorus taking notice: What, Madam, (said he to her) have you the cruelty (though you exceed in all excellent qualities any person in the World) to acquaint me with such doleful news? For in fine, there's nothing more cruel than to know Clidimira is inconstant, and that my Rival is the Brother of the generous Berelisa, to whom my obligations are innumerable: But, Madam, (added he) how can I so soon deface Clidimiras Image engraven in my heart, for whom I have acted those things which deserve a larger compensation; for her alone I have contracted the anger of the Prince my Brother, for her I have destroy'd my Fortune, and rejected Glory; can it be then possible that Clidimira, from whom I have received so many amorous testimonies, should resign her love to another? Speak, generous Berelisa speak, for though I have accused you of cruelty, you can bind me in no stricter obligation, than to discover all you know of Clidimiras infidelity, and to suffer me to peruse all her Letters which serve to the confirmation of it. I will voluntarily do it, replied Berelisa, on condition you promise me not to be my Brother's Enemy, who hath not injured you, since he knows you not, and that he believes you did not in the least pretend to her, when she engaged her self to him. Ah, Madam, replied Artemidorus, 'tis not possible for me to promise you not to hate a Rival, crown'd with the Title of Happiness; and all that I can promise you is, That your amity shall retain the effects of my hatred against Telesis: Speak then, Madam, speak, but do not speak yet, and let me first see all Clidimiras Letters; and she having given him one, he opened it, which contained these words,

Clidimira to Telesis.

IF Joy is a favourable Disposition to Love, you will sometimes find me the pleasantest person alive; I know not whence it proceedeth, whether from the simple effect of my Temperament, or from the Conquest of your heart; and neither you nor Fortune can ruine this serene humour, unless you banish my love from thence.

Ah Clidimira (said Artemidorus, casting this Letter on the Table) 'tis your gayety will chanel my Cheeks with tears, but 'tis requisite for me to know how far your perfidiousness hath transported you; and opening another Letter, he was much surprised to see 'twas one he had formerly wrote to Clidimira; which he would have sacrificed to his anger, had not Berelisa hindred him. Ah Artemidorus (said she to him) what intend you to do? I am but the depositary of these things I shew you, I ought to render them to my Brother, with whom I should have great contestation, had I lost that he confided to my care. But, Madam, said Artemidorus, can I suffer a Letter I heretofore wrote to Clidimira, to be in my Rivals hands? Look on another (said she) and let me view that: and Berelisa by an amorous curiosity being dispos'd to read that Letter, Artemidorus desired to hear it read, conceiving it would be a means to heighten his intended hatred against Clidimira; and Berelisa opening it, it spoke these words.

Artemidorus to Clidimira.

I Shall have this day, Madam, the honour to visit you, but 'twill be only in Ceremony, and with as much care to smother my passion, as I should have had in the Declaration of it: Pity me, I pray you, and whether my spirit suffers an Eclipse or not, assure your self, that the sole love of the admirable Clidimira, can either give or deprive me of it, and that neither my words or silence serve but to evidence your dominion over me.

I spoke this, Madam, said Artemidorus, when I believed Clidimiras heart was moulded in the same frame as mine; but alas, her thoughts now stream in another current! After this he opened one of Clidimiras Letters, characters in this manner.

Clidimira to Telesis.

I Think you ought to be assured of my affection, when I tell you I love you; and that I voluntarily resolve (without my Parents consent) to desert my Country, and run your Fortune. But since you require new assurances of my Love, I declare to you, that if I ever violate my promise, I willingly consent you should blot me out of your remembrance, as I have Artemidorus out of mine.

Ah! 'tis too much, cryed this afflicted Lover, and I should degenerate from all men, if I should still retain the same affection for Clidimira: But alas (added he) I cannot hate her when I would! I crave your pardon, said Berelisa to him, for occasioning this distemper; for I imagined my self obliged (Clidimira being soon to be titled my Sister) to incense you against her, that you might sequester a Passion from your Spirit, which would infallibly rob it of all repose. I am bound to you Madam, (replied Artemidorus) for your good intention; but my obligation would be extream, if you would so far honour me, to condescend to permit my love, to the end my heart might be imprinted with an indelible hatred against Clidimira. Berelisa blushed at this discourse, and had not power to shape a reply: 'Tis true, Artemidorus took notice of it; for his grief did so exceed the limits of moderation, that he scarce knew in what language he had expressed himself to her: And having entreated Berelisa to relate to him the commencement of the love of Telesis for Clidimira, she told him, the same day he departed from Leontine, Telesis there arrived; and seeing Clidimira come forth of the Temple of Ceres, where she had been enclosed, lest she should see Artemidorus, he at first sight found her so amiable, that he sought her acquaintance; and having the happiness to please her, she had so much joy to find her self free, after she had endured such a long imprisonment, that she was resolved to deliver her self from a Pareille persecution, by forgetting her first Love; and to suffer that of Telesis, who engaged himself to her at his departure, to return to espouse her, as soon as he should have obtained Afranor's consent. But, said Artemidorus to her, is not this a delusion of Clidimira, to acquire some tranquillity during my absence? No, replied Berelisa, my Brother hath told me, that what you alledge being suspected, Clidimira submitted her self to the proof of that famous and sacred Lake, which (as you know) clears all dubious conjectures. But as we are not acquainted with the operations of it, said Amilcar interrupting Zenocrates, and that the reports which are framed thereof do not give us a plenary satisfaction, we entreat you (as far as you know) to content our desires. As I am in Leontine, replied Zenocrates, I cannot give you so full an instruction as others; I only know 'tis a general opinion, that when one assures any thing as true, and that he swears it on the brink of a Lake nigh Leontine, if he writes his name on a little Table of Wood, destin'd to that purpose, and that he casts it into the middle of that Lake, it floats at the top, if what he says is true; but if false, it descends to the bottom: It is likewise ascertained, that he which is perjured, is at the same time seised with a kind of a slow consuming Fever, which pines him to death. And this opinion is so received at Leontine, that when a person puts himself to the Tryal of Dela, for so 'tis called, the verity of the words are unquestionable. Berelisa having told Artemidorus, Clidimiras affection to Telesis was experimented in this manner, his affliction was so unconfined, that Berelisa repented her self for having reduced him to such extream misfortune: He was not transported with anger against Telesis, but complained of none but Clidimira, all whose Letters he severally perused; but the more he read, the fuller evidence he had of her infidelity: At length Berelisa smoothed his grief with such obliging words, that he rescued part of that consolation his affection had put to flight; for, said she to him, it grieves me that my Brother should occasion your displeasure: 'Tis not (added she) since Clidimira was capable of change, she would not have changed, if my Brother had never seen her; for I believe inconstancy doth not so much proceed from one who particularly delights those which are capable of infidelity, but because their pleasures are generally sway'd by novelty: therefore generous Artemidorus, seek to consolate your self, till your good fortune presents you with a Person more constant than Clidimira, to recompense penſe that fidelity you have waſted on an unfaithful perſon. Ah, Madam, ſaid he to her, were it poſſible for me to unchain my heart from Clidimira's love, and level it at another object, would you counſel me to expoſe my ſelf to ſuffer ſuch unparallel'd affliction, as I now endure? If I believed (replied Berelisa bluſhing) that all women were as unfaithful as Clidimira, I would not inſinuate ſuch dangerous counſel; but, Sir, I cannot harbour ſuch an ill opinion of my Sex, as to believe it impoſſible to find a conſtant Virgin; I know there are many that deſerve that Title. Alas, Madam, ſaid he to her, I fear I ſhall not be ſo happy to diſinchant my ſelf from this paſſion; I would now act the moſt difficult things imaginable to force my hatred againſt Clidimira; I would willingly reſign my affection to another, though a thouſand dangers attended it; but I feel in my heart ſuch a grand confuſion of Jealouſie, Grief, Anger and Love, that I know not which of them will be the moſt predominant. In the mean time, Madam, added he, the friendſhip and reſpect you command from me, retains me from expreſſing any anger againſt that happy Rival, which triumphs in my miſeries; and believe that except the unfaithful Clidimira, never any perſon could claim the like eſteem as you; Diſpenſe therefore (Madam) with ſo much goodneſs, as to alleviate my affliction, and let me find more ſtability in your friendſhip, than the love of that inconſtant perſon hath denyed me. I aſſure you (replied Berelisa) that if it lay in my power, I would ſoon period your misfortune; but as that depends more on Artemidorus than Berelisa, diſquiet not your thoughts, but yield to reaſon, which will ſoon remedy this unjuſt grief. Ah, Madam (replied he) this Diſeaſe deſtroys the cure of reaſon. After this Artemidorus incited by an irreſiſtible motion, would have opened the caſe of Clidimiras Portraicture; but Berelisa who feared the ſight of this Picture would rather encreaſe than decreaſe his Paſſion, took it from him, and told him he ought now to contemplate nothing but the infidelity of his Miſtreſs. You have reaſon Madam, ſaid he to her, I would hate Clidimira, and I would have your friendſhip be my ſole conſolation. But generous Berelisa (added he) why do you not endeavour to heal the paſſion of Teleſis? for as Clidimira hath left me for him, ſhe will perhaps deſert him for another; do him this courteſie, and by this means you will act my Revenge. For what concerns my Brother (replied Berelisa) I have no deſire to blot out his affection, it being not ſo eaſie to cure a Beloved as a Deſerted Lover; and for what concerns you, I would rather gain Clidimira twenty lovers, than deprive her of one, that your hatred might extend ſo far as never to permit any reconcilement. After this Artemidorus expreſſed many obliging words to Berelisa, but they were ſo interweaved with others which glanced on his former affections to Clidimira, that he hearkned to them with different reſentments; when he was returned to his apartment, he eſteemed himſelf ſo unhappy, that he wiſhed his death had anticipated that day in which he loſt his liberty; for he was at variance with his Brother, he had deſtroyed his Fortune, he was a Princes Priſoner enemy to him from whom he derived his extraction, he ſaw himſelf caſhier'd by that perſon, who had wounded his heart, he had a Rival, which generoſity and gratitude forbid him to deſtroy, being a Virgins Brother to whom he ow'd the favourable treatment he received in his reſtraint, and who knew him to be the Prince of Leontine's Brother; not knowing then how to direct his thoughts, his ſole conſolation was Berelisas friendſhip. On the other ſide this amiable Virgin was not exempted from inquietude; for though her joy exceeded the ordinary limits of moderation, ſhe having introduced Anger and Jealouſie into a Lovers heart, from whence ſhe would have baniſhed love; yet ſhe feared his deſpight would not aſcend to ſuch a degree, as utterly to extirpate this love, and that if this firſt ſhould be extinct, his heart would remain incapable of a ſecond Paſſion: The words of Philonice tending to the concluſion of the War, did in ſome meaſure heighten her grief, becauſe ſhe imagined Peace ſhould no ſooner be compoſed, but Artemidorus would receive his liberty, and that ſecret love, which had ſeal'd the Fortreſs of her heart, even forced her to wiſh the declaration of the true quality of Artemidorus, to the end his liberty ſhould not be ſo ſoon licenſed, ſhe conceiving his life would not thereby be expoſed to any danger: But generoſity ſoon ſtrangled theſe unjuſt thoughts which Love would have imprinted in her mind.

In the mean time the charming Philonice, who thought of nothing but how to manage the reception of the Agrigentine Prince with moſt magnificency, ſent out her Orders to that purpoſe, ſo that all the Ladies were wholly imployed in providing thoſe things, which might moſt advantage their perfections; the Princeſs was likewiſe advertiſed by a Letter from Cliſias, that the day the Agrigentine Prince ſhould come to Cariſalis, ſhe ſhould receive a Letter from the Syracuſan Princeſs, who is a Perſon embelliſhed with all thoſe Graces which compleat a perfect Beauty: Her Body ſhaped with ſuch exact Symmetry, that Nature hath here ſhewn how far ſhe tranſcends the Art of the moſt curious Pencil: For the Prince of Syracuſa having ſent me to the Agrigentine Prince at that time as he ſent Teleſis to him, the Princeſs of Syracuſa entruſted me with a Letter for the Princeſs Philonice; and having told Cliſias, when I arrived at the Camp, he gave her notice of it; and when I delivered her Letter, ſhe parted with ſo much goodneſs, as to receive me with an extraordinary civility, bringing a Teſtimony of the Friendſhip of ſuch an exquiſite Perſon.

But before I relate to you what paſſed that day the Prince of Agrigentine returned, 'tis expedient for me to acquaint you with three things, to the end the Narration of this Feſtival might prove more delightful to you: The firſt, that I had been a long time one of the principal friends of Artemidorus. The ſecond, that I believed he had undertaken a long Voyage, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting he was a Priſoner at Agrigentine. The third, That 'tis neceſſary to deſcribe the Scituation of that place the amiable Philonice had ſelected to receive the Prince her Father; for I ought to render juſtice to this Beautiful Princeſs, to demonſtrate to you that there appeared both Spirit and Judgement in all her actions; and there

hapned in this place so many things depending on this History, that I believe I shall not traverse my reason by describing a place which hath given me so much delight, both by its natural Beauty, and by the merit of him who resides there: For Cleodamas to whom Carisalis belongs, is a Person of eminent desert, whether one considers the grandezza of his Spirit, or the solidity of his judgement, his capacity, politeness, integrity, gallantry, or generosity; But to execute my Design, Carisalis is a place so framed for pleasure that 'tis impossible to give you a perfect description of it; 'Tis not one of those whose Beauty appears by the opposition of the circumjacent places; for you no sooner come from Agrigentine, but fair objects salute your eyes; the way lies in a direct line, a river with its silver streams travelling along with you this pleasant Voyage, the diversity in all places where you pass, and the only pleasure of the beautiful prospect, seems to cheat the length of the way; 'tis even so singular, and the ascension so inperceptible, that you receive no incommodity by it, though 'tis scituated on a mountain; this mountain is crown'd with a great Plain, it having nothing ordinary but the commodity to discover all the Beauties of the adjoyning fields, to limn out in lively colours this amiable Country in general, 'tis sufficient in particular to character Carisalis; Imagine as if you were now in a Court of a proportionate grandeur to a Building your eyes at your entrance survey on the left hand, the symmetry whereof framed to breed delight; on the Superficies is a Balustrade, beyond which is a kind of a Rustick Vestibulum, the Columns whereof are Cypruss; This Vestibulum is bounded by a row of great Trees, placed on purpose there to hinder at first sight the pleasure which doth compose this place; on the top Madam of the prementioned mountain, there is a grand Parterre, like a Terass, along which is contrived a Walk, flanked with fair Trees, you ascend this Walk by two stately steps, between which are two Balconies erected, fixt to a marble Balustrade, from whence one might discover so many different objects, that I fear I shall be taxed either of equivocation or exaggeration, if I only represent a part of them unto you; for in fine, Madam, there is to be seen all those which frame a delightful prospect, you may see many remote and cacuminous mountains, embroydred with spreading Trees of a famous Forrest, which without constraining the sight, confine it to an agreeable arrest; but before your eyes meet with these Mountains and Forrest, a great and pleasant River for some while detains them, which to shew it self with a better grace, forms a Crescent, whose horns of Silver, (if this term is not in Prose inconsistent) bury themselves in the grass of two delicate Meadows; but as if 'twas not sufficient to see this fair and great River, there is a less, which not daring to appear so nigh the other, presents but a little Rivulet, which diverse times shews, and then again hides it self; for sometimes its Maanders deludes the eyes, and sometimes one may see its Argentine Streams shine through the Willows, and run into a little Valley expressly made for modest Ladies to bath their naked Limbs: This fair Valley is at the foot of a little hill, so pleasantly seated; that no words can reach the full description of it: For, Madam, there is a thousand agreeable inequalities: You may see Groves with little Rustick Houses, a small Village where an Hill almost denies the sight of the eye, a little Temple, and several other things which have now slipt my memory; on this side between the great and little River, there's divers Meadows enclos'd with Willows, as if they were several Halls destin'd for rural Sports: This Country is so spacious, directly oppolite to the Parterre, that you may see all that which the industry of Agriculture hath taught men for the preservation of life, and Nature hath so stor'd the Fields with diversity of Flowers, shaded with such exquisite colours, that all others serve but as Foyls to set forth the lustre of this amiable place. I may likewise very well say, this Country hath all the tranquillity of a solitude, though not so dismal as Deserts, for the great River hath boats of all sorts, the less hath sometimes Shepherdesses, which in their Bathing sport themselves in this watry Element; and all these Meadows are as it were sown with flocks of Sheep and Pastures: This is not all the beauty of Carisalis, for behind this high Ally from whence you may discover so many things, is an agreeable Wood, the beauty whereof cannot be limited to any praise; 'tis of no great extent, there is eight principal Alleys, in the middle of which is a Statue of Venus, they are divided into several little paths and solitary retirements, which so often cross one another, that one may weary themselves and not find the place where they first entred: There are seven Cabinets, every one carv'd a several way, the Trees are so fair, the Ground is so plush'd with verdant Grass, and the Shade so charming, that my eyes never met with a fairer object: The Air is so pure, and the sight of two Rivers so sweetly seduces the imagination, that it dispels those melancholy cares which oppresses a Lovers breast; the scituation of the place doth admit of several prospects, the eight great Alleys of the Wood have different objects which limit the sight; one faces a Balcony inscrib'd with divers curiosities of Art, another a pleasant Grove, there's one which looks on the Plain, another from whence your eye cannot reach heaven; in fine, there's such an alluring diversity in this place, that none can come in competition with it. This variety of objects runs through all the parts of the Building, but especially from an high Hall you may take a full survey of this delightful place; there's round about Carisalis many Structures which have consum'd inestimable Treasure, and if they are advantag'd by Art and Magnificence, yet Nature is deficient, which lively shews it self in Carisalis. This Building being thus adorn'd with singular advantages, 'twas a fit place to receive a Prince who returned plum'd with victory.

The Princess Philonice forgot nothing which might contribute to the honour of the Prince her Father; Afranor went at the head of all the Agrigentine men of quality; to meet the Prince six miles beyond Carisalis, and from thence to Agrigentine; the Inhabitants of the City which us'd to bear Arms, ranked themselves in a Warlike posture, the Princess followed by Berthsa and the fairest Beauties of the Court, habited alike; in magnificent Chariots went to Carisalis, where Cleodamas

Lucas received her with his accustomed Civility. But before I acquaint you with the reception of the Agrigentine Prince, you must know that every Lady was accompanied by a person of quality, when she mounted on horseback to meet the Prince, for Philonice had retained as many Men as Ladies, which in sumptuous Apparel should illustrate the glory of this day: She desired Artemidorus to wait on Berelisa, telling him that since he was her Prisoner, 'twas fit he should supply that Office: Artemidorus whose melancholy had altered his disposition, excused himself, fearing to be known in such a confluence of people; but Philonice and Berelisa added so many perswasive entreaties, that he at last complyed with their desires: As all men ought to be invested in the richest attire in this occasion, Aspasius offered to supply Artemidorus with all things necessary, but he refused to accept his courtesie. To return to Carisalis, no sooner had Philonice notice that the Prince her Father was some miles distant from thence, but she mounted on her Horse, followed by twenty Ladies of Quality: These Ladies were habited as Diana's Nymphs are painted, they had a Bow in one hand and a Quiver on their Shoulder; their heads were adorned with Coifs of Plumes, mixt with such lively and different colours, that they composed the finest and imaginable object: In this Plain I have before mentioned, which is on the top of the Mountain, on the right hand from Carisalis, Philonice amongst the others, seemed Diana her self, for such a noble air, and such an innate modesty appeared in her face, but as a mark of distinction, her Bow and Quiver were enamelled with precious Stones, the Tower of Plumes which framed her Coif, had a knot of Diamonds, which represented that demi-Crescent placed on Diana's head, every Lady was attended by a person of quality, proudly mounted and richly habited, who seemed to be there to serve and defend her, and every one had two slaves cloathed in her colours, with Collars of Silver, who marched on both sides her Horse, to stay him if need should require: And to signifie the arrival of this gallant Troop, there was an Harmony part Pacifick and part Warlike, which infinitely pleased; and after all these Ladies came all the Officers of the house of the Princess, and after them two hundred Archers on Horseback, which equally divided themselves both before and behind: The day was fair, and the way so commodious, that every Knight entertained his Lady with what discourse he best imagined would conduce to her delight. Artemidorus being nigh Berelisa, the secrets of whose heart lay open to her knowledge, turned towards her, and fetching forth a sigh, thus said: I could wish, Madam, the unfaithful Clidimira did behold me this day, for you are so attractive and amiable, and the dress so becomes you, that certainly she would believe you are the Goddess who sways my thoughts, and I am so acquainted with her humour, that I am confident she would be highly displeased. Your expressions savour too much of flattery, replied Berelisa, yet to recompense you, I willingly consent to be the immediate cause of your revenge; and though I fancy not the reality of your words, I should be extremely satisfied should Clidimira credit this perswasion. Madam, replied he, you are composed of too much goodness, to interess your self in my revenge, but to render it effectual, I must submit to love you, and you may not contract any hatred against me. Truly, replied Berelisa smiling, which of these two things believe you the most impossible? It seems to me a sufficient difficulty to oblige a person who never affected any thing to begin to love, and there's as much to relinquish one, and assume another love. Ah! Madam, replied Artemidorus, I am not in a condition to reason on that question you have proposed to me; all that I can answer, is, that sometimes I hate Clidimira, and am transported by an earnest desire to love another, but I dare not pronounce your name. As Artemidorus thus spoke, he was interrupted by a Lady marching behind Berelisa, who jestingly told him, He was so attentive to his Discourse, that he noted not the appearing of the Agrigentine Prince: These two Troops following their received Orders, made a stand at an equal distance, from a great triumphant Arch erected in the middle of the way which traverseth this Plain, the Prince of Agrigentine was preceded by those who made a warlike harmony, who were followed by five hundred men on Horseback with Javelins in their hands: Next came the Officers of the Prince's houshold, who led many stately Horses, the Guards of the Agrigentine Prince came after them, and next came the Prince himself at the head of many Officers of the Army, and men of Quality: Though this Prince had out-past his juvenile years, yet he appeared on Horseback with more grace and vigour than any of the Courtiers, he was this day richly habited, and his Deportment alone spoke him Master of his Followers. As I was a stranger, and had been sent to him by a Prince whom he highly esteemed, he vouchsafed me all imaginable honour, retaining me always nigh him: For Terillus who was a great adorer of Berelisas beauty, and who desired the first advantage of her sight, he was in the first rank: 'Tis true his condition claimed that place, but his Love proved the more forcible inducement; as some days were fyl'd on the Register of time since my arrival at the Camp, I had heard there was an unknown Prisoner at Agrigentine, whom Terillus had taken when the Trees began to shoot forth their vernal blossoms, whose Spirit and Behaviour commanded respect from all. No sooner did these two Troops come in sight of one another, but those who made the harmony hastned their pace to joyn at the Triumphant Arch erected in the Plain, where they made a kind of Military Consort, which in its irregularity seemed agreeable: After that those which preceded the Prince and Princess, ranked themselves on the right and left hand; these two Troops slowly marching towards one another, the Prince of Agrigentine (who is an accomplished Gallant) remained at the head of his Troop twelve paces from the Arch, saying it appertained to none but the Ladies to pass under the Triumphant Arch: He therefore caused them one after another, followed by their Knights and Slaves, to go under this Arch; after which they went towards him, wheeling on the right hand, to resume the way of Carisalis: Then the Prince and those which were with him, saluted all the Ladies with much civility, which they repaid with an obsequious flexure: This Prince noting every Lady had but one Knight, commanded some of those which attended him to supply the vacant place; for which purpose he elected the chiefest of his Train, except me, whom he only chose as a Stranger, and instead of giving every Lady him who had the greatest desire to wait on her person, he separated all those which he conceived had any familiarity with one another: He did it principally to please Berelisa, who did not affect Terillus, though he waited his time in courting her affection. For the Princess, she had with her the young Prince of Messina who was then in this Court, and the Prince of Ericine who is one of her alliance; but when Berelisa approached accompanied with her Prisoner, I was surprised at the sight of Artemidorus, but I expressed no mark of my astonishment; for knowing the contestation between the Agrigentine and Leontine Prince, I imagined he was not known; the Prince of Agrigentine willing I should accompany Berelisa as the most amiable person in the Court, and as favorite of the Princess his Daughter, declared to me so many things of this unknown Prisoner, that it confirmed my belief 'twas the same whose Character I had received in the Camp; for when Berelisa passed by, whose perfections did this day shine forth in their greatest splendor; Go Zenocrates, go, said he to me, lend us your assistance to discover this Unknown Prisoner; make love to Berelisa, more easily to effect it, whom I presuppose he now loves; for 'twould be a shame for him to have remained so long Prisoner of War in a Castle where she resides, and not become Prisoner of Love: Go then Zenocrates, go, added he, and endeavour the discovery of your Rival. I receive, Sir, so much advantage by your commands, replied I to him, that I am sorry time will not give me leave to return you thanks for such an unexpressible favour. But Madam, if I was surprised to see Artemidorus, he was no less at the sight of me, for I feared I had discovered him; and remembring he had seen me at Leontine when he made his addresses to Clidimira, my sight excited a commotion in his heart, which I taking notice of, and imagining from whence it proceeded, to resettle his troubled thoughts; ranking my self on th' other side of Berelisa, with a respective observance, thus said: Madam, the Prince of Agrigentine whose curiosity can be confin'd in the discovery only of this valiant Unknown, hath sent me to you, that I might share his happiness by attending your person: But Madam, added I, my infelicity would be extreme, should you deny your consent. You have so little knowledge of your pretended Mistris (replied Berelisa) that I would advise you not to obey the Agrigentine Prince. If you knew him who speaks to you, replied Artemidorus to her, you would know that several passions in his heart do at one time receive both their life and death: But I pray, added he, disguising my knowledge of him, forbid him to discover me, though he should happen to be one of my intimate acquaintance. We marched in this order to a place where we made a stand, because the Prince of Agrigentine desired the Ladies should arrive last at Corisalis, he therefore passed before them with all his Troop, that the fairest shew might conclude the Triumph. For my part, I confess my heart was wounded with the perfections of all those twenty Ladies, who accompanied the Princess Philonice; for as I am an universal Lover of all those objects which delight my eye, even at the first sight, and these twenty Ladies dressed in this Nymph-like habit appeared, graced with the accession of such charming features, that my amorous heart could not resist those piercing beams shot from their conquering Twins of light. In fine, we arrived at Corisalis, where Cleodamas welcom'd the Prince with an eloquent Oration, penn'd in such concise terms, that it far transcended the capacity of vulgar intellects: The Prince not desiring to return to Agrigentine till the darkness of the night began to ravine the days splendor, Cleodamas treated him with a magnificent Collation: But whilst things were preparing more ceremoniously to invite his stay, the Ladies by the assistance of their Knights dismounted from their horses, and went to breath out the fourth part of an hour in that high Walk I have before mentioned: For my part (I confess) never any sight did so much please my eyes, as these twenty Ladies and forty Knights: To avoid confusion, the Prince of Agrigentine had commanded all his other followers not to enter into the house of Cleodamas, but that they should be entertained in the fairest houses of the same Village, and not seeing in this Alley and the pre-mentioned Wood none but persons exactly proportioned in all the dimensions of their Bodies, and beholding their waving plumes and glittering habits through the leavy Boughs, I may confidently say, never any object did more deserve my attention, as the pleasantness of the place inspired joy; all the company were so fashioned to delude time with amorous discourses, that they perceived not the melancholy which denyed mirth to Artemidorus and the jealous Terillus: In the mean time Artemidorus had an urgent desire to confer with me, and on the first presented occasion, he briefly acquainted me with his adventures, demanding of me what I had heard concerning Clidimira, he not being ignorant that all memorable accidents which passed at Leontine were obvious to me. I know, said I to him, she is both ingrateful and unfaithful; and imagining she should be constrained, if she made not a publick recantation of your love, she engaged her affection to a deserving person, and submitted to the tryal of the Lake of Dela, to assure him of her fidelity: Therefore if you credit my words, I would advise you, by another love to banish this passion from your heart. Ah Zenocrates, said he to me, none can renounce love so soon as you. Time would not permit us longer discourse, for one came to advertise the Ladies that Dinner was now prepared: They were conducted into the fair Hall I have before mentioned, where they were served with all magnificence befitting persons of their condition; and the Prince of Agrigentine din'd with some of his Nobility in a low Hall, a foot higher than the Garden. The Ladies after this Repast entred into a fair Chamber, directly opposite against the Hall, with a part of the most accomplished Gallants, the rest remaining with the Agrigentine Prince, who related to Cleodamas divers things concerning the last Campagne: But entring there, Philonice whose curiosity extended to all delightful objects, cast her eye on a Picture hanging on the way to this Chamber, it being designed by a Virgin allied to Cleodamas; and as this Picture merited merited some observation, Philonice called Berelisa to see it: This Picture is framed with ingenious Art; one may see there a pleasant Country, with a fair Tree, at the foot whereof is a beautiful young person sumptuously attired, and behind her three Women, she holds a Distaff in her right hand, presenting it to Hercules, whom a young Cupid holds chained in a golden Chain, and drawing it with her left hand, she forces him to cast away his Club, and to take the offered Distaff; but better to explicate this Picture, the little Cupid holds in his right hand a Torch, and with the other retains the Fillet that blinds his Eyes, which seems to be fanned by the gentle Breizes of the Wind; underneath are some Greek words, which speak thus in our Language,

From my Fire proceeds my Force.

After Philonice had considered the explication of this Picture, she said (turning her self to Berelisa) That for her part she believed the power of Love proceeded not but from the debility of those whom it assaulted. But, Madam, (replied she blushing) do not you see Hercules, who appears far superior in strength to that young Child, forced by him to embrace what he desires. Ah, Berelisa, replied she, there's a certain weakness of heart commonly found in men, which is not incompatible with the force of the Body, nor with the greatest Valour: Philonice had hardly pronounced these words, but all maintained Love's Party: The Prince of Ericine amongst the rest, said, He could not admit Love to pass for Debility, unless in the hearts of those who persevere in loving an unfaithful person. Artemidorus, who felt himself touched with the expressions of the Prince of Ericine, changed colour, and could not frame an answer: Whereupon Terillus thus replied, that it argued not so much weakness to continue to love a person, though she had changed affection, as to persist in loving a person, whose affection 'twas almost impossible to acquire; for (added he) 'tis the greatest subject of complaint one can imagine, to court a Person without hope to attain her love. 'Tis doubtless a great unhappiness (replied the Prince of Ericine) but the inconstancy of a Mistress is far greater. Ah, Sir, (replied Terillus) 'tis more injurious not to be beloved, than to be deserted by a Mistress. After this, every one took the part either of the Ericine Prince, or Terillus, except Artemidorus and Berelisa, whose interest were engaged in this question; for if Artemidorus yet affected the inconstant Clidimira, Berelisa treated Terillus, with so much cruelty, that she saw he spoke against himself, to have occasion to speak against her; but as the conversation seemed curious to Philonice, she seated her self, and caused the other Ladies to take their places, the men standing before them, except some, who kneel'd upon Cushions, more conveniently to entertain their Ladies, whilst the Prince of Ericine and Terillus disputed nigh Philonice and Berelisa, on the precedent subject: For my part, replied the Prince of Ericine, I find no comparison between these two things; for as 'tis not impossible that a Woman who loves you not should esteem you, I find that in ceasing to love her, you are not obliged to hate her, that 'tis sufficient to render indifferency for indifferency, that you are even bound to express Civility to her, when you happen to meet her; and if you disesteem her, and unchain your heart, you sufficiently punish her for her injustice and insensibility, without adding hatred and despisal; but for an inconstant person: Ah, Terillus (pursued he) you cannot too much hate, nor too much despise her: I likewise assert, that if a man hath been very amorous, and hath believed his affection hath been requited, he cannot limit his hatred to an unfaithful person; and I believe 'tis very easie to cure his passion, by ballancing the grandeur of her love and her inconstancy; for by remembring that his anger will be screwed up to such an heighth, that he will think it punishment sufficient to requite her wavering nature, which should not be expressed to a person which hath contemned your affection, either through aversion or indifferency.

Ah, Sir, replied Terillus, our resentments are different, for I believe 'tis more easie and more just to despise a woman which hath slighted his love, than one from whom you have received many demonstrations of affection, though she retains those testimonies, and varies in her former thoughts; for 'tis the greatest injustice one can offer to an amorous man, who is permanent in his love, to reject his Passion; 'tis so natural to love them who affect us, that when a man is so happy to perswade his love to any person whom he adores, if this woman doth not correspond in her affection, disesteems the Lover, is averse to his Passion, or hath entertained another; if she loves another, she is criminal for permitting a new Lover to engage to serve her; if she doth but a little esteem him, the Lover should be very unjust to esteem her much; and if she is averse to him, he ought to retribute the like to her; and in what manner soever it should be, a generous Lover, which hath wasted many days, and not gained the affection of his Mistress, ought to hate and contemn her, who hath with such pertinacy resisted his love, since 'tis certain that ingratitude is a capital crime; and there is nothing more ingrateful than not to love those which loves us: For I have already told you 'tis so natural, that love produces love; that if this passion is not produced in a womans heart, which is ardently loved, it either proceeds from the small desert of the Lover, the capriciousness of the Mistress, or from the aboveſaid reasons; nothing seems to me more just, or ought more easily to be done, than not to have any esteem or complacency for an insensible person, I say one ought to requite her with all the civility a discreet person can be capable of: And if it was possible there should be any matter of indiscretion, between a neglected Lover and his Mistress, I think I should permit him to be indiscreet; for in fine, as he should have no indiscretion, which might make him be suspected of vanity, or which might injure the reputation of an unsensible person, it would be a sweet and innocent revenge; if I did not generally hold that Persons of Quality ought not to revenge themselves of their Ladies in the same manner as they would revenge themselves of their Enemies. I am of your opinion, replies the Ericine Prince, that an insensible person, to whom one hath given many testimonies of Love, if she ungratefully requites him, she merits the same ingratitude; but that which I maintain, is, that 'tis more easie to hate an inconstant than an insensible person, and that the revenge appears more just. On the contrary, replied Terillus, I assert 'tis more difficult to relinquish the love of an unconstant, than an insensible person, and that if a man hath been once favoured and affected by a Lady, he is indispensably obliged, not to be deficient in his discretion to her, though she hath changed her thoughts; but one should not so act with an insensible Mistress, of whom he might more innocently revenge himself, because her insultation is greater by beginning not to love her than the other, by deserving the affection of his Lady, nor can he be obliged to any discretion. But separately to speak of these two things, I will at first make you to see, that 'tis more easie for an abused Lover to dispel love from his heart, than for a Lover which hath been favoured; there is in the memory of a Lover obstinately despised, nothing which can or ought to retain love in his Soul; since that, if he call'd to remembrance the person whom he had served, he sees her cold, insensible, and always indifferent, if she remembers to have written to her, he will likewise remember that she hath not answered to him; or if she hath, her answers have contained no affectionate expressions; if he remembers his eyes have saluted hers, his memory will tell him, that he turned her face from him with contempt; or that she beheld him with a kind of stupid indifferency, which is insupportable in love; if he thinks what actions he hath performed to please her, he remembers either she hath slightly received, or scornfully disdained them, perhaps he hath praised her Beauty, but it often appears he hath thereby betrayed his judgement; for it often happens love inspires those fair which deserve not to be placed in that number: Moreover, a Lover hath no obligation to a person whom he loves without the same requital; so that his heart raising no opposition against his resentment, it seems easie to me, even by his anger to cure his love; honour likewise might do it with much facility; since there is nothing more fit to banish love, than the remembrance that one hath lavished much time in courting a person, which despises him, and who hath distinguished him from the rest of men by a secret aversion; but for a woman which hath once loved you, it is not so, for she hath esteemed you, and preferred you before all men; she hath chosen and confided in you; but 'tis not so in the other; for there's nothing in his memory but indifferency, which might retain affection; there is a thousand and a thousand thoughts in a Lovers heart which hath been beloved, which may retain his love in despight of the inconstancy of the beloved person, he may see tender and passionate Letters, not respecting the person who hath wrote them; she being unfaithful, he may behold her Pourtraict, no acknowledgement retaining his resentment, and even the possibility to revenge ones self, arrests a part of ones revenge, and every time one remembers so many amorous regards, so many obliging assignations, so many favourable discourses, and so many innocent favours, there's means enough to destroy the desire to reconquer the heart one hath lost, and likewise to destroy the hope thereof; for after he is assured he hath done all he can imagine to please her, since he hath pleased her; he thinks he is wanting in something, that in demanding pardon, he may recover the treasure he hath lost; and even supposes if he can accuse himself of nothing, but lay the whole accusation on her, 'tis a capricious humour which will soon vanish, and that then he shall receive more affectionate assurances than he did before; therefore hope may subsist in a Lovers heart, whose affection hath been entertained with a correspondency, though his Mistress hath proved inconstant, and there is much difficulty to disingage his Passion: To speak with sincerity, there's nothing so puissant to retain love, in an heart composed of tenderness, than to hope a pleasure he had before enjoy'd; one will sometimes recede from Glory to preserve his Conquest, and to hinder his Rival from gaining any profit by it; Jealousie which boasts it self to be the most puissantest Enemy of Love, retains it often in a Lovers heart deserted by his Mistress, when he is devoid of hope: Judge then (I pray you) if an indifferent Mistress, which gives you neither hope nor jealousie, can or ought to be difficult to forget, for the remembrance of the pass'd cannot render it amiable to you; the present exasperate you, or the future flatter you with success: But if you consent (replied the Ericine Prince) that 'tis more easie, and even more just to hate a person of whom one cannot be beloved, than one of whom one hath been favoured, though she hath now cancel'd all favours, consent likewise that a Lover is confined to a stricter limit with her, which hath always despised him, than with her which hath betrayed him; for she which hath never loved you, having promised you nothing, she hath not injured you so much as that person, who after she had sworn to you an eternal affection violated her word; and I conclude you ought to be more reserved to one than to another. I am of your opinion (replied Terillus) but 'tis not according to your Method; for I maintain that a man, who hath been uncivilly dealt withal by a woman, owes no more civility to her than to all women in general; I know not whether he can dispense with it in some occasions; but for a woman which hath once loved, I affirm, that if she at length hates him, he ought to respect her, and is obliged to discretion, though his love seems extinct; and as it is just that an abused Lover should ever perpetually keep in his heart the resentment of the ingratitude and indifferency of his Mistress, so a deserted Lover should ever preserve a kind of acknowledgement for his Precedent favours; and this recognition must even oblige him not to be so far transported, as to injure the reputation of his Mistress, from whom he once received favours, which might still deserve his love. I believe it (replied the Prince of Ericine, yielding to Terillus) for as all the favours of Ladies stream from pure Fountains; I am of opinion they may retract them when they please, without being termed indiscreet, principally when they practice no Gallantry; as I never never fathom'd the resentments of a forsaken Lover, and believe that I never shall be exposed to try those of an injured Lover; 'tis not strange I never attained to the knowledge of those excellent things you have so judiciously discoursed of; I have (it may be) less experience than you, in the Estate of a Lover forsaken by his Mistress (replied Terillus) and have more interest than you imagine (added he, looking on Berelisa) in the condition of a Lover whose Mistress slights all those favours he offers to acquire her esteem; but to take my choice in these two things, I had rather continue in the same resentments I now am, to have been once affected by the person I love, though she should vary in her affection, than to believe I shall never arrive to that happiness: The event is so dubious (replied the Ericine Prince) that we ought never to admit of despair; we commonly use those expressions to an unhappy person, replied Philonice, but there is some things we may confidently say will never happen, you have reason, Madam (replied Berelisa, on purpose to anger Terillus) for by Example, when one hath a natural aversion against any person; how is it possible to vanquish it; but if it is not possible to surmount a natural aversion (replied Artemidorus), is there any way to subdue a violent inclination? In truth, answered the Ericine Prince, I believe there's much equality in these two things; and that if it is not easie to expel hatred from his heart; 'tis very difficult to banish love from thence. Ah, Sir, (replied Berelisa, who would not have Artemidorus entertain this resentment) I assure you there's divers occasions, to which our hatred may not extend, and yet they blot out our love. Who will not say (replied Philonice) that Berelisa hath had many Lovers and many Enemies, which hath experimentally taught her to frame these distinctions? and how can't be true she hath never yet had either love or hatred. Ah, Madam, replied she, her cheeks being dy'd with a modest blush, if you had remembred my true sentiments, your language would not have so far exceeded—— I pray (said Terillus, interrupting her, speaking to her in a low voice) do not give a clearer explication of your thoughts; for the person to whom you speak, too well knows what she hath said: Berelisa had answered him, had not the Prince of Agrigentine entred, which caused all to rise from their seats; but every one was surprised to see the Prince so soon as he was entred go directly to Artemidorus, and looking upon Berelisa, Know (said he, to her) your Prisoner is a Prisoner of importance, and that if you have profited of the Counsel I heretofore gave you, when I desired you to inflame his heart with an amorous affection, you have gained an illustrious conquest. As I believe I have not done it, replied she blushing, I think, Sir, I may say for my honour I never had any design to effect it; Conquests of this nature being more often performed when one hath the least suspicion of them, replied the Agrigentine Prince, 'tis therefore impossible for me to give any direct answer, but expecting till you resolve my question; let me complain of the diffidence the Prince Artemidorus conceived of my generosity, by concealing his true condition; at these words, every one cast their eyes on this Illustrious Prisoner, who was plunged in a deep perplexity, for he knew not whether it was Berelisa, or I who had made this discovery; Berelisa, who suspected the thoughts of Artemidorus, sought by her eyes to justifie her innocency; and I likewise by some private signs evidenced to him, I was not conscious of this action.

In the mean time, as his heart is great and noble, he did not much study for an answer, for seeing he was known, he did not deny the truth, but ingeniously confest it, and addressing himself to the Agrigentine Prince, Sir (said he to him) I intreat you to believe you are not the cause of my disguise, and those who have declared my quality, have perhaps told you that I have departed from Leontine, but for an interest of State. I know it very well, replied the Agrigentine Prince, for the Parents of fair Clidimira, having sent hither a man express to inform of them Telesis, who is to espouse her; it hapned that this man being born at Agrigentine, though he resided at Leontine; and coming hither with a desire to see this solemnity, knew you; and being born my Subject, he thought himself bound by Allegiance to discover you to me: but when he acquainted me with it (added he) it seemed he had no design, but that you should live in splendor proportionable to your Quality; for he highly exaggerated the injustice of the Leontine Prince, and your own Merit; neither am I resolved to use you otherwise, nor to change any thing of your Fortune, but to give order you should be treated like a Prince: for though the Treaty of Heraclea be not concluded, you shall receive your liberty as if your condition was not known; I offer you likewise my Court as an Asylum, till the Prince your Brother remits his anger, and resolves to respect you according to your merit. Your expressions are so generous (replied Artemidorus) that I can frame no language to reach the grandeur of your excessive Favours, immeritedly bestowed upon me, nor can I requite your generosity, but by assuring you I will unsluce the azure Conduits of my Veins for your service, whilst Honour permits me to expose my life for your Interests.

After these words the Prince of Agrigentine saying, 'twas time to depart, the Princess thereto disposed her self, but not till she had made an obliging complement to Artemidorus, to whom all the Ladies, and the rest of the company did the like; Terillus did likewise salute him, but with a kind of compulsive civility; for remembring all those courtesies Berelisa had performed to this Prisoner, he believed it may be she knew him; and had more suspicion of it, because she expressed a great emotion of joy at the generosity of the Agrigentine Prince, when Cleodamas, who came with this Prince approached her, she could not restrain her self from testifying her satisfaction. Sage Cleodamas, said she to him, what say you of this adventure? You who can set a just price on heroick actions, how do you esteem this action of the Agrigentine Prince? and how do you like the reception of it by the Prince Artemidorus? I find (replied Cleodamas) you have your part in the glory of this day, since Artemidorus is your Prisoner, and that you were the first who knew his merit. As Terillus had attentively hearkned to the words of Bereliſa, his heart was enſlaved with ſuch a jealous paſſion, that ſwaying all his rational faculties, it retained Love, which was ready to forſake its reſidence. But not to intrude on your patience by reciting ſeveral things not material to this Hiſtory, I ſhall retrench them, and only tell you, that the Ladies having remounted on their Horſes, returned to Agrigentine, where the Prince was received with all the Ceremonies uſual in ſuch occaſions: before he departed from Cariſalis, he careſſed in a ſingular manner the ſage Clodamas, highly commending his ſumptuous entertainment: for the amiable Philonice, ſhe was ſo pleaſed with the delectable Scituation of his Houſe, that ſhe promiſed to retire thither ere Cynthia had once repaired her wained Horns, to paſs away ſome few days with more pleaſure and delight. I ſhall, Madam, tyre your attention by the recital of the Feaſt in the Princes Palace, or the Maſques and Balls, which laſted the ſpace of eight days: but ſhall only tell you, that the Agrigentine Prince incited by his natural genetoſity, forced Artemidorus to accept an equipage correſpodent to his condition; this Prince then appeared without conſtraint the moſt amiable of men, though his melancholy did eclipſe his humour; and eſteeming Bereliſa in a high degree, 'twas not eaſie for to vanquiſh her puiſſant inclination: As Bereliſa was the firſt Lady in the Court, to whom I had ſpoken, and who favoured Artemidorus, being my particular friend, ſhe teſtified unto me ſo much goodneſs, that I became wholly obliged to her; and ſometimes I imagined if my heart had not been already engaged, I had diſpoſed my ſelf to love her: Judging then Artemidorus by my ſelf, I counſelled him what I could to love Bereliſa. Alas, ſaid he to me, when I ſpoke to him of it, my heart is framed to love her, there's nothing I would not do to content her; and I eſteem her a thouſand times more than Clidimira: but I cannot raze that unfaithful perſon from my heart, & in deſpight of my anger, jealouſie and grief, my ſoul is diſturbed; when I ſuddenly hear her name pronounced, my imagination repreſents her to me, and my heart deſires her; and if my words may not be conſtrued in a degenerate ſenſe, my heart yet affects her, though ſhe is inconſtant: I am likewiſe reſolved (replied he) to re-enflame, or cure my paſſion, to write once more to Clidimira, to ſee if ſhe'll have the confidence to forbid me to love her, and always to deny love. I would have diverted him from his intention, becauſe I feared this perſon would flatter him with uncertain hope; but as his Deſign was abſolute, I aſſiſted him therein, commanding one of my men to carry his Letter, which contained theſe expreſſions, if my memory prove not trecherous.

The Faithful Artemidorus to the Inconſtant Clidimira.

YOur variable Nature (Madam) is the ſubject of all Diſcourſe; and though the Title of my Letter doth ſeem to evidence my Belief, yet I confeſs to you my doubts are not fully reſolved, till your own hand clear my ſuſpicion: I know you have given all my Letters to my Rival, that your Lines to him demonſtrate the Reality of your Affection, and that you have given him the Pourtraiture deſigned for me: Though theſe things may be convincing, your Writing only can render me happy, or undeceive me. I am perſwaded you fancy Love to acquire your repoſe during my abſence: For my part I ſhall not declare to you what affection ſways my heart, before you have reſolved my queſtion: Inform me then whether your Perfections are ſtill graced with a permanent Love, or whether your Inconſtancy hath deformed your Beauty.

Artemidorus ſomewhat ſcrupled to ſend this Letter before he had ſhewed it to Bereliſa, but as ſhe was the Siſter of Teleſis, he thought if he ſpoke to her of it, ſhe would not permit him to ſend it, at laſt he did not inſiſt on this conſideration, whereupon I gave it to one of my men, who went to Leontine, I having other Intereſts which obliged me to ſend thither: I know not (Madam) whether you remember I told you, that when Teleſis departed from the Camp to go to Syracuſa, where he was ſent by the Agrigentine Prince, who wrote to Bereliſa, he would go privately to Leontine, deſiring her to tell no perſon of it: It hapned that when Clidimira received the Letter of Artemidorus, Teleſis was there; you may judge then what anſwer ſhe returned to oblige the laſt, and to introduce deſpair into the firſt Lovers heart, ſhe wrote to him but theſe words, which doubtleſs were framed on purpoſe to baniſh love from the faithfull'ſt Lover Nature ever produced.

Clidimira to Artemidorus.

AS we ought never to engage to Love, without the Hope to be crowned with Felicity, I hold we may deſert that Love, to the end we ſhould not be plunged in miſery; therefore, Sir, Knowing the ſtars of your Fortune and mine hath diſtanced our Happineſs, I have changed my Affection, to change my Deſtiny: Forget, I pray you, all that which hath paſſed between us, as I am reſolved to bury it in Oblivion.

You may judge, Madam, this Letter quickned the anger of Artemidorus; for my part, I never ſaw any man more enraged after he peruſed it: What Zenocrates ſaid he to me, Clidimira! the ingrateful Clidimira, hath ſhe wrote unto me a Letter of this Nature, after ſhe hath buoy'd up my Love with Lines both tender and engaging! Can I ſtill preſerve an inviolate affection? Ah no, no, added he, I can hate her, I will hate her, and I already hate her, I will love another, or expire. Your thoughts are ſo various (replied I to him) that I fear you can reſolve on nothing. Ah! to hate Clidimira (replied he) I feel my ſelf already diſpoſed, and the difficulty is to know whether I ſhall perſevere in this hatred. If I was in your place (ſaid I to him) inſtead of perplexing my ſelf with hatred, which is an unquiet paſſion. I would aſſume love, Ah Zenocrates! (replied he) when one

one seeks it, 'tis not so easily found, for it commonly steals on you on a sudden; and after this adventure, I fear any more to enter the List against it; for I confess I never in the least apprehended that infelicity which hath happed; I lov'd, I was lov'd; I acted many things to please Clidimira, and I received from her the same demonstrations: In this condition my passion was glorious to me; I alienated my self from her to compass her repose; I never had any suspicion she would change her resentment; yet I was no sooner benighted from her piercing eyes, which had fired my soul with a beam of their mingled luster; but she deserted my love, and embraced another, thereby becoming the most unjust and unconstant Person in the World. Cannot you do by reason what she hath done by Inconstancy? replied I. Ah Zenocrates, said he to him, 'tis easie for you to counsel me, but 'tis not for me to pursue your counsel. Thus you see, Madam, how the spirit of Artemidorus was seated. As for Berelisa, her thoughts were divers, her aversion still reigning against Terillus, she had a violent inclination to Artemidorus of whose affections she had some expectant glympse of hope; but her heart was confusedly disturbed at her involuntary weakness. Terillus had both Love and Jealousie; 'tis true, he had heard Artemidorus was amorous at Leontine, but he saw him daily pay so many devoirs to Berelisa, which she accepted with so much satisfaction, that he repented himself for having presented this Prisoner to the Agrigentine Prince, not having left him concealed as he desired, he repented that he had took him; and though all his actions were noble, yet he repented for not depriving him of his life: Artemidorus always civilly acknowledged that curtesie he had received from him; and since his condition was discovered, he repayed him in generous and obliging terms.

In the mean time, the Treaty of Peace which appeared so nigh conclusion, was quite dissolved, so that the liberty of Artemidorus was as far distant as ever; 'tis true, he was not the more confined, for the Prince of Agrigentine suffered him to go on his Parol, highly esteeming and affecting him, though he was Brother to his Enemy; his esteem was augmented by the information he had, that the Prince of Leontine, having notice how Artemidorus was treated at Agrigentine, was so displeased, that he intended to declare him criminal; as if 'twas an effectual crime civily to use a Prisoner of War; and if the Princess of Leontine (his Sister) had not retained a part of his violence, he had accused Artemidorus of complotting with his Enemies, and proceeded against him as a rebellious Prince. But to enlarge his injustice, he fancied Telesis being at Leontine, and Artemidorus in this Court, the love of Telesis was but a fictive invention to carry Clidimira to the Prince his Brother, that 'twas but a feigned love, and specious Nuptials, and that Clidimira did yet affect Artemidorus: Being advertised Telesis was unknown at Leontine, he would have arrested him, and would have re-entomb'd Clidimira in the Temple of Ceres; as for Telesis, he could not have him in his power, by reason a faithful friend who concealed him, gave him notice of it, and advised him to return to Syracusa, where he had been sent by the Agrigentine Prince: For Clidimira she alledged her love was now extinct; but he would not credit it, neither would he believe the Tryal of the Lake of Dela; therefore to repose his Spirit, he designed to espouse Clidimira to some other; as she is opulent in riches, he found a person of Quality, who not being able to maintain himself in that garb his condition required, resolved to espouse her: But Clidimira was much afflicted at this new persecution, because she utterly disliked that person which was proposed to her.

In the mean time as this news was soon known at Agrigentine, the joy of Artemidorus was extream, when he had first notice of it. But Berelisas breast harboured inquietude; for she feared that the persecution this Virgin suffered for the consideration of this Prince, would foment his love; her fears proved not vain: The first emotion of joy being passed, Artemidorus became very passionate, being much afflicted because she was persecuted for the love of him; so that pity now changed that design, he had conceived to hate her: The Sun had not eight times measured this Terrestrial Globe, when there was an alteration in his thoughts; for we were informed at Agrigentine, Telesis had been secretly at Leontine, that Clidimira had invented a way to escape from the place where she was inclosed; that she was at Syracusa with Telesis, from whence he had sent to Agrigentine to demand permission of his Father to espouse this Virgin, and to bring her to his House, representing to him that he had already consented to the Marriage, and that the goods of Clidimira were of such a Nature, they might easily be transported thither.

Artemidorus hearing what Clidimira had done for Telesis, formed a resolution to banish her his heart, appearing somewhat displeased at the intended coming of Clidimira to Agrigentine: Asranor at first seemed highly incensed against Telesis; but as the Prince of Agrigentine is always favourable to Lovers, he straight allay'd the fury of his anger; for Berelisa she could not imagine what to desire; for it imported, her Brother should espouse Clidimira, but she wished not her company at Agrigentine, for fear her sight would revive love in the heart of Artemidorus, there was no means to obstruct it, because Clidimira being amiable, gained the esteem of the Syracusian Princess, whilst she resided there, for though this Virgin was stole away from Leontine, it appeared not so to every one, it being generally conjectured her Kindred had carried her from thence to free her from an injust persecution; one of her Aunts, coming with her from Leontine, therefore the Princess of Syracusa, who esteemed and loved her, wrote concerning her with so much affection to Philonice, that she obtained of her Father and Asranor what Telesis desired: Berelisa on the other side, durst not openly display the secret thoughts of her heart, and Artemidorus by the grandeur of his Soul, would not oppose the return of Telesis, since he could not solemnize his Marriage with Clidimira, neither did he believe in the estate he was now, he could render with honour any discourteous office to the Brother of Berelisa, and Asranor's Son, by whom he had been so civily treated during his imprisonment, he imagined how how apprehenſive his grief would be when he ſhould ſee Clidimira in the arms of Teleſis, who had already contracted his hatred though he had never ſeen him: Teleſis in the mean time, knowing his affection for Clidimira, would not come back to Agrigentine, till Hymen had tyed that indiſſoluble knot, which none but death can diſſolve: During this negotiation, Artemidorus was continually with Bereliſa, for he alwaies lodged in the Caſtle, and as ſhe is a moſt charming perſon; the more he ſaw her, the more he eſteemed and loved her; he did not imagine his heart was betrayed to her perfections, but conceived his ſpirit would ſtill retain his love to Clidimira; Bereliſa on her part did too well perceive, that if ſhe did not yet affect Artemidorus, ſhe might eaſily thereto diſpoſe her ſelf.

In fine, the Spring had no ſooner cloth'd the Trees in their verdant Liveries, when Teleſis after he had eſpouſed Clidimira at Syracuſa brought her to Agrigentine, the Troops being then ready to begin the Campagne, Artemidorus whoſe grief had impaired his health, was ordered by the Phyſitians for change of air to go to a pleaſant houſe in the Precinct of Cariſalis, at the ſame time, as Teleſis brought Clidimira to Agrigentine. It likewiſe happened that Philonice after the departure of her father, went to the houſe of Cleodamas to diſſipate that melancholy his abſence had contracted, accompanied by Bereliſa and four or five other amiable perſons; amongſt which was one called Lyſicoris, to whom Bereliſa confided her moſt ſecret thoughts, ſhe had not yet declared to her, her inclination for Artemidorus; but ſhe had acquainted her with her averſion for Terillus, his unhappineſs could receive no addition, he being jealous, his affection ſlighted, and being forced to go to the Army, and to leave Artemidorus with Bereliſa.

Things were on thoſe terms when Teleſis and Clidimira arrived at Agrigentine, as ſhe had Letters from the Princeſs of Syracuſa to Philonice, ſhe went the next day to Cariſalis, where ſhe ſaw her Siſter in Law, ſhe having a noble and ſprightly air, extreamly pleaſed Philonice who admitted her into her Chamber, and after ſome diſcourſe went with her to Bereliſa, who ſecretly wiſhed ſhe might not appear amiable to her; but ſhe was conſtrained to alter her deſire, and to confeſs ſhe was indowed with ſome charming features; Philonice thinking to pleaſe Bereliſa, intreated her to ſtay at Cariſalis; and Bereliſa not willing to oppoſe her was forced to thank the Princeſs for a civility which would conduce to her affliction: Artemidorus who was preſcribed ſome remedies to diſperſe his diſeaſe went not for ſome daies to the houſe of Cleodamas, and being very melancholy he had rather not ſee Bereliſa, who was his ſole conſolation, then to ſee ſo many other perſons; ſo that 'twas his onely divertiſement to breath his languiſhing thoughts, when night began to mantle the skie with a gloomy ſhade, nigh that little River I formerly mentioned, which travelled with its ſilver ſtreams through a delightful vale; for as heat did at this time uſurp the moſt part of the day, the evening and morning were onely commodious to invite our recreations; Artemidorus then every night repairing to this amiable place, commonly left his men a remote diſtance from thence, he one time deſcended, his melancholy not permitting him to note his way, into a little Grove, ore-ſpread with cloſe compacted buſhes, not far from a place where this little River formed a Demi-circle between two Meadows; but as he was ready to leave this little Wood, he ſpied through the buſhes many women at the brink of this pleaſant River, and it ſeemed to him his ears were invaded by Clidimira's voyce; for you muſt know this night all the Ladies who were with the Princeſs Philonice amongſt whom were Bereliſa and Clidimira, had deſigned to bath themſelves in this delightful place. When Artemidorus firſt perceived them, they began to re-inveſt themſelves with their apparel, 'tis not eaſie to divine his thoughts when he heard Clidimira's voice, ſince anger and hatred with ſome interval of pleaſure, mixt with curioſity did then ſurprize him, ſeeing he might make a nigher approach, he ſoftly ſtole between thoſe buſhes, till he had attained one which might ſhelter him from the Ladies ſight, and from whence he might over-hear their diſcourſe, when he was there, he looked upon the Ladies, who though newly come out of the Bath, were in ſuch a modeſt manner, they might not fear the ſight of the moſt curious eye, amongſt thoſe Ladies Artemidorus ſpyed Clidimira: hardly had he given paſſage to his regards, when he ſaw Bereliſa nigh her, but in a different nature, all the Charms of Clidimira being Epitomized in her face, her hands lean and ſqualid, her breaſt deformed, and not any part matching the agreement of her eyes, Bereliſa's hands are ſhaped with exact proportion, her breaſt white as ſnow, and all her other parts correſpondent, the beauty of the one diſplaying the defects in the other, Artemidorus was highly pleaſed at this ſight, imagining Bereliſa's husband would receive a far greater happineſs then Clidimira's. In fine, Madam theſe Idea's were ſo ſtrongly imprinted in his ſpirit, that when the fear of being ſeen commanded his retirement, he contemplated the remainder of the night, the ones beauty, and the others defect, remembring the infidelity of Clidimira, and all thoſe curteſies Bereliſa had conferred upon him, his perſon likewiſe did wholly employ their thoughts whilſt darkneſs blinded the World, they not imagining themſelves the objects which kept unſealed the incloſure of his eyes, for though Clidimira had the confidence to juſtifie her actions, ſhe fled the ſight of Artemidorus, and 'twas not poſſible for her to remember ſo many teſtimonies of affection ſhe had beſtowed upon him, without being confuſed at her inconſtancy: Bereliſa both feared and deſired this interview; for if Artemidorus ſhould never ſubmit his heart to her love, ſhe would have ſome ſatisfaction if he deſerted Clidimira, in theſe thoughts ſhe wiſhed the concluſion of this dangerous occaſion, fearing there might happen ſomething which might cloud her propitious fortune; for ſhe had acquired ſo much eſteem with Artemidorus, that to her his thoughts wore no cover; but as ſhe would not be too curious in prying into his Actions, ſhe intreated her dear Liſicoris to obſerve with a vigilant eye the Paſſages betwixt Clidimira and this Prince, ſhe did not relate to her the cauſe of her curioſity, though ſhe was one of her deareſt friends, colouring it over with her Brothers intereſt; for 'tis more difficult for a woman adorned both with ſpirit and vertue to confeſs a violent inclination to any perſon, who doth not expreſs his love to her, then to avow ſhe favours a Lovers paſſion, as the laſt adventure had armed Artemidorus againſt the charming force of Clidimira's eyes, knowing that if he went not to viſit the Princeſs at Cleodamas his houſe, ſhe would prevent him by coming to him, he determined to wait on her after dinner, which ſurprized the company, they not imagining the ſtate of his health had yet licenced him to leave his Chamber. When Philonice was informed of his arrival, ſhe was in the great Hall, I have formerly mentioned, no ſooner did Clidimira and Bereliſa caſt their eyes on this Prince, but their faces were ſhaded with a crimſon colour, which even planted his Cheeks with bluſhes; he could not conjecture whether this agitation proceeded ſtom his new or ancient love, confuſion did at this time ſo diſtract his ſenſes. In fine, after he had ſaluted Philonice, ſhe preſented Clidimira to this Prince, and knowing what accidents had formerly happened between them, ſhe did not ingage them in any long diſcourſe, but ſpoke to Artemidorus, who ſeeing now only the beauties of Clidimira, was glad he had diſcovered the diſſimilitude of her other parts, ſhe being ſo diſcreet that her hands never lay open to the ſight of any perſon, her breaſt was masqu'd with a pleated ſcarf, which barred the eye from deſcrying her deformed features, ſo that if any one had ſeen her dreſſed after this mode, would have judged the whole compoſure of her body proportionable to the ſplendor of her eyes; but Artemidorus contraryed this opinion, her defects being now as apparent to him, as if they had been viſible; for Bereliſa, he knowing the pure whiteneſſe of her breaſt, and the perfect ſhape of her hands, admired her modeſty for not diſcloſing thoſe things, which Clidimira concealed through affectation; and concluding it an effect of her vertue, began to feel his heart retreating from Clidimira's love, to be ſtormed with Bereliſa's perfections: as Clidimira's ſpirit was a little diſquieted, it ſtopt the Organs of her ſpeech, which incited Bereliſa's deſire to wing away the time in pleaſant diſcourſes; 'tis true her ſpirit was not yet re-ſtated in its former tranquillity; but knowing how far her beauty ſurpaſs'd Clidimira's, her joy framed her to this agreeable humour; Philonice after a little ſtay in the Hall, went into the Wood followed by Cleodamas and all this company; at firſt they diſcourſed of the beauty of the place, and clearneſs of the day, but the company being ſtrayed into theſe divers alleys; fortune placed Artemidorus between Bereliſa and Clidimira, all three were ſurprized to hear no words break from each others lips; the unfaithful Miſtreſs durſt not ſpeak to Artemidorus before her ſiſter, to appeaſe the diſtemper of his ſpirit, cauſed by the levity of her former actions; and Bereliſa willing to ſee to whom Artemidorus would addreſs his ſpeech, did not unlock the ſilence of her harmonious voice: this Prince not knowing in what language to expreſs himſelf, in the preſence of theſe two perſons, expected one of their tongues to ſupply its office; in this manner they arrived to a Balcony at the end of this Ally, where Philonice, Cleodamas and Lyſicoris ſtayed his coming; the Princeſs ſeeing them walk in this mute poſture, ſcarce taking notice of her, demanded of Artemidorus on what ſubject he entertained the attention of theſe two amiable perſons. I aſſure you (replied Bereliſa not giving this Prince leiſure to ſhape an anſwer) my ſiſter and I are not jealous of what Artemidorus hath ſaid, for he hath been ſo ſparing of his words, that he hath ſpoken no more to one then to another. I had more to ſay to one then another, replyed he, but I did not think it convenient to declare my thoughts; for my part (added Clidimira) being a ſtranger here, I did not imagine my ſelf obliged to begin any diſcourſe; for my particular (added Bereliſa) I am ſo pleaſed with my own idle fancies, that my words would have been a pennance to me for interrupting my ſweet repoſe: it ſeems to me (replied Cleodamas) that the fancies of ſuch an excellent perſon (as Bereliſa) if ſhe declared the ſubject of them, would produce much delight; for it only appertains to thoſe who have tender hearts, to be skilled in the pleaſures of a certain pleaſing deliberation, which diverts the ſpirit, and ſo ſweetly ſeduces reaſon, that one cannot define its inticing allurements: 'Tis true (replied Bereliſa) all mens humours do not comply with this delightful dotage, and there's many ſpeak of it, who believe it only conſiſts in licencing their Spirits rather to the motions of their hearts, then to the conduct of this imperious reaſon, to enjoy our pleaſant fancies we muſt let our ſpirits wander up and down, confine them no where, we muſt have ſomething in our ſouls which whiſpers no diſturbance, our temper muſt be inclining to Melancholy, we muſt think on ſomething which pleaſes us, and we muſt be capable of a certain Lethargie of the ſenſes, which imprints belief in all our thoughts, and the uſe of reaſon muſt be for ſome time ſuſpended; I ſay, we muſt but confuſedly hearken to the ſinging of the Birds, or the murmuring of the Springs, neither muſt our eyes diſtinguſh the diverſity of colours. Ah Bereliſa, cryed Cleodamas, you deſcribe theſe fancies too clearly to be ignorant of them. If idle Imaginations were a crime (replyed ſhe) I would ſubſcribe to your opinion, but as they are the moſt innocent pleaſures, I confeſs I know them, and that I ſometimes prefer them before all company whatſoever. But you do not dream (replyed Philonice) that you have ſaid, to draw theſe fancies to the life, there muſt be ſomething in our hearts which doth not diſpleaſe us. Pardon me Madam (replyed Bereliſa) but that ſomething I have named, is not that ſomething you imagine. I aſſure you (replyed Artemidorus) that if one mention ſomething that you have done, it will admit of no other explication then that of the Princeſs. Whatever it ſhould be (ſaid Cleodamas) I ſhould think that man happy which ſhould inſinuate into Bereliſas heart, that ſhe hath called ſomething, which in a vulgar expreſſion is termed Love. Bereliſa bluſhed at this diſcourſe, and fortune conducting Terillus to this place, they changed the ſubject of their converſation: on the contrary, Philonice finding her ſelf on a ſquare Baſe of ſtone on the right hand from the houſe as one aſcends the high high alley, Cleodamas sent for several embroider'd Cushions for the Ladies, who seated themselves in divers ranks on the two sides of this Marble stone, leaving the middle void, lest any person should hinder the sight of the Princess Philonice, as a mark of distinction from the rest, Cleodamas placed the Cushions destined for this Princess, at the foot of a fair Tree, whose distended branches served as an Umbrella to shadow her from the Sun's heat. All the company being seated, 'twas the fortune of Terillus to be next Clidimira, and of Artemidorus to be next Bereliſa; for Lyſiceris, she was next Cleodamas Philonice seeing these two dear friends separated, ask'd Bereliſa if she was not jealous to see Lyſiceris leave her for Cleodamas? Ah Madam (said Terillus, whose Jealousie even consumed his vital spirits) Do not so much injure Jealousie, as to believe it can be found in friendship, and do not deprive love of that thing wherein its power is effectually seen. Bereliſa who knew what consequence he would draw from his own words, opposed him, demanding (in an angry voice) on what reason he built his conjectures, that he durst affirm Jealousie belonged more to Love then Friendship? For my part said Artemidorus, as I never had but the Jealousie of Love, because my friends have always proved constant, I cannot give any satisfactory answer to this question. For my particular (added Clidimira, not seeming to take notice of what the Prince had said) I believe that as there is not a long love without Jealousie, so there is no Jealousie without Love; and that it cannot be admitted in friendship. For my part, said Philonice, I am such an enemy to Jealousie, that I dare not give my Judgement of it: I therefore constitute the sage Cleodamas to be the Soveraign Judge when Bereliſa and Terillus have alledged all they can to assert their opinions. I consent to't said Bereliſa: and I likewise said Terillus; whose Jealousie pressing him to speak, and he beginning to attaque Bereliſa, she declared she would not be denyed from interrupting Terillus when her fancy prompted her to do it. I consent thereto said he, on condition you will grant me the same liberty; but to speak ingenuously, added he, I think you will have sufficient difficulty to confute my reasons, without desiring that permission. There's none so ignorant said he, but knows Love produces Jealousie, and that they are inseparable concomitants; and that that which is called Jealousie in Friendship, resembles not the true Jealousie. Is it not certain that Jealousie is the violentest of Passions? That 'tis more sensible then Love which produces it? 'tis restless, cloudy, and sometimes furious? That 'tis capable to inspire all crimes, that it transports one to revenge, and that it often excites a man to dye his hands in blood? It admitting then this definition, can we believe it may proceed from Friendship, and that such a tumultuous Passion can spring from such a pleasing and peaceful Mother? To speak truth, Jealousie is an effect so necessary in Love, that one cannot be wounded with the Darts of Love, without being poysoned with the stings of Jealousie: For, if one hath no Rival, it receives production from several other things: By a Jealous resentment one envies the glory of the beloved object; one desires alwaies to be with her, to entertain her alone, to admire and adore her, one would have sometimes so much Jealousie essentially attach'd to Love, that the Beloved person should not love none of her acquaintance, that she should have no manner of attachment for sensible things, and I know not whether one would have her love her self, unless for the love of another; I know there's some injustice in these fantastick thoughts, but I likewise know that a prudent love is no love; and that the disorders of this passion which are blemished by no crime, compose the most sensible pleasure. Judge then if Jealousie which is the greatest irregularity of love, and from whence proceeds the most various subjects, can be found in friendship: For if you are not ignorant that this kind of affection is ordinarily produced more by reason than inclination, and that if the proper effects of things were ascribed to their right causes, Friendship would be termed a necessary effect of merit and virtue, since Friendship sways men to love all those who deserve esteem; but if it should not be so, 'tis true, there's friendship for many persons, and if one should yield to your opinion, there would be many jealousies which would be the terriblest things imaginable: All the world should then be filled with crimes, and as there's none but either love many, or one particular person, it would follow all the world should be jealous, and every one would seek to destroy or hate each other; and it may be a man would be so unhappy to have resentments of Jealousie mixed with the friendship of his Father, Mother, Brothers, Sisters, Kinsmen, Friends, Wife, Slaves, and Mistress. You exaggerated this so pleasantly (replied Bereliſa) that I am much pleased at it, for when one is constrained to insert agreeable things, when solid reasons are necessary, 'tis an infallible sign one maintains a wrong part. What (replied Terillus) do you believe that by explaining to you 'tis possible to have many friendships and many Jealousies, my reasons are more pleasant than solid? If you could prove your words (replied Bereliſa) I would not have said that which I have done, but far from consenting to that opinion, I pretend one cannot love nothing of which one might not be jealous: For without examining if there's reason to term jealousie a passion, or if one ought to consider it as a simple effect of the tenderness of our heart; let's look upon't in its self, Jealousie is not to speak properly, but a violent desire to preserve that we either affect or possess, and to hinder another from the enjoyment of that we would attain the possession: From whence I conclude, we may be jealous of all that we love, and that we cannot love anything without Jealousie. I know this resentment is sometimes so weak, that those which have it have no perception of it, but when 'tis so, 'tis doubtless that the attachment we have, which gives such a feeble Jealousie, is not great, and that those which have it, have a confiding Spirit, which makes them repose so much trust on their own Fortune, that they believe no power able to destroy that which they have once gained. But after all, whosoever loves any thing, wishes the possession of it, and desires to possess it when he hath acquired it, he hath even an inquietude to preserve it, proportionable to the inclination and reason which has

first it in his thoughts; so that the jealousie is stronger or weaker, according to the power of the attachment, and 'tis that which without doubt makes the difference between those effects the jealousie of love inspires, and those which are produced by friendship; but the difference which is seen between these two jealousies, are sometimes found in jealousies caused by the same passion: For Lovers are not equally jealous, the diversity of their Temperament and Fortune altering their resentments; and though they all have jealousie, yet perhaps in theirs is as much difference as between that of Love and Friendship: There's jealous persons who evaporate their sighs, complaints, and tears, in amorous verses; there's some whom Jealousie makes to compose a Song, and there's others whom it deprives of reason and vertue, who have recourse to Steel and Poyson, to carve out their revenge on the person they love; but this diversity doth not hinder that the jealous Lover, who only makes a Song to testifie his Jealousie, should not be effectively jealous, since 'tis true one cannot otherwise name a certain resentment which is produced in our heart, with the desire to acquire something of what nature soever: But to speak of Friendship, I affirm that though 'tis prudent, it cannot be tender, unless it be infected with a little Jealousie; I know that the jealousie of Friendship doth not take from us the light of our reason, and that it doth not make us act such fantastical things as the jealousie of Love; but Friendship is not tender, if we do not desire to be preferred before others, if we do not do all things we can imagine to effect it, if we have not some despite when we believe we have not attained our desires, if we are not displeased at those who we see preferred before us, and if we take neither care nor inquietude to preserve what we have gained; you will it may be tell me we may see a thousand and a thousand which have no sensibility of what you have alledged: To that I will answer, there are many persons who believe they love when they have no affection, and who call Friendship a kind of Society, or necessary commerce of life; but when I speak of Friendship, I mean an effective Friendship both tender and solid, of a Friendship where there is a commutation of hearts and secrets: Every one is not jealous according to the proportion of his Friendship, neither doth every one seat it in its right place; but to speak sincerely these luke-warm friendships do not produce violent Jealousies, no more than that love which tunes our Spirits to a musical harmony: But that doth not shew that Friendship doth not produce jealousie, at least I know I have sustained it for Lysicoris, for I remember when she once went into the Country without bidding me adieu, I was extremely grieved at it; 'tis not but that I am an enemy of all constraint and ceremony, but because she gave her farewel to another of her friends that she ought not to respect so much as me: I was extremely displeased; and I complained a thousand times of her, and even hated her whom she had visited. But it may be (replied Terillus looking on her) you have sometimes Love, not thinking you have any: No, replied she blushing, for I assure you I know so well how to distinguish Friendship, Hatred, and Jealousie, that if I had love it were difficult to deceive me. But is it possible (said Terillus) you can call Jealousie all those light despites that a resentment of glory produces in friendship, when that one renders you not the Justice you think to merit? But is it possible (replied Berelisa) that you doubt Friendship hath not its Jealousies as well as Love? That which makes me doubt of it (replied Terillus) is, that I am perswaded Jealousie is not but an effect of the irregularity of Love; and that Friendship cannot have the same irregularity, neither can it have Jealousie. But Friendship (replied Berelisa) hath it not all that which is found in love? It hath little cares and great services, it contains the desire to please, complacency is always thereto annexed, there is likewise of the favours of Friendship effective confidences, and of trifling secrets; one esteems the letters of his friends absence is not rude, Presence is sweet, and in fine, there is found in a tender Friendship all that one can attribute to a tender Love. But, replied Terillus, Do not you comprehend that one cannot be jealous but of that one possesses, or may possess? And that being so, one cannot have Jealousie in Friendship; sure 'tis true that our friends cannot be absolutely ours; for take the perfectest friend in the world, if he hath a Mistress, he will be oftner with his Mistress than Friend; so that Friendship giving nothing which might solely depend on us, it is impossible to be as jealous as if one had a Mistress: But as solid Friendship is too little divertising, Love is robb'd of divers things which have dependance only on it; so that those little cares, and all those things of which you have spoken, are become its mode by Usurpation: But for Jealousie, believe me Berelisa, it hath ever appertained to Love, neither can it be admitted to any passion but this. But how call you that I felt for Lysicoris, replied Berelisa? for I would be more loved by her than another: I should be angry if I was less, I would know her thoughts, I would have her if she is in love with any one, to declare it to me; and I should never suffer her without much distemper to write to any of her friends, without shewing me the Letter: And I very well know the commotion of my Spirit proceeds from Jealousie; I even hold (added she) that the Jealousie of Friendship is more Jealousie, if I may so say, than the Jealousie of Love; for as it retains Reason still entire, the least effects it produceth in a friends heart, ought to be more considered than those it produceth in a Lovers: But in what place may we see jealous Friends, (replied Terillus) who have their eyes wandring, their tincture pale, their humour melancholy, and their spirits disquieted through excess of their Jealousie? But in what place, replied Berelisa, have you seen Friends which receive contempts without grief, which patiently suffer tepedity, oblivion, indifferency, and irregularity when they believe they are neglected by a new Friendship. I confess it would be difficult for me (replied Terillus) to shew you a friend so patient to suffer all those things you have named without resentment; but I call it despite, and not jealousie: And for my part (replied Berelisa) I will call revenge all the resentments of a jealous person after your mode, but to speak rationally, as Love and Friendship derive their Original from the heart, and that we know not how to love nothing but by a certain universal cause, which forms all Loves and Friendships in the world, there is likewise in the heart of all men, as well a jealous as an amorous disposition, and this disposition acts doubtless more or less violently (as I have told you) according to the form of the affection which causes it, according to the subjects one hath to entertain Jealousie, and according to the temper of men which are capable of it: To speak truly, Friendship being no other thing than an imperfect Love, it would be strange if the inseparable concomitant of Love doth not follow it, though not with all those torments and punishments it trails often after it in a Lovers heart. Therefore I entreat the sage Cleodamas, who ought to be our Judge, to condemn you to have an eternal Jealousie in all manners imaginable, and to execute his arrest. I offer my self (added she with a malicious smile) to solicit all the persons you the most love to give you cause to be jealous: Terillus would have answered Berelisa, but the last thing she said having framed the company to laughter, he had an extreme despite, and could not have retained himself; if the Princess, who noted his grief, had not turned towards Cleodamas to tell him he should pronounce his sentence on this question in which so many were interessed. As universal as Jealousie should be (replied Cleodamas) it appears Madam, that you are not a little jealous of your authority, by commanding me to speak before you, but at least (added he) do me the honour to give me your advice, and permit me to take the opinion of all the Company: No, no, replied Philonice, I would know your pure resentments in this occasion, before I declare mine. Since 'tis so, replied he, permit me to render exact justice, and to begin by the Elogium of Terillus, for he without doubt so ingeniously sustained. Jealousie appertains not but to love, that if Berelisa had less spirit and eloquence, I should have been exposed to have given an injust arrest: But to speak sincerely, she hath so couragiously defended the part of truth, that 'tis to no purpose I should declare their jealousie in Friendship as well as jealousie in Love, and that if there are found friends without Jealousie when they have cause to have it, there are friends without tenderness, which unjustly usurp a quality they do not merit, since 'tis absolute impossible to have a durable love without some stains of jealousie. Nevertheless to clear up the spirits of Terillus for asserting a grand error; I believe as he hath more love than friendship, he knows not but one kind of jealousie, and judging others by himself, he hath believed there would be no jealous friends: On the contrary, Berelisa who knows by her own experience that Friendship gives Jealousie, and who perhaps hath lovers to whom she hath given it, hath been better instructed than Terillus, and hath so admirably maintained her part, that I am forced to pronounce my arrest, and Crown her with the Victory. In effect, I declare none can better sustain the truth, than Berelisa hath defended hers, she having acquired the sole advantage of the dispute. I therefore entreat her (added Cleodamas) to moderate her resentment, and not to wish that Terillus who knows so ingeniously to defend a bad cause, should have at one time so many different jealousies; for the jealousie of friendship if there is any, replied Terillus, I do not fear to have it, but for the jealousie of Love if I have it, I shall be very much deceived if Berelisa takes it from me: She is doubtless more fit to give than to take away, replied Philonice rising from her Seat; I assure you Madam, replied Berelisa, that I know not how to do neither the one nor the other; but in the choice of these two, I had rather give this evil to whom I would than desire to heal it, for the power to give replied Terillus, one must have given it another before, and for to cure, one must take the first one hath given.

As I know not how to divine Enigma's, replied Berelisa, I cannot answer to what you say; if you desire said Terillus, I will more clearly explain it to you: It is better (replied Philonice, beginning to walk for fear Berelisa would give him too severe an answer) at this time no farther to insist on it, for Berelisa is now in such an humour, she will not understand what she desires not to hear: After this all the company began to direct their steps towards the house, for Artemidorus he was so melancholy that he scarce knew the subject of their discourse on, and his passion for Berelisa did so much possess his Spirit that his former love for Clidimira seemed almost extinct, his soul was likewise so suspended between love and hatred, that he would not speak to Clidimira for to complain of her, nor to Berelisa for to tell her he feared she had too much cured his love for her Sister: Berelisa and Clidimira explained his melancholy in the same manner, for Berelisa thought Artemidorus was buried in this misery because he yet loved Clidimira, and Clidimira imagined that this Prince yet loved her, so that maugre her inconstancy she had some slight compassion; but for Berelisa she had a strange delight to see Artemidorus should be so little sensible of the outrage he had received, that he should yet affect Clidimira, though her affection lay not open to the discovery of every person, she could not eternally hide her grief from Lysicoris who perceived it, and demanded one night from whence it proceeded, as they were leaning over a Balcony at the end of the high Alley. When Cynthia with her borrowed light repaired the essence of her brothers lamp, and silence so reigned in this fair solitude not troubled by the agitation of the leaves, that Lysicoris and Berelisa cast forth two or three sighs, and desiring to know the reason of them, I pray said she to her, tell me what makes you sigh? for I confess I am ignorant of the cause thereof: Your fortune is happy, the Princess prefers you before her other attendants, you are beautiful and in the flower of your age, you have naturally both spirit and vertue, and you command the affection of all: Ah Lysicoris, replied she, a sigh stealing from her heart, you are a flatterer: Truly, replied she, I do not flatter you; it is certain I know men whose affections are changed to you, but none who desire not your love, yet you are melancholy, you fly company and sigh, not willing to declare the subject of them; do not you repent your rigor to Terillus, and dare you not through pride publickly confess it? No, replied Berelisa, and I can assure you the more Terillus loves me, the more he becomes insupportable to me: I know he is magnanimous, and is advantaged by a great spirit yet he hath many other things which displease me. 'Tis true, replied Lysicoris, his body is not of so perfect a composure as that of Artemidorus, but it seems to me love should not solely submit to beauty; and if I am not deceived there are other qualities more essential than this: 'Tis true, added she,

she, if this Prince was the Rival of Terillus, I should think you had reason to prefer him, for he hath not only a more graceful deportment; but more affability and vertue, but as you know if he is yet amorous, it is certainly of your Sister, and Terillus being the completest of our Court, you act too much injustice by treating him with such severity: It is needless to know whether it is justice or injustice, replied Berelisa, but I confess to you, I would have you discover if Berelisa loves my sister, and if you desire to be informed what thoughts possess my heart when I sigh, they only spring from my Brothers interest, and from the apprehension I have that Artemidorus and Clidimira renew their former gallantry; the face of Artemidorus appears masqued with so much melancholy since the arrival of my Sister. I have noted it as well as you, replied Lysicoris, but others sigh not in such a manner for a Brothers interest, and your words varied from true sincerity, when you invented the precedent expressions. What would you have me tell you, replied Berelisa: I would know, replied Lysicoris, from whence proceeds these sighs: Really, replied she, I think Artemidorus hath occasioned them: If so, you are captive to your Prisoner, replied Lysicoris, for I am assured when one breaths forth such heart-breaking sighs as yours, they must of necessity proceed from an amorous tenderness You are so knowing in sighs, replied Berelisa, that one may imagine your life hath been but a continual suspiration. If I have not sighed, replied she, I have seen many sigh, but the sighs of love differ from others, and if you will speak sincerely, confess to me those sighs I have heard were not produced by domestick affairs or ordinary accidents: If they were sighs of Jealousie, replied Berelisa, what would you say of them? I should much murmur, replied she, for they must then proceed from a concealed passion which precedes it. Murmur then, answered Berelisa turning her head, since 'tis too true for my misfortune, that my heart is infected with a terrible jealousie, though I have no violent affection: Ah Berelisa, replyed Lysicoris, that cannot be, and if you are very jealous, you must doubtless have much love; in truth replyed she, I feel nothing but jealousie, if so replyed Lysicoris, you feel more grief then pleasure; 'tis not so replyed Berelisa, but 'tis that I dare not tell you, for the confusion of it hath almost prescribed limits to my life; but it may be there's something more contemptuous, replyed Lysicoris, then to confess one hath jealousie; yes replyed Berelisa, and if 'twas not that I conceive it expedient for me, you should know the secret of my heart, to endeavour to know that of anothers, and the more easily to conceal mine from the rest of the world, I should never tell it you, though you have ever been the confident of all my secrets; you have then a strange secret replyed Lysicoris, more strange then you can imagine replyed Berelisa, since in word my dear Lysicoris, I swear I have a simple desire in my heart to be affected by Artemidorus, in the mean time it gives me such a violent jealousie, that I fear I cannot conceal it, for since my sister-in-law came hither, such melancholy cogitations so benight his pleasing humour, that I doubt not but he yet loves her; believe me Berelisa, replyed Lysicoris, when one ardently desires the love of any person, there must needs be a strong affection to the desired party. In truth replyed she, I do not believe I love Artemidorus, but I would not have him love Clidimira; he hath so much friendship for you replyed Lysicoris, that I believe if he loves her, and you demand satisfaction in that point, he will not deny it; if I was not the sister of Telesis answered she, I should ere this have demanded it: 'Tis not added this fair Virgin rather then to remain in this incertitude; I resolve in the end to speak to him of it, but as I fear he'll divine 'tis not the interest of Telesis which frames my curiosity; I should be much perplexed to execute my design, though hitherto I have had sufficient power over my self not to perform any action, or speak any word, which might give any occasion to Artemidorus to suspect I had any particular inclination for him, for in fine I love glory, and I so much wish the estimation of this Prince, that if I should not be severe by my own vertue, I should be cruel for the love of him; those Madam were the resentments of Berelisa, those of Clidimira were of another nature, for when she thought Artemidorus yet affected her, she was more confused at her infidelity, then ever she had been before; 'tis not that she would renovate her affection with this Prince, for she hath vertue, but she at least would not have been displeased if she could have excused her self to him. As she considered she could not easily effect it, she avoided him as much as possible she could; for Artemidorus he fled every one, his grief was so extream to find himself amorous of Berelisa; 'tis not but he wished he might be in love with Berelisa in the first transports of his anger, but he wished it when he did not think 'twould arrive, so that now feeling himself in a different estate, he contrary'd his former wishes, but they proved ineffectual, for the defects of Clidimira and her infidelity were so recent in his memory, that they banished from his heart his precedent love; on the contrary, Berelisa appeared to him both amiable and charming. The great care Clidimira us'd to hide her deformity, and the little care of Berelisa to shew her excelling features, did produce such a strange operation in his thoughts that Artemidorus despised the one, and esteemed the other; but after all, he saw he had better not ingage himself to love Berelisa: if there had been no other reason but that this fair Virgin was a Princess, whose Father was enemy to the Leontine Prince his Brother, who would doubtless say when he had notice of it, that he thought only to love his enemies. As his reason was already accustomed to yield to his love, his greatest grief was, to think that perhaps he might not be loved, for Terillus seemed to him a discreet man, and he feared to share his fortune, he knew Berelisa had more friendship for him then Terillus, but his friendship ever disquieted him, and he thought t'was an easie matter to compass the love of any person which had but indifferency for him, then a Virgin who was already of his intimate acquaintance; for Terillus he was altogether unhappy, he was a lover, his love was rejected, he was Jealous, and not without cause, he must go to the Camp and leave his Rival with his Mistress, but mauger ſo many melancholy thoughts; the charming Philonice made the ſociety at Ceriſalis appear very agreeable; the ſage Cleodamas likewiſe deſirous to ever uſe the memory of her reſidence there, parted all the Alleys and Cabinets of the wood, between ten or twelve perſons who compoſed the pleaſures of this illuſtrious Princeſs and fixt inſcriptions at the end of every Alley, conſonant to the humours of thoſe perſons from whom they derived their names; he gave likewiſe names to the little paths which croſſed this amiable wood, and he called one the Alley of ſighs, becauſe it ſeemed a fit place to caſt forth a ſecret ſigh: 'twas in this that Berelisa not thinking him to be there, having found Artemidorus alone whilſt the reſt of the company were in the great Alleys, heard this Prince ſigh; he had not yet any deſign to tell her he loved her, neither had ſhe any intention to ſpeak to him in particular, but a caſual accident making them meet in this Alley, preſented them with an opportunity, they little expected; as they both ſought this place of the wood to flie all diſcourſe, they bluſhed when they ſaw one another, they explained not the change of their colour as they ought; for Artemidorus believed the modeſty of Berelisa made her bluſh, and Berelisa imagined the alteration of his countenance proceeded from his being ſurpriſed in an amorous deliration for Clidimira, whom he ought to blot out of his remembrance, ſhe having ſtained her vertue by her unfaithful levity, and the curioſity ſhe had in her ſoul becoming more ſtrong; confeſs the truth ſaid ſhe to him, her cheeks being replanted with bluſhes. You are not ſo vindicative as you imagine, and you yet permitted the inconſtant Clidimira a firmer ſeat in your heart then her mutable affection might claim: Nevertheleſs added ſhe, I will believe you conſtrain your ſelf for the love of me, for I preſuppoſe it's becauſe Clidimira is my Siſter that you flie her, that you do not ſpeak to her, and that you ſee not the occaſion to eſſay to revenge your ſelf of her infidelity. I ingeniouſly confeſs replyed Artemidorus, (looking on her with an amorous eye) you are the cauſe that I flie Clidimira, but charming Berelisa, 'tis not by the reaſon you imagine; No, no, replyed Berelisa, invent not a deluding ſincerity to puniſh me for my raſery; for in fine, ſince the firſt inſtant you have reviewed Clidimira, you are not the ſame as before, and the change of your humour is ſo great every one takes notice of it. I confeſs to you I am ſurpriſed at it, for 'tis true, Clidimira hath performed ſuch unworthy actions, that I conceive not how you ſhould yet retain your love: ah if I have any for Clidimira cryed he; I intreat the Gods Berelisa ſhould never have any for Artemidorus, though he cannot hope to be happy unleſs he is once honoured with Berelisa's affection. I pray, replyed this Virgin with much aſtoniſhment, do not anſwer in this manner, a perſon who ſpeaks to you ſeriouſly as a faithful friend. I pray Madam, replied he, do not thus anſwer a perſon who ſpeaks to you with ſincerity, and as a faithful Lover reſtrain me from the ſentiments of Terillus; and do not cruciſie me more by your rigour, than Clidimira hath done by her inconſtancy.

Whilſt Artemidorus thus ſpoke, Berelisa's ſpirit was in a deep diſquietude, for ſhe knew not with what temper to receive theſe expreſſions of the Prince: She ſaw doubtleſs in his eyes and viſage all the ſigns of an ardent love, and the tone of his voice juſtified his ſincerity; but fearing Artemidorus would deceive her, to have a pretext more eaſily to ſee Clidimira, her ſpirit was enraged, and not to expoſe her ſelf to ſuch an adventure, ſhe thus ſpoke to him: Sir, ſaid ſhe, a ſerious gravity being ſeated in her face, though it is not my cuſtom to remember any perſons of thoſe courteſies they have received from me, yet I entreat you to recal into your memory the intention I ever had to render your reſtraint more pleaſing. I pray Madam, ſaid he interrupting her, change not your thoughts I conjure you, and act as favourably for a Prince, who will be always ſettered in your Chains, as you have acted for your unknown Priſoner: But to begin to do it (added he) believe (if you pleaſe) I am ſincere, that I love you a thouſand times more than I ever loved Clidimira: Yes, charming Berelisa, I have learned to love by ſerving her, and you alone have taught me to hate her; for I confeſs unto you my imbecillity and ſtupidity, if you had not chaſed her from my heart, ſhe would have maugre her inconſtancy, ſtill triumphed in my misfortune: Commiſerate then a Lover, who is ſo well skilled in the tenderneſs of love; for if you do not, I know not what will become of me. That which you ſay is ſo ſurpriſing (replied Berelisa) that I know not what to think of it; for in fine, Sir, if I could believe you loved me, if I ſhould deſire it, how ſhould I be perſwaded your affection is real? Is it not true that the day which preceded Clidimira's arrival, you yet loved her? I very well know (ſaid he) that I would not have loved her more, and that I wiſhed my heart was ſubmitted to your Love; but as I am ſincere, I confeſs if I am not deceived, I had then ſome love for Clidimira; and admiration and friendſhip only for the charming Berelisa; but alas things have now aſſumed a new face; for I love Berelisa, and ſo contemn Clidimira, that I reſolve to upbraid her with her infidelity: Let Teleſis peaceably poſſeſs her, added he, I will not emulate him; and if he beſtows on me his amiable Siſter, I will voluntarily reſign to him my ancient Miſtreſs. But Sir (replied Berelisa) how can Love ſo ſuddenly die, and ſoon revive? Do you deſire Madam I ſhould tell you, ſaid he to her, that it may be I am as unfaithful as Clidimira? And that I did not love you, when I believe I loved her? But I know I love you more then ever I did any, and there's nothing I ſhould not be capable to do to convince you of it; I know (purſued he) you uſe to give love without receiving any, and that Terillus hath a cruel experience of it: But Madam, ſince he hath the unhappineſs of your hatred, and that it ſeems you ſport your ſelf with his misfortune, uſe the occaſion I offer you, to torment him, and love me by a cruel reſentment for him; if you will not love me by a reſentment of tenderneſs for my ſelf. But yet replyed Berelisa, how ſhall I know how this pretended Love hath entred into your heart? By the trecherous window of my Body, replyed he. But you do not conſider what you ſay, replyed ſhe, for I am not graced with more perfections then I was three months ſince;

and Clidimira (as my Brother hath said) is more beautiful than ever. 'Tis true, said Artemidorus, but Clidimiras Beauty is lessened in my esteem, and and yours is heightned by the opposition of her defects, demand therefore (Madam) no more satisfaction of me, and rest satisfied, that I love both your spirit and person with an equal ardour, and that I am perswaded whosoever takes from Clidimira the splendour of her eyes, the freshness of her tincture, the carnation of her lips, and a certain gallant air in her face, will deplume her of her attractive features; for her Spirit as 'tis inconstant, it admits of no praise. Berelisa hearing Artemidorus speak in this manner, was surprised at it, for as the perfections of a Rival picture a strong impression in the spirit, she remembred Clidimira had no charms to allure the eye but her visage, and the proportion of her body, and she was not ignorant that she was imbellished with all those graces which are required in the composure of a perfect Beauty; and this imagination spreading her face with a scarlet colour, she shadowed it with her vail to conceal her blushes: But as she was shaping an answer, she saw Terillus and Clidimira appear, who not seeking them, accidentally found them in this place, this sight confused all parties, but as there was no way to fly their company, they joyned them in the middle of this alley, regarding one another with a different aspect; for Artemidorus, who desired to perswade Berelisa, Clidimira was now banish'd his heart, looked only on his new Mistress: Terillus being jealous, looked both on Berelisa and Artemidorus; Clidimira, who thought she might yet challenge some affection in this Prince, blushed at her infidelity, looking on the curious weaving of the leavie branches; for Berelisa she sometimes looked on Artemidorus, and sometimes on her Sister, to the end to discover what imaginations swayed their Souls: The conversation of these four persons was very reserved, and I assure you, their words did not countervail their thoughts, and what they said, dissented from their resentments; in fine, after they had shared an hour in discourse, other persons coming thither parting this company, Artemidorus was necessitated to joyn with Clidimira or Terillus: In the choice of these two, he had rather speak to his Rival than his inconstant Mistress, since he could not entertain Berelisa, with whom a Lady had some private conference: As Terillus was jealous, and prepared for his martial expedition, and that he knew Artemidorus was generous, he resolved to speak to him of his love; and singling him from the rest, Sir, said he to him, you will perhaps tax me of audacity and injustice, for demanding of you if you are but a Prisoner of War, and for entreating you to call to mind, that if I had not retained those whom your valour had incensed, your death only could have ransomed the rashness of your courage; I say not this, Sir, added he, to reproach you, you are indebted to me for your life; but only to demand of you whether you are but a Prisoner of War, or whether you are become Prisoner of Love, for in fine, if you are amorous, your heart is chained to Berelisas Beauty. Before I give a precise response to your demand, replied Artemidorus, I confess to you your generosity hath preserved my life; but Terillus, I sell my liberty dear enough, if I tell you I should have dyed without shame in that occasion, and as I was not too happy, but am yet very miserable in giving me life, you have not given me so much as you imagine; and it belongs only to me to accuse you of all the misfortunes of my captivity: But Terillus, I am more just, and too generous for to tell you, your preservation of my life reflected more from the Prince of Agrigentines's interest than mine; I look on you as my Conqueror, but Terillus, added he, you must know Mars and Love are not at variance, and that I am not obliged to tell you, whether I do or do not love Berelisa; if I should be amorous, I should not be conscious of any injustice to you, for your love is disesteemed, and I should deprive you of nothing, if I should be so happy to gain her love; but Terillus, things are not yet come to this point, and if I love Berelisa, she hath yet no knowledge of it. Ah, Sir, replied Terillus, if 'tis so, let her never know it, and disengage your self from the service of that person; I know your quality hath seated you above me, but since the Fortune of Arms licenses me a freer liberty of speech than another, resist the charms of her tempting Beauty, and let not my Prisoner become my Rival. I pray Terillus (replied Artemidorus) if you well understand your Interests, press me no more; for Love is such a capricious passion, that difficulties augment it; and to consider it in a rational manner, as Love is not a voluntary thing, they are even unjust which would constrain it; act then what you can to compass Berelisas love, and if I love, permit me likewise to conquer an heart; she hath refused you, and for the life I owe you (pursued he) I will put my self in estate to render it you when you require it. Terillus, who is fierce by nature, gave a sharp answer to Artemidorus; and if some men had not interposed, seeing them heated with anger, some misfortune would have put a period to their incensed minds; but as the agitation of their spirits was visible in their faces, Philonice was advertised of it, who following the counsel of the sage Cleodamas, made them seeming friends, not diving into their secret thoughts: Since this time both Artemidorus and Terillus cancelled their former obligations, he after a little time returning to the Camp; for Artemidorus, he accompanyed the Princess to Agrigentine, where he performed so many things, that Berelisa was perswaded he loved her; but though she had a strong inclination for him, and that she wished his love, yet her actions were so reserved, that he was a long time ignorant of his felicity; and they so prudently managed their affections, that their loves was not yet divulged: 'tis true, Terillus declared them, but as he was known to be jealous, none made reflection on his words; and Clidimira believing Artemidorus yet loved her, though he did not speak to her of it, acquainted several of her friends with her resentments, so that his love for Berelisa was not in the least suspected. But in fine, not to disoblige your patience, in the time that Artemidorus was favoured by Berelisa, news came that the Fates had exiled the life of Telesis, which afflicted both Berelisa and Clidimira; but grief reigned with a fuller power over Berelisa than Clidimira, she having a

ſpirit which eaſily admits of conſolation; on the other ſide, Bereliſa ſeeing her Siſter at her own diſpoſe to make a free election, feared, that after her tears were baniſhed, ſhe would reconquer the Princes heart, who was obliged to ſhare his viſits betwixt theſe two fair afflicted perſons; 'tis true, when he repaired to Cadimiras Chamber, he always choſe a time when others were there, to the end he ſhould not be engaged to make a long complement, entertaining her with ſome conſolatory diſcourſes, according to the cuſtom of ſuch viſits. In fine, when time hath calmed the diſpleaſure of this fair Widow, and that ſhe believed her ſelf in a capacity to make an innocent conqueſt, ſhe perceived Artemidorus loved her Siſter, ſo that jealouſie remitting in her heart her former love for Artemidorus, ſhe repented her inconſtancy, and deſigned by all enticing allurements to gain what ſhe had loſt: Being returned to Agrigentine, my eyes preſented her to me with ſuch an acceſſional luſter of perfections, that knowing Artemidorus had renounced her love, I was caught in thoſe ſnares laid to reentrap his heart; I gave her aſſiduous viſits, and ſome amorous expreſſions ſlip'd from my tongue, but as ſoon as ſhe perceived I was engaged in her ſervice, ſhe uſed this occaſion to juſtifie her to Artemidorus, with whom ſhe had had no particular diſcourſe ſince ſhe came to Agrigentine; for knowing the intimate familiarity betwen us, ſhe did not doubt but what ſhe declared to me, I would make to him a full declaration of it; and I ingeniouſly confeſs, ſhe over-reached me with ſubtlety of her wit: As I then one day ſpoke to her of my pretended paſſion, being alone in her Chamber, ſhe cut off very ſhort, but in an obliging manner: I pray Zenocrates (ſaid ſhe to me) ſilence your paſſion; and to teſtifie unto you how infinitely I eſteem you, I will not treat you as I ordinarily treat thoſe who are ſo prided with their imaginary fancies, as to declare their affections to me; if you will therefore diſclaim your love, I will embrace your friendſhip, and confide to you the whole ſecret of my life: You know (purſued he) we have been of long acquaintance, and I know that when you went to Leontine, you were linked to Artemidorus in ſuch a ſtrict bond of amity, that you cannot be ignorant of what paſſages happened between us; but Zenocrates I will diſcover that to you, which neither you nor Artemidorus knows, and which perhaps he may never know. But, Madam, ſaid I to her, Artemidorus doth not love you, and you ought to have no more affection for him, which is the reaſon hath engaged me to ſerve you. I knew, replied ſhe, Artemidorus hath wound himſelf out of the labyrinth of his love; but Zenocrates (added this artificious perſon, ſeeming to have ſome confuſion) Artemidorus is unjuſt, for he hath believed me more inconſtant than I have been; and if I dare ſay it, I have been more unfaithful to Teleſis than Artemidorus. I ſay not this to you (purſued ſhe) that you ſhould declare it to him, but only to the end to unlock to you the ſecret Cabinet of my heart, and to merit your eſteem and friendſhip, ſince I am not in eſtate to receive your love: Know that when Artemidorus departed from Leontine, my Parents perſwaded me that this Prince eſtranged himſelf, to the end that during his abſence, the Prince his Brother might marry me by his authority to whom he pleaſed, ſo that deſpight poſſeſſing my ſpirit, I reſolved to obey thoſe who propoſed Teleſis to me, ſeeing I could not be free but in marrying my ſelf, and I thought I could not better revenge my ſelf of Artemidorus, than to engage my ſelf to Teleſis, whom I choſe rather than another, becauſe he was no Leontine, and that if I could not forget the love of Artemidorus, I at leaſt hoped I ſhould never ſee him; for I did not foreſee any likelihood I ſhould find him at Agrigentine, but for my misfortune Fortune hath diſpos'd it otherwiſe, and I ſee my ſelf expoſed to the moſt cruel adventure in the World; every one knows I have lived ſo well with Teleſis, that I have not ſpoken to Artemidorus, that I am neither juſtified nor excuſed to him, and that I have acted as a perſon which cares not to be eſteemed unfaithful; but Zenocrates maugre all this, I have preſerved in my heart ſuch a great eſteem for Artemidorus, and ſuch an obliging tenderneſs, that I ſhould be ſorry if he knew it. I tell you this, leſt you ſhould accuſe me of ingratitude; for as you ſee me young, I do not refuſe your affection but to accept anothers; But not to tell you all, I will not engage my ſelf in all my life to ſuffer the conſtraint in which I have lived; and ſince I cannot deſtroy the remembrance of Artemidorus, I will at leaſt in not pretending more to his love, never ſuffer any others; 'tis not that he merits the tenderneſs I have for him, for he hath received my infidelity in ſuch a manner, which makes me ſee it had been difficult for him to have been unfaithful: he hath done me the favour to hate both Teleſis and me, but is reſolved to deſtroy me with ſo much tranquillity, that I am not aſtoniſhed to ſee him engaged in a new affection: but in fine Zenocrates, I eſteem you a too diſcreet man to receive you in a divided heart; count your ſelf to be my Friend, never ſpeak to him of what I have told you, and believe I could not have given you a greater teſtimony of eſteem, than to open to you the ſecrets of my heart. Cadimira framed this Diſcourſe with ſuch ingenuity, that I believed it; and though at firſt Love was the Theme on which I diſcourſed, I at laſt was contented to be her Confident; as I knew the engagement of Artemidorus, I told her, that I would not counſel her to think of reconquering his heart; for, ſaid I to her, if one hath at any time committed any infidelity to her, I do not believe one ought to renew love with him, who hath done it, becauſe I believe confidence can never be re-eſtabliſhed; all other ſubjects of complaints which may be between two perſons which love, are nothing, which may be preſently reconciled; but for infidelity, Madam, (replied I) it is not ſo; and 'tis much better to make a new affection with me who am not ſcrupulous. No, no, Zenocrates (replied ſhe) I will not follow your counſel, for I will love nothing; I do not think to regain the love of Artemidorus, who hath blotted me out of his thoughts; but Zenocrates, added ſhe, I conjure you never to ſpeak to me of your pretended love, if you will not aggrandize my affliction. Can I hearken to that you tell me, without thinking you tell it me, if 'twas not that you knew by an infallibly certainty, that I am abſolutely solutely indifferent to Artemidorus? I entreat you do not multiply my grief; and be certain that if I was disposed to a new engagement, I should prefer you before all my acquaintance. Clidimira had doubtless stretched her Discourse to a further length, had not some Ladies interrupted us. In the mean time I was so astonished at her words, that I knew not where I was, and as I was assured that Artemidorus did no more think of Clidimira, and that she was already expelled his thoughts, I did not fear he would re-entertain her love, I went therefore to seek him, to tell him he had compleated his revenge on Clidimira, since she yet loved him: My expressions did so surprise him, that he believed I did but jest with him; but I at last spoke to him so seriously, that he knew I invented not any fiction; and though he loved Berelisa with an extream passion, that which I told him of Clidimira made him change colour; for he then remembred divers things which made him imagine this person had a design to recal him; anger was solely seated in his breast, and if Berelisa had seen that which passed in his heart in this occasion, she would have had no subject of jealousie: He did not believe he ought to make known to her this adventure, because he held that a wise man ought never to tell (without an absolute necessity) that a woman loves him, nor whether he loves her, or loves her not; he did not tell me that he believed he was loved; on the contrary he counselled me not to shake off my love, and I followed his directions, but I found a strong resistance, that ere the Sun had nine times run its diurnal course, my passion was buried in its own ruines. Though Artemidorus had defended me from telling Clidimira, I had acquainted him with what she had told me; and though he constrained himself as much as possibly he could, yet she saw by his eyes he knew it, hoping then that in continuance of time there might happen some slight quarrel between Berelisa and him, which might tend to her advantage, she acted many things to effect her design, for when she was with any friends of Artemidorus, she would be lavish in his praise, she always frequented those places where he went, she oppressed Berelisa with visits and testimonies of friendship, and when she encountred the eyes of this Prince, she made, as if she would shun them, though she carefully sought them, likewise making him see in her a certain emotion accompanyed with confusion and modesty, she excited some kind of trouble in the heart of Artemidorus, which obliged him to fly her; 'tis not that he did not feel himself faithful to Berelisa, that he should always be so, and that the infidelity of Clidimira would yet much anger him; but after all, Clidimira acted in such a manner, which both grieved and perplexed him: This fair person therefore to attain her desires, contracted a particular friendship with Terillus, she told him she was touched with his merit, that she would protect him nigh her Sister, and she effectually become the confident of his love, and his jealousie of Artemidorus; she even gained one of the Maids which waited on Berelisa, she entertained likewise some commerce with me, and in this manner, whether by Terillus, by the Maid which she gained, or by me, she knew all which passed between Berelisa and Artemidorus; 'tis not that I told her any thing in particular, only as I well knew Artemidorus desired she should believe he would love her no more, and that he desired not her affection; I would confess to her he was very amorous of Berelisa; but to tell you the truth, she knew all things both by jealous Terillus, and the aforesaid person: so that a furious anger possessing her spirit, she plotted all her designs to sow division between these two persons. As she hath a subtle spirit, she judged that 'twould not be easie for her at first to put any difference between Artemidorus and Berelisa; for 'tis a person who hath a tender heart, a regulated spirit, who thinks not but of that she loves, who believes there ought to be as much probity in love as any other thing, and who doth not give the least subject of jealousie to Artemidorus; but she thought 'twould not be so difficult to put distrust in Berelisas spirit; therefore after she had been acquainted by the pre-mentioned ways in several particulars, reflecting on the affection of Berelisa for Artemidorus, she wrote a Letter to her Sister by an unknown hand, and another to Artemidorus, under the name of one of his friends who was in the Army; she put them both in one Pacquet, and by a secret way sent it to Artemidorus, he knowing not from whence it came, and unripping the Seal, he found a little Note directed to him, which contained these words.

I Demand your pardon for not writing to you my self, but having received a slight hurt in my right hand, I have employed another, to entreat you to deliver this inclosed Letter to Berelisa; I assure you it comes from a Person who hath much interest in her affairs, and who so far engaged me to render it safe to her hands, that I believe I could not better cancel my Engagements, than directing it to you: I shall not excuse my self for the trouble I impose upon you, since you will be fully recompenced by the sight of that beautiful person.

Artemidorus having read this Note, did not suspect there was any deception in it, for he knew the name they had subscribed to this Letter, whose name I cannot at this time remember, and 'twas true, that this man had been hurt in the right hand, so that Artemidorus being impatient to perform this service to Berelisa, went to carry the Letter to her, and as Clidimira had a design to be an ocular witness of the effect of this deceit, she went to Berelisa's Chamber, where Artemidorus came; and imagining this Letter was not of much consequence, he gave it her before Clidimira, telling her in what manner he had received it. Though Berelisas curiosity incited her to peruse it, principally because she could not imagine who writ it, she would have by a resentment of civility put it in her pocket; but Clidimira, who saw Artemidorus take notice of it, said to him; Do not you think my Sister renders you a respect, which is the most difficult in the World, for my part I know nothing so weighty to carry as a sealed Letter, when one dares not open it by reason of Ceremony? Artemidorus being now roused from that Lethargick slumber in which

which he was buryed by Clidimiras sight, told her, he would dismiss himself from her company, if she would not read this Letter; so that being constrained to open it, she found it poysoned with these dangerous words.

I Pray, Madam, receive with a favourable eye the advice I intend to give you, and do not think strange if the person subscribes not her name; for your Friendship is so dear to her, that not knowing how you will receive this advice, she dares not expose her self to your hatred. Know then, Madam, he which renders you my Letter, doth not possess your affection without the knowledge of divers persons; I know not whether 'tis his fault or yours, but many know you loved him first, and may yet love him last; for as he hath not been too strongly touched with Clidimiras change, he is not perhaps so faithful to you as he ought to be; every one knows you love him, that you receive his Letters, and return him affectionate answers, that he wholly sways your soul, and that you vouchsafe him many favours, which he doth not receive with such transport of love as Terillus would, did you please so far to honour him: Every one knows Clidimira doth not hate him, that he hath not sealed her justification, and that his extinct flames may be re-ascended, if they are not already: You would therefore attract much more glory, to recompense the inconstancy of Terillus, to leave Artemidorus to Clidimira, and by this means you will free your self from that obloquy which doubtless will blemish your Reputation, if you do not regulate your self by my Counsel.

As soon as Berelisa began to read this Letter, she blushed, and blushed with so many signs of anger imprinted in her face, that Artemidorus who looked attentively on her, knew it contained something which displeased her, and had much vexation, because he had delivered to her: Clidimira on the contrary had an extreme joy to see the inquietude of Berelisa, she testified her notice of it, to the end to give more curiosity to Artemidorus, for she believed Berelisa would not shew it him. She had no sooner perused the Letter, but she said to her, I entreat you Sister to tell me, if the news you have from the Army, acquaints you with the death of any of your Friends, for I see so many marks of grief in your countenance, that I already seek to divine who we have lost. For my part, added Artemidorus, looking on Berelisa, I shall esteem my self very unhappy, if I have brought unto you any doleful news; but if so, I can at least assure you, I know not who writ it. Berelisa seeing her self prest to shew this Letter, told him, that there was nothing considerable in it, and that it contained certain Domestick Affairs. You have not a soul so interessed (replied Clidimira with much confidence) to be sensible of things of this nature. I blush sometimes so easily (replied Berelisa, cloystering this Letter in her Pocket) that one must never judge of the resentments of my heart, by the emotion of my face; but though Berelisa made a great effort to constrain her self, Artemidorus knew some disturbance had entred her spirit; in effect, so soon as Clidimira was gone, she thought on nothing but this cruel Letter, and she imagined it had been wrote by the contrivance of Terillus; but though her spirit was incensed, she did not believe she ought to shew this Letter to Artemidorus, for fear he did not credit what she believed, and left he should be transported against Terillus, to whom they had both obligations; and her ancient jealousie beating an alarm to her heart in this instant, she had intention for some time to observe Clidimira and Artemidorus. In the mean time Clidimira, who secretly triumphed at this deceit, was in hope this Letter would prove effectual; for if Berelisa did not shew it to Artemidorus, 't was an evident sign this Artifice had made some impression in her heart, which might in some time breed a difference between them; and if she shewed it him, Clidimira drew from thence at least this advantage, to make known to Artemidorus she yet loved him; for though she imagined I had told him, she was not certain of it. So soon as she was departed, Artemidorus prested Berelisa to shew him this Letter; but as Clidimira when she went away saluted this Prince in a manner which augmented her suspicions, she constrained her self in her intended resolution not to shew it him: Artemidorus who could not suffer she should conceal any secret from him, thus complained of her injustice: Do you then believe Madam, said he to her, that it is permitted you to hide any secret from me, who have made an entire resignation of my heart to you, and who tells you without any reservation all you desire? Is it thus, Madam, you requite my Tenderness, my Fidelity, and my Respect? You know (added he) that you have refused me a thousand and a thousand favours, and that I have promised never to breath forth any dislike of your actions, whilest I am assured to possess your heart: Speak then, Madam, I entreat you, and tell me if this is to be the master of it, not to know what passes there? Do you think, Madam, that one cannot be unfaithful but in ceasing to love any person? Or that one cannot love others more than Clidimira? And believe you not that it should be a kind of Infidelity to trust more to ones self than to the person one loves, and conceal any thing from him. I believe at least (replied Berelisa blushing) that when one faithfully loves a person, one ought never to mention a woman one hath loved, if he is not constrained to it; but you do not so: For I am assured you speak an hundred and an hundred times of Clidimira without necessity; I have even heard you mention her name for anothers, there being no resemblance betwixt them: If you would speak of some quarter of Agrigentine, the street where Clidimira remains; if one asks you the time when you were freed from close restraint, you say it was a little before Clidimira came to Agrigentine, and Clidimira is yet so strong in your memory, that you speak not so much to me of others, as you do of Clidimira to me. But Madam, replied he, I have mentioned her an hundred times to you, to declare her unworthy actions. You would have done me more pleasure never to speak to me of her (replied she) to discustom your mouth from pronouncing her name: For in fine, it is a general maxim, not to mention the first Mistress to the second, unless (as I have formerly said) one is constrained; and I had rather hear you call Clidimira Berelisa, than Lysicris Clidimira: But Madam, said Artemidorus to her, Do not not you think hatred presents persons one hates to the memory, as well as Love those which one loves? And do you think it should be possible I might ever love Clidimira if I should not love you? No, no, Madam, added he, I cannot love an unfaithful Mistress: 'Tis true, I am not so much transported as another, but it is because I believe discretion ought to reside in the hearts both of happy and unhappy Lovers, and that they should retain a kind of civility for the Female Sex: But after all I hate and despise Clidimira, and I despise her it may be more than you can imagine. Time will demonstrate it to us, replied she: What? Madam, replied he, do you believe time is necessary to assure the fidelity of a man to whom you have promised your affection? And can you conceal a secret from me? Ah Madam if it is so, Terillus is less unfortunate than I am, for at least he can ground his happiness on no future hope; but for my part, Madam, who think to be happy, I find my self plunged in misery. In the mean time added he, there is it may be several things within these few days happened to me, which merit a more favourable treatment. But if there is happened things I know not (replied she with precipitation) you ought not to think it strange if I declare not a secret to you, since you have one I know not. Artemidorus seeing his own words had betrayed him, and not willing by generosity to acquaint Berelisa that her Sister yet loved him, would have explained it otherwise than he had said; but as he is naturally very sincere, he could not frame himself to tell a lye. Berelisa then knowing by the manner of his speech he had something he would not tell her, had such a strong curiosity, that she earnestly pressed him to tell her what had happened to him, which made him desist from desiring to know the contents of the Letter: So that both having a strong curiosity, and this curiosity augmenting by their resistance, in the end Berelisa's being the stronger, it obliged her to tell Artemidorus, that if he promised her not to be transported with any resentment against the party (whom she imagined) had wrote the Letter she received, she would shew it him. And he likewise told her, that if she engaged her self not to speak of what he said to her, she should see that she had much injured him in speaking to him of Clidimira in that manner as she had done. In fine, Berelisa gave to Artemidorus the Letter he had given her; which so surprised him, that the fountain of his utterance was a long time sealed, before he could perform his Word to Berelisa, for they at first so sympathized in their thoughts, that there was doubtless a transmigration of their souls: For he likewise believing Terillus had invented this fallacy, he then began to exaggerate his misfortune, for having a Rival to whom he had many obligations, and to seek by what way Terillus had known what he had wrote in his Letter: For, said he to Berelisa, if there was nothing there but my Love for you, and your goodness for me, I should say Jealousie had dictated it to him; since there is no better spy than the spirit of a jealous Lover: But Madam, I am surprised of what he relates concerning Clidimira, since that (in fine) if I must tell you all things, it is true that this unfaithful person would without doubt once more deceive me. Berelisa hearing Artemidorus speak in this manner, pressed him to retail to her that which he had said; and this Prince willing to obey her, recounted unto her that which I had told him: But though she might remain satisfied, yet she was angry he had concealed that from her so long time. Nevertheless (added she by a motion of Jealousie) do not you imagine Clidimira would reconquer your heart by a resentment of hatred for me; and if another had deprived you of your Love, she would have resigned to her a peaceable possession, but as I am unhappy, I would not swear you will not become unfaithful. Ah Madam (interrupted Artemidorus) you are the injustest person in the world to use those words. As they were on these terms, the amiable Philonice entred accompanied by the Prince of Messina, who came to Agrigentum during a suspension of Arms: I came likewise to Berelisa's house a little after; and as I was taxed of inconstancy, Lysicoris who was come with the Princess Philonice, having some thing to tell me called me, whilst Philonice spoke to Berelisa towards the windows: But as I answered not; I pray, said she to a Lady which was nigh me, tell that unfaithful person who is by you, that I would entertain him. Hardly had Lysicoris said this, but turning towards her; I pray, said he to her, call me not unfaithful; yet for Inconstant (pursued I) I endure it; but for unfaithful I cannot suffer it: I have not such a delicate Spirit as you (replied Lysicoris) and I know not too well between Inconstancy and Infidelity. As Lysicoris said that, the Princess Philonice who had heard her, turned and seated her self, and making one in this discourse, she demanded who could doubt there was no distinction to be made between an unfaithful and inconstant person. In truth (replied Lysicoris) I think in case of Love, these two things very much resemble. For my part, replied I, I am not of that opinion, that one cannot sometimes be inconstant without shame, and that one cannot be unfaithful without baseness. Berelisa seeing then such a fair occasion to insult over Clidimira, and to darken her esteem with Artemidorus, engaged so discreetly this conversation, that she saw her self obliged to make the distinction; and she did it more easily than any part of the Company, and the Prince of Messina, as others without exact examination said; that inconstancy and infidelity might easily be confounded. For my part said then the Princess Philonice, I am of the opinion of Berelisa and Zenocrates, for I believe one cannot say there is a kind of inconstancy without infidelity; or fidelity without inconstancy; and if it was not that I am now in a melancholy humour, I might very well bring my thoughts to tryal; but since Zenocrates and Berelisa are of my opinion, I give them Commission to declare my resentments; for I imagine they know them: But said then Lysicoris smiling, is he not an unfaithful man which changeth love? And an inconstant Lover is he not likewise who changes his Mistress? A liberal man who makes a present without choice (replied Berelisa) gives something which is to him, and a prodigal man which casts without choice, gives likewise that which appertains to him; the one practiseth a virtue and the other makes to see he hath a vice; this which is well more estranged the one from the other, than inconstancy and infidelity; for I say not that inconstancy should be a vertue, but I say that an honest man when he is young, may sometimes be inconstant without dis-

honouring himself, and that in some times, in some age, and in pretext that this should be, no person can be unfaithful without baseness and infamy: I sustain likewise that infidelity and inconstancy are yet more horrible in women than men. Berelisa said this with so much emotion, that I knew well that I might do her the greatest pleasure in the world to rem't my cause in her hands, and that she was not sorry to speak on this subject, finding likewise much more fit to oblige her to defend me, than to defend her self; I left her at least to begin this innocent war. But then, said the Prince of Messina, I would know precisely what is that delicate distinction you make of inconstancy and infidelity? I call inconstancy (replied Berelisa) a certain incertitude of heart and spirit, where young men are more subject than others, since there is without doubt two or three years of life; where those which are naturally of an inconstant inclination, find nothing which pleases them which attaches them not successively. For by example, if Zenocrates would say the truth, he will confess that a great number of women have pleased him, that he hath fair brown, and fair yellow, he hath many times felt in his heart enough disposition to have love, he will even confess I assure you that he hath began to tell it to many fair persons; and that there's likewise some others for whom he hath changed his thoughts before he had occasion to speak to him of his passion. I ingeniously confess, replied he, but above all I believe not to be unfaithful. You have reason, replied Berelisa, and one cannot without doubt accuse yon but of a simple inconstancy which hath even nothing which resembles infidelity; for as I have already said it, to speak of this kind of inconstancy in general, it comes from this, that those which are capable of of it, are sensible to all that which appears fair to them, of all which is new to their eyes and to their spirits, of that which they seek to please without difficulty, of that which they have any irresolution in the spirit, which hinders them from chusing of that that the first youth of inconstancy have some resemblance: But after all, those men there which see pleasures from quarter to quarter, from street to street, and from house to house, do not assuredly betray the person, because no person trusts to them; and to speak truly, the inconstants of this kind only vex themselves, since they have pain to attaque an hundred hearts without gaining one; one hearkens to their pleasures without believing them, one receives their incense without vanity, one leaves them without pain, one destroys them without regret, and they come through the world as Butterflies on Flowers, without resting on any thing and without leaving any sign of their passage, likewise not doing any discourtesie to a person, there would be much injustice to confound those inconstants with the unfaithful I have spoken of; sure their inconstancy is without perfidiousness and superchery; it is not but to say the truth it should be desired this inconstancy was banished from the heart of young persons; for if it is not very criminal it is not at least laudable; I will likewise confess with sincerity is not yet altogether a true inconstant, and he hath only a simple disposition to be so. I am obliged to you (replied I) for enrolling me in the number of the inconstant persons, and not placing me among those which are unfaithful, for it is certain I cannot suffer it. But, said the Prince of Messina, I comprehend not wherefore those which vary in their thoughts have not infidelity. You will easily be satisfied therein (replied Berelisa) if you consider that to make a Lover truly merit the quality of unfaithful, one must suffer his affection, one must hearken to him, one must give him hope, one must love him; if a man on the contrary loves a woman without being beloved, and that he hath served a long time without attaining her love he leaves her; one loves another, one cannot in this case place him in the number of the unfaithful, nor that of the inconstant; for as one loves not but for to be loved, as soon as one destroys the hope, Love may die in Lovers heart, without being culpable of any crime; and to speak truth, it is not even possible that it dies not there: 'Tis therefore not doing that but which one might hinder themselves from doing; one leaves love without inconstancy, and one cannot love otherwise without infidelity; but the most odious and the most degenerate crime in the world is, when there's a concatenation of affection between two persons, and that it happens one breaks the Chain; for in this case there it is not a simple inconstancy, it is an infidelity, where inconstancy, perfidiousness, and baseness are found: And it is in fine, as I have said, the greatest of all crimes in this point, before you engage your self you consider not what you do, you examine not your thoughts, and do not well know the heart you give nor the heart you receive. 'Tis true, said Philonice, I find something very strange to see men of spirit suddenly change their thoughts: but, said then Lysicoris, when one hath this misfortune what shall one do? I will, replied Berelisa, one should continue to love by generosity, when one cannot by inclination; that in fine, when one is promised an eternal affection, no reason can dispense with it but the infidelity of the person one loves: And in this case we must not only love her any more, but hate her, despise her, flee from her as from a Monster, and revenge our selves though ne'er thereby prejudiced: For if it is a man which is unfaithful, no person should force him to go and say to a woman he loves her, and to tell her it often to make her love him; therefore when he changes he hath no excuse in effect: Probity, Sincerity, and Fidelity, ought to be in love as all other things, and more than in other things; because the consequences are more dangerous, being contained there is no exchange more important than the hearts of two persons which love one another. But if a man is criminal of being unfaithful, at least confess, replied the Prince of Messina, that a woman hath the same injury as a man. I say, replied Berelisa, and I'll maintain she hath more, for as cruelty befits women in love, they might take him to examine themselves, ere they engage to love any one; but after you have considered of it, a woman accepts the heart is offered to her, and that she gives hers, she cannot change without infamy; and truly a woman at least in my opinion, cannot innocently love but once in her life; besides baseness and perfidiousness, which is common to her with an unfaithful man, neither can one yet accuse her of imprudence or little modesty: For for my part, I conceive not how a woman who hath vertue and good judgment to resolve her, should voluntarily

Nevertheless, replied Philonice, one sees they make no difficult to do it. I am of your opinion, replied Berelisa, but if I was a man, I should have an horrible aversion for those women. But I pray, said the Prince of Messina, in what rank do you place those men who make a seeming love, when they love not, and sometimes obtain love? I put them in the rank of deceivers, replied she. But amongst the unfaithful, replied I, it seems to me there are many sorts; for there are some which become so, because they find defects in the person they love, that they noted not before; and there's others which cease to love, because their own good fortune destroys their love. For the last (said Berelisa) I sustain that when one hath solidly contracted an affection with some one, there is but one only defect of love, which might be a legitimate cause to break it, and the loss of beauty, youth, change of fortune and health, ought to change nothing in the hearts of two persons which have promised an eternal love; but for those whose love destroys it self, I find them so criminal and so odious, that I boldly say 'tis impossible their spirits are seasoned with any good qualities, or that their heart is noble; and the change of thoughts without any strange cause, is the greatest sign of imbecillity, and defining of judgment, and that in the end, the infidelity in love from whence soever it proceedeth, is the basest and criminallest thing in the World; all other duties of life approach not the ingagement of this, because one is born subject to all the others, and this is by a voluntary subjection one makes it a law to himself, which ought to be as much more inviolable as one imposes it, and one cannot infringe it without condemning himself, without destroying his own pleasures, without blemishing his Honour, without trampling Justice and Virtue under his feet. All that which you say, is admirably well said, replied the Prince of Messina, but above all, if in despight one hath of it, one feels one loves no more, what shall one do then? I will, as I have already told you, that one loves by generosity, when one cannot love more by inclination; and I will, if one can no more love, that one constrains himself therefore to act, as if one loves not; yet since that it is in this occasion only, that it permits to deceive innocently, and that it is even good to do it; at least I know well, that if one act otherwise, one must resolve to be hated and despised of all persons, which have Virtue and Reason; for I confess to you, that I know not how one hath boldness to shew himself in the World, after a perfidiousness of this nature; nevertheless there is found women which shew themselves, replied I. And there is likewise found men, added Philonice, which leaves not to love them. Ah for these men there, said then Berelisa, it is assuredly they should not be too delicate in love, nor in generosity; for, for my part, if I was a man, it would be impossible for me to love a person which should act any infidelity. But yet, said the Prince of Messina, without knowing the Interest she had in this Question, which excuse you more sooner, whether a man who should love a woman, which should have made an infidelity to another, or of a Lover a Lady should have betrayed, and which would renew affection with her? In my opinion, replied Berelisa blushing, I cannot ballance these two things, for he which should have suffered infidelity, would be more condemnable than another that at least might flatter himself with the opinion to have more merit, than he which should have been abandoned. Nevertheless, added she, to make Artemidorus speak, I should be glad but for this Article, one demands that he seemeth of it to all men in the company. You are so equitable in all things, said then Artemidorus, who had not yet spoken, that your thoughts should be those of all honest persons; and for my part, I declare, I approve all that you have said, and even all that which you think.

For my part replied I, I am not so complaisant, for I find both have an equal wrong: And I, added the Prince of Messina, I think that a Lover who hath conquered the heart of a woman, ought (if he can) reconquer it, when he hath lost it; for what knows he, but he will find it better: But, it may be, he may find it worse, said Berelisa. Though it should be so, replied Philonice, I find Berelisa hath very well made the distinction between Inconstancy and Infidelity: I confess to you Madam, (replied she) I have not said the third part of what I think, for better to understand it, one must after to have separated the inconstant from the faithful; one must I say divide the unfaithful between them and the inconstant', there are unfaithful persons by weakness, by interest, by capriciousness, and by impiety, and there is likewise inconstant persons of temperament, of occasion, of vanity, of little judgement, of debility, of wantonness, and of idleness. If you will examine these divers things, said I to her, 'twould require doubtless much time. As one accuses to be a demy-inconstant, replied Philonice, I see well you fear that one puts you not in the rank of those, of which Berelisa would speak; but since you take no interest to infidelity, and that you have never loved long enough to be unfaithful, I would willingly demand of you, which of the two a woman should love best, in the necessity to suffer infidelity? Ah, Madam, interrupted Berelisa, always thinking on Artemidorus, I put no comparison between these two things? for a man which leaves one woman to love another, or a woman which breaks with a lover for a new ingagement, commits a more outragious action, than if a lover diminishes by little and little. For my part, replied Lysicoris, I am not of your opinion, and I know nothing more cruel or more ouragious, than when without any strange cause, one sees the fire extinct; for in this estate, one knows not what to do to retain such a lover; I have had a friend to whom this adventure was hapned, who told me the fantastical things in the World to exaggerate to me her grief; for, said she one day to me, I am the same I was, when he of whom I complain, was deeply in love with me; my mirrour and my eyes speak the same, and all those who approach me, confirm me by their flatteries; I am not deceived, I am likewise pleasant, and as faithful as ever, I have no less spirit, and he is not the same he was; yet added she, if any amiable Perſon hath deprived me of him, I ſhould have the conſolation to hate her, I ſhould find a hundred inventions to diſpleaſe her; I ſhould even think her adulation had attracted him, that novelty had charmed him; and in continuance of time, he would repent himſelf of his infidelity, and return to me; but ye think being, as it is, one would ſay he hath forgotten to love, and that he remembers not to have loved: I know not likewiſe what to do, neither to remit love in his heart, nor to hate him, though I know there's nothing more outragious, than to ceaſe to love in this manner, becauſe it muſt of neceſſity be ſuppoſed I have no puiſſant charms, ſince I cannot keep an heart I had conquered, that no perſon deprives me of it. After this (purſued Lyſicoris) I have nothing more to tell you to aſſert my opinion, ſince the complaints of my friends I have reported, ſum up all my reaſons. If you have no better (replied Bereliſa) it will be eaſie to vanquiſh you, ſince 'tis certain there's no compariſon to make between theſe two ſorts of Infidelities; one cannot imagine but he ceaſes to love without making any new love, doth it not but becauſe a certain ſcrupulous ſagacity perſwades him this paſſion is a weakneſs; or that being of thoſe men who can ſtay long in any place, he is troubled at his own conqueſt; ſo that to reaſon well one may ſay, that a Lover of this nature renders himſelf worthy of the deſpiſal of her whom he abandons, without one may poſitively ſay that he deſpiſes her; for in ceaſing to love a perſon without loving another, one ſees he deſpiſes love in general, and not in particular, the perſon whom he deſerts; but for a Lover who makes a new Love, there's nothing more injurious, more cruel, nor more ſenſible; the tenderneſs of the heart is thereby wounded, Honour is thereby engaged; and in fine, one ſuffers all that he can. I am of your opinion that this other kind of Infidelity is rude, that one ſees no remedy, and that its very juſt, and very natural to hate whoſoever denies his love, I boldly confeſs that one ought more to hate one of thoſe Lovers, than a true Enemy, who hates you as you hate him, and who not having never loved you, hath not at leaſt betrayed you; but after all you may not have in your heart in this occaſion, hatred againſt him, and againſt your ſelf; on the contrary, an infidelity of the other manner, ſeats in your heart not only hatred againſt your ſelf, aud againſt your Lover; but that which is the moſt cruel of jealouſie, of fury, and even ſometimes of injuſtice and cruelty; for the means to ſee ones ſelf to attain between the hands and heart which is very dear, without hating not only him which gives it to another, but her to whom it was given; at leaſt, I know I have ſeen women, who have hated all brown Beauties, becauſe that ſome Lady who had black eyes and brown hairs, had rob'd them of their Lovers; and in effect it is altogether hard to ſee that one prefers another perſon before you, and that one leaves aſſured for incertain favours. Moreover, what grief is it to think this Lover ſacrifices you to his laſt Miſtreſs, and that he tells what obliging curteſies you have beſtowed upon him, to the end to oblige to beſtow more; for my part, I believe that this kind of grief ſo much troubles reaſon, that though it would be more ſhame in appearance that one prefers another perſon without merit before you, one therefore had rather the thing ſhould be ſo; to the end that at leaſt one hath the conſolation, that if this adventure is known every one blames her, which hath made ſuch a bad choice. But, replied Lyſicoris, can you yet hope that this unfaithful, which is not become inſenſible to love, will recover reaſon, and will return to you; inſtead that if 'tis one of thoſe Lovers, wherein the fire is extinct, what do you, and what can you do to refire him. Nothing, replied Bereliſa, for I declare to you, that whoſoever ſhould ceaſe to love me, ſhould never be loved of me; but had you rather love an unfaithful, which becomes ſo by ambition, replied Philonice. In truth, replied Bereliſa, it is of infidelity as of death; for in any manner that one dies, it's very rigorous to die, I think nevertheleſs that I ſhould rather forget an ambitious unfaithful, than an unfaithful, as I have ſpoken of, I would therefore deſpiſe him very much, added ſhe, but as I ſhould not fear ſo much, that he would go to recount my favours to Fortune, than another to his Miſtreſs, I ſhould have leſs grief. But, replied I, do you think it fit one ſhould leave you for glory? By no means, replied ſhe, for the love of glory is not inconſiſtent with that of a virtuous perſon, and not to trouble you further with any frivolous diſcourſe concerning infidelity, aſſure your ſelf I ſhould never think well of him that ſhould forſake me, though it were even to ſave his own life. The fair Bereliſa ſays right, replied Artemidore, for when all's done, there can be no excuſe for infidelity. You ſpeak but light of it, for one that hath experienced it, replied ſhe bluſhing, for, for my part, I declare, that I cannot imagine any thing, more unjuſt, more baſe, more ungrateful, more unworthy, a gallant Soul, nor more incompatible with Virtue. However, ſaid I to her, ſmiling, give not ſo cruel a verdict againſt ſuch as are inconſtant without any evil deſign, whom you ere while ſo pertinently compared to Butterflies. I acknowledge it, ſaid ſhe, but that I may neither flatter nor ſurpriſe you, I think that if people do not in time recover themſelves out of that harmleſs inconſtancy which you ſpeak of, it may prove a diſpoſition which may arrive to the habit of infidelity. I therefore think it much concerns any one, to ſhake hands with it as ſoon as may be; for to be plain with you, inconſtancy, though never ſo little, is a crime. But, I pray, replied Philonice, of the inconſtant, what kind are you moſt pleaſed with? Thoſe which are ſuch out of affection, replied Bereliſa. But are there any ſuch, replied I? For my part, I aſſure you, if I am guilty of any inconſtancy, I mean no hurt by it, I think not of it, even when I am ſeiſed by it; and if there happen a change in my Love, the true reaſon is, that which did pleaſe me, pleaſes me no more, or that there is ſomething elſe, I am more taken with.

The whole Company having laughed at this extravagant ſally of mine; Bereliſa maintained againſt me, that there were ſome that were inconſtant out of affectation, who only to ſhew themſelves Gallantillo's, Wits; and Sparks, pretended one while to love ſuch a one, another ſome other, without any other deſign, than in a ſhort time to beat many many bushes, and to raise talk of themselves in divers places: But take it from me, added she, very pleasantly, that as there are some young Gallants who conceive themselves obliged in reputation, to pick up the little news that are sown up and down; to sing tolerably well, the songs that are most new and most in vogue; and to treasure up in their Pockets such compositions in Verse or Prose (good or bad it matters not) as are new, there are also others so vain as to make it their business to complement all those, whose perfections may indeed challenge it; and though neither guilty of inconstancy nor love, perpetually wander into those places, where they have nothing to do, nay where indeed they are as slightly entertained. And whereas such people would seem to be what they are not, I abhor them beyond the inconstant, and can afford them no other predicament than that of the faithless. But, replied I, if all manner of inconstancy were banished the World, it would follow, that a man must never speak to above one woman in all his life, and must commend none but her, which in my opinion would to many people be a thing insupportable. Ah Zenocrates, replied Berelisa, you screw up the Peg too high; for there is a certain complemental civility allowed in conversation, which permits you to commend all beauties, which keeps you from being savage or brutish, and you may sometimes celebrate the brown, sometimes the fair, in as much as beauty is every where commendable, what dress soever it be in. But there is a great distance between a general civility and inconstancy, for a person generally civil begets in all hearts an inclination of love and esteem for him; but a man professedly inconstant, such as I know some, spends his whole life in saying what is never believed, in praising those which disgrace him, in snatching at every thing though he fasten on nothing; to fight without victory, and to love without any return. Thus it happens at length, that men of this humour feel all the afflictions of love, and never come to be acquainted with the pleasures, and after they have shifted their hearts from hand to hand, they are forced to take them home withered, because they can meet none that will be troubled with them. This expression of Berelisa causing a great laughter in the company, I publickly declared that I would reform that careless inconstancy whereof I stood accused, and made a vow either to become a constant Lover or insensible. Whereupon Philonice said pleasantly, that she believed I should rather prove the latter than the former, and that she should be as glad of it as my self; which said, she rose up, and the company being dissolved Berelisa was extremely troubled: For though she had said many things handsomely, yet came they from her, rather out of that concealed interest which she had in what was discoursed of, than any freedom of humour, insomuch that being left alone, she was excessively melancholy. She read over the cruel Letter she had received, and found in it so much matter of grief, that she could not sleep all night. That which disturb'd her most in all this adventure was, that Artemidorus had told her, as a secret, of the recommencement of Clidimira's love to him; for as to what was said, of the affection which she her self had for that Prince, as it was very innocent, so was she not much troubled at it. She was also much incensed against Terillus, as believing it was he who had directed the packet which Artemidorus had received, nor could she but fear the business might have some unhappy consequence; but all considered, she feared nothing so much as that Clidimira might recover the heart she had lost. On the other side, Clidimira was in doubt whether she should gain her ancient Servant from Berelisa; but withal had this considerable satisfaction, to think that she caused a disturbance in her Rival. As for Artemidorus, he was extremely perplexed and out of tune; for in the imagination he had that Terillus had sent him the terrible Letter he had delivered to Berelisa, he was almost out of himself that he was in debt for it, and that he was withal obliged in point of generosity, to pretend not to believe it was he had put that trick upon him. Besides, the jealousie he observed in Berelisa, made him fear the consequences of it; nor was he less disordered by the affection of Clidimira. Yet was he not without some intervals wherein he was not much displeased, to think that it was now her turn to feel what punishment it is to love, and not to be loved again.

But to hasten as much as I can to an end of this long Relation, Artemidorus returned the next day to Berelisa's, to ask her what she would have him do. In the first place, said she to him, I would have you not pretend to believe that it was Terillus who directed that Packet to you; in the next, I would have you without doing her any violence; put some publick affront upon Clidimira, which may serve you as a pretence never to go to her house more, nor speak to her any where else. That I should never more see her at home (replied he) nor speak to her again, I gladly submit to you, but to do her any affront publickly, is a command you cannot justly lay upon me, insomuch that common civility will not allow a vertuous man to do any such thing. I know not (replied Berelisa) whether civility will permit it, but I am certain Love will, since I would have it so: For in fine, what confidence can I have in your affection, if you obey me not in this business? You know (added she) that it is with much reluctancy you have resolved to hate the unfaithful Clidimira, how then can I be assured that you will persist in this disaffection, since she still behaves her self as if she loved you? But Madam, answered Artemidorus, if I have been so much troubled to cease loving the faithless Clidimira, how do you conceive I can possibly cease to love the faithful Berelisa? However it be (said she) I must have this expression of your affection. But Madam, replied he, I do not absolutely deny you, but entreat you to take some days to consider, whether you do not your self an injury by engaging me upon such a business; for Terillus and Clidimira who have of late seemed very kind together, will be sure to lay it at your door, if I do what you would have me: If therefore you will take my advice, you will be satisfied with that security I give you, never to see Clidimira at her house, to avoid her elsewhere, never to speak to her, and to love you eternally. Ah! Artemidorus, replied Berelisa blushing with vexation, you are too discreet to be a Lover, and if the humour takes me to be discreet also in my turn, you shall find that Love and Discretion hold not so good correspondence, and that they are more likely to destroy than support one another in the same heart. But Madam, replied this Prince, what have I said which might incense you? What have I done which might deserve your indignation? You husband your self too much between Clidimira and Me, replied she, and that I am not able to endure; whereas if I were as cautious not to displease Terillus as you are Clidimira, either you would renounce all love for me, or be very angry. But Madam, replied Artemidorus, are you not confident of my affection? And can you suspect that I still love the faithless Clidimira? I do absolutely believe you love her, replied she, but if there should happen some little difference between you and I, I should not think it impossible you might love her again: My desire therefore is, that you were at such a distance with her, that you should never be reconciled, and consequently never give me the grief to see you in your ancient fetters: Not (added she) but that if I were to hate you, I should wish you that misfortune; for I know nothing more unhappy, more poor, nor more unworthy a man of a great and noble soul, than to be matched with a faithless one, and put himself into a condition to be over-reach'd the second time. I assure you Madam, replied Artemidorus, that I am not likely to meet with this sad misfortune, and that I cannot be unhappy by the means of any faithless person if you do not become such. But why then (replyed she) do you not raise me out of the weakness you see I am in, since that while you restore me, you should withal be revenged of Clidimira? If I could do it without your being concerned therein as well as my self, replied he, I should gladly obey you: But Madam, I beseech you consider what commands you lay on me, and assure your self I shall ever love you, Clidimira never, even though she should have a greater affection for me than ever I had for her. Artemidorus (replied she) you are too tedious in debating a thing pleases me not.

While she said this, Clidimira comes into the room, which caused a fatal interruption of the conference. In the mean time Artemidorus thinking to oblige Bereliſa, took his leave; but not being able to quit the room without passing by Clidimira, he had not the power to do it without a civil salute; which Bereliſa took very hainously: Not but that she knew well enough that he could not avoid saluting her; but she conceived it but just, after the discourse she had entertained him with, he should have acquitted himself with more neglect and less Civility. Nor was it in her power to dissemble the disturbance of her mind; which Clidimira perceiving, and looking on it as a consequence of the Letter she had caused to be written to her, began maliciously to press her to tell the reason of it. When you shall have told me that of the Joy I see in your countenance, replied Bereliſa coldly, I shall happily give you that of the melancholy which seems to be in mine. Truly, replyed Clidimira, if my eyes do discover any joy, they betray me; for since the loss of Telesis I have had no great reason to be joyful: To deal as truly with you, replied Bereliſa, I also assure you that if mine express any melancholy, they are impostors and deceive you. But Sister, replied Clidimira, it were more unlikely that I should arrive to any joy after the loss of Telesis, than it is that you should be sad. There are so many things like ly to be true which are not true, replied Bereliſa, and so many true things which seem not to be so, that I think it not fit to measure your joy by the account you give me of it: Not but that (added she) after the loss of such a Husband as you had, it would be thought very strange that you should so soon have overcome all grief; but it seems youth, and a greatness of mind and beauty will not suffer affliction to be long liv'd. If it be so, replied Clidimira, since you have so great a Wit, since you are so Young and Handsom, and have only lost a Brother where I have lost a Husband, it is likely you should be much more light-hearted than I. As I have not lost a Brother, but I have withal lost a friend, replied Bereliſa, I have happy thought my self more concerned in this loss than you have: For to speak generally, when one loses a Husband one loses a Master, who many times disturbs our pleasures; and therefore it is not impossible but that the loss of Telesis may cause me a greater affliction than it does you. Not to examine whether it be impossible or not, replied Clidimira blushing for madness, I am certain Telesis is nothing concerned in the melancholy which is now legible in your eyes. And not to examine, replied Bereliſa, whether you have reason to speak as you do; I am certain that the gladness which may be read in yours ought not to be there, there being no great reason it should. You may be satisfied, replied she, that if I am glad I have reason to be so. And I for my part tell you, replied Bereliſa, that if I am troubled, I will be revenged on those that are the causers of my trouble. As angry as you are, replied Clidimira, I should willingly contribute to your revenge: And so you shall, replied Bereliſa in a malicious tone, for being related as we are, our interest cannot be without some relation, and so not to be divided. Tell me then, who are your enemies of either Sex, replied Clidimira? You see them every day, replyed Bereliſa, I need not name them to you, and it shall go very hard but——

As Bereliſa would have continued what she was saying, Aphranor comes into her Chamber, to acquaint her that the valiant Prince of Agrigentum, who had defeated his enemies, had at length forced them to Petition for Peace, which was signed; adding withal, and directing his speech to both her and Clidimira that they must needs go immediately to the Princess Philonice's. Which said, he acquainted them with some of the Articles of the Treaty, they not offering to interrupt him as having their several expectations, that he would not forget that which concerned the Prisoners. But Aphranor conceived they were not to learn, that in all Treaties of Peace, the prisoners of War are set at liberty, and therefore said nothing to them as to that point. Insomuch that having both an equal curiosity as to one Article, wherein yet they were not equally concerned, they spoke both at the same time, to ask the same thing. But having received their answer, they blush'd, they became more jealous one of another, they hated one another more then before; and to consummate their affliction, Aphranor told them that all the Prisoners were set at liberty; 'Tis true (added he) that the Prince of Agrigentum had ordered him who had brought him this news, to tell Prince Artemidorus, that his Court should should be his Sanctuary, as he had offered it sometime before, and conjured him to remain there, till such time as he had made his peace with the Prince of Leontum. But when he had quieted them a little with this weak hope, he added, that it was thought this Prince would not accept of the proffer, because of the mis-intelligence which was between the Princess of Agrigentum and Leontum So that Berelisa and Clidimira perceiving that Artemidorus would be obliged to remove, were both extreamly troubled, which trouble yet had a mixture of some reflections of joy, which either of them raised from this consideration, that this absence of his would afflict her Rival. But to speak truly, it was a joy was neither serene, nor of long continuance.

In the mean time, Aphranor pressing them to go immediately to Philonice, and they not thinking it civil to discover they were not so loving one to another, as to make a visit together, were forced to obey him. But all the way as they went to this Princess, they spoke not one to another till they were come neer her Palace. Clidimira, purposely to vex Berelisa, and to sift out her thoughts, asked her whether she thought it not fit that she sent to congratulate Artemidorus: For, added she, with a seeming simplicity, since he was pleased to give me a visit in my affliction, I conceive it but fitting I should return this civility. If there be a necessity that he depart and leave us, it were fit you did what you say; but if he remain, I should conceive you did well, if you had no more to do with him, considering what hath passed between you. I assure you, replyed Clidimira maliciously, that were it not that I found him constantly in your Chamber, I should be very indifferent whether I returned him this civility or not; but since there is a decorum obliges me not to refrain visiting you, there is no great fear I should receive any incivility from such a Prince as Artemidorus. I know not whether I advise you well or not, replyed Berelisa, but I conceive it were better you received an incivility, then expose your self to Calumny. As for Calumny, replied Clidimira, I fear it not much; for when one is conscious that he deserves it not, he need not trouble his thoughts with it. You are very happy, replied Berelisa, to have such a tranquility in your thoughts; which said, they entred into Philonica's, where all was filled with joy. But they had not been there an hour, ere Artemidorus came to that illustrious Princess, to express his gladness of the satisfaction, which the so glorious success of the Prince of Agrigentum had caused to her; and withal to acknowledge how much he conceived himself obliged to the generosity of that Prince. Philonica answered Artemidorus with her ordinary Prudence and Civility; which done, the sage Cleodamas being come in, began to whisper something to Philonica. For being a man of the most ancient and most honourable House of any in Agrigentum, and had withal the recommendation of a great Understanding, Vertue and Honesty, he was more then any other concerned in the Peace which his Country was now to enjoy; so that having acquainted Philonica with many things, which it concerned her to know, he began openly to commend the Prince of Agrigentum, who had now satisfied the World, that he had not raised a War but to settle Peace, and not out of any Sally of Ambition, adding that he was truly a Father to his Subjects, since he preferred their quiet before the carrying on of a War, which it had been more to his glory to have continued, had he not preferred the publick good before his particular advantages. It is true, continued Cleodamas, that to speak rationally, it is much more glorious for a Prince to have preserved Plenty in his Dominions then to have ruined his neighbours; and is more noble out of a consideration of Justice and Humanity to be thrifty of the blood of his Subjects, then out of a Punctillo of glory and ambition, to be prodigal of his enemies. All approving what Cleodamas said, and acknowledging the praises he gave the Prince of Agrigentum to be just, they congratulated Philonica, and afterwards, Artemidorus. For there being some or other continually, coming in, and going out of Philonica's Chamber, the company stood, and every one was at liberty to go from one place to another. So that there was not any either man or woman, which did not complement Artemidorus, except Berelisa and Clidimira, who had not the courage to go and tell him that they were glad of a thing which indeed caused all their affliction. But Berelisa desirous to conceal her trouble from her sister in-law, and being withal, almost out of her self to put her into some disturbance, came to her, and speaking softly; for one who thought her self so much concerned to send congratulations to Artemidorus, said she to her, methinks you make not much hast to tell him that you are glad he is at liberty, I expected you should have shewn me the way, replied Clidimira; for I believe you think your self as deep in the concernments of that Prince, as I do; but since haply you conceive, that by reason of the relation I have to you, I ought to speak first, I shall do it: Whereupon Clidimira without expecting any answer from Berelisa, drew near to Artemidorus, who was not far from her, and made a very handsom and obliging complement to him, Artemidorus thinking it in a manner barbarous not to return a civil answer before so many people, gave her thanks for her good wishes. But persisting in the desire of tormenting her sister, she behaved her self so, that though he had for a good while indeavoured to avoid discourse with her, yet she forced him to answer her divers times: Whereat Berelisa, who heard not what passed between them, was extreamly vexed, Artemidorus who was not ignorant of the ticklishness of her humour, would have gone to her as soon as he was dis-engaged from Clidimira, but she avoided all discourse with him, and gave him such a lesson of vexation to read in her eyes, that he was infinitely troubled at it. He nevertheless continued following her, and pursued her from place to place, insomuch that at last taking her leaning on a Window which looked into the garden, he went to that next it, and taking hold of a corner of her garment to stay her from going away: Well, cruel Berelisa, said he to her, will you eternally avoid me? And when all the World congratulate me though for a thing which afflicts me, do you think it a trouble to comfort me?

me? You are then already resolved, replied she roundly, to take Clidimira along with you to Leontum? I am resolved to die, cruel Bereliſa, if you prove not more favourable to me; and I am resolved to hate and be revenged of you, replied Bereliſa, if you prove unfaithful. I am content you shall do both, replied he, if I do prove such; but if I am both constant and unfortunate, pity me, and love me at least as much as you have promised. Philonica hereupon, calling Bereliſa to her, Artemidorus had not the opportunity to speak to her any more all that day; nor could he sleep all the night following, such a distraction did the humourousnes of Bereliſa, and the insinuations of Clidimira raise in his thoughts. Not as I have already acquainted you, that he had any design to ingage himself any further to Clidimira, and had an excessive affection for Bereliſa; but he had a conceit that it were a kind of aspersion to a person of honour, uncivilly to shake off the love of a woman, whether she have forsaken him or not; so that not finding any mean between these two things, he was in a strange perplexity. His liberty, which he now was Master of, contributed to his disturbance, for if it favoured him to be rid of Clidimira, it also removed him from Bereliſa, without whom it was impossible for him to be happy. On the other side, as to what concerned his fortunes, he easily fore-saw that if he remained at Agrigentum, now that he had obtained his liberty, he should be proclaimed Traytor to Leontum. So that which way soever he looked, whether on what concerned Bereliſa, or Clidimira, or on himself, his mind was still in the same disturbance. That which further augmented his disquiet, was the arrival of Terillus; for being perswaded it was he had sent him the cruel Letter which he had delivered to Bereliſa, he was no longer able to indure the affront; and if Bereliſa had not charged him to keep the busines secret, he could not have forborn expressing the resentments he had of it.

In the mean time, Clidimira having understood by the Gentleman whom she had corrupted, that Bereliſa and Artemidorus had had some little contestation, failed not to make her advantage of it, and was so diligent in finding an opportunity to talk with him at Philonica's, that indeed he could not with civility avoid her. To acquaint you, Madam, with what discourse passed between them, were no easie task for me; for neither Artemidorus nor Clidimira could yet be perswaded to give an exact acount of it. Yet thus much hath been gotten out of Clidimira, that Artemidorus entertained he with the bitterest reproaches, which, without a visible affront, and an abjuration of that civility which is due from man to womankind, he could imagine; and Artemidorus hath discovered so much, as that Clidimira without telling him plainly, I love thee, had entertained him with the greatest tenderness and passion, in the excuses she made, that she had married Teleſis. To be short, the very same day I saw this Prince, but so clouded with sadness, as I had never seen him before. Not but that he loved Bereliſa with the greatest affection imanigable; but believing withal, that Clidimira loved him as much, he looked on it, as what would raise a Tempest between him and Bereliſa. Nor indeed was it unlikely, for there cannot happen a greater disturbance to a vertuous man, then to be loved of two women that hate one another, and yet are obliged to be almost perpetually together.

But Bereliſa having understood what discourse had past between Artemidorus and Clidimira, by one of Philonicas women, who had over-heard some part of it, was so troubled that Artemidorus had said nothing to her, that without discovering her affliction either to Lyſicoris or me, or yet to Artemidorus; she (to be revenged of the disloyalty of this Prince, as she interpreted it) resolved to be more kind than ordinary to Terillus. But to tell you the truth, these two Lovers were equally surprised at her carriage: for if it was matter of wonder to Artemidorus, to see a remission of her affection to him; it was no less to Terillus, to find from her that little kindness she was pleased to shew him. He at first imagined, that she foreseeing that Artemidorus was shortly to leave Agrigentum, thought fit to make sure of him, and having a subtle and piercing wit, and that sharpned by his jealousie, he soon discovered that this kindness and compliance of Bereliſa was but personated and artificial, such as wherein her heart was nothing concerned; so that it caused him to be more jealous than ever. As for Artemidorus, though he doubted not but that Bereliſa still loved him, and that it was only for his sake that she was so kind to Terillus; yet all considered, he could not avoid some reflections of jealousie, which obliged him to hate this Rival. For Bereliſa, though she was satisfied that Artemidorus had a tender affection for her, yet being not assured but that the flatteries of Clidimira might have some influence on him, she was seised by a jealousie which distracted her beyond all imagination: and as concerning Clidimira, though she then could without any return of love, and in a manner without hope of any, yet was she subject to jealousie: So that it may be said, that jealousie never had such an Empire in any amorous transaction, and was withal so ill grounded, as in this. For Terillus was jealous, though he could never hope for any love from Bereliſa. Artemidorus was jealous of Terillus, whom Bereliſa hated; Bereliſa was jealous of Clidimira, whom Artemidorus loved not; and Clidimira was jealous, though there was not any rational likelihood she should ever regain the heart she had once lost. Nor could it otherwise be, but that the consequences of these several scenes of jealousie must be sad and tragical, and such as hindred these persons from those enjoyments of Peace, which the Prince of Agrigentum brought along with him, who was now come burthened with glory to receive the acclamations of his people. But I should tire you with a second relation of the honours were done him, and withal I must remember, it is the History of Artemidorus, and not his, which I relate to you. I shall therefore only tell you, that things being in this posture, there happed to be a consort of Musick in the Gardens of the Palace of Gyants, whereof I told you the ruines were so magnificent. For though this Palace be ruined, yet the Gardens remain, and they are so well ordered, that it is the general Walk of all persons of Quality, of either Sex, especially in the Summer, when we court the fresh Air, to avoid the inconveniences of the heat. The Prince of Agrigentum therefore desirous to hear some Musick in this Garden, wherein there are a many Walks with Trees on both sides, which cross one another, had it after an excellent manner: For the Moon not shining that night, and that it is neither pleasant nor handsome to be in the dark, especially in a place where so many people meet, he caused Lamps of Crystal to be fastned to all the Trees of the principal Walk; as for the rest, they were only at the places where they crossed, to the end that those might be humour'd who delight to walk in dark shady places, and are desirous of recollection, or would confer of something which cannot be spoken without a change of colour: So that it being noised abroad that there would be a Consort in the Garden, which is called the Cyclops Garden, abundance of people came thither that evening. Among others came Artemidorus, Berelisa, Clidimira, Lysicoris and Terillus. For my part, I was never taken with any thing so much as that nights walk: For those lights made a strange shew through the thickness of the Trees and the darkness, and that multitude of excellent persons, whereof one had but a glimpse, made a delightful confusion, and caus'd a many adventures. Some walk'd one way, some another; some walk'd up and down, as those that look'd for what they were nor likely to find; others having met those they look'd for, possess'd themselves of those seats, which are in diverse places of the Garden, and without any regard to the Musick, nor those that pass'd to and fro, they discours'd freely, having their minds so far disburthen'd of all things, as if there had been no other people in the world. There were others on the contrary who continually remov'd from one place to another, pretending they had much to do in every place, where indeed they had not any. There were also some who having quite forgotten the Company, hearkned only to the Musick and were wholly taken up with that: on the contrary there were others, who not minding the Musick at all, acted the parts of publick spies, and seem'd to have no other business there, then to observe what was done, that so they might have something to discourse of the next day. There wanted not those, who pretending they had some design in hand, and some business to do, seem'd to be much troubled, which made them quit the company they were engag'd in, to go into the Walks, as if they had appointed to meet some body there, though they knew there was nothing to entertain them but obscurity. There were also some, who neither discoursing with any body nor hearing the Musick, nor giving themselves to any recollection; walk'd up and down, singing as if they had been alone in some solitary place. In fine, I saw so many pleasant spectacles that night, that I never spent any with greater delight. 'Tis true, it was the mother of one unhappy accident; for you are to know that Lysicoris having observ'd Berelisa to be very melancholy, and that she minded not the Musick, took her aside, and conducting her to a seat which is neer the Cypresse Labyrinth, importun'd her to tell the reason of her sadness. Berelisa who felt her self almost over-burthened with it, told her all her mind, heightning and aggravating the affliction it was to her to be more favourable than ordinary to Terillus, purposely to vex Artemidorus. But (added she, her soul being dissolved into tenderness and passion) if this Prince depart, as I believe he will, I will be revenged upon Terillus, both for the disloyalty of Artemidorus, and the Letter he caused to be sent me; as also for the jealousie which Clidimira causes me, and the correspondence that is between him and her; for I am confident it is he hath distilled into her those inclinations which she hath, or pretends to have for Artemidorus.

Lysicoris hearing her speak so violently, told her she was very much too blame in all things; that for Terillus he was unfortunate enough in that he was not loved, abating the cruelty she had used in abusing him for some time; that as for Artemidorus, she might assure her self of his affection, and therefore should not entertain a jealousie that he would be so unworthy, as ever to return into the fetters of the faithless Clidimira: So that there remained only her Sister-in-law, for whom she might have any just aversion. And therefore, said she to her, you need not think it strange now that Telesis is dead, that she should endeavour to repair her disloyalty past, by a future fidelity. Ah Lysicoris, replied Berelisa, she would not certainly have renewed her love to Artemidorus, were it not to rob me of him, and indeed it is only envy, that hath let love into her heart. It happens in the mean time, that I who had resolved not to love any thing, had broken my resolution, to oblige a Prince whose affection I thought I might innocently entertain, and of whose heart I thought to have been possest for my life, whereas now I am in a strange disturbance, and a fear he should be guilty of an infidelity to me, to satisfie the most faithless, and consequently the most detestable person in the world. But, said Lysicoris to her, you torment your self without any reason; for I am confident that Artemidorus loves you, that you love him, and that Clidimira will love without any return of her love. To what end then do you trouble your thoughts to hate Clidimira, to entertain jealousie, and to pretend kindness to Terillus, since you hate him? I hate Clidimira, replied she, because I cannot help it; I am jealous for the same reason, and I am kind to Terillus, purposely to vex Artemidorus, to put a worm of jealousie into his brain, and to make him quit all thoughts of Clidimira, and oblige him to love me better. Alas, 'tis too much, cruel Berelisa (crieth out Terillus, who stood behind a Cypress near Lysicoris) and I should be the basest of man kind, if having heard all this, I revenge not my self on you in all the ways and circumstances that a person of honour may be revenged of a woman. Now, Madam, to represent unto you the amazement of Berelisa, were not easie for me, for she had not so much as suspected, when she left the company with her dear Lysicoris, that Terillus had followed them. Nevertheless how angry soever she might then be with Artemidorus, her first reflection in this accident was, a fear that Terillus might attempt something against him. Whereupon doing her inclinations the greatest violence could be, she earnestly intreated him, to give her the hearing out of a consideration of generosity. But the more she intreated, the further was he from satisfying her, and suddenly stealing away, she soon, by reason of the thickness of the Trees, and the obscurity, lost sight of him. However, she imagined not that Terillus should take such a violent resolution as he did, or or that it should be taken and executed in so short a space. She and Lysicoris thought to find me out, to acquaint me how things stood, that without interessing her in the adventure, I might have a care of Artemidorus. But there being an infinite number of people in the place, and that women cannot shift places so easily as men, they saw me not. Besides that, the Princess Philonica, seeing them pass by, called to them, and obliged them to stay with her, which they did, but with little ease, as being extreamly troubled at what had happed. For Berelisa thought not fit to acquaint Philonica with the disturbance she was in, since she could not do it without discovering the mutual love which was between her and Artemidorus. That which yet increased her disquiet, was, that this Prince was neither with Philonica, nor with the Prince of Agrigentum; however, hoping to meet with me before the night were passed, she said not a word, and only charged divers people, in case they saw me, to tell me, that she would gladly speak with me about a business that required great hast. So that in fine, one of Berelisa's friends having found me among some women told me of it; but it happening to be just at the time that the musick gave over, and that all people were departing, I could not by reason of the throng get from among those Ladies with whom I was in discourse, nor yet come near Berelisa. Besides that, not able to conceive what she was so hasty to acquaint me with, I resolved to put it off till betimes next day. By this means she went away without seeing me, and I went my ways, without any thought of Artemidorus, to whom there had happened what is indeed to be admired. For you are to know, Madam, that Terillus having over heard what Berelisa had said, took a resolution in the first transport of his indignation, either to destroy himself or Artemidorus. To which end, it being ordinary for men to take their swords with them, in such evening walks as these, because it is very late ere they retire, and that in regard they are obliged to convey the Ladies, it seems fit they should be in posture to defend themselves; Terillus found it an easie matter to execute his design, yet so, as that it might not be discovered. He had no sooner left Berelisa and Lysicoris, but he went to find out Artemidorus, whom he soon found; for as a jealous Lover is very observant of what his Rival does, he knew the place where he had left him. Finding him accordingly, and taking him aside unperceived by any, he led him into one of those cross walks, which I told you had only Lamps at the places where they crossed. He was no sooner in it, but Terillus broke forth thus, My Lord, said he to him, you will haply think me very bold, if I presume to ask you whether you remember not a certain thing you said to me in the Wood of Carisalis; further, if I desire to know whether you will make good your word; for since you cannot bestow Berelisa on me, though you would, there is a necessity you should deprive him of his life, who once saved yours, according to your promise, so dispose of your self, that you may return me the life which I have preserved for you, Terillus at these words having drawn, Artemidorus saw it was no time to consider what he had to do, he retreated two or three steps to put himself into a posture of defence, and moved by a resentment of generosity and gratitude, I beseech you, cryed he to him, force me not to your ruine, since it is no fault of mine that you are not loved by Berelisa. But Terillus in stead of returning any answer to Artemidorus, made such a thrust at him, that this Prince was satisfied, that if he did not look to himself, he who sometimes had saved his life, would now take it away. However, for some time he stood only upon the defensive; but at length, finding himself hurt on the left side, he became more prodigal of his Valour, And now looking on Terillus as a furious Rival, there hapned between these two Lovers, a most terrible Combat; for being at good distance from those Lamps which were in the cross walks, all they could do was to see the glistering of their swords, not perceiving one another distinctly. But in fine, not to trouble you with the description of a Combate, which was not seen by any body: I shall onely tell you, that it proved so bloody and so obstinate, that Terillus fell dead at Artemidorus's feet, after he had received four great wounds. 'Tis true, Artemidorus had received three, whereby he was disabled to walk, as having one of them in his thigh; and being got into one of the most remote Walks, they had not haply been found out, if by chance Berelisa, who was to lie with Lysicoris that night, so to avoid the opening of the Castle gate of Agrigentum at an unseasonable hour, had not slunk away from Philonica, to go out at a back gate of the Garden which was neerest to that Quarter where her friend lived. Berelisa therefore following her, and being conducted by a Brother of Lysicoris and some others, they passed through that Walk where Artemidorus and Terillus had fought, and where they yet were in a most sad condition. The slaves who went before them, with a kind of Torch made of the Bark of Pine trees, which they use in that Isle, to light them in the night, spyed Terillus laid along on the ground all bloody, and Artemidorus leaning against a Tree, as hardly able to keep on his feet, and having his own Sword in his right hand, held that of his adversary in his left, to help to bear himself up. These slaves making a great exclamation at it, Lysicoris, Berelisa, and the Gentlemen who waited on them, came neer, and found these Rivals bloody all over. To tell you what impression it made in Berelisa, were a thing would trouble me much. As for Artemidorus, he spoke so, as that it was soon seen his wisdom and discretion had not left him; for he bemoaned his misfortune, in that he had been forced to fight with a man to whom he was obliged; and concealing the occasion of their quarrel, to preserve the reputation of Berelisa, he only acquainted them that he was not the beginner. But while Lysicoris, her brother and the other

Gentlemen

Gentlemen went to find out Chyrurgions and people, to have a care of, and remove the persons hurt, Artemidorus turning to Berelisa, All the suit I make to you, Madam, is, that if I die, you will believe I die with all fidelity to you, and that if I live, you assure your self it shall be only for your sake. These words having softned the heart of this great Beauty, it soon dissolved into tears in her eyes, so that she was not able to return him any other answer, then these three words, I wish it; as being partly hindred by the arrival of a multitude of people in an instant, which obliged them to provide for the wounded, whom for the present they carryed to Lysicoris's house as being the neerest.

They were no sooner gotten thither, but the Prince of Agrigentum, who had been acquainted with this accident before he had reached his own Palace, was there also; where he had not been long ere Terillus dies in the hands of the Chyrurgions who dressed him. Whereupon the Prince of Agrigentum, who knew how powerful the Family of Terillus was, caused the Corps of this unhappy Lover to be immediately carried to his own Palace, so to divert his friends from coming where Artemidorus was, whose wounds were very dangerous. But that Berelisa might not grieve for this misfortune, with that freedom she wished, Clidimira going homewards in her Chariot, passed by Lysicoris's house, and so came to understand what had hapned; pretending a tenderness for the health of her Sister in Law, by reason of the fright she had received, she would needs see what condition that Prince was in, for whom she had so infinite affection: I leave you to imagine what resentments these two Rivals might have, as also what might be those of Artemidorus, who when he had been dressed, saw all people come freely into the Chamber where Lysicoris had disposed him, and found these two women about him. 'Tis true, this disturbance lasted not long; for Lysicoris having observed what trouble he was in, as also what Berelisa suffered, caused the Chyrurgions to give order that the Company should quit the Prince's Chamber. By this means Clidimira was forced to depart, and to allow Berelisa the liberty of bemoaning this unfortunate adventure, which she was more sensible of than can be well imagined, for she was not only troubled for him whom she loved, but was also afflicted for his death whom she loved not. This done, the Prince of Agrigentum fearing the friends of Terillus, who was descended of a House to which courage and boldness was hereditary, should commit some violence, left part of his Guard at Lysicoris's, and returned to his Palace. For my part, I heard nothing of this accident till the next morning, no more did Philonice, but at the first noise of it, I was more surprised than ever I was at any thing in my life. This day the friends of Terillus making a great stir about his death, Artemidorus was secretly brought into the Castle of Agrigentum; for the Illustrious Prince, who is Master of it, would not, out of considerations as much of Generosity as Policy, expose Artemidorus to the violence of his Enemies; so that now it was Berelisas charge to have a care of this Illustrious wounded person. 'Tis true Clidimira kept her company much, for it having hapned that a house stood next to hers falling down, had brought with it part of the Walls of her Lodgings: Upon this pretence she desired to be entertained at her Father-in-Laws, who not considering the consequence of it, received her; so that Artemidorus, notwithstanding his aversion, was obliged to see her, and Berelisa could not blame him for it, nor indeed durst take it ill. Now Clidimira being very subtle, behaved her self so, as that she really perswaded Artemidorus that she had never loved him with that tenderness as she did then. On the other side Berelisa, notwithstanding all the secret discontents which she had gone through, and those she struggled with, assured him, that never any woman was inspired with a more violent, and withal a more vertuous passion, than that she then had for him; and what was most remarkable, was, that these two Rivals, out of a fear of disturbing the Illustrious Patient, as also to conceal their loves from the world; and lastly, for fear of losing the happiness which it was to them, to see what they loved, seemed to live in an absolute Peace, though they really hated one the other as much as might be.

But Artemidorus beginning to recover, and having past all danger, fell into an incredible disquiet. For though he faithfully and fervently loved Berelisa, yet could he not without incivility reject the applications of Clidimira: so that it was a perpetual trouble to him, for to entertain them but coldly, he could not without some violence to his own inclinations; if he received them with any satisfaction, he must expect to find in the eyes of Berelisa, those characters of affliction which brought him infinite trouble. But in fine, to put a period to my relation, you are to know that this private combat proved of publick concernment. For Artemidorus, being Brother to the Prince of Leontum, and there being no probable account given of this quarrel, the friends of Terillus were so ill satisfied with the Prince of Agrigentum, for giving Sanctuary to him who had killed him, that the people being engaged in it, and the Magistrates taking notice of it, he was forced to acquaint Artemidorus, that, though he were quite recovered of his wounds, it were hard for him to carry the business so, as that he might promise himself safety in his Court, as he had hoped he might, by reason of the difference that then was between the Prince of Leontum and himself. But at length that the business might be carryed on with as much generosity as might be, the Prince of Agrigentum assured him of a safe Retreat with the Prince of Syracuse, and withal forced him to submit to be put into an equipage sutable to his condition, and that he might continue it to him at Syracuse, till such time as he had made his peace with the Prince his Brother; assuring him, that if the friends of Terillus might be reduced to hear any reason, he would send for him back to Agrigentum. Philonice, for her part, expressed a thousand civilities to him; and it may be said, that never man had so much cause both to commend and complain of his Fortune, as Artemidorus then had: For as he was infinitely obliged to the Prince of Agrigentum, so was he equally unhappy in that he was forced to leave Berelisa. It added some grains to his unhappiness, that he was loved by Clidimira; these three Persons suffering no mean afflictions; yet such as were not alike in all. For Berelisa was excessively afflicted at the absence of a Prince whom she loved, and of whose affection she was assured, though she was not without some jealousies he might prove false to her. Clidimira was for her part as highly troubled, in that she lost both the hope of regaining him, and that of seeing him of a long time. They had accordingly each of them to express their several passions, a conference in private with this Prince the night before his departure. Although it be the most terrible thing in the world to a woman to love, and not be loved (said Clidimira to him) yet (my Lord) I am of opinon, that rule ought not to be so general, and that a person whom only the malice of her Fortune hath made seem unfaithful, may and ought to repair the crime whereof she stands accused, and persist in her affection, even though she be not loved any longer. And therefore (my Lord, added she) permit the unfortunate Clidimira to assure you, that into what part soever of the Earth Fortune shall dispose you, she shall have those sentiments of affection for you, which she shall never for any other. I quarrel not with you (continued she) that you have quitted the affection you had for me, and have directed it to Berelisa; for when you began to love her, it was because you believed me unconstant: I was then at the disposal of a Husband, and could not love you any longer with innocence. But be you withal so favourable, as not to accuse me of a crime, which my ill fortune forced me to commit: I do not certainly deserve you should have that consideration of my love, as to make you disingage your self from Berelisa, but you may haply think me worthy to look on the heart that she possesses as a jewel, which it is possible I may enjoy, in case she either neglect or lose it. All then that I crave, is, that if by some accident, yet unforseen, you should with-draw your affection from her, you would promise to bestow it on me, and forget my weakness past. Ah, Madam, (said Artemidorus to her) you propose to me things impossible, for Berelisa will not lose me, and though she should, I shall be thought certainly at a loss of all reason, if I should ever be induced to resign my self to a person who had so unmercifully forsaken me before. All therefore I can say to you, is, that as I have endured your infidelity without any disturbance or revenge, so I shall without indiscretion admit those obligations you shall lay upon me, and shall so entertain them, as not to be deceived by them a second time.

This conference had certainly put Artemidorus into some disorder, had I not interrupted; but as to the discourse this Prince had with Berelisa, it was longer and fuller of passion, for the tenderness of it was reciprocal. However, Artemidorus could not absolutely force all jealousie out of Berelisas heart, though in those things he said to her, he discovered the greatest passion in the World. I am easily perswaded (said she to him) to believe that you love me; nay further, I am confident you love not Clidimira; but I am withal certain, that you are satisfied she loves you, and I doubt not but that if there should happen any difference between us, you would renew your affection to her.

In the mean time, this consideration is no small torment to me, and if you desire I should not die of grief, you must promise me in case absence should consume the affection you bear me, or that some other unhappy accident divorce me from your heart, or that my death make an eternal separation between us, that you will never love Clidimira; for I perceive that when you shall be returned to Leontum, there may happen such a turn of Fortune, as may bring her thither also. But can I give you a greater assurance of my affection, answered Artemidorus, than by promising to love you eternally, and to love none but you? You may, my Lord, replied this powerful Beauty, for amidst those fantastick apprehensions I am now engaged with, I should be more satisfied to hear you once say, that you will never love Clidimira, then that you should swear you will ever love Berelisa. But when I protest that I shall love you as long as I live, replied he, does it not signifie as much, as if I said I shall never love her? No (my Lord) it does not (replied she) and if you were sufficiently read in love, you would not think this distinction so extravagant, nor would make so much difficulty to humour my affection. Hereupon Artemidorus was obliged to promise her all she desired; and moreover, assured her, that as soon as he could, he would return to Agrigentum, that it should be only for her sake that he did return; and that if Afranor would but give his consent, he would marry her. He had once intended to have proposed it to Afranor, before his departure, but in regard it would have proved very unseasonable, Berelisa would not permit him. She also made him promise he would not write to Clidimira, though she should write to him; to be short, she made all the proviso's which the nicest jealousie could suggest against this dangerous Rival.

This posture were Affairs in, when Artemidorus left Agrigentum. He loved Berelisa, and he him: He had renounced all love to Clidimira, yet she still loved him, and though he could not guess what might be his fortune, he immediately went to Syracuse, whither I accompanied him. He was no sooner gone from Agrigentum, but Clidimira did two things, one was, she entred into Combination with one of the friends of Terillus, purposely to oblige him to use all means to ingage the rest to oppose the return of Artemidorus; the other was, that she got leave to return to Leontum, where she hath managed her affairs with so much policy, that at the present she is so powerful in that Court, that Artemidorus cannot hope ever to come into his Country, but through her means.

On the other side, Berelisa left no stone unmoved to hasten his return to Agrigentum; but those with whom Clidimira held correspondence opposed it so stifly, that the Prince of Agrigentum thought himself obliged, out of considerations of his own interest, not to send for him. But there fell out another accident in the Court of Syracuse, which obliged Artemidorus, and me, to leave it. There hapned also other alterations at Leontine, which forced thence a Princess, who is at the present at Clusium, and we were by divers motives induced to come into Italy with Amilcar, with whom we took shipping together in Sicily, af-

as we had entred into a ſolemn friendſhip. But I forget to tell you, that ſince Clidimiras coming to Leontum, and that ſhe hath gained great reputation there: Artemidorus is much more unfortunate than ever he was; for being ſtill paſſionately devoted to Bereliſa, and ſtanding upon a punctilio of fidelity, he was ſo far from intreating his former Miſtreſs to continue her favours and good offices, that he vouchſafes not to anſwer the obliging Letters, which ſhe writes to him. On the other ſide, he underſtands that the Prince of Eriaeus, is fallen deeply in love with Bereliſa, and that he is joyned with the Friends of Terillus to hinder his return to Argentum, and that he might be abſolutely unhappy, he durſt not have any correſpondence with the Princeſs his Siſter, leſt he might offend the Prince his Brother. But when all is done, the afflictions of Artemidorus, proceeding from no other cauſe than the exceſſive affection towards him of two of the greateſt Beauties in the World. I cannot retract what I ſaid in the beginning of this relation; but on the contrary maintain that this Prince is too blame for taking ſo much trouble upon him, ſince what occaſions his trouble might felicifie any two the greateſt perſons in the World.

For my part (ſaid Amilcar, perceiving Zenocrates had ended his relation) I think you are in the right, and that it is properly of ſuch things, that it may be ſaid a man cannot have too much. I aſſure you (replied Hermilia) I am not of your mind; for I believe a vertuous man thinks it a great affliction, to be loved by one woman, of merit and quality, having beſtowed his affections on another. For what concerns me, ſaid Valeria, I think a woman who is ſo unhappy as to love, and not be loved again, deſerves more pity than a vertuous man who is loved, and yet cannot himſelf love. However it be, ſaid Brutus, I think Artemidorus condition very ſad; for he hath loved a faithleſs woman, whom it is unlikely he will ever hate, ſince ſhe hath ſuch an infinite affection for him; he now loves a perſon whom he cannot come near; he hath a powerful Rival, and this Rival is abſent; his love is an obſtacle to his Ambition; he can neither be among his friends, nor yet among his enemies, and he knows he were happy, if he were not where he is: All which certainly is the greateſt puniſhment that abſence and love put together can inflict on him. It is but too certain, ſays Herminius, and I am of opinion that a Lover who is loved, when he is forced to be at a diſtance from the perſon he loves, and is ſubject to a fear of loſing her, is in a far greater torment, than a Lover who ſimply fears that he may not be loved. I do believe indeed it is the greater torment, ſaid Zenocrates; but yet there is a great pleaſure in the very thought of being loved, and it is as great an affliction to be aſſured that one is not. I agree with you (replied Herminius) and yet the fear of loſing a good which one is poſſeſſed of, and the impoſſibility of enjoying, ſignifie, haply, ſomething as hard to be indured, as the bare diſtruſt of not being able to attain that good which one deſires. But it is certainly too late to begin the diſpoſition of a thing of this nature, eſpecially in the Chamber of one that is ſick, and that a fair one too. For fairneſs (replied Hermilia) I muſt decline it, and for ſickneſs it is not ſo great, as that ſuch pleaſant company ſhould be any inconvenience to me; but certainly it proceeds from the impatience you are in to return to Aroves and Artemidorus. They are certainly (ſays Amilcar) too much ſubject to melancholy, to be left for ſo long time alone; beſides that to deal truly (added he ſmiling) it is already ſo late, that it is fit all addreſs themſelves to that God, who alone is equally propitious to the fortunate and the unfortunate, without any alteration in their fortunes, and that I have already obſerved ſome effects of his power, in the fair eyes of Valeria. Hereupon the whole company riſing, the entertainment was concluded, though Valeria would not acknowledge what Amilcar ſaid, and that ſo many honourable perſons were very unwilling to part.

The End of the Second Book of the Second Part.

BOOK III.

BEing come out of Hermilias Chamber, Brutus, Amilcar, Herminius, Zenocrates and Celeres, went to Aronces and Artemidorus, whom every one (according to his humour) comforted after the beſt manner he could. That done, they fell into diſcourſe about what their minds was taken up with: The Liberty of Rome and of Clelia, was the buſineſs in debate, as being the main ſcope of all their Deſigns. And whereas it was only in the night, that the ſecret friends of Herminius, Brutus and Valerius, had the opportunities of Conference, as ſoon as they had quitted Aronces's Chamber, Brutus went to Valerius's, to reſolve on ſeveral things with him: but all the way he thought of nothing but Lucretia. Alas! ſaid he to himſelf, how much more happy are all other Lovers, whoſe adventures I am entertained with, than I am? For thoſe who are not loved, hope, or at leaſt may hope to be; and thoſe which are, receive thoſe expreſſions of it, which come not without pleaſure. But for my part, I am much more miſerable, for the over-vertuous Lucretia, would not ſo much as that I ſhould know ſhe hath not forgotten me; ſo that I am forced to ſuffer all the malice of a croſs fortune, without the leaſt diverſion of comfort. Inſtead of one, I am ſeiſed by a many paſſions; ſince I am obliged to entertain hatred, jealouſie and ambition as well as love: and beſides all theſe extremities, I muſt chain up my reaſon, and make it a ſlave to the cruelleſt Tyrant that earth affords.

But whilſt Brutus talked thus to himſelf, as he went to Valerius, and that Rome ſeemed to be a depopulated City, the Inhabitants of it being buried in their reſt, the implacable Tullia, whoſe heart was upon the rack of an ambitious jealouſie, which is much more cruel than that which ordinary love inſpires, had ſecretly ſent for him who was Clelias keeper, out of a deſign to corrupt him if ſhe could. You know, ſaid ſhe to him, all that I have done for Tarquin, as alſo what he hath done to raiſe himſelf above all others; and after all; he is not aſhamed to ſubmit himſelf to a Slave, the Daughter of his Enemy. Nor are you ignorant how often he hath endeavoured to take away Clelius's life; conſider then what an exorbitance of paſſion this Prince is hurried into, to deſcend to love Clelia, who hates him above all others; who yet might in time haply pretend to love him, that her Father may be reſtored, and put into a condition to revenge himſelf, and, in his turn, baniſh thoſe by whom he was baniſhed. You may aſſure your ſelf, added ſhe, that if Clelius were once in power, you would not be one of the laſt baniſhed; and you may eaſily conjecture by what is paſt, that he would never be quiet till Tarquin were turned out of the Throne, and till I were poſſeſſed of my grave. Serve me then couragiouſly in the Deſign I have to take away Clelia from Tarquin, and doubt not of a reward proportionable to ſo great a ſervice; for into what place ſoever you would repair for Sanctuary till Tarquin were appeaſed, I will take order you ſhall have no cauſe to complain of your Fortune. Beſides that, all the employments which Tarquin hath put you upon, have raiſed you ſo many Enemies here, that it were not amiſs if you removed: and that Tarquin hath ſo poorly rewarded all thoſe confident executions you have done for him, that you cannot expect any future advantage by them. Let me then by my entreaties, by my reaſons, and by the hopes I give you of making you happy in what place of the World you pleaſe, perſwade you to do what I will have you. You know that I can do almoſt any thing that I deſire to do; ſubmit therefore to my will, if you would not rather diſoblige the Woman of all the World, who hates to extremity what ſhe is once diſpleaſed with, and can moſt eaſily deſtroy what oppoſes her; but withal, who moſt magnificently rewards thoſe who ſerve her with cheerfulneſs and confidence.

The fellow whom ſhe ſpoke to being ſubtle, and ſtanding in fear of her, and knowing her to be the moſt revengeful Woman in the World, ſaw it was no time to conteſt with her; for he conſidered, that having diſcovered her ſelf ſo far to him as ſhe had, he were a loſt man if he denyed her. Beſides, reflecting how ill he had been rewarded for all the crimes he had committed in executing theſe unjuſt Orders of Tarquin, he concluded, that the dangerous conjuncture he was in, he could not do better than entertain the propoſitions which Tullia made to him. He therefore anſwered answered her as one absolutely engaged in her interests, and only demanded some few days to dispose of his affairs, that he might with safety obey her: For Madam, said he to her, I must first make sure of some of the Guard which I command, I must give other Orders to those that are upon the Guard at present, and I must put all things into such a posture, as that nothing may hinder the execution of this noble design of yours, of delivering the King from a person which might really prejudice you, and haply prove his ruine. Tullia agreeing to what he said, dismissed him; and slept the rest of the night with more quiet, than a person so cruel deserved to find.

According to this design, Amilcar having been with her the next morning, she told him that within eight days at farthest, she would put Clelia into his disposal; so that burthened with this great news, he came to acquaint Aronces with it, who certainly received it with no small joy; though he was not so sensible of it as he thought he ought to have been. 'Tis to be feared (said he to Amilcar) I am so accustomed to misfortunes, that I cannot be otherwise than unfortunate. But however it be (says Amilcar) you are to blame not to give Hope a place in your heart; for if Tullia do not what she intends, we shall execute our other resolutions, and you shall find that the same persons who are employed to restore Rome to her liberty, are also engaged to restore Clelia to hers. You have moreover this advantage, that your Rival is one whom all true Romans wish destroyed, and all vertuous people abhor. You speak reason indeed (replied Aronces) but when all is done, Clelia is still in captivity under an unmerciful Tyrant who is in love with her: I live concealed in Rome not being able to do any thing but bemoan my self and give orders; Clelia's liberty is uncertain, the effect of the conspiracy is very doubtful, and supposing Clelia were out of Rome, we were still equally miserable, for what part of the earth would afford us Sanctuary, since we neither know where Otho is, nor where Sulpitius may be, and that the Prince of Numidia who could inform us, continues still in his madness? But all things considered might it please the Gods, I could but see Clelia once out of Tarquin's power, for could I but see her at liberty, and might but once more cast my self at her feet, and protest that I die for love of her, I should render fortune thanks and acknowledge my self more obliged to you than ever I was to any man.

But while Aronces was thus distracted between hope and fear; while Amilcar employed all his wits to serve him, while the Prince of Numidia was in some danger of death; while Brutus, Herminius, Valerius, and their friends plotted secretly in Rome to make some insurrection which might usher in the liberty of their Country; while Arsidonius, Zenocrates, and Celeres were ready to hazard their persons in any thing wherein they might serve Aronces, while Mutius who still continued his addresses to Valeria, divided his heart between the love of her, and that of glory; Horatius was in an incredible disturbance at Ardea, having understood by some spies that Clelia was in Tarquin's power, that this Tyrant was fain in love with her, that the Prince of Numidia had endeavoured to deliver her, and that it was not known where Aronces was. If he had durst he would have come disguised out of Ardea as Herminius did, to see if he could have delivered Clelia; but he knew he was so much looked on by the besieged, that there was no possibility to do any thing of that nature; and all he could do, was to carry things so, as to oblige the Ardeans to persist in demanding the liberty of the Captives. But being withal a person of conduct and experience, he easily conceived it was not very likely Tarquin should deliver them up, as being one that was obstinate in all his resolutions. He therefore could do no more than what he did, unless it were to bemoan his fortune, whose pleasure it was, that at the same time he should be in exile in love, ill intreated and obliged to his Rival.

As for Tarquin, he was astonished to hear that it was the Prince of Numidia who had attempted the delivery of Clelia; for it was easie to infer thence that this African Prince must needs have a considerable party in Rome, to carry on such a design as that. However he doubted not when the Siege were over to discover the truth of the business; and so for the present spent not his thoughts on any thing so much, as how to gain the place by some treaty, or if that could not be done, take it by storm, which way they had not yet attempted. For Titus and the Prince of Pometia, their minds were rather employed in Love than War, and Herminia and Collatina were yet absolute Empresses over their Souls. But as concerning Sextus, Lucretia was the continual object of his imagination, he always saw her, even when he saw her not; he thought of nothing but her, he talked of nothing else, he conceived a hope though he knew not what should oblige him to it; and his apprehensions were so violent and so distracted, that never since it was loves employment to put the senses into rebellion against the mind, did he inspire into any one a passion more exorbitant, more tyrannical, and more fit to overturn all reason than that which had seized his soul. Thence it proceeded that he troubled himself not much, either at what was done in Rome or passed in the Camp, and it took up all his wits to find out means to see Lucretia again.

While these things were in agitation, the Envoy of the King of Clusium, staid in expectation, though to no purpose, to hear some news of Aronces; for though there were many persons, who could, if they had so pleased, have acquainted Tarquin where that Prince was, as also with the true worth of Brutus, and all the Plots that were a foot in Rome; nay, though there were two women who understood this whole secret, and two Maids that knew the greatest part of it, yet did it not take the least air that could be. For the Interest of the Country being thought at Rome of equal concernment with that Religion, there was a greater observance of faith and secrecy in such emergencies than there is elsewhere. And for the women, who were trusted with the knowledge of a business of so great importance, they were not ordinary persons; for Racilia, Brutus's Aunt, she carried about her that generosity which was (as it were) hereditary to the Family, whence she was descended, and Sivilia doubtless wanted not those perfections, and that greatness of Courage as were requisite to qualifie her for the trust of a thing of such consequence. Nor could it otherwise therwise be, but that the illustrious Herminius was so well acquainted with her worth, that had she not been his Mother, he would have made her his Friend. For Valeria there need be no more said to give her the greatest commendation that may be, than that she was Valerius Daughter, Lucretias friend, and Herminius's Mistress; and for Hermilia there needed no more to distinguish her from the Commonalty of women who can keep nothing secret, than to say she was Brutus's Sister, Racilias Neece, and Valeria's intimate friend. 'Tis true, she was as yet very young, and for that reason was she not acquainted with all that was designed against Tarquin; and for what she knew besides, there was no fear she might discover any thing, since she could not have done it without hazarding the life of her Brother.

Thus was this great business carried on so secretly amongst these illustrious persons, that there was not any thing discovered that might prejudice either Aronces, Brutus, or Herminius; nor was there any thing suspected abroad of the great design wherein the illustrious Lover of Lucrecia had been ingaged ever since his coming from Metapont; nay, this year he had two sons were received into the service; who were so far from knowing any thing of the design of their generous Father, that they were sufficiently engaged in his Sons Interest, whom Brutus was designed to ruine; and besides were entred into a Cabal opposite to that of those young men, with whom the subtle Amilcar held a secret correspondence against, if there were occasion to make use of them. Besides all this, there passed neither day nor night, but there were secret meetings in Rome, either at Racilias, or at Valerias, or at Sivilias. The Salii, and the Vestals wanted not their concernment in these negotiations, all which related only to the liberty of Rome. They caused divers reports to be scattered among the people, prejudicial to Tarquin, either relating to the Siege, or of his refusal to deliver up the prisoners, or of the loss of his Army, which grew weaker every day; or his past Crimes, his present Tyranny, or his future exorbitance. Care was also taken to possess the multitude, that if Tarquin took in Ardea, Rome would be reduced under a more cruel subjection than ever; thus to infuse into the minds of the inhabitants of that famous City, a general inclination which might ingage them to a rising, when there should be occasion. It is certain there needed no more than the violences of Tarquin and crimes of Tullia, to dispose the Romans into a desire of shaking off the yoke of so unjust a Tyranny; for there were none but knew, that Tarquin was no lawful King of Rome, and that instead of having been chosen according to the Fundamental Laws of that State, he had caused to be murthered one of the most vertuous Kings in the World, so to possess himself of the power he injoyed, so that it may be said he acquired it through the blackest of all crimes, and conserved it through the most insupportable tyranny that ever was. But though this Prince understood by some of his creatures that the people was discontented, yet contrary to his custom, he slighted the information; as having his heart at that time wholly taken up by love and detestation. Clelias resistance had filled his soul with those two passions, after so strange a manner, that they afforded him not the least quiet, and his mind was hurried by such violent agitations, that it was perpetually taken up with one of these two thoughts, either that he should injoy Clelia or destroy her. Troubled therefore with a perpetual imagination; either of forcing her to love him, or putting her to death, his mind could not admit much quiet; nay, Aronces and Clelia, as unfortunate as they were, were less disquieted than he, it being the property of virtue to fill with serenity those hearts it is possessed of. Not but that even the most virtuous people are sometimes most unfortunate, and most sensible of their being such, but it never happens that their hearts are tossed with those impetuous disturbances whereby the souls of wicked persons are shaken through the conscience of their crimes, and if those are forced to complain of some other, they have withal the happiness to have no cause of complaint against themselves, which is no small advantage. For as it would trouble a man more to have any thing to object against a neighbour, than against a stranger, against a kinsman than against a neighbour, against a friend than a kinsman, against a mistress than a friend, so it must be most troublesome for a man to have any thing to object against himself above all others. But there being nothing that Aronces and Clelia could reproach to themselves, they indured their misfortunes with an admirable constancy, though the sence they had of them were as deep as their affection was great.

There hapned in the mean time a very strange accident which might in all likelihood have proved the mother of a world of mischief. Valerius being come one night to Racilias to confer with Herminius, who was within three dayes to return to Ardea, the Slave whose charge it was to open the gate having over-watched himself before, forgot to put out a Lamp, which set the house on fire, at a time when all in it were so securely a sleep, that the first notice they had of it, was by the cries of those that passed by the next morning who perceiving great flakes and eruptions of fire, soon noised it all about by knocking at the adjoyning houses, and making horrible outcryes. Of all those that were lodged at Racilias, Aronces was the first took the Allarm, and could not be much surprized at such a confused noise, but must needs be much more, when, having gotten hastily out of his bed, he found his Chamber full of smoak, and whole roof opposite to his windows, so all of a fire, that it was not imaginable how it could be quenched. Awaking hereupon the slave that attended him, he sent him to do the like to all those of that side where the fire had not yet taken, and went himself and knocked at the several Chambers of Racilia, Hermilia, Brutus and Herminius, the Stairs being as yet free, in regard the Slave who had been the occasion of this disaster, lying in the highest room in the house, the fire began at the roof. That which was most fatal in this accident, was that it was broad day; by which means an infinite multitude of people being gotten about the house, were pressing to get in, to indeavour to keep the fire from spreading to the next houses. This put Aronces and Herminius into a strange disturbance, for it was impossible but that among such a crowd of people, there might be some one that knew them, and consequently might cause them to be taken. Aronces whose thoughts were wholly taken up with the deliverance of Clelia, was now in danger to be taken himself, and Herminius was now within the reach of Tarquins cruelty, and not unlikely to lose his life; insomuch that those two illustrious but unfortunate persons were in some doubt whether it were better for them to expose themselves to the flames then fall into the hands of such an enemy, were it not that in hazarding their lives in that manner, they had also brought Racilia, Hermilia, Brutus and divers other persons that were in the house into imminent danger. When therefore they understood that it was absolutely impossible to stop the violence of the fire without assistance from without, they were the first who opened the Gates to the multitude of people, who demanded entrance, telling Racilia and Hermilia, that they chose rather to be the Victims of the Tyrant then expose the lives of two such considerable persons to the cruelty of the flames.

But that there might be a combination of generosity and prudence, and that whilst they endeavoured the preservation of others, they might not be thought absolutely negligent of their own, they disguised themselves as much as they could, and their design was, as they opened the gates, to follow Racilia and Hermilia with burthens of Purple, Tapistry, and other things of that nature, pretending they were employed to carry them to Sivelias, whose house was not very far thence. But to the end they might also defend themselves if occasion were, they took every man a sword. As for Brutus it was his business to conduct his Aunt and Sister, who had left in the house such as they thought able to hinder the disorders which are done upon such occasions. For Brutus not daring to make any discovery of his understanding, it was not thought fitting he should give any directions in an accident, wherein it is but requisite a man had his judgement at liberty, to act as he ought; Besides that desiring to be in a condition to serve his friends in case they were set upon, he chose rather to go out of the house with them. To be short, this unfortunate company had fortunately made a shift to break throw that throng of people which was knotted together before Racilias door, and was gotten within twenty paces of that of the vertuous mother of Herminius, when this illustrious Roman was discovered by the Captain of Tarquin's Guard, who was going to visit a friend of his in that quarter. The man thinking it a fair occasion to gain a considerable reward from the Tyrant and Tullia, by putting into their hands a person whose destruction they had so long endeavoured to bring about, cryed out to the people, charging them in the King's name to secure a traytor who was there present, whom he shewed to those whom he spoke to: And that they might take heart by his example, he immediately drew his Sword, and was seconded by two of his companions who did the like.

Herminius had scarce perceived that they made at him, but casting away the Purple Tapistry he had on his back, he put himself into a posture of defence, and indeed behaved himself so valiantly, that he made his way through the crowd that was about him. Aronces who went before him, had almost reached Sivelias, where he doubted not to have found Sanctuary, but turning about, he finds his friende ngaged; Disburthening himself therefore of what he carried, instead of providing for his own safety, he came to relieve Herminius, Brutus seconded him, having conducted Racilia, and Hermilia into Sivelias. The danger they was in was more then ordinary, for what was most remarkable in this adventure was, that though Tarquin were infinitely hated, yet the charge that man made for the securing of Herminius proved effectual. It is true, that as that infinite confux of people which throng to such unfortunate disasters, brings along with it a many persons apt enough to commit any disorders, so is it not much to be wondred at, that there were those that promoted this injust design. But Herminius, seeing Aronces and Brutus engaged in his relief, was so far from being encouraged at it, that it very much displeased him, and he made a shift to tell them so much as might acquaint them, that they should not have hazarded themselves for him. But they were deaf to such advice, on the contrary they were more eager in his defence then they had been in their own, though they were set upon and kept in by abundance of people. Those who were spectators of this action, were astonished to see Brutus fight as he did, for the Captain of the Guard spoke to much purpose, when he told them that the business now was to take an enemy of Tarquin's, the other heard him not. 'Tis true, that having gained among the people the reputation of one out of his sences, the people looked on his valour in this encounter as an effect of his madness, and therefore consigned their respect to him as Nephew to Tarquin. For Aronces, his valour made him be observed, though not discovered, for he who would have taken Herminius, would fain have had him alive, and have dispatched Aronces, who defended with such a courage, that never was there seen any thing like it. On the other side Herminius, to reward his generosity by another worthy eternal memory, knowing him who would have taken him to be the same who had promised Clelia within a few days, would not by any means kill him, and was content only to ward off his blows, lest he might ruine that design. But by unhappy accident, Aronces not knowing that to be the man who should have delivered Clelia, plaid upon him so effectually, that having dispatched three or four of those that seconded him, he run him with his sword quite through the body, so that he fell dead at his feet. Herminius who saw the beginning of the business, cryed out purposely to hinder Aronces from making that thrust, yet his generosity proved ineffectual, for his voice was not heard till after the blow was past. But if it came not soon enough to hinder his death who was to give Clelia liberty, yet came it time enough to discover to Aronces what he had done, for in the instant the man fell, he remembred his Physiognomy, and perceived that he took away his life who was to deliver his Mistress, which proved the greatest affliction of any that ever had happened to him. The horrid apprehension of despair which in that instant seized his spirits, yet could not suspend his valour; on the contrary it inflamed it, and desirous at least to ſave his friends life, he did things ſo prodigious, that he aſtoniſhed the multitude that encompaſſed him: Brutus and Herminius for their parts did what (truly repreſented) would exceed probability, inſomuch that the Captain, and two of his Guard being diſpatched, they were not ſo much preſſed upon as before.

Nevertheleſs, they muſt needs have fallen at laſt, had they not been relieved by the prudence of the generous Sivelia; for as ſoon as Brutus's Aunt was gotten into her houſe, and had acquainted her how things ſtood, ſhe immediately ſent to the place where lodged Amilcar, Artemidorus, Zenocrates and Celeres, to acquaint them, and demand their aſſiſtance. But it happened that the firſt was gone to viſit Clelia, by order from Tarquin, from whom he had to that purpoſe received a Letter, for it was ordinarily in the morning that he went to ſee this fair Priſoner, ſo to have all the other part of the day free to do other things wherein he was obliged to ſerve his friends. Beſides that Clelia was in a condition that ſhe awaked very betimes, and was ſo negligent as to matter of dreſſing, that Amilcar had admittance as ſoon as he pleaſed, without any diſturbance; for it having been long ere they could force open Racilias gate, to quench the fire, as having not yet the aſſiſtance of thoſe that were without, it was far days. But in fine, Artemidorus, Zenocrates and Celeres being acquainted with what paſſed, came immediately to Sivelias followed by all the people they had. In this poſture entring at one gate of this virtuous Matrons houſe, and going out at that, where Aronces, Herminius and Brutus were, they came in to their relief; and their arrival was ſo ſeaſonable, that the multitude ſeeing ſo many armed people come out of the houſe, was eaſily perſwaded there were a many more within; ſo that running away, they left thoſe whom they would have taken, at liberty to enter into Sivelias. They were no ſooner in it, but they thought it the beſt courſe to diſlodge; for they eaſily imagined, that as ſoon as Tullia were informed of the buſineſs, ſhe would be-ſet the houſe. Without any ſtay therefore, they only paſſed through the Houſe, and went to that where Artemidorus, Zenocrates and Celeres lodged, where taking their Horſes, they mounted Aronces on Amilcar's; which done, Brutus having found them a guide, directed them to a Houſe which Valerius had near Collatia, there to lie concealed, till ſuch time as they had more leiſure to conſider what they had to do. For his part, he would not depart, telling them, that his apparent ſtupidity would excuſe him in this adventure, and bidding them not trouble themſelves about him. There being no other courſe to take, they went where Brutus directed them, and were there gladly received; for Valerius who had left Rome at the break of day to go thither, was there two hours before.

But as they went, what did not the unfortunate Aronces think on? If he had followed his own inclination, he could not have been prevailed with to quit Rome, but as it had been madneſs not to have done it, conſidering what was paſt, ſo was it his concernment to leave it, which yet he could not without ſo much regret and reluctancy, that never was there any Lover ſo miſerable. Ah! ſaid he to himſelf, How unfortunate art thou! Canſt thou expreſs no valour but what muſt be prejudicial to Clelia? Is it poſſible thou ſhouldſt deſtroy him, who was to deliver her? Is it poſſible, after ſuch a cruel and monſtrous diſaſter hath hapned to thee, thou canſt doubt thy own deſtruction, or conceive the leaſt hope? No, no, it were more rational to deſpair, and that thou ſhouldſt by an inconſiderate death put a period to ſo unhappy a life.

While Aronces entertained himſelf in this ſad manner, Herminius, who was extremely troubled at the accident, came up to him, and demanded his pardon, as if he had been guilty of his death. Alaſs, deareſt Herminius, ſaid he to him, what do you mean? It is I ſhould rather demand your pardon, as the cauſe of your misfortunes, for I am perſwaded that my ſingle unhappineſs cauſes that of all my friends, and that Fortune, who is reſolved to make me the moſt miſerable of all, thinking it not ſufficient I ſhould be ſuch through my own misfortunes, is pleaſed I ſhould have no friends but what are unhappy. It is indeed eaſie to diſcover that my unhappineſs is particular to me, and waits on me every where, for it happens, as it were, by appointment, ſince when it ſo much concerns Clelia, that I ſhould remain undiſcovered at Rome, the particular houſe wherein I lay concealed muſt needs take fire, which muſt force me out of it, in the ſight of two thouſand perſons; and the malice and inconſtancy of my Deſtiny muſt needs have it ſo, that of the infinite number of people, who made it their buſineſs either to kill or take us; I, who would have been content to die a thouſand, and a thouſands times for Clelias Liberty, muſt preciſely kill that man who ſhould have delivered her. It is certain, my Lord, replied Herminius, this unhappy accident hath in it ſomething more inſupportable than were the loſs of a Battel, or ſomething elſe of that nature; but all conſidered, I find in my ſelf a certain confidence, that ſomething will happen which we expect not; for, in fine, there hath not been in Rome ſince Tarquin's aſſuming the power, ſo general an inclination to ſome great turn of affairs, as I have obſerved within theſe few days. Ah Herminius, replied Aronces, was there any thing more certain in appearance than Clelias Liberty? and yet by a ſtrange ſhifting of Fortune, I muſt needs kill him who was to deliver her. If you then take my advice, let us not hope any thing, added he, but let us rather prepare our ſelves, either to endure all misfortunes imaginable, or by death to accord them.

Whilſt Aronces and Herminius was thus engaged, and that Artemidorus, Zenocrates and Celeres bemoaned their friends, and their own misfortunes, and were upon their way altogether to Valerius's houſe, divers things paſt at Rome. For Brutus, whoſe great heart admitted not the leaſt fear, went to Tullia, to acquaint her, with his ordinary ſimplicity, that he was preſent when the Captain of Tarquin's guard was killed, who, he ſaid, came by his death among a great multitude of people, by ſetting upon certain men who endeavoured to quench the fire at his Aunts houſe, exaggerating, according to his affected ſtupidity, how much he was to blame for diſturbing ſuch as were were burthened with her goods, which they were carrying to the house of a certain friend of Racilia. Tullia, who had already understood the death of the Captain of the Guard, and was extremely troubled at it, took no heed to what was told her by a man, whom she thought no great master of his senses. On the contrary, without any further discourse with him: Did not your stupidity excuse you, said she to him, I should teach you how those are to be treated who presume to make use of their Swords against his Majesty's Officers. But since your madness secures you, get you gone out of my sight, lest in the transportation I am now in, I treat you for your stupidity, as your Brother was for his too much prudence.

Brutus hearing Tullia threatning him so insolently with death, had almost broke forth, and at once discovered his reason, his indignation, hatred, and his revenge: But at length mastering his resentments, he withdrew, as if he had not heard what Tullia said, and repaired to Racilia, who was at her illustrious friends house. In the mean time the fire being quenched, the streets were clear of people; and that which was most observable, was, that though abundance of people had been spectators of this accident, yet could not Tullia have any punctual account of it. For the Captain being dead without discovering any thing, or so much as naming Herminius, and his companions being also out of the way, all that could be made of it, was, that they had been killed, endeavouring to secure an enemy of Tarquins. The people knew not Herminius from another man, because he was disguised; and for Sivilia, the reputation of her virtue was so great, that none durst inform against her, nor tell Tullia that those armed people, who had rescued the other two, came out of her house. As concerning Aronces, there was mention made of him; and indeed the business was handled in such a confusion, that nothing could be made of it, there being an hundred several relations of the same thing.

But while these things were in agitation, Amilcar was gently entertaining Clelia and Plotina, who were so transported with the hopes of Liberty, that their conversation that morning was as free, as if they had really been at Liberty. For though Amilcar had received a Letter from Tarquin, wherein he easily discovered what a Tyranny Love and Hatred exercised over him, yet he shewed it not to Clelia, but entertained her altogether with discourse concerning Aronces, telling her what satisfaction it would be to him to see her at liberty, what it would be to her to receive new assurances of his affection, and the joy that attends a happiness which succeeds a misery. He gave her also a Letter from Aronces, wherewith she was extremely satisfied, as containing the greatest tenderness and passion; nay, so much was she pleased, that having perused it, she gave it Plotina, who reading it aloud, found therein these words.

THe bare hope of seeing you once at Liberty, causes so great, yet so pleasant a disturbance in my soul, that fearing to dye for joy when I see you again, I conceive my self obliged to assure you, that I am still the most amorous of Men, and the most faithful Lover upon Earth. I know I should be somewhat ashamed that I can survive my grief, and withal fear I may die for joy; but all considered, if you well examine the apprehensions of my soul, you will find that a Lover, who hath been accustomed to misery, may rationally doubt his ability to bear the most sensible of all pleasures: However it happen, I shall think my self obliged to my Destiny, and esteem it such as may move envie, if I but die at your feet, after I have once more said, I love you.

Plotina having read this Letter, told Clelia, that there was something more to be done, that she was obliged to return some answer thereto, and let her see it. Accordingly this excellent person, who had an extraordinary command of her Pen, was pleased to do what Plotina and Amilcar desired, and answered it in these words.

Clelia to the Generous Aronces.

SInce you have survived your grief, you shall not need fear dying for joy, this being more properly the Messenger of Life than Death. But that I may be absolutely happy in my Liberty, remember you have promised never to break those chains which I have put you in; for according to those passionate resentments I have for you, I believe I should chuse rather never to quit my Prison, than that you should get out of the Fetters you are in. Excuse me then, if while you make Vows for my Liberty, mine are, that you may be my perpetual Captive. Farewel, I crave your pardon, if writing to you, I have offered at any Wit; for where there is either Love or Misery, it suffices if there be but Passion.

Clelia having done, Plotina and Amilcar, who were discoursing at the Window, while she was writing, drew near her, and read what she had written. Whereupon Amilcar assuming the discourse: Ah, Madam, said he to her, how extremely am I pleased at your demanding pardon of Aronces, for being too witty in your Letter. There should not certainly be too much wit in Missive and Love Letters, which is the reason that it is so hard to find any Letters or Addresses of this Nature composed as they should; for there must be neither artifice nor negligence; it must not express too much Wit, yet it must speak a certain Gallantry and Passion: In fine, it is so hard to write well in Love, that there cannot be any thing more. But for my part, says Plotina, I cannot conceive there should be more difficulty to write of one thing than of another; for I think that, in point of Letters, all one hath to do, is simply to express ones thoughts. For where there is a conjunction of Fancy and Judgement, one for the most part hath reflexion on every thing which he ought to have, and consequently writes what is fit to write of it. For instance, when I am to write of a business of consequence, I shall not so express it, as if I were only to acquit my self of a simple Complement: If I am to write something of News, I shall not trouble my self about Complements: If I write a Letter of Friendship, I must not labour for any high Stile: If a Love-Letter, I have no more to do than to consult my own heart. I cannot therefore well apprehend why you conceive it so great a difficulty to write Letters of this nature. To dealy truly (says Clelia), I think it not so easie to write any kind of Letters, and that there are but very few persons absolute masters in it. I am of your opinion, replied Amilcar, but of all Letters, those of Love are the hardest to write, as being such, whereof there are very few that are able to judge. Yet Plotina speaks (replied Clelia) as if she thought all sorts very easie, whereas I think, as I have already told you, of all things in the world, it is that requires most judgement. But to shew you I am somewhat versed in it, replied Plotina, and that I know somewhat what belongs to the composing of a Letter, is it not granted that Letters containing business of consequence, ought to be appolite and exact; that they require a soundness of Judgement rather than Eloquence; that they admit not any superfluity or expression, and are compleated by what is pertinent; and that it be especially considered, that there be order and perspicuity? Yet I told you there must be withal, added she, a certain dress of Civility, which is that which puts a difference between the Letters of consequence, written by persons of Honour, and those of others: and in fine, it is necessary that the person who writes, understand well himself, what he would express to another; for I know not any thing more insufferable, than to write a Letter that shall need an Expositor, and confounds things instead of explaining them. And yet there are a many people (replied Clelia) who think they understand themselves when they do not. But Plotina is none of those (replied Amilcar) for I assure you she knows very well what she says, and therefore I should take it as an infinite obligation, if she would shew me how Letters of consolation are to be written; and whereas there happen frequent occasions to write such, I should take her directions in five or six, which I would preserve as patterns, to imitate when need were; for truly, I find nothing so contrary to my inclination as this kind of Letters. For when ever I intend any such, instead of any condoling or sympathizing with such as are afflicted, I find my self more inclined to divert than bemoan them; and I am so far to seek what ought to be said, and what not, that I can never compleat a Letter of this nature, without writing it several times over; nay when all is done, cannot dismiss it without some blots and scratches; and therefore the fair Plotina would extremely oblige me to shew me how to write them. Could you but see my apprehensions of it (replied Plotina) you would certainly do it with great ease, for I can by no means admit these tedious consolatory Letters, as proving always fruitless; whereas it might be said of some people, they write, as if their Letters should have in them some Magical force against affliction, and that they who read them, ought from thence forward abjure all regret for what they have lost. But I am to withal (added she) that people would be perswaded once for all, that only time is the comforter of such afflictions, and that it is not the proper office of Eloquence. Moreover, what measure of consolation is to be applied to such as are not over afflicted. The safest course a man can take in such cases, is to let his consolatory Letters be very short; for to observe a certain moderation therein, he is only to acquaint the person he writes to, how much he is concerned in his affliction, without digressing into tedious Lamentations, or high Elogies, not ingaging the numerous forces of Moral Philosophy and Eloquence to no purpose. It is very true (says Amilcar) and you are questionless much in the right. For how many Women are comforted for the death of their Husbands, when, indeed, they neither need nor care for it? Nay, how many persons are there of all relations, who should people accommodate themselves to their secret thoughts, were rather to be congratulated than bemoaned, since they are not sorry, that they are heirs to those for whose deaths they are complemented. I therefore resolve amiable Plotina (added Amilcar) never to write any Letters of consolation, but such as shall be short; not to disturb Morality and Eloquence on these occasions; to make no more those long exaggerations against the cruelty of death, as some do; as also not to study high Commendations or spins out long Panegyrick, and in a word, absolutely to conform my self to your directions. I shall not trouble you to tell me, how a man ought to behave himself in congratulating another's good fortune; 'tis an Art I am absolute Master of, and I can furnish you with ten or a dozen beginnings of Letters of that kind, abating those that start out thus, I congratulate your ..... I conceive my self so much concerned in your ..... and the like, which are too low for persons who would be thought Masters of Wit. But I should take it as a transcendent courtesie, if you would shew me how I might acquit my self well of those Letters of Recommendation, which are given unsealed to those whom one thinks fit to commend; and particularly how those to whom one writes may understand, whether it be his earnest desire they should should do the business proposed, or is indifferent whether they do it, or not; for when I am at Carthage, I am in a manner persecuted with such emergencies.

For my part (replied Plotina) when I commend a business which relates to such as for whom I have no great esteem, I write a short dry Letter, yet not wanting as to Civility, nay you shall find in it the word Intreat, but it stands so alone, that it is not fastened to any thing. On the contrary, when I effectually desire a thing might be done, I first of all make appear that what I desire is just, I give a good character of the person whom I recommend; I express what friendship or esteem I have for him, I put the obligation is done in his favour upon my own account: I ingage the person to whom I write in point of honour to do him some good office, and to make all secure, I write by some other hand, whereby I confirm all I had writen before. For what concerns me (said Clelia) I would gladly learn how to write to a sort of people, with whom onely Civility obliges me to hold a certain correspondence, who yet are such as you would not favour with your friendship, nor take any pleasure to oblige. In the first place (replied Plotina) I should advise to write to them as seldom as might be, for I can by no means away with that sort of people, that write to no other end but to write, who so readily charge themselves without any necessity, with the receiving of hundreds of Letters from persons whom they care not for; and are for the most part pleased when they send or receive without any choice. And in the second, I should wish, when one is obliged upon the account you speak of, a man would not express in his Letters either too great wit, or too much friendship; for certainly a man injures himself, who writes a high and over-obliging Letter to a person of ordinary parts; wherefore there must be gotten a kind of colder civility, which is soon found when looked for, which is used towards those for whom we have no great love nor esteem, when by some considerations of acquaintance, we are obliged to write to them, and it is in such emergencies as these that we are to make use of those Letters, which are called Letters of Complement, wherein there is not any thing particular, nothing either good or bad, containing a parcel of words and little sence, not obliging either those who write them, or those to whom they are directed, to any thing, as being dressed in such general terms, that they may be directed to all sorts of persons, without any particular address to any. Judgement, certainly, is requisite in all (replied Clelia) as for instance it might be said there is nothing easier then the writing of news, and yet there are some who write it most fantastically. They are such (replied Amilcar) who write news often, though they know not any, who believe all is said to them, write without order or choice, who trouble themselves to write things, that either none regards, or are displeasing in themselves, or have lost all the grace and insinuation of Novelty. For certainly, it is not more necessary that a woman to be a beauty, be also young, then that news be fresh and sudden, to please; there being nothing more unseasonable then a long relation of an old adventure. Yet it must be confessed (replied Clelia) that there are certain disastrous accidents, which some make it their business to renew the stories of, and spread abroad, as if they were lately happened, which certainly, is very troublesom to those who knew them before they were written to them. But in my judgement, when one writes a Letter wherein he would relate what had happened, he is to consider what kind of news the persons to whom he writes are most taken with; for I am confident there are some who are only pleased with those general narrations wherewith Fame it self comes for the most part burthened, and would hear of nothing but Victories or Defeats, the Sieges of Cities, Conflagrations, Deluges, Insurrections and the like. There are also those who matter not the general Occurrences of the World, so they are but acquainted with what passes in their own Quarter, whence it is but necessary we should sift their humours to whom we write, when we are to send any thing of intelligence.

You speak very much reason, Madam (replied Amilcar) but that which I would particularly learn from the fair Plotina, since she seems to be so much exercised in it, is to know in what Letters a man is permitted to display all his perfections, and after what manner he is to discover his wit. That certainly, is a thing you know better then I (replied she) but that you may be satisfied that I am able to judge of the excellencies of your Gallant-Letters, if ever you shall write any to me, I declare to you, that it is only in them that I pretend to be skilled, and that for those which are called Serious-Letters, I meddle not with them. In these out of all doubt (replied Amilcar) a man is permitted a high stile. For instance, if Valerius or Lucretius were to write to Tarquin concerning some affair of great consequence, or if some great Clerks held an Epistolary correspondence, they might pertinently make use of History, Morality, Policy, and in a manner all the assistances of Eloquence. Be it as it will (saies Plotina) I understood it not, but for your Gallant-Letters, I am the greatest Critick in the World. It is properly in these, that the Wit hath all liberty imaginable; here the fancy is not limited by any severity of judgement, which is so far dispensed with, that the more serious things may be chequered with pleasant digressions of extravagance. They admit Satyre if somewhat corrected with ingenuity; commendations and flatteries have here their several stations; a man may speak of friendship, in terms of love; all novelty is pardonable, even lying, if innocent, is excusable; if one knows no news he may make some; one may pass from one thing to another without disorder; for this kind of Letters, to speak properly being a conversation between persons that are absent, there is nothing so much to be avoided as a certain kind of reservedness of deep learning, that smells of Books and Study, and hath no acquaintance with Gallantry, which may by called the Soul of this kind of Letters. As to the stile of them, it must be plain, natural, and noble altogether, which yet hinders not, but that there may be a certain Art, by the means thereof, there is nothing which may not pertinently be brought into letters of this nature, there being not any thing from the thredbare Proverb, to the Sybill's Prophecies, which a good wit may not make use of. But there must be an especial care had in such occurrences, to decline that swelling Eloquence which properly belongs to Orations, and there must be applied another kind, which with less noise proves more effectual, especially among women; for in a word, the Art of telling trivial stories handsomely, is not known to all sorts of people. You may be confident of it (replied Amilcar) and I can further assure you, that it is not proper to all to desire to know it. But, amiable Plotina, make your obligation absolute, and tell us precisely how you would have Love Letters written.

Since I never either writ, or received any (answered she) I know not very what I shall say, but being now in good humour to speak I shall not deny you. But I must in the first place tell you, there are a many more excellent Love-Letters than its conceived. I am of your mind (replied Amilcar.) Yet it is not to be admired (answered she) if the Gallant Letters make a great noise, and those of Love very little; the former being written to be shown to all the World, the other to be concealed. Those who receive a handsome Letter of Friendship, gain much reputation by shewing it; but for those who receive a well-couch'd Letter of Love, it were a dishonour to communicate it; so that it is not to be thought very strange, if we meet with so good few ones of the latter sort. To come yet nearer the business, since there are an infinite number of people, who may be said to have a great wit, in respect of those who are guilty of a great love; it is not to be wondred at, if there are fewer excellent Letters of this kind than of any; it being indisputably certain, that to write punctually of things of this nature, a man besides an ardent importunate love, must be indued with a certain tenderness of heart and intellectuals, which is that wherein consists all the Beatitude of Love, either as to Conversation or Letters. But (replies Clelia) did you not just now maintain, that in such cases too much Wit was to be avoided? I confess it (answered Plotina) but do you not think there is necessary a great deal of Wit to discover little? In so much, that though it may be said, that though Love Letters require not the fire of Wit, which should sparkle in Gallant Letters, yet must there be some instead of it, and the fire of Love possess the place of that Wit, whereof I speak. I conceive therefore the true Character of a Love-Letter, ought to be neat and passionate; and that if there be any thing of gallantry, spirit, yea even diversion in these Letters, it must be moderated with passion and respect. The expressions of them ought to be forcible and piercing, and among those things which divert the mind, there must be others that shall offer a kind of violence to the heart. It is requisite also, if I mistake not, there should be a little disquiet, for Love cannot by any means admit Letters of Felicity. Not but that there may be a certain degree of joy, yet it must be such as is not certainly serene, nay though there were no cause of complaint, yet ought a man to imagine something to himself whereof he may complain. You speak so admirably well (replied Amilcar) that if you had studied Love all your life, you could not have delivered your self better. If I have known no love my self (replied she smiling) I have those Friends of my own Sex, who have, and have taught me how to speak of it. In a word then, in a Love Letter, Fancy must be predominant over Wit, and the Stile of it must be natural, full of respect and passion; nay, I dare maintain there is nothing more likely to make a Letter of this nature less effectual, than its being over witty. Hence also doth it proceed, there are so few that can judge well of Love Letters, for to be critical in it, a man must imagine himself in the place of those that love; he must suppose what they say comes immediately from their hearts; he must discover a many little circumstances that are only known to those who write, not to others; and in fine, he must be able to distinguish very nicely, between that Gallantry which is required in Letters of Friendship, and what is admitted in those of Love. Moreover (added she) I have it from a very virtuous person, that ordinarily women are more exquisite at Love-Letters than men, and for my part I think he was not mistaken. For when a Lover is once resolved to make a full discovery of his passion, there is no need of Art, to say, I am still under the Martyrdom of your Love; but for a woman, in regard she never absolutely acknowledges her love, but doth all things with a greater Mystery, this Love, whereof there can only be had a glympse, causes a greater pleasure than that which is apparent, and without ceremony. But, it seem, says Clelia, there must be a difference between the Letters of a Servant, and those of a Mistress. No question of it, replied Plotina; for in the Letters of a Servant, affection and respect must be predominant; those of a Mistress should speak modesty, and fear in aspect to tenderness.

But excellent Plotina, replied Amilcar, since you are so learned, you are yet to tell me whether length be excusable in Love Letters, for I have a friend conceives they should be short. To speak in general terms of all sorts of Letters, replied Plotina, I think they should not be over-long; but it were very pleasant indeed, if it should be thought ill, that two persons, who love one another infinitely, who have not the opportunities of speaking one to another, and meet with many difficulties to convey their thoughts one to another, should not be permitted to write what they cannot speak; and that Love which is an exaggerating passion, and magnifies and multiplies all things, had not the priviledge sometimes to dilate it self into long Letters. For, how can a great passion be swathed in a few words? How can a short Letter contain a great jealousie, and transport all the apprehensions of one amorous heart into another in three or four words? As for those who write the gallant sort of Addresses, added she, it is easie for them to abbreviate, and yet lose nothing of Wit, since their reason being absolutely free, they make choice of the things they say, and reject those suggestions which please them not: But for a poor Lover whose reason is disturbed, he takes nothing up by choice, he writes down the dictates of his Fancy; nor indeed should he chuse any thing, since that in point of Love, neither can there be too much said, nor is it believed there hath been enough. Thus I maintain, there is no prohibition of long Letters, condi-

onally they be in no other dreſs than what love adorns them with; and to ſpeak ingeniouſly, there's nothing deſerves ſo great commendation as a handſome Love Letter: For all conſidered, notwithſtanding what I ſaid before, I believe that when one writes ſuch a one, the mind is ſo taken up, and ſo diſtracted, that it is much more difficult to write well in this, than in any other caſe. Not but, as I ſaid before, that the heart is that which is principally concerned in it, but that ſometimes the heart is ſo diſturbed, that it ſelf is ignorant of what it feels. But I pray, ſays Amilcar, who are theſe Female Friends of yours; who have taught you to ſpeak ſo learnedly of Love? She hath been entruſted with the ſecrets of ſo noble a Paſſion, replied Clelia, that if you knew all ſhe knows, you would not wonder to hear her ſpeak as ſhe does. It ſhall be her fault, replied Amilcar, if I do not, for it would be the greateſt pleaſure in the World to me, to hear her relate an amorous adventure; beſides that, added he, you cannot force me hence, though you were ever ſo deſirous, for the Captain of your Guards went out when I came in, and you know the doors of your Lodgings are never opened but when he is here: Nay he told me, he ſhould not return very ſuddenly, by which means you have as much leiſure as you could wiſh. But what ſhould oblige me, replied Plotina, to relate to you the adventure of one of my Friends, when there is no neceſſity for it? How! replied Amilcar, Do you think it a matter unneceſſary, to let me know in what School you have learned to ſpeak ſo well of Love? Aſſure your ſelf, if you refuſe, I ſhall be perſwaded you have run through three or four ſeveral Loves in your Life. If it be ſo, replies that excellent Virgin, I ſhall rather ſubmit to entertain you with the adventures of Ceſonia, whereof I had this day promiſed Clelia the relation; not but that ſhe knows ſomething in general of what hath hapned to this admirable woman, but ſince ſhe will have the particulars thereof, I am content you ſhould alſo participate, conditionally you uſe all the means you can for her deliverance as well as ours. Ah Plotina, replied Amilcar, if the fair Clelia will have it ſo, it will be an infinite pleaſure to me; for I know not any thing of greater delight, than to underſtand that a perſon of a great Wit, and withal ſerious, can admit Love. I thereforé promiſe you to do all that lies in my power, to oblige Tullia to ſet all the Captives at Liberty: and to perſwade her to it, I will tell her, that Tarquin will be leſs incenſed at that, then if ſhe only delivered Clelia. Hereupon Plotina, being confident that Amilcar would more readily employ all his intereſt for Ceſonia, if he were informed what had hapned to her, and Clelia having added her entreaties to thoſe of this accompliſhed African, began her Relation in theſe words.

THE HISTORY OF CÆSONIA.

SInce you lay your commands on me, fair and generous Clelia, I ſhall relate unto you the adventures of this admirable woman who hath had the happineſs of your good opinion; and I am alſo content Amilcar participate the pleaſure of the Relation. But he muſt give me leave, as learned as he is, to acquaint him with divers things relating to our City, and particularly concerning its original, which an African cannot in any likelyhood know, that ſo he may the leſs wonder if he find ſo many tracts of magnificence amongſt the Rutuli, and indeed ſo much gallantry and wit. For to deal truly with you, the Original of Ardea is more noble then that of Rome, and it cannot be objected to us, as it may be to the Romans, that our Fathers were Criminals and Out-laws; and in a word, the Rutuli are reckoned amongſt the moſt ancient people of Italy; Ardea, which is their Metropolis, being built by the fair and famous Danae, the Daughter of Acriſius, and mother of Perſeus, whoſe Hiſtory is ſo celebrated, that I think it unneceſſary to relate it.

You do very well, interrupted Amilcar ſmiling, for though an African, and as Ignorant as you conceive me, I am not to learn, that Jupiter fell in love with Danae, that he was put to his ſhifts for that invention of the precious Golden Shower; that he turned Bull to Raviſh Europa, and put on the form of a Swan to ſurprize the Mother of Caſtor and Pollux. I know further, that Danaes Father underſtanding his daughter was neer her time of Lying in (notwithſtanding all the care he had taken to cauſe her to be kept in a Tower, to elude the effect of an Oracle, which threatned he ſhould loſe his life by the hands of a Son of that Princeſs) cauſed this fair Lady to be ſhut into a Cheſt of Cedar, which he gave order ſhould be caſt into the Sea; and that the gods providing for her ſafety, directed the waves to caſt it on the Coaſts of Italy. I know further, that having been found by a Fiſherman, who was taken with her extraordinary Beauty, he preſented her to the Prince whoſe Subject he was, who grew ſo deeply enamoured of her, that he married her. Nay I have heard it reported, though that be not ſo eaſily credible, that Danae, though incloſed in the cheſt, and that toſſed up and down in the Sea, was ſafely delivered therein of young Perſeus, and that the Fiſherman made a preſent both of Mother and Child to the fore-mentioned Prince.

Ah Amilcar, cryed Plotina very pleaſantly, you know too much, and I ſhould be eaſily perſwaded you know all I have to tell you. And yet, methinks you ſhould have miſſed what ſome related, viz. that Danae was not the foundress of Ardea, but a Son of Ulysses and Circe; but the story is not true, as being grounded only on this, that Ulysses being a very eloquent person, and Circe an excellent Herbalist, the people of Ardea speak more politely than those of any other City, and have a greater knowledge of the names and qualities of Plants, than there is elsewhere. But it is out of Controversie, that the fair Danae built our City, for the conflagration, though very great, leaving behind it certain magnificent Temples, there is to be seen the History of Danae, excellently represented in certain Pictures, though done before the Foundation of Rome. She is to be seen also in a sumptuous Palace, drawn by a famous Painter, called Cleophantus, who followed Demaratus of Corinth, Father to the first of the Tarquins, when he came into Italy to avoid the persecution of Cypselus, King at that time of the Country; so that it is agreed on all sides: And to confirm it further, there are a hundred particulars to evince the truth; for we have women bear the name of Danae; and that of Persander, which is an ordinary name, seems to be derived from Perseus; and there is to be seen a Cypress Chest, which is said to be the same wherein Danae came to land in Italy, and was miraculously preserved when our City was burnt. Moreover, in memory of the Golden shower you spoke of, there is a yearly feast celebrated at Ardea, wherein all Lovers are obliged to some liberality towards their Mistress, wherein there must be something of Gold: For there is a certain Superstition spread whereby many are perswaded, that a man cannot be faithfully loved at Ardea, if he find not some means to convey to his Mistress something consisting of that Metal. But if the men employ all their wits to do it, the women on the contrary, unless it be on the Feast-day I spoke of, think themselves obliged in point of honour to avoid the receiving of any thing wherein there is gold, unless it be done by some ingenious surprisal; which gives occasion to a many gallant adventures.

But not to trouble you longer with things frivolous, it suffices you know, that there is a great profession of Arts, more magnificence, and more ingenuity at Ardea, then there is in Rome, as famous as it is: Even Poesie is there no stranger; for that in divers Temples may be found Inscriptions in verse, in praise of divers persons. There is one to be seen in Junos Temple, very excellent, and very ingenious, though the subject of it be only to celebrate a certain Painter of Aetolia, who for his Art and acquaintance with all Sciences, obtained the freedom of our City. Ardea therefore being a place more polite then the name of the Rutuli would make it be thought, wonder not at what I am going to tell you, and charge me not with too much partiality to my own Country.

But having spoken to you of Ardea, I am now to speak of Cesonia. For her Person I shall say nothing, for you know she is infinitely pleasing, that she hath the ayr it self of Beauty, that she hath a Majestick graceful aspect, that she is of a proper stature, hath an excellent eye, and her countenance full of freedom and modesty. You know further, she is infinitely ingenious, of a gentle and constant nature, and her conversation hugely inviting, and that the earth affords not a woman that hath a heart more noble and sincere, or inclinations more generous. Being a person of the greatest quality in our City, her education was proportionable; Her Father indeed she lost, while she was yet very young, but her Mother (whose name is Ersilia) omitted nothing which she thought might contribute to her perfection, and treated her with such complyance and obligation when she was grown up to her reason, that she seemed rather to look on her as a Sister then a Daughter, and would rather intreat her advice, then enjoyn her by command. 'Tis true, Cesonia did not abuse this tenderness, but the more indulgent Ersilia was to her, the greater was her respect and duty; so that it might be said the mother was absolute mistress of the daughter, and that the daughter had the same power of the Mother, for there was never observed the least contestation between them. Cesonia having thus a great beauty, a great wit, a great goodness, and a great fortune, it is not very strange if she had a many Suitors. For my part, though I am two years younger then she, and of an humour less reserved and more free, yet hath she given me the first place among her friends, for I dare presume to affirm thus much of my self that among the most serious Confidents in the World, I will not be outvied by any as to Fidelity and Secrecy. It happened moreover that Cesonias house, and that wherein I lived, joined, and that her mother and mine were allyed; by which means we were in a manner alwaies together, and there was such a reciprocation in our pleasures, that we took not any when we were not together in the same place. We had some other friends of our own sex; but to tell you truly, there was a great distance between those apprehensions of friendship which we had for them, and those we had one for another. Yet was there a strange difference between Cesonias humour and mine; but withall, such as had the same effect in our hearts, as divers sounds have in Musick, when it is well understood; for my freedom of disposition diverted Cesonia, and I was no less pleased with her mildness, complaisance and ingenuity. She is even guilty sometimes of a certain languishing melancholy, with which I was much taken; in a word, we made such harmony, that there never happened the least discordant note between us. Not that we could be alwaies of the same opinion, but when we were not, we disputed without bitterness; as soon as we apprehended truth, we submitted thereto; nay, even when each persisted in her opinion, it was without indignation or any discovery of sullenness or obstinacy. Nor did our friendship make a small noise in the City; insomuch, that when people spoke of us, without naming us, we were commonly called, The two friends.

Cesonia in the mean time having no great inclination of her self to marry, and taking no encouragement from my humour, which hath ever been much addicted to liberty, to change her opinion, slighted many propositions were made to her, though very advantagious; so that she had slipped over the eighteenth year of her age, before her heart was sensible of any disposition to fix her choice upon any one of all those that were her servants. It was certainly no trouble to her that she was esteemed by all of quality in our City, beyond all the Beauties of Ardea; but she withal thought thought it so hard a matter to meet with a man that knew well how to love, and that it was the greatest unhappiness to be obliged to one by whom she were not absolutely beloved, that she would have been glad of Ersilias consent she might not marry at all. For when she had a mind to aggravate the aversion she had to marry a man by whom she could not think her self beloved, she spoke the pleasantest things in the world, though naturally she is very serious. But (said I to her one day, when there was very great company at her house, and that all were pressing her upon her shiness, and over-reservedness in things of that nature) according to the humour I conceive you to be of, it were a hard matter to perswade you, that you might be perfectly beloved; for though you be sincerity it self, I have heard you say, in the business of love you distrust all things. You may very well have heard me say so (replied she) and it shall be your fault if you hear it not again; for there are not only a sort of men in love, who tell you they feel more then they do, but there are others who though absolutely insensible, will yet entertain you with their incredible sufferings. There is also a sort of Lyars who are sensible they are such, and because they know not well what Love is, think they are in Love, when the most can be said of them, is that they are simply disposed to be so. By that argument (replied an excellent person, whose name was Persander) it were not sufficient for a man that were in love with you, to render you those services which another might, but he must find out some new way to convince you of his affection. Very right (replied she) for I am not very credulous, and to prevail any thing with my great mind, there must be something extraordinary, especially if the first birth of the affection should be directed to me, that I might no longer doubt of the conquest I had made. But (said another to her, a person of great merit, named Turnus) I would gladly know what that were that should absolutely convince you of the power of your charms. Since I have not so exactly examined what apprehensions I should have of a thing, wherein I am not concerned (replied she) I know not well how to answer you; but for the present, what would assure me of a mans affection, were to see him express it by a neglect of what he were most naturally and most strongly inclined to. For, if (for example) I should oblige an ambitious man to renounce his ambition for the love he bore me; if I should force a covetous man to become liberal; if I should cause a cholerick person to banish that Passion out of his soul, meerly because I was displeased with it; if a fickle man should prove constant meerly for my sake; or if an obstinate Lover should quit some other Mistress purposely to serve me, I think I should believe I were possessed of the Empire of their hearts who should do such things upon my account. And to deal sincerely with you, I do not think those who conquer any heart, ought to use their Conquests as ordinary Conquerours do, who to insinuate into their new Subjects, alter not the Laws of those Countries they have subdued. On the contrary, I maintain, that it is lawful for those who conquer any heart, to govern it by such laws as they shall think fit; and that it is the noblest expression of a Mistresses Authority, absolutely to dispose of what never acknowledges her Supremacy. If therefore I should have made a faithful Lover of a fickle, or a fickle of a constant, I should think my self more confirmed in my power, then I should by all the ordinary discoveries which men do make of their Passion.

Cesonia had no sooner said this, but Turnus smiled, and Persander changed colour, as if they were secretly concerned in what that fair Lady spoke. And indeed, you are to know, that Turnus was naturally inconstant, and Persander loved without any return of his love, and had been a long time a Suitor to a Lady of our City, who certainly deserved not the love of a person of his quality; so that having been both smitten by what Cesonia had said, it caused a little agitation in their hearts, for they had both an infinite esteem for this admirable person. But for her part, when she spoke it, she thought not of either, and was minded onely to disburthen her self of an opinion, wherein she thought her self singular; and indeed it proved the Text of all that days discourse; all being obliged to dispute whether a woman were more obliged to an inconstant Lover that should prove constant by loving only her, or to a faithfull Lover that should prove inconstant to a former Mistress, as being forced to it by the charms he met with in a second. I shall not trouble you with a repetition of that discourse, because I must repeat another in the sequel of my story, whereby I should be obliged to relate the same twice.

But I must needs more particularly tell you thus much, that Persander and Turnus were of the best of quality in Ardea, that they were both very proper as to their persons, and were both infinitely discreet and vertous. 'Tis true, they were of very different natures; for Persander is a man of a more pleasant, more free, and more general conversation, and excellently good at those little things, which indeed are the State-affairs of Love. Turnus was of a serene, mild, and complaisant disposition, and if the love of ease had not disputed the Empire of his heart with that of glory, and his Mistresses, he had made one of the most exquisite Lovers in the World: For he had something of Gallantry, something of Delicacy, and insinuation of Affection, which was infinitely taking, and withall, notwithstanding his inclination to ease, certain Sallies of violence, which fortifi'd people in the perswasion they had of his love. But for Persander his ingennity and cunning contrivances were his best Agents; and it may be said of these two Conquerous, one was fitter for the gaining of a battel, the other more excellent at a siege.

Turnus was at this time, instead of one, ingaged in divers Love-designs; for there were in Ardea three excellent persons, by whom it may be presumed he might have been loved; if he could have been content to love but one, and direct all his affection to her. Persander on the other side, could admit but of one passion, but as I told you before, Love had otherwise prevented him; and certainly she to whom he had then designed his heart, was not worthy to receive it. But indeed, she was not only so far from knowing the value of it, that she refused to accept it On the contrary, she had treated Persander with so much indignity and neglect, that the Clouds under which he lay began to disperse, when Cesonia without any design, held the discourse I have related to you, which was pertinently directed both to him and Turnus, if they could have resolved then to love her. For, if you remember, I told you that Cesonia acknowledged her self equally satisfied of the affection of an inconstant person, if he became constant, and of that of a constant Lover if he proved inconstant for her sake. That which was most observable in this accident, was, that Persander and Turnus who were friends, applyed to one another what Cesonia had said, though they were satisfied that she had spoke without any reflection on them, though indeed the application was not serious on either side.

But departing the house together, and being both equally surprised with the beauty and perfections of Cesonia, they fell a praising of her, and spoke a many things in her commendation. From which discourse, Persander took occasion to tell Turnus, that since he was so much taken with Cesonia, he should do well to address his services to her, and quit that indifference in love, wherein he had continued all his life. For in fine, said he to him, while you wander from one beauty to another, you will not advance much; and since that all those from whom you receive favours, please you not so well as absolutely to ingage you to them; and that you are this day more taken with Cesonia then all your former acquaintances, I would advise you to sacrifice all your other Mistresses at her Altar. I promise you (replied he) that if I thought the sacrifice would prove acceptable, I should do it with all my heart; but you know, it is not only requisite that the victims should be such as might please the Gods but they also must be acceptable who offer them. Being assured therefore (continued he) that you are more in Cesonias favour then I am, I should advise you to undertake the adventure; for if she said that she was confident of the affection of an inconstant Lover that should prove constant for her sake, she also said she would be satisfied with the love of a constant one that should prove unconstant, to serve her. If therefore you will take my advice, you will forsake your ancient Mistress and make choice of this; for not to flatter you, it will be more advantageous for you to alter your resolutions then for me. There are, you know well, three persons, all excellently handsom, of whose affections I might presume, could I but love them, and who find me imployment and diversion sufficient, though all that is between us, be no more then a fence of mirth and gallantry, which may haply grow up to something, if we please, and may also come as easily to nothing, if we are disposed. But you, without any reciprocation of affection, love a person that seems onely amiable to your self; and you put your friends upon a necessity of wishing that she may never prove favourable to you; for if you conquer the indisposition of your love by marriage, you were the unhappiest of all men in that it were to exchange one whom you thought a worthy Mistress into a troublesom Wife. If therefore you value my advice any thing, you will this day renounce her, and address your love to Cesonia, with a confidence of the approbation of all people. For by this means, you will reform an errour which all the Tyranny ascribed to Love could not excuse; Reason would approve your change; and though you should not be loved, yet were your condition better, than it is now; since it is more supportable to be slighted by a person of great merit than by another that hath not any.

I cannot but acknowledge (replied Persander) that notwithstanding the violence of my Passion, I ever knew that the person for whom I have had for so long time a fruitless love, was guilty of some imperfections, nay that she was disacceptable to all rational men. But if I am too favourable, the others are unjust, since she wants not such good endowments, and that .....For her good ones interrupted Turnus, I know not what she may have; but for those that relate to civility; I'll answer for her, she has not any; for she's of an unsetled and perverse disposition; she is ungraceful, both as to behavior and countenance; she is nothing acquainted with the world; she always takes things in the worst sense, she sometimes commends what is to be discommended, and dispraises that which deserves praise, nothing obliges her, she is moved without occasion, and she understands not the greatness of your mind, and consequently not that of your affection. Fasten therefore on the occasion which Fortune presents you with, make a hearty sacrifice of this miserable Victim; for I am of opinion, when the sacrificer is accepted, they look not so directly on what he offers; besides that none can be more liberal then he that bestows all.

You have certainly a strange confidence in my Friendship, replied Persander (blushing through the disorder of his thoughts) to speak to my Mistress as you do. I am so confident of the truth of what I say, that I fear not your displeasure. Not but that I know you now look otherwise on the person you love, then you will do one day; but you are so accustomed to be troubled that others are not so much taken with her as your self, that I do you no more injury then you have endured a hundred times before. Nay I am sufficiently satisfied continued he, that I have seen you blush for very shame, upon several occasions, at some things which that creature either did or said; and therefore it were very unjust you should bear me any ill will, because I cannot speak well of her, since you may easily perceive it is only your own concernment that could have obliged me to speak after this rate, you being the only Suitor to this Wench, who certainly is very indiscreet to slight you, in regard there is nothing so certain, as that if she miss you, she will never meet with such another. Cease then at length, cruel friend, to persecute me, replied Persander, if you expect not I should also take my turn and fall upon you, and tell you, that if I deserve to be blamed for loving a person defective, as to those perfections which Love should aim at, you deserve to be much more, who are indifferent whether you are loved by any one of three the most accomplished women the Earth affords. Hereupon the two friends parted, not thinking what might be the consequence of what they said one to another.

On

On the other side Cesonia and I, not knowing any thing of what had passed between Persander and Turnus, fell to discourse upon what had been spoken in the Company; for, our houses adjoyning, we were seldom asunder but at night; nay sometimes it hapned, that I staid at Cesonias, or she at our house. Being therefore at liberty, as to company, we took a Walk into Ersilias Garden, but reflecting on whatever had been said, I represented to Cesonia that she had said one thing which Persander and Turnus might severally apply to themselves, for their stories were known to all the world. I had no sooner said it, but she blushed, as having no thought of them when she spoke as she did, and fearing they might imagine it directed to them, she was much troubled in her mind. I should be extreamly afflicted, said she to me, that two persons of their Quality should suspect me of any design to engage them to love me. Since they are the only two of all the City, replied I laughing, that are not fallen into your chains, what great crime were it if you should spread your chains for them? How great a crime it were I know not, replied she, but it would certainly argue a great weakness, and much indiscretion; but that which gives me some ease, added she, is, that Turnus is so well known for his Inconstancy, and Persander for his obstinate fidelity, that I shall not be easily suspected of having any intention to alter their resolutions. But that also which is equally true, is, that they are the two men of all the City whom I most esteem, and for whom certainly I should have the greatest inclination; and consequently added I, they are the two persons of all the City who were the most likely to make you happy, if so be you resolve to marry any one. According to the humour I now am in, said she, I should not be satisfied to have only an inclination for him I would take to be my Husband, for I conceive my felicity consists rather in the resentments which others have for me, then in what I have for them: and if I had met with any one among those who have endeavoured to gain me, that could have put me into a strong perswasion that he had a great and violent affection for me, I should without doubt have looked on him, so as from him to have derived my happiness, for certainly there is a greater pleasure in being loved, then in loving.

Ah Cesonia cryed I, you are extreamly mistaken if you believe what you say, since 'tis only the Love which is in one's own heart that can make one happy, and that to speak sincerely, there is no pleasure in being loved, but by that which one loves. Every one hath his particular humour (replied Cesonia) and that is none of mine; for if I had two Lovers of equal merit, and my inclination led me to favour him whom I thought the less amorous, I should prefer before him the other whom I conceived to have greater affection for me, though I loved him the less. Ah Cesonia, replied I, how great a fault would you do in so doing! Ah Plotina, replyed she, how dangerous a one should I be guilty of, did I make any other choice? for all considered, is it not true that the end of loving is to be loved again, and that it is the greatest torment to love beyond what one is beloved? I agree with you, replied I, that it is insufferable to be sensible of having more love then one causes; yet I hold there can be no sensible pleasure in loving any further then it relates to that which one loves; and that all the devoirs, all the services, all the addresses of a person whom one loves not, give no great satisfaction in comparison of those are rendred by one for whom we have a certain respect.

But Plotina, answered Cesonia, you consider not what you say when you speak thus; for it is so natural to love, to the end one should be loved again, and to imagine a certain pleasure therein, that to speak generally of it, one desires to be loved as well by those whom one loves, as those whom one loves not. There is also a certain satisfaction in receiving acknowledgements of esteem from those we are not in a manner acquainted with; and the reason is, that as often as one receives such expression of affection, one seems to take it as a certain argument of his own merit; besides that, if there be any charms in love, I think they consist in an absolute Empire over the heart of a vertuous man. I can also very easily imagine, that it is as it were a degree of felicity, for a woman to see a person of a great reason and understanding, renounce part of his Reason to serve her; that he raises to himself an hundred sensible pleasures from her most inconsiderable favours; that he betrays a thousand obliging weaknesses, which he himself is not sensible of; that his colour changes when he sees her, that many times he knows not what he says, even when it is his design to speak the best he can; that he sees her in all places; that he seeks none but her; that he resigns himself absolutely to her will, and altogether renounces his own. But on the contrary, when one loves, insteed of commanding, he obeys and must expect all the inconveniences of love, and never be acquainted with the enjoyments of it.

Ah Cesonia, replied I, I could not have imagined a serious person could possibly have said what you have! And I should never have thought, replied she, that a person of a free and gallant humour could have held what you hold, which certainly should rather be the Tenet of Melancholy and Distraction. But said I to her, what do you think on when you imagine it is a greater pleasure to be loved then to love? Do you think I cannot name you a hundred several men whom you should esteem strangely troublesom, if they were but once encouraged to follow you every where, and to pretend an infinite love to you? But when I say so, replied she, I do not mean that I would be loved of those people of no worth, who are not to be admitted in the quality of lovers, nor yet of friends; and all that I say amounts to no more then this, that a woman who hath a great esteem for a vertuous man, by whom she is faithfully and ardently loved, shall be more happy then if she her self had a strong love for another vertuous man, who were less amorous then the former. And I hold on the contrary, replied I, that there is no enjoyment in being loved, but in as much as it proceeds from those we love; that all those weaknesses which you say it would be pleasant to observe in a person of a great mind, would not seem such to you, if you were not capable of having the like; and to apprehend aright what Love is, there is no queſtion but the moſt inconſiderable ſervices rendered by a perſon whom we love, far exceed the greateſt we receive from another, for whom we have not that ſympathy. And in a word Ceſonia ſaid I to her laughing, the caſe is not the ſame with love as at a Ball, where many times thoſe who dance not, have a greater pleaſure then thoſe who do; for certainly, whoever would find a great ſatisfaction in being loved muſt himſelf love, and that to the greateſt extent of paſſion; and for my part, I am ſo far from imagining any pleaſure in marrying an amorous Husband if I loved not him, that I think it no ſmall torment, by reaſon of the continual reſervedneſs wherein I ſhould conceive my ſelf obliged to live. If therefore you will take my advice, make choice of him whom you your ſelf ſhall beſt love, and not him who hath no more to ſay for himſelf; then that he hath a greater love for you. I ſhould willingly grant (added I) it were a great unhappineſs, and a great madneſs to love and not be loved again; but as long as I live, I ſhall perſiſt in this opinion, that there can be no true delight in being loved, if one alſo loves not; and certainly, the heart muſt be extreamly prepoſſeſſed for to raiſe this one pleaſure above all others, and imagine it ſuch as whereby all ſorts of afflictions were alleviated, and might effectually put us into a condition of indifference for all things elſe.

But is it not alſo certain (repli'd ſhe) that as ſoon as one is ſtrongly poſſeſſed with love, there inevitably follows a number of cares and diſturbances. There do ſo (repli'd I) but I believe withall there are thouſands of pleaſures, which cannot be conſequent to any thing but by the reſidence of that paſſion in the Soul. For when all is done, all thoſe things which we ſay are very pleaſing when one loves, are not ſo conſiderable in themſelves, as to make a ſuperſtructure of Felicity, were it not that the heart is prepoſſeſſed. So that to be abſolutely happy, we muſt, if I may preſume to ſay it, enter with ſincere intentions into this correſpondence and conſonancy of affections, we muſt retain in our ſelves, ſo much love as we cauſe in others, and expect to find our particular ſatisfaction, in our own tenderneſe rather then in that of another: For were it not ſo, one might take an equal pleaſure in being loved, by a hundred ſeveral people at a time; whereas, I am confident that a woman who hath three or four Lovers, will find no true pleaſure but with him whom ſhe particularly loves.

I do not tell you (repli'd Ceſonia) that thoſe whoſe hearts are deſigned to love, find no ſatisfaction in loving; but that which I maintain is, that one who would marry, ſhould find her ſelf in a more firm poſture of happineſs, by marrying a man who extreamly loves her, then if ſhe married one whom ſhe her ſelf were infinitely in love with. But (repli'd I) you mind not what you ſay, for it frequently happens that theſe amorous Husbands grow ſoon cold in their affection; ſo that if you are ſatisfied in being loved, though you loved not your ſelf, it muſt needs follow, that as that love evaporates and conſumes, your pleaſure alſo determines. On the contrary, if you love him whom you have married, he is always the ſame pleaſant object he was to you, even though he ſhould give you ſome ſlight cauſe of diſcontent; Not to flatter you therefore any longer, I think there never was any woman (Cockneys excepted) beſides your ſelf, who thought there was any great pleaſure in being loved, without loving her ſelf. Be it as it will be (ſaid ſhe) ſince I preſs you not to change your opinion, neither ſhall I change mine for your ſake; but it may come to paſs that while I ſhall be content to be lov'd, though I love not, you ſhall love, and not be lov'd again. For that matter (replied I) I fear not what may happen to me; for one never loves, but what ſeems worthy to be loved, and I ſhould not look upon the moſt vertuous man in the world, as ſuch as ſhould oblige me to love him, if he did not firſt love me.

Theſe were at that time the apprehenſions of Ceſonia; but not to ſpend time in the relation of many little accidents conſequent thereunto, I ſhall onely tell you, that from that day, Perſander and Turnus took ſome by occaſions to ſee and know more of Ceſonia, and became more aſſiduous Diſciples of our Cabal, which certainly was the moſt ingenious and moſt gallant of any in the City; and if I may preſume to affirm it, that which had the greateſt reputation of Vertue. 'Tis true, it ſtood not with our conſtitutions to admit indifferently all ſorts of people, and that we ſtood much upon the choice of our friends of either ſex, when we were commonly called abroad, The fair Solitaries. Our ſolitude indeed hath nothing that might affright, for we admitted the viſits of all vertuous perſons, without any regard had to the reſt. Not that we would be charged with any incivility; but it happened either by artifice or good fortune, that we were not pleaſing to thoſe whom we liked not, So that ſome ſtood in fear of us, others not knowing what to ſay to us, and ſome for the moſt part not apprehending what are ſaid to them, we lived without any diſturbance; for to tell you truly, we minded not much what they thought of our Conſiſtory; and when we were informed of what fooliſh things they ſaid of The fair Solitaries, we only made ſport of it, and then took occaſion thence to think our ſelves happy in that we were diſſociated from ſuch people.

But for Perſander and Turnus we gladly entertained them when they preſſed the favour of ſeeing us more particularly then ordinary; for they were both perſons of ſo much worth, that to do them reſpect was to receive it. However it was not their deſign at firſt to profeſs any love to Ceſonia; but certain it is, that Perſander being ſtill ſlighted by the perſon whom he lov'd, took this occaſion to divert and imploy his thoughts, ſo to indeavor his recovery. Nor indeed did he diſſemble it, ſaying, when we ſometimes asked him, whence it came he ſo much honoured us with his company, that his buſineſs was to find out ſome pleaſant friend that ſhould make him forget a too cruel Miſtreſs. As for Turnus, ſince he purſued only what moſt pleaſed him, and that Ceſonia wanted not any thing he could have wiſhed; he eaſily diſ-engaged himſelf from thoſe three Beauties, whereof there was not any whoſe heart he might not have gained, if he could have ſerv'd but her alone with perſeverance. It hapned alſo that Perſander's Miſtreſs went into the Country, and that a new difference fell out betwixt them at parting;

ting; for she put such a fantastick trick upon him, that he was extreamly troubled at it. It came to pass afterwards, that he saw divers of her Letters, which were such as seemed not fit to be written by the Mistress of Persander, for he himself writes admirable well; he also came to the sight of several Letters of Cesonias, wherewith he was taken even to admiration. Insomuch, that absence, vexation, and reason clearing up Persander's heart of its former pre-possession, put him into a condition sensible of the Charms of Cesonia. As for Turnus he was so accustomed to the sense of merit and beauty; that it would have been very strange, if he should have had none reserved for one of the most accomplish'd persons in the World.

These two friends thought not, in the mean time, that they were become Rivals, for they professed themselves equally friends to Cesonia, who entertained them accordingly. So that not behaving themselves, as Lovers, they soon gained with us that liberty which friendship affords. They writ Letters to us, and we answered them; we had a hundred appointed walkings together; and we carried our selves towards them, rather as if they were friends of our own sex then the other. For being both of them circumspect, respectful, and discreet, we stick'd not to say before them a many things which might be thought somewhat extravagant. But at length, I one day perceived it was not impossible they might have some resentments of love for Cesonia; for being one afternoon all four together in Ersilia's Chamber, we fell a talking of a certain Lover of our City, who as it was reported, had parted very fairly from his Mistress, to go and travel; and that though there happened no difference between them, he was absolutely cured of his Passion, and was returned without any Love. For my part, says Turnus, I do not think it impossible; for I know those, who without the remedy of absence can overcome two or three Passions, much more, one. And for my part (replied Persander) I do not think a man can be cur'd by absence only; and I am absolutely perswaded, that to be eased of ones Passion, a man must necessarily entertain another. There may no doubt (continued he) be a sort of people, who are not so sensible as many others, and into whose souls it might infuse a certain coldness, which signifies rather indifference then Love; but afterwards restored to the sight of the person whom they had loved, they would re-assume their love; for I cannot conceive that absence alone is able to destroy love. I hold therefore, that whoever ceases to love, upon no other account then absence, must be guilty of infidelity, and have taken another Mistriss. But if there be a necessity a man enter into a new love, before he can be said to give over loving a former Mistress, in case of absence, replyed Turnus, the same conclusion holds against a Lover who should at once disengage himself from two or three. By no means, repli'd Persander, for it may happen that these Mistresses might do a many things conducing to his cure, which a person that is absent cannot. But if on the contrary replied Turnus, these two or three Mistresses were more favourable then ordinary, what would you say? I should say, replyed Cesonia laughing, you would be thought ungrateful, if you forsook them for another. But Madam, replyed Turnus, I put not the question to you, but to Persander, who will needs maintain that a man cannot cease loving a person that is absent, without entring into a new love; and thinks it not possible a man may quit three fair Mistresses, without finding another; Nay I conceive, added he, he pretends that a woman ought to think her self more oblig'd to him, if he loved her in the absence of his Mistress, then she should to me, though I should in the presence of three suffer my self to be wrought upon by the charms of this fourth. There is no question of it replyed Persander, and for instance, if making profession of constancy as I do, it should happen that the admirable Cesonia could make me inconstant, and fasten her love upon me, I should do a greater action for her sake, then you should do by forsaking all your Mistresses to serve her; for change being natural to you, you did no more in loving her, then comply with your own inclination, But if I should persevere to love her for a long time, replied he, shall I not have done much more for her then you, who are naturally fastened to one place, and should not deserve any great reward, though you loved ever so faithfully? It must certainly be a very long time, replied Persander, before you can recover your reputation. I beseech you, replyed Cesonia, make not these fruitless suppositions, and if you have any quarrel, let not me be concerned in it.

But if that which they say be real (reply'd I laughing, not thinking it had been so) you were finely catch'd. I had no sooner said so, but I saw Persander's colour change, and Turnus was not without some disturbance. I assure you replyed Cesonia, I should hardly believe it, though they should endeavour to perswade me to it, You do not then believe Madam such an accident as this impossible, replyed coldly Persander; for if you remember, you said one day when Turnus and I were present, that to give you a remarkable testimony of his affection, a Lover must do something absolutely disconsonant to his natural inclination, and among those you expected that an unconstant man should prove constant for your sake, or that a constant Lover quit his perseverance purposely to serve you. And Madam, added Turnus, we were so far perswaded to follow your directions, that I advised Persander to quit his Mistress, to love you, and he afterwards gave me the like counsel to forsake all mine, to apply my self only to you. He was pleased it seems to requite your ill advice with as bad, replyed Cesonia blushing. On the contrary, replyed Persander, I gave him that counsel out of meer friendship, but he was not disposed to follow it. 'Twas because at that time, I was so wedded to your judgement, that I would not do what you refused. Certainly replyed Cesonia laughing, you are both very admirable persons, to tell me so truly what passed between you that day. They are much more, replyed I, laughing with her for company, if they dealt so really with you as to acquaint you with their present thoughts; for I am clearly of opinion, though I should not swear it, that in Persander you have made an inconstant Lover of a constant, and in Turnus you have exchanged inconstancy into a perseverance. You speak so indiscreetly creetly replyed Cæsonia, that I think not fit to answer you. But if it be so, replyed Persander, what do you expect Turnus and I should do? Must we hate one another, must we cease to love you, must we fear, or must we hope? And that you may complete your obligation upon us, be pleased to declare which of us two may with more confidence presume to have given you the greater testimony of his affection, he who is become constant, or he who has quitted his constancy? I beseech you, Madam, added Turnus, be pleased to give Persander a punctual answer. Did he speak to me seriously, replied she, I would answer him; but since he proposes nothing but trifles, having not the least relation to truth, I shall not trouble my self to give him any return. But supposing they said not any thing that were real, replied I, why make you such ado to satisfie their curiosity? And if what they say have some ground, tell them sincerely, though by way of jest, what they may think of their several fortunes. In troth Plotina, said she to me, you give me very pleasant advice: Truly, replied I, you have my very thoughts; for Persander and Turnus are as yet Friends; but if they are Rivals, I wish it may be without quarrel, and that you impose on them as an expression of their love to you, to live always in Friendship. If they were my Lovers, replyed she, I should be glad they were such without hating one another; but since they are not, and that I should be sorry they should, I have nothing to say to them. For your being sorry, said I, I cannot so easily believe it: For in fine, continued I jestingly, this adventure hath in it something so particular, that you would be much troubled to repent your having been the occasion of it. Besides, that having so much generosity as you have, you should be glad to have put so great an obligation on two the most eminent persons in the world; for all that can be objected to Persander is, that he loves a woman that deserves not his love; and all that Turnus can be charged with, is the inconstancy of his Love.

For this good Office Turnus and Persander gave me many thanks, and began again to press Cæsonia to resolve them, but she would not: So that the discourse was concluded in such a manner, as satisfied Cæsonia and me, that there was something of truth in what we suspected; and withal convinced Turnus and Persander, that they had both followed the advice they had given one another. However they went away together, but burthened with thoughts and melancholy, as being each of them troubled in their minds, that he had a Rival instead of a Friend. But at last Persander, as being the more discreet, desirous to sift the resentments of his Friend; Tell me truly, said he to him, are you not at this present more taken with Cæsonia than with all the world besides, and if it were possible you could reform your inconstancy, you would do it only for her sake? Before I tell you my thoughts, replied Turnus, do you acknowledge that you are this day more pleased with Cæsonia than ever you were with your former Mistress, and that if you could prove inconstant, you would do it only for the love of Cæsonia? For inconstancy, replied Persander, I cannot be reproached with it, though I forsook the person you mean, and should in consequence love Cæsonia, since it is granted there is no obligation to love where one is not loved. And whereas you are pleased to tell me that I am more taken with this excellent person than my former Mistress I am to tell you, that how far soever you may have thought me prepossessed, I have always known, that the one had imperfections, the other none. But that which hath caused this change in my resolutions is, that the person in whom I then had only a glimpse of certain imperfections, and in whom I imagined there were some excellent good qualities, seems now to me some other creature; for I find not any thing in her I am pleased with, her Company is troublesome, all that I saw in her formerly is vanished, and I am so much ashamed, nay indeed so much amazed, that I have thought her so excellent and loved her so much, that my thoughts of it far exceed my expressions.

Ah Persander, cryed out Turnus, you are in love with Cæsonia: And you, replied the other, who thought it your felicity to divide your self among all the Beauties, never think your self well now, but when neer Cæsonia. I acknowledge it, replied Turnus, for whereever I am, I ever wish my self with her; and there is certainly something of enchantment, whereby I am so carried away, that her House is in my way, in what quarter soever of Ardea my business lies. It seems then, replied Persander smiling, if we are not yet Rivals, we soon shall be: I am of your mind, replied Turnus, and I am troubled at it beyond expression: For certainly (added he) I must needs be very unhappy, that the most perseverant of all men, hath resolved to cease to be such, purposely to become my Rival. It is rather I who have cause to complain (replied Persander) in that the most inconstant Lover in the World, will needs be other than he was, merely to cross my designs. Ah! Persander (replied Turnus) I am the more unhappy of the two, for certainly Cæsonia had a greater inclination for you than for me. I know not on what you ground that conjecture, (replied Persander) but it should rather be inferr'd, that a man who could not gain the love of the least amiable person in the World, should not be over confident of gaining that of the most accomplished, and therefore his Rivalship is not to be looked on as very formidable. But Turnus, if I am slighted as inconsiderable, you are (on the contrary) much to be feared; for can a man possibly have a more dangerous Rival, than one who, though guilty of no love, or at best but little, could yet in a manner command all the greatest beauties of Ardea. Howere that may be (replied Turnus) I am confident Cæsonia hath naturally a stronger inclination, and a greater esteem for you than me. I know you are a greater Gallant, more vigilant, and more ingenious than I am, and consequently have reason to fear you may be more fortunate than I. Since you are infinitely more amiable than I can ever possibly be (replied Persander) and that I have a very great opinion of Cæsonia's judgment, I am easily perswaded not to expect any love to your prejudice. But to do something more than ordinary in the World, (added he) let us endeavour from this day forward, so to manage our Love, that it destroy not our Friendship; for as yet there is not ought done wherewith we may reproach one the other. You advised me to love Cæsonia, and I gave you the same advice, so that we cannot be

be charged with any defect of Friendſhip in the original of our Love: And therefore ſince I might be thought unreaſonable, to preſs you to quit your pretenſions for my ſake; it were alſo unjuſt in you, to oblige me to ſtifle my Paſſion for yours. Not but that if I thought I could do it I would, both out of conſiderations of Friendſhip and Reaſon, though you preſſed me not to it; but ſince it is impoſſible, and that I cannot conceive you can be ſo ſuddenly weary of a thing you are ſo much taken with, we muſt regulate thoſe apprehenſions we have one of another, while we love the accompliſhed Ceſonia. (W)

To obſerve the Rules of Generoſity (replied Turnus) we muſt promiſe not to attempt any thing one againſt another, and have the ſame love one for another, as if we were not Rivals; but ſince that cannot be, the contrary courſe muſt be taken: And therefore (for my part) you have from me all liberty to ſay and do any thing, which you think may gain the love of Ceſonia, conditionally you give me the ſame. I am very well content (replied Perſander) but this ſhall not hinder what means I ſhall uſe otherways, as being ſtill your friend. And I ſhall do the like if I can (replied Turnus) but I ſhould be glad one of the Articles of our Treaty were, that in caſe Ceſonia make choice of either of us, and thereby cut off all the pretenſions of her other Lovers, the other ſhall have nothing to object againſt him, but ſhall continue in friendſhip with him. Be it ſo (replied Perſander) though I can never hope to make any great advantage of this proviſo.

In this manner, Madam, did theſe two Rivals acknowledge to one another the love they had for Ceſonia, ſo that from that day they omitted nothing, whereby they thought to gain the favour of this excellent perſon. But this happening neer the time that they celebrate the Feaſt of the Golden Shower, to honour the memory of Danae, and that it is then the cuſtom, as I have already told you, that all Lovers beſtow on their Miſtreſſes ſomething wherein there muſt be Gold, Turnus proved the ſubject of our abuſes for a whole Afternoon together at Ceſonias houſe: For all people believing he was in love with three or four of the City at a time; one woman who knew nothing of the change of his humour, ſaid, that day would undo him, he was obliged to make ſo many magnificent Preſents, if ſo be he preſented all his Miſtreſſes. If you are one of them (replied he) you ſhall ſee what will be done: For my part (ſays Ceſonia) I think this cuſtom ſo ill grounded, that I am almoſt minded to pretend my ſelf ſick on the Feaſt day, for though there cannot be made ſo ill a conſtruction of receiving Gold at this as at other times, yet it is againſt my humour to accept ſuch magnificent Preſents. As for thoſe inconſiderable things, whereby they are neither inriched who receive them, nor they impoveriſhed who beſtow them: I ſhould permit they paſſed between friends, eſpecially when they are equally able to return them; but I am a profeſſed Enemy to thoſe women are taken with magnificent Preſents. It ſeems then you are of the opinion (ſays a perſon of quality whoſe name was Pallas) of thoſe who believe that ſince Jupiter invented the Golden Shower, there hath remained in that Metral, a certain Magical Force, that ſoftens the rigours of all thoſe Beauties which receive of it, and, that the beſt receipt, and the moſt advantageous for a ſlighted Lover, is to oblige his Miſtreſs to take a good quantity of Gold. Since there are no univerſal Medicines (replied Ceſonia) I do not think that, as Soveraign as you take it, abſolutely effectual, unleſs it be on ſome intereſſed woman, with whom merit ſignifies nothing, Gold all things. For my part, replied I, 'tis a thing I cannot eaſily apprehend, how any women can be ſo baſe as to ſell their affection, and am as far to ſeek how there can be men that will buy them: For if I were a Gallant I ſhould imagine ſomething ſo diſhonourable in this kind of Commerce, that I ſhould never prove a Merchant in it. I ſhould no ſooner diſcover in the heart of a woman any thing reflecting on her own intereſt, but I ſhould contemn, avoid, and hate her; and in my opinion an intereſſed woman is ſo far abominable, that I take her not to be good for any thing; for I ſhould neither admit her in the quality of a Miſtreſs, nor of a Wife, nor a Friend, nor a Kinſwoman, nor yet a Neighbour, ſo much do I abhor this kind of unworthineſs. It ſeems then (ſaid Pallas) you have no great devotion for the Feaſt of the Golden Shower? I obſerve it out of curioſity (replied I) but if it happen any thing is preſented to me, I leave it in the Temple, that people may ſee I go not thither to come thence ever the richer: And for my part, replied Ceſonia, I think fitter not to go thither at all.

Perſander and Turnus who were preſent at this diſcourſe, did what they could to oblige her to change her opinion, but ſhe could not be prevailed with to make an abſolute promiſe to go to the Temple: For in fine, ſaid ſhe to them, I have lived hitherto, and never received Preſent wherein there was any Gold; and I will not begin now. Not but that I am of opinion (added ſhe) this ſuperſtition of Ardea hath ſome rational ground; but I have ſuch an averſion from that Metal, which makes ſo many of my Sex commit ſuch horrid enormities, that I will not receive any of it. For my part (added ſhe) I make no compariſon between a woman moved by the ſenſe of merit, and haply ſubject withal to ſome weakneſs, and one whoſe Soul is only open to avarice, and who beſtows her heart on him that bids moſt for it. I agree to what you ſay (replied Perſander) but after all, Madam, (added he) Liberality is a Vertue, and more to be practiſed by a Lover than any other. Ah Perſander (cryed I) is it ſo eaſie to reconcile theſe two things? for I take it as granted that the moſt diſintereſſed woman in the World, is ſhe who expects the greateſt liberality from her Lover; but with this proviſion, that he ſuſpect her not of an imperfection ſhe is not guilty of, and endeavour to expreſs his Liberality, which vertue hath ſuch an eaſie way to diſcover it ſelf, that even thoſe who have nothing to give, find means to ſhew they are not covetous: For a Lady ſhews ſometimes that ſhe is of a liberal nature, as well in not ſeeking and avoiding the occaſions of receiving Preſents, as in making ſuch her ſelf. To deal truly with you, replied I, all women are not of that diſpoſition; for I know one who hath ſuch an excellent gift of receiving, that it may be ſaid ſhe never hath any thing, and is deſirous of all that others have without any exception: For ſhe takes occaſion to commend whatever ſhe ſees, if there there be the leaſt hopes it may be offered her: She asks thoſe who are not of Ardea, what is moſt rare in their Country, that ſhe may afterwards beg it, ſhe permits ſuch things to be ſent into her houſe, as ſhe intends not to pay for; and if ſhe betray her ſelf in ſome little liberality in her life, it is on ſome occaſions, wherein ſhe is infallibly aſſured for the little ſhe beſtows, to receive much: And for my part, I am ſo far perſwaded ſhe can refuſe nothing that's proffered her, that if ſhe had a Lover were ſo faſtantick, as inſtead of Perfumes, Flowers, Fruits, and ſuch accommodations, which may be received without any imputation of Avarice, to ſend her Arms; I believe ſhe would take them rather than it ſhould be ſaid ſhe refuſed any thing.

This Jeſt having put the Company into a laughter, they fell afreſh to perſecute Turnus with the number of his Miſtreſſes, and the Feaſt of the Golden Shower: But he anſwered ſo ambiguouſly, as might convince them they were deceived who thought he had ſo many Preſents to make. To be ſhort, Turnus and Perſander not ſpeaking any thing to one another, were both reſolved to ſurpriſe Ceſonia by moſt magnificent Preſents, if ſhe came to the Feaſt: But they were ſpared the trouble, for pretending ſome indiſpoſition ſhe would not go. For my part, I, according to my wonted curioſity, went, and failed not to find there Perſander and Turnus: But that you may know what is done in that place, I am to acquaint you in few words with part of the Ceremonies of this celebrious Feaſt.

You are then to know, that for the performance of theſe Ceremonies, there is a Temple deſign'd, wherein is to be ſeen repreſented the Hiſtory of Danae, and where the greateſt part of thoſe of quality of either Sex are preſent: I ſhall not trouble you with the Sacrifice which is there offered, for it ſignifies nothing to my purpoſe; but I ſhall tell you, that the Ladies that come thither are dreſſed to the greateſt curioſity and expence, that they are all on one ſide of the Temple and the men on the other; and to ſhew that Liberality ought to be the inſeparable attendant of Love, there is a Cupid repreſented on the Altar, who hath in one hand his Bow and Torch, and in the other a horn of Abundance inverted, out of which may be ſeen falling down, Gold, Pearls, and precious Stones. In the mean time the Ladies who are on one ſide of the Temple, have each of them in their hands, Myrtle-Crowns, and are, for a certain time, obliged to ſtand: For the men who would ſhew their Gallantry, they are on the other ſide, holding every one what they have to beſtow on their Miſtreſſes, in caſe they come to the Ceremony. Having proceeded thus far, he who offered the Sacrifice makes a large diſcourſe in the commendation of Liberality: Which done, all the Ladies one after another paſs before the Image of Love, which they call Love Liberal, and having made a low reverence, they walk gently before thoſe men who have the gallant and precious things, which they intend to beſtow on their Miſtreſſes; and when any Lady comes over againſt him who would make a Preſent to her, he very ſubmiſſively ſtays her, and with one knee on the ground, offers her what it was his deſign to beſtow on her. This civility obliges to accept, but if he who makes the Preſent be ſuch a Lover as ſhe would wiſh were not ſuch, ſhe only receives his Preſent, and makes him a low reverence. On the contrary, if he be one whoſe Service ſhe is pleaſed with, ſhe puts the little Myrtle Crown ſhe had upon his head; and for the Preſent ſhe hath accepted; it is at her diſcretion either to carry it away with her, or beſtow it on the Temple: If ſhe chuſe the latter, ſhe lays what ſhe had received on a ſpacious Altar near the door. But that whatever proceeds from Love may return to Love, all that is laid on the Altar is employed to promote the fortunes of ſuch as love one another, and have not wealth enough to live happily together without ſome aſſiſtance.

In the mean time, it is an affliction to ſome Beauties to go to this Feaſt, and receive nothing, whereas on the contrary there are others, on whom too much is beſtowed, for among us, it is in a manner as diſgraceful to have too many Lovers, as to have none; it being believed that five or ſix pretending to a woman, cannot ſubſiſt without hope, which it were a ſhameful thing for any Woman to keep ſo many in.

But to return to my ſtory, you are to know, that on this Feaſt-day Turnus came thither, with gold Chains in his hand, whereof the workmanſhip was indeed admirable, and his deſign was to preſent them to Ceſonia, and to do it ſo as if he ſhould entreat her to chain him up. For Perſander, he held a kind of Crown of Gold, beſet with precious ſtones, which he intended alſo to preſent her with, as it were in acknowledgment of the ſupreme Power ſhe had over his heart. But they were both much ſurpriſed not to find Ceſonia there, and indeed the whole Aſſembly was much amazed to ſee they beſtowed not what they had on any; ſo that there being no young Lady of quality of all Ardea who was not there, Ceſonia excepted, it was eaſie to judge they deſigned their Preſents to her.

But what was moſt remarkable was, to ſee that day Turnus's three, and Perſander's former Miſtreſs; for the former were all in expectation of thoſe Chains of Gold, and the latter was more than confident of the Crown. But, in regard they would not carry away their preſents, theſe two Lovers went and laid them at the feet of that God of love I mentioned before: I had forgot to tell you, that when I paſſed by Turnus, he ſtaid me and would have obliged me to take his chains, and deliver them to Ceſonia; telling me very freely, that that fair Lady and I were but one and the ſame thing, and that conſequently he might well truſt me with what he had to preſent to her. Ah Turnus, ſaid I to him, you are in a great error; for ſince it cannot be underſtood by all what you ſay to me, it would be thought (if I received what you offer me) that I were one of your Miſtreſſes. Having ſo ſaid I paſſed by him, not giving him time to make any anſwer: But Perſander having obſerved that he had ſpoke to me, he would alſo needs ſtay me, to ask whence it came that Ceſonia was not there? To which I anſwered, that the reaſon of her not being there was, that ſhe would not receive any thing wherein there were gold, whereupon I left him.

From the Temple I went to Ceſonia's, to acquaint her with what had paſſed, and particularly that Per-

Perſander and Turnus had made ſuch diſcoveries of their inclinations to her, as ſhe ſhould acknowledge infallible. For, added I laughing, Perſander, the faithful Perſander, had that power over himſelf, as to ſee his ancient Miſtreſs paſs by, not only without offering her the Crown he had in his hands; but without ſo much as taking any notice of her; and Turnus, the inconſtant Turnus, was pleaſed to ſee paſſing by all his Miſtreſſes one after another, without ſo much as anſwering their looks: So that all that now remains to be done, is to conſider whether you are more obliged to him who is become inconſtant for your ſake, or to him who ceaſes to be ſo, that he might conſtantly love you.

Ceſonia deſirous not to take what I ſaid in good earneſt, anſwered me ſmiling, that haply theſe two Lovers had done this rather out of Revenge than Love, whereupon ſhe asked me divers other things. Nevertheleſs I perceived ſhe was not diſpleaſed at what I told her, nay indeed it pleaſed her ſo well, that ſhe kept me with her all that day: That which was yet more particular in this adventure was, that all thoſe who came to ſee her, congratulated her for her new conqueſts, for ſeeing that Perſander and Turnus beſtowed not their preſents, and that ſhe was the only young Lady of Quality, as I told you before, wanting in the Aſſembly, it was generally conceived it was to her they intended to preſent things of that magnificence; and it may be thence preſumed this thing love had not by its luſtre raiſed ſo much noiſe if ſhe had been in the Temple as it had by her abſence. Beſides, it was looked on as a thing ſo pleaſant, that ſhe ſhould gain the hearts of a conſtant and an inconſtant Lover, that the talk of it multiplied extremely.

In the mean time, Perſander, whom I had told that Ceſonia could never be prevailed with to accept any thing wherein there were Gold, though divers of her Lovers had endeavoured to ſurpriſe her, was ſo far obliged to his imagination, that it prompted him to do a thing which all the reſt had attempted in vain, and withal, ſuch as gave him a happy advantage over Turnus. Muſing therefore how he might ſurprize Ceſonia, he at laſt thought (it being then the proper ſeaſon for Flowers) he had found it out; and employing therein a certain woman in whom he might confide, who was infinitely ſubtle, he debated the buſineſs with her, and uſed her aſſiſtance in the execution of it. She took a ſmall, but ſtrong Gold Wire, which ſhe neatly drew through one of thoſe great Bulruſhes which grow near Lakes, ſo as it might not be perceived: Which done, folding the Wyre and the Ruſh both together, ſhe bent it into a Circle, on which having faſtned abundance of excellent Flowers, ſhe made a kind of Crown which ſeemed very pretty and delightful. But that Ceſonia might not ſuſpect there was any Gold, there were certain diſtances wherein the Ruſh was viſible all about, ſo that it was almoſt impoſſible to diſcover this innocent Cheat. The Crown being thus finiſhed, Perſander beſtowed it into a very handſom Basket and ſent it into Ceſonia, together with a Letter which ſhe received when there was none preſent but my ſelf. At the firſt, as it is natural to people to be afraid of being over-reached, ſhe well viewed this Crown of Flowers, but not perceiving any thing that had any reſemblance to Gold, ſhe accepted it, and reading the Letter aloud, ſhe found it as full of Gallantry as the Preſent: But that you may the better judge of it, it was very much, if not altogether to this effect.

EXpect not from me, Madam, in theſe days, when the ſame things proceed from Ambition as from Love, any thing that is rare or precious: That which I take the preſumption to ſend you is ſo trivial and ordinary, that it dares hardly own the name of a Preſent: Yet, Madam, be pleaſed to remember it may be allowed that of an Offering, and that a Goddeſs might condeſcend to accept it from a heart ſo diſpoſed as mine is. For in fine, Madam, to think all the Crowns in the World ſo far below you as this is, to envy even thoſe Flowers becauſe deſigned to your ſervice, and to eſteem them too too happy though they die to-morrow, if they do but pleaſe to day: Theſe (Madam) ought to be the ſincere apprehenſions which men ſhould have when they do you homage. How glad ſhould I be, Madam, if you ſhould not receive it ſimply out of Civility, as I do it not ſimply out of Cuſtom; and if but one favourable glance, or a ſingle agitation of your heart diſtinguiſh it from ſo many others more ſumptuous and more magnificent. This favour once obtained, what tradition ſoever we have received from our Fathers, I ſhould ſtudy no other way to deceive you, as Jupiter did Danae; and you would be freed from the perpetual trouble of avoiding it. Grant it me then, Madam, for your own quiets ſake: But aſſure your ſelf withal, I beſeech you, that it is beyond all compariſon more neceſſary for mine.

Ceſonia and I having both read this Letter and commended it, ſhe asked me whether it were fit I anſwered it; for in fine (ſaid ſhe to me ſmiling, and looking on that flowery Crown) I think there is no Snake hid under theſe Flowers; or to ſpeak without Figure, Perſander hath put no trick upon me. As for Gold, ſaid I to her, it is not likely there ſhould be any amongſt theſe Flowers, but for Love, I am confident Perſander's heart is well furniſhed. If Perſander be in Love with me, replied ſhe, I am not obliged to anſwer him: Ah Ceſonia, ſaid I to her, while a Lover diſcovers himſelf no otherwiſe than as a Friend, one is not obliged to gueſs at what he hath in his heart, if one would not have it ſo; therefore if you take my advice, you will not gueſs at what Perſander thinks, but write to him: Whereto Cæsonia condescending, answered him in these words.

Cæsonia to Persander.

THE Crown which you have sent me, I am infinitely more taken with then if it were of Gold and Diamonds, and indeed, it comes in a most fortunate conjuncture of time, for I receive it with joy, whereas certainly I should have refused a more precious if you had proferred it me. But believe not however, that I cannot distinguish your favours from your Flowers, for if these please my sight, those put me into disorder. Nevertheless, I shall not put the trouble it is to me that I deserve them not upon your account, since it were not so just I should quarrel with your flatteries, as my own Imperfections.

When this Letter was finished and that I told Cæsonia it was well, she called for the Slave who had brought the Crown of Flowers, and gave it him; which done I told her, it was but just she should for the rest of that day wear the Present, had been made her. But Plotina, said she to me must I crown my self with Flowers, as if I were to be a Victim? No said I to her, but to disguise the business somewhat of a Crown I will make a Garland. Whereupon I went to break asunder that Circle of Bul-rush on which the Flowers were fastned; But I found it a harder matter to do then I thought. But at last, the place where the gold-wyre met giving way, and the Rush broken in divers places through the force I used, the gold-wyre appeared, so that breaking forth into a loud laughter, that my Friend had been over-reached, ah Cæsonia, said I to her you were mistaken when you said there was no Snake under these Flowers, for I have found one, which is very pleasant, and yet withal very terrible,

While I said this, Turnus enters the Room, so that Cæsonia made a sign to me that I should hide the Crown of Flowers, and say nothing of it. But there being abundance of obligation in these kinds of surprizes, and being my self merrily disposed at that time, I obeyed her not. On the contrary, as soon as I perceived Turnus, I began to abuse him, and told him he had a Friend who far out-vyed him, as to wit: For, added I, Cæsonia who would not go to the Temple on Danaes Feast-day, to avoid the receiving of Presents, and fears the shower of Gold, more then the thunder of Jupiter, hath been deceived by Persander after the gallantest manner in the world. Whereupon I shewed both Cæsonia and Turnus that ring of gold-wire which was drawn through the Rush whereon the Flowers were fastned, and presently after I perceived they both blushed. There being only we three in the room, and that I was very familiar with Cæsonia and Turnus, I asked them why they blushed. For my part, says Cæsonia, it may be easily conceived I take it not well that I am surprized: And for my part added Turnus, it may be as easily guessed I am not pleased to see my Rival more witty and more fortunate then I. A Rival replyed roundly Cæsonia! Right Madam, a Rival, replyed he, for though I think Persander hath not openly professed love to you, I have chosen rather to tell you he is my Rival, that you may thence conclude I am his, then live any longer, and you not understand that I love you. And to the end I may nor retract what I say, added he, I tell it you before Plotina, whom I stand much in fear of.

Turnus speaking this smiling, Cæsonia seemed to take it as not spoken seriously, and accordingly at the beginning put off the business very handsomly. But Turnus having a confidence more then ordinary, would not be satisfied: No, no, Madam, said he to her, since I doubt not but you are acquainted with my love, bestow not your wit to no purpose. Though it were so, replyed she laughing, it were no greater matter, for you have loved divers others. I confess it, said he, but I declare to you, I now love none but Cæsonia. How said I to him, have you forsaken your three fair Mistresses? I have replyed he hastily; nay I have renounced all Female acquaintance, and if there be any love left in me for you, it is because Cæsonia loves you, so infallible is it that Cæsonia hath the absolute disposal of my heart. Your heart, replied Cæsonia, is so accustomed to change of affection, that if you love me to day, it is to be expected you should give over to morrow. Ah, Madam, replied he, think me not the same inconstant man of whom you have heard related such stories, unhaply you have thought somewhat fantastick; for I am so altered from what I have been, that I hardly know my self.

While Turnus spoke thus, I was dressing up the Garland of Flowers, for to put on Cæsonias head, but she would not have it, whereat Turnus was very glad: But his joy lasted not long; for Cæsonia desirous he should not take any advantage of it, she said some things to him, whence he might infer, that it was not impossible for her to have some inclinations for Persander, though she looked on this surprizal rather as an argument of his Invention, then any Design he therein had to express his Affection. In fine, said she to Turnus, I look on what Persander hath done, with the same consideration as I hear what you say. Ah Madam, replied Turnus, though there be an equality in the resentments of Persander and mine, yet I beseech you, do not you treat us equally. I shall treat you both as you deserve, replied she, and, to begin with you, Let us hear no more of your pretended Love, for I should be sorry to be one day numbred among your cast Mistresses. Ah I beseech you Madam, replied he, be pleased to be my new inclinations, and I promise you never to have any other. If you were Persander, replied I, you could say no more. Persander is now proved faithless, replied he, and I am become constant. But if Persander have proved faithless, answered Cæsonia, you say it is for my sake: and therefore it will be no advantage to you to reproach him with that in my presence. But Madam, replied he, if it be any advantage to Persander to have proved inconstant for your sake, shall I merit nothing to have proved constant upon the same account? That you you ſtand ſo much upon your Reformation, as to Conſtancy, replied ſhe, granting it true, it ſignifies no more then that we expect your love for five or ſix hours longer. Ah Madam, replied he, I ſhall love you to the laſt gaſp. I ſhould be ſorry you were ſo neer your end, replied ſhe, were it only to ſatisfie a curioſity I have, to ſee into whoſe hands you will commend your heart, when it is out of mine, if ſo it be true it is there, which, to tell you truly, I have no great confidence of. Ah Madam, cryes out Turnus, you are very unjuſt ſo cruelly to perſecute a man who offers you the greateſt Sacrifice that any Lover could. And I am clearly of opinion, replied I laughing, that if you had kept a fair reckoning of all your Miſtreſſes, you might have ſummed up as many as there need Victims to make up a Hecatomb.

As we were thus engaged, comes in Perſander, who thought Ceſonia had not yet found out the cheat he had put upon her. But ſeeing as he came in the Crown taken aſunder, he inferred the plot was diſcovered. 'Tis true, he was further confirmed in it, by what Ceſonia ſaid to him: for ſhe no ſooner had caſt her eye on him, but ſpeaking to him. You are very confident, ſaid ſhe to him bluſhing, to give me a viſit after you have thus abuſed me. Ah Madam I am indeed very unfortunate in it, ſince you are diſpleaſed with it; nor can I believe that ſecret force, which they ſay Jupiter infuſed into Gold, when he found out the precious ſhower whereby he himſelf was felicified, to be very effectual, ſince I find you incenſed againſt me for ſo ſmall a matter. If I had ſurprized her as you have, replied Turnus, I ſhould not think it ſtrange ſhe took it ill; It is true added I, no body loves to be abuſed, but when all's done, I am glad Ceſonia hath been, to teach her that ſhe ſhould not boaſt it could not be done, as ſhe did yeſterday. And further, not to diſſemble, ſaid Ceſonia, I give ſo little credit to this imaginary power of Gold, that I do not fear I ſhall overlove Perſander for the Preſent he hath made me. Ah Madam, replied Turnus, if he had only beſtowed on you this little circle of Gold, I ſhould not much fear him, but I am afraid in this competition of our hearts, you may prefer his before mine. I perceive then, replied Perſander, you have ſpoke many things to Ceſonia, too many, by the one half I aſſure you (replied ſhe) and I am ſo little ſatisfied of the truth of any thing he ſaies, that of all he hath ſo confidently advanced, I believe nothing. How, Madam (replied Turnus ſomewhat haſtily) are you not ſatisfied that Perſander and I love you ſo much, that we begin already to love one another the leſs? Ah Turnus (replied Perſander) I muſt confeſs your Generolity is greater then mine; for I ſhould not have been ſo free as with my own, to diſcover the love of my Rival. I am fully ſatisfied (ſaies Ceſonia) you are both in ſome want of your ſences.
